partment. For my part I always think that it is not a wise course, when a spirit of discontent exists, to avoid going into the question whether or not there really is a grievance at the bottom of it. As I understand the Motion to night, it is simply that this matter shall be inquired into, and I shall most heartily support an inquiry because I think it is one which, in the interests of the public as well as the interests of the Service, ought to take place. My hon. and learned Friend opposite (Mr. Ambrose) wanted to know why the Service would not be satisfied with a departmental inquiry. I confess I am surprised at such a suggestion coming from such an intelligent Member of this House. The reason is that it is the Department generally that is called in question, and it is a recognised principle that it is not wise to put the accused person in the position of Judge, because the probability is that he will find the case not proved, and that is why we want an independent tribunal to inquire into the charges made—into the general administration of the Department. My hon. and learned Friend expressed great indignation at a suggestion which he says emanates from some of the servants in the Postal Department, that the Department is guilty of the adoption of the sweating system, and in an early part of his speech he wondered how business could be carried on if we interfered in any shape or way with the laws of supply and demand. I wish to point out to my hon. and learned Friend that if the Government were to depend upon the unimpeded course of the law of supply and demand, if higher wages were never to be given than are demanded in the labour market, we should have the sweating system in full force. I feel that that is not the position that should be taken up by the Government of a country like this. The country should see that its servants are remunerated, not at the lowest rate at which labour can be obtained, but fairly, so as to enable them to maintain themselves and their families in decency and comfort. I cannot see any real hope for the working classes of this country if it is to be understood that the Government are to purchase labour at starvation wages rather than interfere with the law of supply and demand. I am afraid that, however good the intentions of the Postmaster General may be, he is not in a position that permits him to carry those good intentions into effect. When the Postmaster General, some 12 months ago, held out hopes that the second-class telegraphists at Liverpool would have their salaries increased, for some few weeks afterwards those men received increased pay. Then, as I understand, a Treasury Minute was issued, and not only was the increased pay of those unfortunate men stopped, but they were compelled to refund that which they had already received. After that, we cannot rely much on the good intentions of the Postmaster General, because we cannot believe he has sufficient authority to carry them out.

(10.48) GENERAL GOLDSWORTHY (Hammersmith): The only doubt I have on this question arises from the fact that I think it is most detrimental that the Service should be interfered with, and the public put to inconvenience by agitations such as have recently taken place. Still, I agree with the noble Lord opposite that we should have an inquiry into the grievances of the staff. I beg most respectfully to submit to the First Lord of the Treasury whether it would not be possible to have an inquiry into the administration of the Post Office very much on the lines of the recent inquiry by the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the Financial Secretary to the Treasury into the working of the Customs House. That inquiry brought to light several grievances. The Chancellor of the Exchequer and the Financial Secretary, went exhaustively into the complaints that were made, and ascertained that there were grievances to be redressed. The Postmaster General has done something for the Post Office, but I feel that he has not gone far enough. I do not consider it is right for this country to employ its servants at a low rate of wages. No private employer would do what the Government have done, but if the Government encourages overwork, private employers will do the same. I appeal to the Government to assent to an inquiry of the nature I have mentioned, without any reflection on the Postmaster General whatever.

*(10.50.) SIR E. J. REED (Cardiff): The right hon. and gallant Member who has just sat down remarked that it was undesirable to encourage agitation among public servants, and with that observation I entirely agree; but I think it is a pity that public Departments are so conducted as to render such agitation inevitable. At a large meeting of the Post Office employés it was my fortune to attend, I ascertained that undoubted grievances did exist among them. I think the Postmaster General himself and his principal advisers do not make sufficient allowances for the feelings, the expectations, and the disappointment of their own officers. Twelve months ago when a similar Motion to this was brought before the House I had to take considerable notice of the case of the Cardiff telegraphists, and I am bound to say that on every occasion, when I put the Postmaster General to the trouble of speaking with me on the subject, he answered me most fairly and considerately. I believe he has tried to do, and I do not doubt he thinks he has done all that could fairly and reasonably be expected of him. But what is the state of things? I venture to think that the group of Cardiff telegraphists, having been distributed about the country, are the nuclei of agitation and dissatisfaction that will never be stopped until something like what they regard as justice is done to them. Here we have a number of zealous and excellent officials, for no proved complaint or even declared suspicion, sent away at the briefest possible notice from the town in which they resided, and subjected to several serious disadvantages, all of a penal character. I doubt whether the Postmaster General has ever understood the real feeling which exists in the breasts of these men, and of the whole telegraphic staff of the country, because of the treatment they have received. I should have no justification for reviving this question if the grievance were limited to some half-dozen gentlemen. But it is a burning cause of complaint throughout the whole telegraphic service, and I believe it will continue to be so until redress is given to these innocent men. It is quite true that some of these officers have been promoted to the 1st Class, and are more or less approximately contented. But the Post Office seems to think that if it sends a man into 2nd Class from one town to another, and keeps him in the same class, it will do him no injury. But what is really done in many cases is to snatch a man away from prospective and imminent promotion, and to send him to another town where he goes to the bottom of the list in the same class and is thus deprived of a reasonable expectation of promotion. I feel, however, that in all these personal matters we shall be more likely to get individual grievances set right by appeals to the Postmaster General, and to his good sense and good feeling than in any other way. If I may make a criticism on the Debate of the evening, I must say I should have liked to see it extended; to a statement of the shortcomings of the Post Office not only in relation to the personal staff, but to the growing necessities of this country and this Empire. I believe the reason of much discontent is that the Treasury absorbs the earnings of the Post Office in too great a degree. I remember having a conversation with the late Mr. Fawcett when he became Postmaster General, and I believe he entered the Post Office with the idea that he was about to undertake the charge of one of the most successful and praiseworthy Departments of the State. I took the liberty of telling him that I held the contrary view. I said I thought the Post Office the most inefficient Department that I ever knew, and pointed out to Mr. Fawcett that in many of the remote parts of Japan they had a better postal service than we have even now in many of the rural parts of this country. I do not advocate an inquiry with any view of casting discredit upon the Government, but there is only one way that I know of to improve the Service generally, and that is to strengthen the hands of the Postmaster General against the demands of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. Mr. Fawcett, I remember, told me that he had informed Mr. Gladstone that unless he allowed him to retain in the coming year at least £200,000 out of the profits of the Post Office for the purpose of developing the Service, he should not feel justified in continuing in his office or attempting to conduct the Department. There can be no doubt that the profit appropriated by the Chancellor of the Exchequer is greater now than it has ever been before. [Mr. GOSCHEN: No.] At all events, it is to the appropriation of that profit I attribute much of the disadvantage under which the Postmaster General labours. I appealed to the Postmaster General to give further consideration to the cases of the gentlemen I have mentioned, because it is a burning shame that, in any great Department, there should be men, not convicted and not even charged with a fault, suffering for the rest of their lives disadvantages to which they never ought to have been subjected.

(11.4.) MR. HENNIKER HEATON (Canterbury): The strained relations which have existed between the Postmaster General and myself during the last few years render it extremely difficult for me to take part in this discussion. I regret that the Resolution is not framed in a manner to commend it to the House and the public, because it does not embrace the grievances of the public, and it is concerned only with the grievances of the staff which it is well known have been recently alleviated at an annual cost of £250,000. It is perfectly well known that the Treasury embarrasses the Postmaster General to a considerable extent. I am debarred from voting for the Resolution because it does not refer to the grievances of the public. The first point of the public interest involved in these questions is the relation between the Post Office and the Treasury, for it is the Treasury that impedes the Postmaster General by appropriating the £3,000,000, out of which must come the cost of extending the postal facilities. During the last few years great reforms have been carried out, but unfortunately in the teeth of opposition from the permanent officials of the Post Office and from the Treasury, and the present Postmaster General will retire from office without getting credit for any of them; they were forced upon the officials, and he had to fight the Treasury during the whole period. There are certain grievances, the ventilation of which will interest the public; and some of these affect newspapers. Of late the permanent officials, through the mouth of the Postmaster General, have been issuing edicts against newspapers which contain too much news of general interest as distinct from news of current interest. If less than one-third of the contents of a paper is news of current interest then it is not carried by the Post Office at newspaper rates. A more miserable and unworthy edict was never issued. The edicts of the Postmaster General in this respect have caused great dissatisfaction among the thinking portion of the community. Another great trouble to the people of the country is as regards circulars. In Continental countries circulars are sent in open envelopes; in this country the Postmaster General imposes a heavy fine on any circular which is included in an open envelope. This is an irritating restriction. A circular must be gummed across, or have a piece of string round it, and be open at both ends. If the Postmaster General would adopt the simple experiment used in America, of sending circulars in open envelopes, he would give great satisfaction to the trading community. Such a plan would permit of easy action. Another grievance is with reference to re-addressed letters. If a person sends a letter re-addressed from Birmingham to London, a fine of one penny is imposed. Some hon. Members may not be aware that in the Postal Union if a letter is carried here from France, it is carried free of charge; the Government of France get the whole postage, and we do the work without any charge whatever. But in the case of a letter posted from Birmingham to London, the English Government get all the profits of the stamp, yet they charge the public for re-addressing it to another part of England. That is one of the other small reforms which we have asked from the Postmaster General, who always replies that the Treasury stands in the way. Another grievance is the refusal to allow type-written letters to go through the Post Office as ordinary circulars. The Postmaster General will soon learn that he will have to give in with regard to this. Another small reform which is needed has reference to postcards. When will the Postmaster General grant the request of the whole people of the country to buy them at the face value of $\frac{1}{4}$ d.? Every Member of Parliament wants this reform; yet when I have asked for it two or three times, the Postmaster General has refused, or referred me to the Treasury. Again, why should not the hour of collection be stamped on the letters as well as the date? Two hundred Members of the House of Commons have signed a Requisition to the Postmaster General asking that the plan adopted in America and on the Continent should be put in force here, by which the hour of collection is stamped on the letter as well as the date. It would cost no more, and it would be a protection to the public from unnecessary delay in delivery. But that reform has not yet been carried out. There are other reforms which have been continually put before the Postmaster General, and for which a favourable consideration has been promised, although that promise has never been carried out. One of the great troubles of the public is the Postal Guide. A more confusing document could not possibly be issued. It is issued in the interests of the Department, but is so complicated a work that only an expert can understand it, and, beyond this, the Department are continually puzzling the public by the issue of new copies, so that the public are totally unable to understand how to carry on their correspondence in the best manner. I now turn to the Telegraph Department. There is no doubt that the question of reforms in this Department is really engaging the attention of the public, and I think that the sooner we carry out the necessary reforms the greater will be the advantage to the public and the higher the honour that will be conferred on to the Department. We are told that the Telegraph Department is already beginning to pay, and we think we have a right to ask that the addresses on the telegrams shall be sent free, as well as the telegram, on condition that the address does not exceed eight words. There are other miserable and irritating annoyances in connection with the Telegraph Department, to which I will direct the attention of the Postmaster General. One of these is the charge made for the receipt of telegrams. Under the present arrangement 2d. is charged for the receipt for a sixpenny telegram, whereas if I were to give a receipt for £100 I only have to pay 1d. I ask the right hon. Gentleman the Postmaster General to remedy this grievance. I may remind him that he promised to do so three years ago; but last year he wrote a most humiliating confession, that although he had asked the Treasury to enable him to carry out this reform, they had refused to accede to his request. The whole thing would not amount to the loss of £10 a year, and yet the right hon. Gentleman is unable to persuade the Treasury authorities to carry out this small reform. The public also complain of the worry and annoyance occasioned by the rules of the Telegraph Department with regard to compound words in telegrams. The names of places are often charged as two and three words in place of one word. For example, "De Vere" is charged for as one word, while "De Vere Gardens" is charged for as three words. Again, the word "won't" is charged for as one word, while "shan't" is charged for as two. "Upstairs" is charged for as one word, and "downstairs" as two words. "Baron de Worms" is charged for as one word, while "Orr Ewing" is two words. There are many other anomalies of this kind which might easily be remedied with very little loss to the Revenue. There are no fewer than 100 places in England which are charged for as two words, but which ought only to be charged for as one, and I would suggest to the right hon. Gentleman that all compound words should in future be charged as one word only. That, at any rate, is the common-sense view to take of the matter. In doing this the Postmaster General would be conferring a boon upon the public which would be fully appreciated, and which could be granted at a very small cost. I hope that the result of these annoyances from which the public suffer will be the appointment of a Committee, not composed of members of the Postmaster General's Department nor of the Treasury, but of Members of the House of Commons, in order to see whether or not the reforms I have indicated could be carried out in the interests of the general public. I have only further to thank the House for the attention with which it has listened to my remarks, and to express my earnest hope that some such reforms as I have suggested will speedily be carried out.

(11.24.) Mr. CAUSTON (Southwark, W.): Notwithstanding the long list of grievances which the hon. Gentleman the Member for Canterbury has brought forward against the Post Office, I gather from what he has said that, notwithstanding the strained relations between the right hon. Gentleman the Postmaster General and himself, the hon. Member does not intend to vote for the Motion of the noble Lord the Member for Barnsley (Earl Compton). We have heard the speech of the hon. Member for the Harrow Division (Mr. Ambrose), and I am sure we shall all deplore the inconvenience that he has suffered by the great pressure that has been brought to bear upon him by discontented Post Office officials; but, at the same time, we cannot but congratulate him on the noble independence he has displayed in the resistance he has offered to these attacks. My noble Friend (Earl Compton) and the hon. Member for York (Mr. Lockwood), and the hon. Member for Liverpool (Mr. Neville), have made out a very good case for inquiry. I do not desire to prolong this discussion by going into many details, but, at the same time, I cannot see why an inquiry should not be held into the administration of this great Department. We have had inquiries relating to the Army and Navy, and I want to know why we should not have an inquiry into this great business Department—the Post Office. It is said that this question ought not to be made a Party question, and in that remark I cordially agree. We are all interested in the success of the Post Office and its good conduct, and I do not see how the inquiry can detrimentally interfere with either. It is not only a question of labour, but there are various other matters which would have to be inquired into, such as have been referred to by the hon. Member for Canterbury, one of them relating to the charges made for the service rendered and the regulations enforced with regard to parcel post, book post, and letters. There is no doubt that our commercial interests suffer greatly from the anomalies in connection with these matters. The hon. Member for Canterbury has said that he has for three years been attacking the Postmaster General without any good result. Therefore I think that the hon. Member ought to vote for the proposed inquiry. With regard to labour, there is discontent among the postmen and telegraphists, and postal and savings banks clerks, and their grievances have been pressed forward not only by the officials themselves, but by the public at large, who take an interest in deserving public servants. If everything is right the Department has nothing to fear; if there is anything wrong it ought not to be left without investigation. The Government on this question ought to desire that their followers should give an independent and not a Party vote. Without occupying further time I would earnestly press upon the Government the desirability of granting a Select Committee or a Royal Commission on this question. It ought not to be a departmental inquiry, because a merely departmental inquiry would not give satisfaction. If we desire to give satisfaction alike to the Post Office officials and to the public by all means let us have an inquiry with which all persons interested are likely to be satisfied. I can only further express my sincere hope that the Postmaster General and the Chancellor of the Exchequer will agree to the Motion of my noble Friend.

(11.30.) THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. RAIKE, Cambridge University): In the first place, I wish to recognise the very kindly and conciliatory tone towards myself personally which has pervaded all the speeches in support of what is practically a Vote of Censure upon my administration. But having said that, I am bound also to confess that I have listened with a great deal of surprise—I may say of astonishment—to very much that has been said to-night. The noble Lord who brought forward the Motion, and the hon. and learned Gentleman who seconded it, and other hon. Members, have talked of the “widespread discontent throughout the ranks of the Postal Service,” of the “general dissatisfaction,” and of several things of that sort. I beg to traverse those charges. There is no “widespread discontent,” no “general dissatisfaction.” I will go further, and say that at no time of late years has there been a more general feeling of content and satisfaction among the employés. One would think that the speeches made by the noble Lord and others who followed him had been rehearsed last year, when, no doubt, there was considerable discontent and dissatisfaction; but in not one of those speeches was there one word as to what has been done to allay that discontent and remove that dissatisfaction. The noble Lord and the hon. Gentleman who supported him have been silent about that. I do not wish to detain the House by dwelling upon the steps which have been taken, particularly as I had an opportunity eight or ten months ago of imparting to the House what had then been done to meet the demands and satisfy the requirements of the Post Office officials. But it is due to the House, after what has been said, or rather has not been said, to state that what has been done comprises the following changes: Overtime, as far as postal clerks and telegraphists are concerned, is now paid at a rate and a quarter. The cost of that payment is estimated at £11,000 per annum. Extra pay for Sunday work, which in the provinces amounts to double pay, comes to £53,000 a year; the improvement in the wages in the provinces, £47,500 a year; in the London Central Telegraph Office, £13,000 a year; and in the Metropolitan district to £5,500 a year; extra pay, given upon Bank holidays, £22,000 a year; the revision of the superintending classes throughout the Kingdom now in progress, and about half completed, is estimated to cost £41,000 a year, and the sick pay additionally granted comes to £15,000 a year. The total amount of these additions to wages and the improvements in the condition of sorting clerks and telegraphists amounts to no less an addition to the annual charge on the country than £207,000, and to all this not one single reference has escaped those who have spoken.

EARL COMPTON: The right hon. Gentleman must have forgotten that I alluded to the benefits which have recently been granted, and I thanked the right hon. Gentleman for them.

MR. RAIKES: I think the noble Lord has done so in a very perfunctory manner, and has referred to these things only to dismiss them. When this question was under the consideration of the Government last year they laid down a clear policy, namely, to increase the numbers of the staff so as to reduce overtime, to deal with those various financial changes to which I have referred, and to improve and adjust the position of the superior officers. All that has been done, or is in the course of being done—the whole of the machinery for carrying out that policy is in working order. Overtime, with the one exception of the office to which so much reference has been made, is not excessive, and all that is required is to leave these reforms to bear their natural fruit, and to test by experience how far they correspond to the just anticipations which have been formed. I think that when the noble Lord commenced his remarks he must have rather disappointed many of those who came here to-night expecting to hear from him a general and comprehensive indictment of the administration of the Post Office. I think that they must have been a little surprised when they found that the noble Lord dealt merely in the way of putting them aside with the various questions which he enumerated, such as that of communication between the Western Highlands and with the North of Ireland, further facilities with regard to postcards, and with that question of colonial postage which is so dear to the heart of the hon. Member for Canterbury, and, in fact, many interesting topics to which he referred only to put them aside. I will only refer to one other of those extraneous matters which the noble Lord has mentioned in more than one sentence, namely, the recent controversy with the Boy Messenger Company. For my own part, I have no wish to drag the House into a discussion on that point, which would be outside the general course of this Debate; but as the noble Lord has been good enough to take credit to himself for supposing that his having put down this Motion has accelerated the settlement, I may say that it never crossed my mind that the noble Lord could possibly have dragged that question into the Debate which he proposed to originate to-night, and I must regretfully disabuse the noble Lord of any of the prestige which might possibly attach to him that he had contributed in any manner to the settlement of that question. The noble Lord talked about Petitions to the Postmaster General, and said that there had been a great many. For my own part I suppose that no Postmaster General has ever received so many or has answered so many, as myself, and I can assure the noble Lord that, if he thinks that these Petitions were buried on their way to me, he is entirely mistaken. There might be some irregularity in the form of a Petition, or some impropriety in its expressions which might lead the head of the branch of the Department to send it back to the petitioners, informing them that it was not in proper form; but even in such a case, as far as I can say, I believe I am always made aware of the fact that a Petition has been presented, and the reasons for its being sent back. In the case of the Petition of the London sorting force with regard to the Medical Department, they were told that that was a Petition which their superior officer would not be justified in forwarding, at least as far as that branch of the Department was concerned, and I do not think they were the people whom the Postmaster General could gain by consulting as to the constitution of the Medical Department. Although I am always ready to take notice of any specific complaint made in any particular case against any medical officer, it would be almost impossible to conduct the business of the office if the Postmaster General had to take into his confidence all the sorters of the office as to who was best fitted to be a medical adviser to the Post Office. I have, however, been informed of the Petition, and have endorsed the action of the officer who told them that it was an irregular Petition, and one that could not be presented. With regard to the Petition of the Savings Bank clerks, which it is said had been intercepted by the Financial Secretary to the Post Office, it is perfectly true that the Financial Secretary had referred that Petition back to the memorialists, intimating that it was a document which would not serve their interests, and advising them for their own sakes not to present it. What followed? They did present it, and it reached me through the Comptroller of the Savings Bank instead of the Financial Secretary. I believe that the head of the Department is kept perfectly informed as to every Petition, or suggestion, or memorial that emanates from any class or any branch of it. The case which has been made most of, and which I admit is a serious one, though not one which, in my opinion can in any way be elucidated by a Parliamentary Committee, is the question of overtime in the Savings Bank. I desire to point out that during the sitting of the Ridley Commission, to which so much reference has been made, the staff was not recruited, and it accordingly declined in numbers. The status of these men was being inquired into, and the staff, not being increased, diminished. Thus overtime necessarily grew. It is to be regretted, but it could not be avoided. Till last year, however, overtime was very popular, and officers who have left the Savings Bank Department and been removed to other Departments volunteered for overtime at Christmas. When the period of compulsory overtime expired, only the other day, 138 out of 531 came forward and voluntarily offered to continue overtime. I mention this to show that overtime is not regarded by the staff as an unmixed evil, as is sometimes supposed. The noble Lord said that 531 men had worked 268,000 hours overtime, and that this amounted to the services of 150 men all the year round. I cannot accept that computation, because if you divide 268,000 by 531, the proportion is a trifle over 500 hours, and I cannot see how the proportion of 500 hours can require the services of such a staff as 150 men. But the staff has now been increased, and the Department is in a position to dispense with excessive overtime. Some time ago I stated in the House that overtime in the Post Office was voluntary. Exception has been taken to that statement, but I was perfectly justified in making it at the time. No difficulty had ever been experienced in obtaining volunteers, and it was not thought that at any time it would be necessary to have recourse to compulsion. Certain men in the Department, however, conceived the idea of putting the Government in a position of embarrassment, from volunteering for overtime, and declined to work themselves. Then it was that it became necessary to resort to compulsion and to exercise that inherent power which resides in the head of every Department, as in every place of business, to insist on the necessary work of the country being done and to insist upon the servants of the Department assisting in performing their duty to the State. Now, what were the grievances of those 551 clerks? Their position had been improved—they had received a substantial addition to their salaries, and the maximum salary had been raised from £300 to £350. They had also received assurances that their prospects of promotion would be most jealously safeguarded. Yet they were not satisfied. Why was this?

Because, in my opinion, and in that of my principal advisers, it was undesirable at present to increase the numbers of a staff which showed a disposition to give trouble. Accordingly the Department resorted to the alternative of bringing in female instead of male clerks. To this the male clerks objected. They said that they always expected that, as the business of the Department grew, the number of male clerks would increase, and that the number of superior appointments would also be increased—that they not only expected that their prospects of promotion would remain as good as when they entered, but that they would improve by reason of the increase of the clerks. That was an attitude which no one responsible for the Department could recognise. They were entitled to just and considerable treatment; but they could not be permitted to assume that the Department existed for their benefit. These clerks further said that their prospects of promotion were threatened because it was possible that under the new arrangements the number of superior appointments might diminish. I do not deny that there is something to be said for that contention. All I can say in answer to it is that I have determined, and so have those who are engaged on the permanent work of the Department, that in so far as in us lies we will protect the interests of all the men now in the service as far as their prospects of promotion go. And I would point out that, as they are now all members of the second division, their prospects of promotion are not limited to the particular branch in which they serve. Having now given what I hope is a perfectly fair and candid account of the question raised between the clerks in the Savings Bank and the authorities of the Post Office, I hope I have, in the opinion of the House, really exploded the only thing which looked like a substantial grievance. The noble Lord also touched upon one or two points. He referred to the long hours which telegraph boys have been called on in some cases to work. I entirely agree with what the noble Lord said as to the desirability of not employing boys for such long hours. I very much deprecate their employment for such long hours; but I think it would perhaps have been more useful to the boys themselves, and fairer to me, if the noble Lord had supplied me with the instances to which he referred, and, by writing to me, given me an opportunity of redressing any particular grievance. I would like, however, to point out in this connection that it has been made during the last few weeks a matter of great complaint against the new Post Office Express Service that I did not send out boys at all hours of the night. The noble Lord has also referred to the drivers of mail carts. He said they got 24s. a week and worked from 4 in the morning to 8 o'clock in the evening. I cannot suppose that their work is continuous; there must be considerable intervals; but I do not see that I am called upon to interfere in the private conduct of their business by the contractors now serving the public unless some serious known grievance is brought to my notice. I have done my very best in the course of the last three years to cut down the long hours during which the postmen work, and there is hardly an important town in the country in which I have not succeeded, with the full assent of the Treasury, in reducing their hours to 12, or at the outside to 13. And the House must remember that I do not mean by that, continuous work. Those are the extreme hours over which the work is spread. As regards the rural postmen, I shall always be very glad to deal with any question of hardship in any special case. Since last year the Government has taken a very important step in suppressing the class of unestablished London postmen at 18s. a week, whose grievances formed so fertile a topic in the discussion which took place in 1890, and all the men it was possible to take into the Service are now established postmen. I think the noble Lord might have informed himself on that point before referring to the matter in a manner which led the House to imagine that the unestablished force still existed. With regard to the question of temporary employment of female telegraph clerks at lower wages, where should the Post Office go for it if not to their old servants? There is many a former female clerk whose matrimonial venture may not have been altogether successful, and who may have been left a widow with children to support. She is, at all events, in a position to claim the sympathy and consideration of the Department. As to the wages given, it is not possible to give temporary assistants anything like the wages earned by the regular servants, but I believe that in many cases 20s. a week is most thankfully received and most usefully applied. The hon. and learned Member for York drew attention to the question of the Epsom telegraphists. I think the hon. and learned Member is misinformed if he supposes that the whole of the Epsom staff is composed of men drawn from York, Manchester, Derby, and other places so far away; but I would point out that it is not desirable entirely to complete the temporary staff at Epsom from the Central Office, because every telegram from Epsom has to pass through the Central Office, and that is, therefore, not a time when the Central Office can afford to be depleted. With regard to the grouping of offices, I am not surprised that that should be a subject of criticism outside the Department. I am not certain now that we may not have gone a little too far in that direction; but the groups have in every case been based upon the character of the work, a matter upon which it is impossible for an outsider to form any opinion. The local authorities are undoubtedly the best judges of the nature and character of the work that passes through their hands. I am very much afraid that if one dead level maximum had been fixed it would have been impossible to fix it at a high point, and that, instead of the telegraphists of Manchester, Liverpool, and Birmingham earning 56s. a week as a maximum, they would more probably have had to be content with 50s. It is more than likely that the House and the Treasury would have said, "If we are to have one maximum only, we shall level down instead of up." The hon. Member for Liverpool, who apparently spoke chiefly with the object of denouncing the laws of supply and demand, took exception to an unfortunate incident that has affected some of the telegraphists at Liverpool. It is quite true that there was a mistake in an official document, and that by the document as printed it appeared that the Treasury sanctioned salaries of £155 instead of £150. The mistake—I do not know who is responsible for it, possibly the Queen's Printers—unfortunately escaped notice. If £155 had been retained as the amount of the salaries, it would have been necessary to give the same sum to all the men in the same position in the future, and to allow it also to the clerks in Manchester, Birmingham, Glasgow, and other towns. An unnecessary expenditure would thus have been involved which we did not feel justified in asking Parliament to sanction. I am extremely sorry for the disappointment caused to the gentlemen concerned, but I hope that when they obtain their next annual increment they will forget not only the disappointment, but give the Department credit for not having attempted to perpetrate anything like a cruel hoax. The hon. Member for Cardiff has aired again the grievances of some of his interesting constituents. Having already discussed the question fully in this House, and having obtained from the House last year an express ratification of the course which I thought proper to take on the occasion referred to by the hon. Member, I must, with all respect to the hon. Member, decline to go into the question now. Discipline is discipline, order is order, and the Postmaster General must be given some little discretion, and when he thinks that certain clerks will be better employed at one office than another the personal interests of those clerks ought to be subordinated to the public interest. I am happy, however, to be able to inform the hon. Member that three of the seven clerks whom he has in his mind have been promoted to the first class in the offices to which they now belong, a promotion which they could not have obtained if they had remained at Cardiff. The hon. Member for Canterbury will forgive me if I do not follow him through the wide field which he has traversed. I wish the hon. Member would give the Government generally the credit which he is good enough to give to me. There is no reason why any distinction should be drawn between myself and my colleagues, who are equally desirous to do what can be done to improve the Postal Service. I appeal to the House not to encourage by any uncertainty in their decision to-night any recrudescence of that unfortunate feeling of discontent and dissatisfaction which at the present moment is almost at vanishing point in the Service. The noble Lord opposite is doubtless not aware of it, but he is being put in motion by the expiring Committees of the old agitation, and they do not represent any general feeling in the Service. I think I have shown to the House that the Post Office, the Treasury, and Her Majesty's Government have given the most careful, most exhaustive, attention to all the grievances which have been brought before them, and have afforded most substantial and, as I believe, complete relief. It would never do if, in order to encourage the vapourings of three or four of those gutter journals which disfigure the Metropolitan Press, Members of this House were to make the grave mistake of throwing discredit upon a body of men like the permanent officials of the Post Office, of whom any country might be proud, with whom, I believe, any Minister would be delighted to work, and of diminishing the authority in his own Department of a Minister who, whatever may be his personal deficiencies, at least believes that he has done nothing to forfeit the confidence of this House.

(12.8.) MR. THEODORE FRY (Darlington): I wish to draw the attention of the right hon. Gentleman to the question of the opening of private letters presumably at Post Offices in Ireland. This subject was raised many years ago, and questions have been put to predecessors of the right hon. Gentleman, the invariable answer being that such things never occur. But further cases have recently come to my notice, for letters of mine to Father O'Connor, a priest of Achill, have been opened before they reached my correspondent, and letters to me from Father O'Connor have been similarly treated. A political leaflet was abstracted from a letter which was sent to the rev. gentleman, and a photograph was abstracted from a letter sent to me. I sent a second letter and asked Father O'Connor to look carefully to see if it had been tampered with. He found it had. I then sent a third, and asked him to return it to me unopened. He did so, and I then found it had been re-opened and re-sealed. A railway official in Ireland told me that he believed a great proportion of his letters were opened. I have heard of other cases in which private letters have been opened, and whether this is done from curiosity or by official orders, it is a matter which demands the serious attention of the Postmaster General.

*MR. RAIKES: If the hon. Member will send me the envelopes of any letters which have been opened, I shall be glad to institute inquiry. Of course, the Post Office cannot open letters; it would be a legal offence for any one in the Post Office to open them; and, therefore, they cannot be opened under official orders.

(12.12.) MR. FLYNN (Cork, N.): If it is an offence against the law, then unfortunately the law is very frequently broken in Ireland by high officials, and with the connivance of the authorities. We have brought numerous cases under the notice of the right hon. Gentleman, and in fact it is quite a customary practice. There are certain Post Offices in my constituency in which it is done invariably, and if I am sending a confidential letter to a priest or to a well known Nationalist, I have to send it under cover to some one else. That is a common precaution nowadays. We do not charge the right hon. Gentleman with knowledge of the practice, but we say that the tone which he assumes in regard to our complaint is calculated to encourage the Post Office officials to look upon this as a trifling matter. I can only repeat that if the opening of letters is an infraction of the law such infractions of the law are committed daily in Ireland.

(12.14.) MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): Year after year I have complained of the practice. I wish the hon. Member joy of what will follow from sending envelopes to the Postmaster General. After a decent interval there will come a reply stating that searching and exhaustive inquiry has been made without any result. I can tell the Postmaster General that private letters are habitually and daily opened by his officials in Ireland. I have made complaint of it to him without result. I say that of all the mean devices by which Government is carried on, this mean and sneaking system is the worst, and we shall denounce it if it were proved against the meanest Government in Europe.

Main Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

SUPPLY.—Committee upon Monday next.

(C. 5501)

FALSE MARKING PREVENTION (No. 3)
BILL.—(No. 187.)

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
 "That the Bill be now read a second time."

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.):
 What explanation are we to have of this Bill?

*(12.27.) MR. HOWARD VINCENT (Sheffield, Central): This is a simple amendment of a sub-clause in the Merchandise Marks Act, 1887. Last year evidence was given before the Select Committee showing that two inconsistent facts have to concur to constitute the offence of blind marking, and the enactment is thus rendered nugatory. The evidence of the Outlers' Company before the Select Committee showed that the Sub-sections B and C of Sub-section 3 of Section 3 are utterly inconsistent, and the Bill simply proposes that the superfluous Sub-section B shall be omitted, in order that the law may be enforced. I hope that the House will not object to the Second Reading, on the ground so fully stated in the Memorandum that I need not further detain the House at this late hour.

(12.29.) THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir R. WEBSTER, Isle of Wight): I think that the matter required more consideration than has been given it in the hon. Member's speech. The question is whether the Sub-section really requires any Amendment. It appears to me that the Sub-sections which are said to be inconsistent may in certain cases have to stand together, and I think some explanation is necessary. I should like to explain in a few words what would be the effect of their standing together. I join issue with my hon. and gallant Friend as to what would be the state of things if they were read separately. Sub-section 3 requires, that in order for it to be an offence, the false or improper naming shall be identical with or a colourable imitation of the name of some other person carrying on a similar business. Take the case of a well known firm, such as Parkins and Gotto, one condition of an offence would be that that name should be taken fictitiously, or used by some persons not bond fide carrying on business in the class of goods dealt in by Parkins and Gotto; and the two conditions must co-exist together. It is not intended to prevent a man from trading in his own name, and also in an assumed name so long as he does not thereby do injury to another person. It is a matter for grave consideration, whether or not the two conditions ought not to exist together, namely, imitation of a rival trader and no justification for the use of the name in your own business. There are names used which are fictitious, but well-known in trade such as "Waukenphast," which everybody know is not a man's name, but merely a corruption of "Walking fast." It would be ridiculous to propose to stop the use of that name because it is fictitious, when its use is doing no harm to anyone. I do not wish to express a final opinion on the hon. and gallant Member's proposal. It is rather a question for hon. Members who are acquainted with trading matters, and I do not pretend to indicate to them what should be the decision of the House on the subject. I did think, however, it might be of service to the House to point out what is the effect of the conditions if they are read together, and what will be the effect of the change proposed by the hon. and gallant Gentleman.

(12.34.) MR. HALDANE (Haddington): I certainly agree with the view presented to the House by the Attorney General on the part of the Government. This Bill seems to me to be another of the series of attempts that have been made by traders from time to time to commit a robbery on the English language. They want to secure a monopoly in names for trading purposes. The attempt has been made over and over again in the Civil Courts, and it has failed as often as it has been made. The doctrine laid down by the Courts comes to this: that a person may trade in whatever name he pleases, so long as he does not infringe a trade mark or is not guilty of a fraud, and what the hon. and gallant Member wants to do is to secure to the traders rights that they have not got at present. He is trying to invoke the Criminal Law to do what he knows the Courts, in the exercise of their equitable jurisdiction, would never do. He wants to make it an offence to carry on business under a fictitious name, though that name is used bond fide as a kind of advertisement.

MR. HALDANE: What difference ought that to make? The question is, whether anyone has the right to appropriate and enjoy a monopoly in a part of the English language. Under the circumstances, the House ought to consider carefully before extending privileges which are not in the interest of the public, but of particular traders.

(12.37.) MR. HOWELL (Bethnal Green, N.E.): I may say, in regard to this matter, that there does not appear to be present at this moment any Member of the Select Committee which sat upstairs to consider this subject. It seems to me that the object of the Bill is to satisfy the desires of someone in Sheffield, but the subject appears to me of such importance that, if dealt with at all, it should be by the Government. I beg, therefore, to move that the Bill be read a second time this day six months.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and, at the end of the question, to add the words "upon this day six months."—(Mr. Howell.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

MR. CHANCE (Kilkenny, S.): I would point out that if the Bill passed in its present form, it would be absolutely ineffective. As the law stands at present, the use of a fictitious name is only forbidden when a fraudulent purpose is manifest. If this Bill is carried the question of fraud disappears, and the use of a fictitious name is forbidden if it is not registered as a trade mark; but if it is so registered, it will be in order. All a person wishing to use a fictitious name will have to do will be to spend £2 in having that name registered.

*(12.39.) MR. HOWARD VINCENT: The hon. Member for Bethnal Green (Mr. Howell) says this matter was considered by the Committee on the Merchandise Marks Act of 1887. A Select Committee, of which I was a member, sat last year to inquire into the operation of that Act since 1887, and the Master Cutler, of Sheffield, in giving evidence, said—

"I think the Merchandise Marks Act ought to prevent the use of fictitious names unless they are registered. We were under the impression that it would, but it does not do so."

The Deputy Clerk of the Outlers' Company, in his evidence, dealt strongly with the same point, and showed that the section, as it stands, does not facilitate the identification of fictitiously-marked goods. I would ask the Attorney General if it would not be possible to introduce some Amendment which would meet the cases he raised as to the legitimate use of a trading name.

(12.40.) SIR R. WEBSTER: The question put by the hon. and learned and gallant Gentleman seems to me simply to raise the whole principle involved.

MR. T. M. HEALY: We may take it now as a privilege clearly asserted and vindicated by the Attorney General that men may use names that are not their own.

Main Question, as amended, put and agreed to.

Second Reading put off for six months.

DIVORCE BILL.—(No. 281.)

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."

MR. J. R. KELLY (Camberwell, N.): The Bill has never been printed, and I object to proceeding with so important a Bill at this hour of the night. I beg to move the Adjournment of the Debate.

MR. HUNTER (Aberdeen, N.): I would point out that this is a one clause Bill, and that it would be quite as easy to take the discussion on the Committee stage as at present. One point is to enable a divorce to be obtained in case of desertion.

MR. F. S. POWELL (Wigan): I hope the House will not continue a Debate on this important subject at this hour. The Bill has not yet been circulated.

Debate deferred till Friday, 1st May.

DRAINAGE AND IMPROVEMENT OF LAND (IRELAND) BILL.—(No. 66.)

Considered in Committee, and reported, without Amendment; to be read the third time upon Monday next.

It being One of the clock, Mr. Speaker adjourned the House without Question put.

House adjourned at One o'clock, till Monday next.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

ARMY SCHOOLS BILL.—(No. 83.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Earl BROWLOW): My Lords, the object of this Bill is to place Army schools on the same footing as the public elementary schools, with regard to certain charitable endowments and scholarships. It has the concurrence of the Charity Commissioners, and has already passed the other House. I trust your Lordships will give it a Second Reading.

Bill read 2^a (according to order), and committed to a Committee of the Whole House to-morrow.

PUBLIC BODIES (PROVISIONAL ORDERS) BILL.—(No. 74.)

House in Committee (according to order); Bill reported without Amendment; and re-committed to the Standing Committee.

MIDDLESEX REGISTRY BILL.—(No. 87.)

Read 3^a (according to order), and passed.

ELECTORAL DISABILITIES REMOVAL BILL.—(No. 85.)

House in Committee (according to order).

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: My Lords, as this is a Bill with the details of which I do not think I need trouble your Lordships, I will simply state that it is for the removal of disqualifications of which I believe everybody disapproves. I do not think there are any details in it which your Lordships would consider need be mentioned.

Bill reported without Amendment; Standing Committee negatived; and Bill to be read 3^a to-morrow.

House adjourned at twenty-five minutes before Five o'clock, till To-morrow, a quarter past Ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Monday, 20th April, 1891.

QUESTIONS.

REDUCTION OF RATES ON INDIAN AND COLONIAL POSTAGE.

MR. SUMMERS (Huddersfield): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the estimated loss to the Revenue that was due to the reduction in the rates of the Indian and Colonial postage during that portion of the last financial year during which the reduced rates were in operation?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square): I believe it was about £25,000.

MR. SUMMERS: I beg to ask the Postmaster General what would be the additional loss to the Revenue if the postage rate to India and the Colonies were reduced from 2½d. to 1d.; and if he can explain to the House the basis on which his estimate is framed?

*THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. RAIKES, Cambridge University): Besides a loss of revenue to the extent of £105,000 a year already incurred in reducing to 2½d. the postage on letters to India and the Colonies, it is estimated that an immediate additional loss of £75,000 a year would result from a reduction from 2½d. to 1d. This estimate is based on the amount of correspondence passing between this country and the Colonies, and shown by the latest Returns on official record. It is not, however, practicable to estimate the contingent loss that might result from any considerable increase of correspondence.

MR. SUMMERS: May I ask the right hon. Gentleman whether, in this calculation, he estimates the cost of sending each letter from London to Dover at 1d.?

*MR. RAIKES: The estimate has been based on a comparison from the Revenue derived from a 2½d. postage and a reduction to 1d.

THE EXPEDITION TO MANIPUR.

MR. WEBSTER (St. Pancras, E.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether he has yet received information as to the alleged statement that the troops employed in the Manipur expedition were at the time of the recent disaster without an adequate or suitable supply of reserve ammunition to fit their rifles; and whether, if he has no knowledge as yet on the subject, he will telegraph to India for such information?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Sir J. Gorst, Chatham): I presume that the hon. Gentleman cannot have received a communication which I forwarded to him this afternoon, asking him to postpone this question until I can receive information from India?

MR. WEBSTER: No, Sir; I did not receive a communication from the right hon. Gentleman, and, of course, I will defer the question.

MR. SCHWANN (Manchester, N.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether he has now obtained any official reply as to the truth or falsehood of the rumours which have appeared in the Press, that the Indian troops killed Manipuri women and children in the affair at Manipur, so that, in case the rumour be proved false, it may be categorically denied?

SIR J. GORST: The noble Lord the Secretary of State for India is in possession of official information from Manipur which denies, by implication, the statement contained in the question; but he has thought proper, under the circumstances, to address a special telegram to the Government of India on the subject, and I must ask the hon. Member to postpone his question until the answer to that inquiry has been received.

THE BOMBAY CIVIL SERVICE.

MR. J. M'CARTHY (Londonderry): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether it is true that a grave "block" still exists in the Bombay Civil Service, that nearly one-third of the whole Service is crowded into the four years preceding 1871, and that, although the "block" has been officially acknowledged, nothing has been done by the Government of India, or the Secretary of State, towards removing it; and why have no "blocked" Bombay civilians been employed under the Government of India?

SIR J. GORST: No doubt promotion in the year named in the question of the hon. Gentleman has been slow; but steps have been taken, by the grant of what are called "minimum allowances," to meet cases of exceptional hardship. It is not the case that Bombay men of the years named have not been employed under the Government of India.

THE OPIUM DEBATE.

MR. MACLEAN (Oldham): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether, considering the anxiety caused in India by the Division of Friday night week, and the necessity for letting the Indian Government know what are the real intentions of the House of Commons with regard to the Opium Revenue, he will give a day for the discussion of the Main Question raised in the Resolution of the hon. Baronet the Member for the Barnard Castle Division of Durham (Sir J. Pease), and of the Amendment proposed by the right hon. Baronet the Member for the City of London (Sir R. Fowler)?

*THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster): I regret that the Amendment of the right hon. Baronet the Member for the City of London did not form part of the Main Question raised by the hon. Baronet the Member for the Barnard Castle Division, but I cannot see at present any prospect of being able to find time for a renewal of the discussion in order that a definite decision on the whole question may be arrived at.

*MR. MACLEAN: In the meantime, will the Government refrain from communicating to the Government of India the imperfect proceedings of the House, or calling upon them to take any action whatever in this matter?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I think the hon. Member is well aware of the circumstances and conditions under which the Government of India is conducted. The Government in India is responsible for the financial arrangements of that Empire, and it would be improper if I were to suggest that they will not consider what passes within this House. I have no doubt they will, but they are not, however, responsible to this House. The full and entire responsibility of the Government of India rests with them.

*SIR J. PEASE (Durham, Barnard Castle): Perhaps I may be allowed to say that it is not my intention to ballot in order to place this Motion again as a Substantive Motion before the House. I feel that at this time of the Session it would be inconvenient to the House again to introduce the subject, even if I were so minded. Moreover, I am advised that if I were to do so the Motion of my right hon. Friend the Member for the City of London might be deemed by you, Sir, to be out of order, as it involves a question of handing money by this House over to the Indian Government without a Vote of the Crown. In looking at the matter myself, in the excellent work of Sir Erskine May, it seems to me that the point might arise, although I believe there has been no absolute ruling by you, Sir, in regard to it. On the other hand, I am quite content for the present with the declaration which has been made by the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury, that the policy of Her Majesty's Government has been in the past a steady reduction of the quantity of land in India placed under poppy cultivation, and that that policy will be persevered with in the future. I am also content with the declaration which was made by my right hon. Friend the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs. Under these circumstances, I do not propose to raise the subject again this Session.

MR. H. ELLIOT (Ayrshire, N.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether, having regard to the conflicting statements made as to the effects produced upon health by the consumption of Indian opium in China and elsewhere, to the confusion which it is alleged exists in the public mind upon this matter, and to the insufficient time which a discussion on a private Member's Motion affords for an exhaustive Debate, he will consent to appoint a Select Committee to inquire into the allegations made on either side, with a view of testing their accuracy, and enabling the House and country to form an instructed judgment as to their worth?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I am aware that there have been conflicting statements as to the effects produced upon health by the consumption of Indian opium in China and elsewhere, but I do not think that the appointment of a Select Committee would enable the House to judge of the accuracy or otherwise of the allegations which have been made, as the Committee would not be able to examine Chinese witnesses, and the evidence of those who have merely passed through the fringe of that country would not enable a Committee to form a judgment which would be of very great value.

PAUPER IMMIGRANTS.

MR. HOWARD VINCENT (Sheffield, Central): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade if the Alien Act will continue to be enforced at the 23 ports frequented by poor foreign immigrants, and having regard to the importance of the question and the declaration of the Select Committee of 1889,

"That they contemplate the possibility of restrictive legislation becoming necessary in the future, in view of the crowded condition of our great towns, the extreme pressure for existence among the poorer part of the population, and the tendency of destitute foreigners to reduce still lower the social and material condition of our poor,"

if the statistics on the subject can be laid upon the Table at least every three months; and if he is in possession of any definite information concerning the ultimate destination of the 13,333 aliens who arrived last year in London by cheap sea routes from Amsterdam, Antwerp, Bremen, Bremerhaven, Gothenburg, Hamburg, and Rotterdam, and declared themselves as not en route to America, and particularly concerning the 4,000 arriving by one line trading between Hamburg and Tilbury, of whom the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis reports "80 per cent. appeared to be quite destitute"?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Sir M. HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.): Yes, Sir; it is intended to continue enforcing the Alien Act at the 23 ports where alien lists are now obtained, and, if any general expression of opinion on the part of Members of this House should reach me to the effect that statistics should be issued quarterly instead of yearly, I shall be prepared to give instructions accordingly. As regards the second paragraph of my hon. Friend's question, I have no further information than what is given in the Report.

IMPORTATION OF WHEAT AND FLOUR.

MR. HOWARD VINCENT: I beg to ask the President of the Board of Agriculture if he can state the quantity of wheat and flour which was produced in the United Kingdom in 1890, compared to 1870 and 1880, and the quantity imported from foreign countries and British Possessions, respectively, in those years; and if the removal of the Customs registration fee of 1s. per quarter upon foreign grain in 1869 had any appreciable effect upon the price of bread, and what revenue it would have produced last year had it still been in force?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. CHAPLIN, Lincolnshire, Sleaford): In 1890 the official estimate of wheat and flour produced in the United Kingdom was 9,500,000 qrs., or, roughly speaking, nearly 41,000,000 cwt. In the same year there was imported of wheat and flour from foreign countries, roughly speaking in round numbers, 65,000,000 cwt., and from British Possessions 14,000,000 cwt. There are no official estimates of the production of wheat in Great Britain for the years 1880 and 1870, but calculations have been made by Sir John B. Lawes, and, taking these calculations as the basis for comparison, there was imported in 1880 of wheat and flour from foreign countries, in round numbers, 56,000,000 cwt., and from British Possessions 12,000,000 cwt. In 1870, wheat and flour from foreign countries, 33,000,000 cwt.; from British Possessions, 3,000,000 cwt. There is no official record of the prices of bread in this country, but a Return was ordered by the House of Commons in 1888 of the prices of bread in 12 different unions from the years 1867 to 1887, and it would appear from this Return that no effect can be observed in the price of bread from so small a change in the value of wheat as was caused by the removal of the duty of 1s. in 1869. The duty, which applied to all grain as well as flour and meal, it is estimated, would have yielded a revenue of £2,047,000 if it had been still in force in 1890.

Sir M. Hicks Beach

THE ASSESSMENT COMMITTEE OF ST. JAMES.

MR. COBB (Warwick, S.E., Rugby): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether he is aware that, notwithstanding that it has been arranged that, in the Parish of St. James, the Assessment Committee shall in future be appointed by the whole of the Vestry, great dissatisfaction exists among the great majority of the ratepayers as to the existing assessments, on the ground that they will remain in force until the year 1895, and that the rate books show that, in nearly every case, the members of the existing Assessment Committee are assessed on more favourable terms than their neighbours; and whether he is willing to receive a deputation of ratepayers, or to direct an inquiry, by an officer of the Local Government Board, into the existing assessments?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. RITCHIE, Tower Hamlets, St. George's): If any ratepayer of the Parish of St. James, Westminster, felt himself aggrieved by the assessment of any property in the parish by the Assessment Committee, he had his remedy by appeal. The Local Government Board have no jurisdiction whatever in the matter, and they have no authority, therefore, to interfere. Under these circumstances, I cannot undertake to receive a deputation or to direct an inquiry by an officer of the Board into the existing assessments of the parish.

SUPERANNUATION FUND FOR SCOTCH SCHOOLMASTERS.

MR. FRASER-MACKINTOSH (Invernessshire): I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether the desirability of providing a Superannuation Fund for public schoolmasters in Scotland has been considered by him; and, if not, whether he will take action in the matter?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. P. B. ROBERTSON, Bute): The Scotch Education Department is prepared to give its best attention to any specific proposal for the establishment of a Superannuation Fund which may be submitted on behalf of the teachers; but the Government is not prepared to take the initiative in formulating such a scheme.

POSTAL ARRANGEMENTS IN THE NORTH AND WEST OF SCOTLAND.

MR. FRASER-MACKINTOSH: I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether, in view of the dissatisfaction with the present service in the North of Skye, he will, in the contemplated postal rearrangements betwixt Portree and Lochmaddy, provide that the mail steamers should call at Staffin and Kilmaluig?

MR. RAIKES: I am glad to have anticipated the hon. Member's request in this respect. The mail steamer which is to be established on the 1st proximo between Portree, Lochmaddy, and Dunvegan will call at Staffin and Kilmaluig.

POSTAL FACILITIES IN THE NORTH AND WEST OF SCOTLAND

DR. M'DONALD (Ross and Cromarty): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether it is his intention to ask for public tenders for the conveyance of mails by sea in connection with the increased and improved postal facilities in the North and West of Scotland, which have been lately promised by the Government; and, if not, why not; whether he is aware that, in the Report of the West Highlands and Islands Commission, it has been strongly recommended that existing routes should not be interfered with prejudicially by subsidised steamers; and does he intend to act on this recommendation?

COLONEL MALCOLM (Argyllshire): I also beg to ask the Postmaster General whether, in making the arrangements for the improved postal service in the West Highlands and Islands he has kept in view Clause 51, under the heading (b) steamers, of the Report of the Commission, together with the instruction of the Secretary for Scotland to the said Commission; and whether, in consideration of these statements, he will take care that the contracts be submitted to public tender?

MR. RAIKES: In reply to these questions, I have to say that the recommendations of the Highlands Commission have not been lost sight of. Her Majesty's Government, being desirous of offering at once at least some of the increased postal facilities recommended by the Commission, have made temporary arrangements with the present contractor for new and improved services as an experiment. When sufficient experience has been acquired of the actual needs of the districts in question, the services will be thrown open to public competition in the usual way. No other course could have been followed without delaying the improvements until next year.

POSTAL ARRANGEMENTS IN LANCASHIRE.

MR. HOYLE (Lancashire, S.E., Heywood): I beg to ask the Postmaster General if information has reached him that an important letter, posted in Manchester on Thursday, 29th January, was not delivered at its destination, Bradley Fold, Ainsworth (within 15 miles of Manchester), until 8.45 on the morning of Saturday, the 31st January, and is he aware that great irregularity still continues in the time of delivery of letters there; whether complaints have reached him of the present arrangements under which there is only one daily delivery of letters at Bradley Fold, and that there is no pillar or other post office letter box in the village for the reception of letters; and whether he can remedy the grievance complained of?

MR. RAIKES: I am informed that the delay of the letter referred to by the hon. Member was accidental and in some measure due to the address not being accurate. There does not appear to have been any general irregularity. At present there is only one delivery in the day at Bradley Fold, but arrangements are in progress for affording two deliveries, and it is also in contemplation to establish a letter box at the railway station, from which collections will be made morning and evening.

THREATENED TROUBLES IN SOUTH AFRICA.

DR. FARQUHARSON (Aberdeenshire, W.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether, having regard to the opinions expressed by Sir Sydney Shippard, Administrator of British Bechuanaland, in his Report to the Governor and High Commissioner, dated 30th September, 1890, that we are threatened with serious troubles on the Western border of Gordenia; that there are signs of restlessness amongst the natives in the Protectorate; that we are holding vast territories with a very small force, it is the intention of the Government to give effect to his recommendation that the present force of border police should be increased by at least 50 men and officers for the Crown Colony, and by 50 men, with six Maxim guns, for the Protectorate, as soon as possible?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Baron H. de Worms, Liverpool, East Toxteth): Full consideration was given to Sir S. Ship-pard's opinion, and in the Estimates for the current year provision has been made for an increase of the police force by 25 men and 1 officer, making its total authorised strength 469 officers and men. This force costs £104,000 per annum, out of a total expenditure of the Bechuanaland Government of £164,797, involving this year a grant-in-aid from Imperial funds of £119,700. Her Majesty's Government trust that there may be no immediate necessity for a further increase of the Government police.

ASSISTED EMIGRATION FOR CROFTERS.

MR. WATT (Glasgow, Camlachie): I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether the Secretary of State has been in communication with the Government of Canada, or other British Colonial Governments, so as to conclude the best possible arrangement of assisted emigration and land grants on behalf of the crofters of Scotland requiring to be emigrated?

MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: The consideration of all proposals for State-aided emigration from the congested districts of Scotland was postponed by the Government till they had before them the Report of the Select Committee on Colonisation. That Committee has lately issued its Report, and the Government have now under consideration the recommendation which it contains.

CIVIL SERVICE WRITERS.

MR. TUTE (Westmeath, N.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether, in those cases where writers have been for many years employed upon work above copying and heads of Departments are unwilling to take the initiative in recommending such writers for promotion to the new class of abstractors, the Treasury would make some definite statement or rule for such cases, so that men, thus employed, may not suffer loss of promotion and permanency through unwillingness or refusal of their chiefs to take action in their behalf?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. JACKSON, Leeds, N.): No, Sir; I do not see any reason for any further statement by the Treasury on this subject. As I stated on the 5th of February, in reply to the hon. Member, Clause 29 of the Treasury Minute of the 10th of August, 1889, appears to me to be sufficiently precise. It should be obvious, I think, that it is not the function of the Treasury to suggest increase of expenditure for which heads of Departments see no justification.

THE CENSUS IN WALES.

MR. BRYN ROBERTS (Carnarvonshire, Eifion): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether the great majority of the Census papers distributed in Llithfaen, South Carnarvonshire, were in English without the language column; and, if so, will he cause a fresh Census to be taken in that village?

MR. RITCHIE: The village of Llithfaen forms part of the Nevin registration sub-district. 1,300 schedules in the Welsh language and 200 in the English language were distributed from the Census Office for this district. By an error of the packer, the 200 English schedules which were sent did not contain the extra column for "Language spoken." It appears that only about one-half of these 200 schedules were distributed in the entire registration district. Steps will be taken to obtain the desired information in all cases in which the defective schedules were distributed.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE (Carnarvon, &c.): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether he is aware that in the Census forms distributed at Nevin, Carnarvonshire, the language column was omitted; and whether he will take steps to remedy the omission?

MR. RITCHIE: Nevin is in the same registration sub-district as the village of Llithfaen, to which I have already referred. The same explanation applies in this case also. Only about 20 English schedules were distributed in the parish.

COMPULSORY RETIREMENT.

MR. KELLY (Camberwell, N.): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether any, and, if so, what steps have been taken to enforce that portion of Clause 10 of the Order in Council of 15th August, 1890, which provides that "Retirement shall be compulsory for every officer on attaining the age of 65 years;" whether certain provisions of that Order have been regarded as taking effect from the date thereof; whether the Lords of the Treasury have power by Minute or otherwise, and, if so, under what authority, to modify the effect, or fix or vary the date at which an Order in Council, or any part thereof, may come into operation; and whether all salaries paid to officers over 65 years of age since the date of the Order in Council of 15th August, 1890, have been disallowed by the Comptroller and Auditor General; and, if not, why not?

MR. GOSCHEN: No date being named in the Order in Council of August 15, 1890, the Treasury fixed a date for retirements taking place under the provisions of the Order. Some provisions of the Order have taken effect from the passing of the Order. The Treasury have no power, so far as I know, to vary the provisions of an Order in Council. In this case it was impossible that the provisions should take effect at the passing of the Order, and, no other date being mentioned, the Treasury named a date which they considered most convenient for the Public Service. The Comptroller and Auditor General does not disallow expenditure, but reports for disallowance, and he reports not to the Government, but to the House of Commons. His Report on the account in question has not yet been laid before the House of Commons.

NORTH AUSTRALIA.

MR. WATT: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether he can state how many years it is since a Governor of South Australia visited the Northern territory; whether he can state the total mileage of the Transcontinental Railway (at both ends)

now open for traffic; whether there is any proposition, in case the Australian Commonwealth is established, of completing the line under its guarantee; and whether he can now give any information as to the proposed visit of the Governor, Lord Kintore, having regard to the depressed condition of all the industries in the territory?

BARON H. DE WORMS: The Northern territory has never been visited by the Governor of the colony. The total mileage of the Transcontinental Railway now open for traffic is 884 miles, being 736 from the Southern terminus and 148 from the Northern. No proposal of the kind referred to for completing the line has been brought before the notice of the Secretary of State. Lord Kintore will, no doubt, investigate the state of industries in the Northern territory, which he is understood to have reached on the 1st of this month.

AUSTRALIAN FEDERATION CONVENTION.

MR. BUCHANAN (Edinburgh, W.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether Papers will shortly be issued containing a Record of the Proceedings and Debates of the recent Australian Federation Convention?

BARON H. DE WORMS: Her Majesty's Government have, as yet, received only the first two numbers of the official Reports of the Convention Debates, but see no objection to presenting the Papers to Parliament when complete.

SOUTH AFRICA COMPANY.

MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether he is aware that a Chartered Company is not under the obligation to make Returns to Somerset House in regard to the Act of its shareholders and other matters connected with it, which are obligatory on all Limited Liability Companies not being Chartered Companies; whether, in view of this fact, and that by the 25th Article of the Charter of the South Africa Company it is stated that—

"Within one year after the date of this Our Charter, or such extended period as may be certified by Our Secretary of State, there shall be executed by the Members of the Company for the time being a Deed of Settlement providing, so far as is necessary for,"

amongst other things—

“The regulation of Members of the Company, and the transfer of shares in the capital of the Company; the division and distribution of profits,”

he will cause such a Deed of Settlement to be executed, and lay it, when executed, upon the Table of the House, in order that the public may have the same opportunity to know matters in connection with the transfer of shares in this Company, and with the division and distribution of profits which are available in respect to companies that are not chartered; and whether, in connection with this Return, he will see that it is fully set forth, and that, whilst the Company has to pay all costs and expenditure in regard to carrying out the objects of the concession from Lobengula, one-half of the profits (if any) are retained by the Promoters of the Company, should it appear that this is the case?

BARON H. DE WORMS: I believe that the hon. Member is right in supposing that a company under Royal Charter is not subject to all the obligations of an ordinary Registered Company. The Deed of Settlement of the British South Africa Company was executed on the 3rd February last. It is not thought worth while to print it as a Parliamentary Paper, but any hon. Member can see it at the Colonial Office, or at the Company's Office, or be supplied with a copy. Her Majesty's Government have been advised that they ought not to assume any responsibility for the financial arrangements or the internal organisation of the Company, such as is suggested in the last paragraph of the question.

MR. LABOUCHERE: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether an Imperial Proclamation has been published in the Gazette of the Cape Colony, declaring that any attempt to occupy Banyailand, or to establish autonomous government in that country, will be regarded as an infringement of the rights of the British South Africa Company, and an aggression against British suzerainty, and will be resisted; whether it is to be understood that no British subject is to be allowed in Banyailand without the permission of the British South Africa Company; and, if so, from whence this exclusive right of the Company to occupy this territory is derived; whether he can state how many British subjects there are now in Banyailand, and what is the area of that country; whether he is aware that persons wishing to pass through Mashonaland in order to go northwards are impeded by agents of the South Africa Company; whether he is aware that the Company does not permit any of Her Majesty's subjects to trade in Mashonaland, and that the monopoly of opening stores has been granted to two Kimberley firms, notwithstanding that it is set forth in the Charter granted to the Company, that it is conferred upon it because it will tend—

“To the opening up of the said territories to the immigration of Europeans, and to the lawful trade and commerce of Her Majesty's subjects and of other nations,” and that it is stated in the 20th Paragraph of the said Charter that—“Nothing in this Our Charter shall be deemed to authorise the Company to set up or grant any monopoly in trade;”

whether he is aware that the concession from Lobengula in regard to which the Charter was granted is only a concession granting mining rights to the Company, and that it conferred on it no land, and that promises are being held out by advertisements of the Company in the South African newspapers offering to intending settlers land in Mashonaland (which forms part of the territory included in the mining concession of Lobengula); and whether, in order to prevent Her Majesty's subjects from being deluded into going into Mashonaland by the promise of grants of land from the Company, Her Majesty's Government will take steps to make it known that the Company can make no grants of land, as it has no land to grant?

BARON H. DE WORMS: The High Commissioner reported on the 7th inst. that he was about to issue a Proclamation respecting Banyailand; but Her Majesty's Government have not yet received the text of it. As regards the second question, Her Majesty's Government do not understand that there is any such prohibition. I am not at present able to answer the third question. In reply to the fourth question, we are not aware of any such proceedings. The hon. Member has probably been misinformed. As regards the fifth question, Her Majesty's Government have not been so informed. Any British subject feeling himself aggrieved has every opportunity of stating his complaints to the High Commissioner or to the Secretary of State. As regards the sixth question, the concession (see page 139 of P.P. [C. 5918]) is not merely a grant of mining rights. Her Majesty's Government are not aware that the company has offered land in Mashonaland to settlers, unless conditionally upon it being able to confer titles. In reply to the last question, Her Majesty's Government do not think it desirable to issue any notice, believing that the position of the company in Mashonaland is fully understood, both in this country and in South Africa.

MR. LABOUCHERE: Will the right hon. Gentleman say from whom he obtained his information with regard to what is going on in that part of the world?

BARON H. DE WORMS: The Colonial Office derives official information from the usual sources.

PUBLIC HOUSE LICENCES.

MR. KELLY: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention has been called to the published reports of a case heard on the 9th instant, at the West Bromwich Police Court, in which the applicant for the transfer of the licence of a fully-licensed house at Lyndon was a brewer at Birmingham, who admittedly intended to put a manager into the house, and in which the Magistrates' clerk stated that the name of the holder of the licence was "given as John Cotterill, who had been dead several years," and that he had "Received a letter from the Home Secretary that morning requesting that they" (the Justices) "should be very careful about the ownership of licensed houses;"

and in such report it was further stated that upon the refusal of the Justices to grant the transfer of the licence, the solicitor who appeared for the applicant gave notice on his client's behalf that he should again apply for a transfer of the licence, granted in the name of the person who had been dead many years, to the manager of the brewer;

whether the report is accurate in so far as the statement of the clerk to the Magistrates that he had received a letter from the Home Office, with reference to the duty of Justices, to make full inquiry as to the real ownership of houses when dealing with the transfers of licences is concerned; and, if so, whether a similar letter has already been sent, or is intended to be sent, to all clerks of Justices; whether, if such letter has been sent from the Home Office, he would be willing to state the precise terms thereof; and whether he can state if the circumstances, as to the renewal of the licence in question for several years in the name of a deceased person, are altogether exceptional; and if they are not, what steps, if any, he would propose to take to put an end to the renewal of licences in all such cases?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (MR. MATTHEWS, Birmingham, E.): I have not seen the published report of the West Bromwich case; but it is the fact that I have recently issued a Circular Letter to the Licensing Justices of every Petty Sessional Division, calling their attention to the fact that there was reason to believe that in many cases the register prescribed by Section 35 of the Licensing Act, 1872, incorrectly states the name of the owner of the licensed premises, and asking them to take steps to rectify, if necessary, the existing register, and to secure the due observance of the statute in future. I shall be happy to show the Circular to my hon. Friend. I cannot think that the facts referred to as to the renewal of a licence in the name of a deceased person during a long period of time, if accurately stated, can be otherwise than exceptional, but I have asked for a full Report as to all the circumstances of this case, and I will then consider what action, if any, it may be necessary to take in the matter.

MR. J. WILSON (Durham, Mid.): May I ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he will be willing to give the letter as a Parliamentary Paper?

MR. MATTHEWS: I do not think it would be worth while to give as a Parliamentary Paper a Circular Letter which any hon. Member may see.

MR. SUMMERS: Will it be possible for the right hon. Gentleman to give a correct Return of the real owners of licensed houses?

MR. MATTHEWS: Yes, Sir; if I can get the materials. That is the object of my letter.

HONOURABLE ARTILLERY COMPANY

MR. CAUSTON (Southwark, W.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether the statement in the Standard newspaper, of the 10th instant, is well-founded, namely, that the Secretary for War has approved of the allowances given to Artillery Volunteer Corps being extended to the artillery portion of the Honourable Artillery Company; and the issue will be made shortly on account of those members of the horse and field batteries who were returned as efficients on the 31st of last October; whether it is contrary to the provisions of the Volunteer Act to make this grant; and, if so, upon what authority it is made; and whether the Honourable Artillery Company has asked for this allowance?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. E. STANHOPE, Lincolnshire, Horncastle): The allowances given to Artillery Volunteer Corps have been extended to the artillery portion of the Honourable Artillery Company under the special regulations of that regiment, and at the request of its Colonel, who accepts, as regards its artillery portion, as a condition of this grant all the liabilities which fall upon other corps under the Volunteer Act.

COLONEL LAURIE (Bath): May I ask whether the Honourable Artillery Company are enrolled in accordance with the provisions of the Volunteer Act, and under what Vote the money will come?

MR. E. STANHOPE: They are not enrolled; but they have accepted the full responsibilities of Volunteers, and the money, therefore, will be voted under the Volunteer Vote.

MR. CAUSTON: Is there not a clause in the Volunteer Act providing that nothing in this Act shall apply to the Honourable Artillery Company?

MR. E. STANHOPE: If the hon. Member wishes I will look further into the matter; but, for my part, I do not see how there can be any objection to extending to the Honourable Artillery Company the advantages enjoyed by other Volunteers if they accept the same conditions.

MEDICAL PRACTICE IN FRANCE.

DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether, under the provisions of the recent Medical Law enacted by the French Government, no British medical man will be permitted to practise in France without having obtained the diploma of Doctor of Medicine in one of the State Faculties, except when a special dispensation is granted by the Minister of State; and whether French medical men are permitted to practise their profession in England?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Sir J. FERGUSON, Manchester, N.E.): We are not aware in what form the Bill in question has passed the French Legislature, or if it has passed; but inquiry is being made. French and other foreign medical men are free to practise their profession in this country, subject to certain disabilities, unless they are registered under the Medical Act of 1886; but the provisions of that Act in this respect do not take effect, unless the country to which they belong has conceded reciprocal privileges.

STANDARD OF HALF-TIME.

MR. SUMMERS: I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education if he can state the number of School Boards and School Attendance Committees in England and Wales in which the Standard of half-time exemption, fixed by the bye-laws, is as low as Standard II. and Standard III. respectively, and the number of School Boards and School Attendance Committees in which the standard of full-time exemption, fixed by the bye-laws, is lower than Standard VI?

THE VICE PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Sir WILLIAM HART DYKE, Kent, Dartford): The information will take a little time to prepare; but I shall be happy to furnish it, if, in the meantime, the hon. Member will put his request on the Notice Paper in the form of a Parliamentary Return, which, I would suggest, might usefully show the number of cases in which the standard of full-time exemption is now either the IVth or the Vth., rather than those where it is lower than the Vth.

ARMY MEDICAL OFFICERS.

MR. BARTLEY (Islington, N.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether he proposes to grant to Army Medical Officers the composite titles suggested by Lord Camperdown's Committee?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: I am quite ready to recommend to Her Majesty the grant of composite military and medical titles if such a concession meets the wishes of officers of the Army Medical Staff; but I am met with the difficulty that this concession, although asked for in Sir Andrew Clark's letter of January 17 last, appears to be repudiated in his later letter of March 7. These officers, I should state, have not approached me or His Royal Highness the Commander-in-Chief through any recognised official channel, but I assume that Sir Andrew Clark is expressing their opinion on the subject.

DR. FARQUHARSON: Will the right hon. Gentleman bring on the Army Estimates sufficiently early to ensure a proper discussion on the matter?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: I am afraid that it will not be in my power to prescribe when the Estimates shall be brought on.

REMOVING CATTLE WITHOUT A LICENCE.

MR. MARK J. STEWART (Kirkcubrightshire): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Agriculture if he is aware that last month the fine of 19s., including expenses, was imposed at a Justice of the Peace Court in Elgin on John Taylor, son of a butcher, who pleaded guilty for having on the 16th February last moved from Rothienorman Railway Station, in a scheduled district, four cattle from Rothies without a movement licence from the Local Authority; whether the Board of Agriculture has taken any notice of the sentence; and whether, having regard to the large gains which may arise through contravention of the Orders in Council, it is his intention to take any steps, by legislation or otherwise, to secure the infliction of more severe penalties for such offences, and thus deter dealers, butchers, and others in the cattle trade from spreading infection through the country?

MR. CHAPLIN: The only information which I have upon this subject is that which is contained in the public Press, from which it appears that at a Court in Elgin on March 30, Bailie Grant, General Duff, and Dr. Webster on the Bench, John Taylor was charged with having, on February 16, moved from Rothienorman Railway Station, in a scheduled district, four cattle to Rothies without having a movement licence from the Local Authority of the County of Elgin. He pleaded guilty, and the Justices imposed a modified penalty of 19s. and costs, the maximum penalty under the Act being £20. It is not for me to criticise the action of the Bench, and, indeed, I know nothing of the circumstances; but it is obvious that if penalties of this trifling amount were usually imposed it would render it impossible to enforce the Act.

PLEURO-PNEUMONIA.

MR. BARCLAY (Forfarshire): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Agriculture whether pleuro-pneumonia has been detected in the lungs of an animal from the United States of America, recently slaughtered at Deptford; and whether the Veterinary Inspector sent by the Government of the United States was made aware of the discovery, and agreed that the lungs were so diseased; and if he will give the port of shipment?

MR. CHAPLIN: Pleuro-pneumonia has been detected in the lungs of two animals which arrived on the steamship Parkmore from Baltimore, and were landed at Deptford on the 7th of this month. The Veterinary Inspector sent by the United States has been made aware of the discovery; but I am informed that he has expressed no decided opinion at present, and has sent a portion of the lungs to America for further examination. I may add that in the opinion of the experts of the Board of Agriculture there is not the slightest doubt as to the character of the disease, which is precisely the same as that which we are endeavouring to extirpate in the United Kingdom at present.

UNITED STATES AND BRAZIL
COMMERCIAL TREATY.

MR. OCTAVIUS V. MORGAN (Battersea): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether he will state the present condition of the proposed Commercial Treaty between the Republics of the United States of North America and Brazil?

SIR J. FERGUSSON: It has been in operation since the 1st of this month.

SECOND DIVISION CLERKS.

MR. KELLY: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether Second Division clerks in the Home Office are paid for overtime at the uniform rate of 1s. 6d per hour; and, if so, whether he will state the terms of the Treasury Minute under which such remuneration was granted; and whether he will take the necessary steps to secure uniformity of pay for overtime throughout the Public Service so far as the Second Division clerks are concerned?

MR. JACKSON: One shilling and sixpence per hour is the general rate allowed by the Treasury for Second Division clerks' overtime. There is no general Treasury Minute laying down this rule. It is, however, well known throughout the Service, and I understand that the Comptroller and Auditor General queries any payment above the recognised rate. In these circumstances, it is unnecessary for me to circulate any new rule.

THE POTATO DISEASE.

DR. CAMERON (Glasgow, College): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Agriculture whether his attention has been called to a Report recently published by the French Government as to the success attending the use of a solution of sulphate of copper for the prevention and cure of potato disease, and the Report of M. Petermann, Director of the Station Agronomique de l'État at Gemblons, Belgium, on the use of sulphates of copper and iron for the same purpose; and whether, considering the great importance of the subject to potato growers in this country, he will take steps to publish the substance of these Reports in a form accessible to British agriculturists?

MR. CHAPLIN: The Reports on the experiments conducted by M. Aimé Girard in France upon the use of sulphate of copper in the prevention or cure of potato disease during 1888 and 1889, to which attention has recently been drawn, were under the consideration of the Board of Agriculture last summer. A translation of these Reports was forwarded to the Irish Government, by whom, I understand, valuable experiments have been tried in various parts of Ireland, which are to be repeated on a larger scale this year. Since then we have received, within the last few days, information as to the further experiments conducted by M. Girard with sulphate of copper in 1890, and we have also received M. Petermann's Report of his similar experiments in Belgium. As soon as we have the French Report for 1890 complete it is proposed to issue a leaflet embodying the results of these Reports for the information of British agriculturists.

SALMON FISHERY ACTS.

MR. MACARTNEY (Antrim, S.): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade what are the Salmon Fishery Acts and the sections thereof relating to the placing of gratings in watercourses, millraces, or other channels for conveying water for working mills; and whether there are any special provisions relating to mills worked by turbines; and, if so, if he will state the Acts and sections containing these special provisions?

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: The sections of the Salmon Fishery Acts which relate to the placing of gratings in watercourses are the 13th section of the Salmon Fishery Act, 1861, and the 54th, 58th, 59th, 60th, and 61st sections of the Salmon Fishery Act, 1873. These Acts apply almost exclusively to England and Wales. There are no provisions for distinguishing one description of milling machinery from another.

THE CASE OF MRS. JACKSON.

MR. COBB: I beg to ask the Attorney General whether, having regard to the recent decision in the case of Mr. and Mrs. Jackson, and to the effect which that decision has had upon subsequent decisions and statements, as to the present state of the Law of Divorce, of Judges of the High Court of Justice and inferior Courts, the Government are prepared to bring in at once a short Bill assimilating the English to the Scotch Law, by providing that desertion for a certain number of years shall give a right of divorce to the husband or wife, and that a wife shall have the same right as a husband now has of obtaining a divorce on the ground of adultery only; and whether, in the alternative, the Government will afford facilities for the early Second Reading of the Bill introduced by the hon. and learned Member for Aberdeen, and other hon. Members for a similar assimilation of the law?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir R. WEBSTER, Isle of Wight): The decision of the Court of Appeal in the case of Mrs. Jackson did not, in the opinion of the learned Judges who pronounced it, make any alteration in the law, but only declared the law. Under these circumstances, no attention should be paid to any statements made without judicial authority. Her Majesty's Government do not propose to introduce any Bill proposing any change in the law. The last paragraph of the hon. Member's question should be addressed to my right hon. Friend the First Lord of the Treasury; but I think I may say that it will not be possible to give facilities for the Bill of the hon. and learned Member for Aberdeen.

MR. COBB: May I point out that it is not the dictum of Magistrates, but one of the Judges of the High Court—Mr. Justice Jenne?

SIR R. WEBSTER: I think the hon. Member has quite misunderstood Mr. Justice Jenne. His remarks were addressed to a particular case, and had no reference to any alteration of the law consequent on the decision in the Jackson case.

IMPROVED STEAM COMMUNICATION IN THE NORTH OF SCOTLAND.

DR. M'DONALD: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether, in his arrangements for new and improved steamer communications in the Western Isles and North of Scotland, he has acted on the statement in the Report of the last West Highlands and Islands Commission, which states—

"It is, however, so doubtful whether the institution of new routes of steamers would not interfere with existing routes, and it is so clear that Government would not be justified in subsidising one steamer if it had the effect of stopping another, that great care will be required in giving effect to this recommendation; and every effort should be made to secure the co-operation of the Carrying Companies now engaged in the West Coast Trade;"

and if some of such competing companies have been so conferred with, why not all?

MR. W. H. SMITH: The Government would much regret if new steamer services on the West Coast of Scotland should have the effect of inflicting any permanent injury on persons now engaged in the carrying trade in that district, and they will be glad to consider any representations or suggestions on the subject that may be made to them. The arrangement which will come into force on the 1st of next month is of a provisional character only, and it is open to any modification which may hereafter be found desirable. It is hoped that in the course of next year it may be found practicable to invite tenders from parties who may be willing to undertake the whole or any part of the services; but, as it was important to start the new services at once, this course could not be adopted at the present moment.

THE LABOUR COMMISSION.

MR. NORRIS (Tower Hamlets, Limehouse): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury if it is by intention or mistake that, whereas the dock labourers are directly represented on the Labour Commission by one of their leaders, the great Dock Companies and Wharves of London, who control property of immense value and employ nearly 100,000 men daily, are not represented on the Commission; and whether he will consider the advisability of such a nomination?

MR. W. H. SMITH: I am quite aware that no representative of the Dock Companies has been placed on the Labour Commission; but I am confident that their interests will be fully looked after by the members of the Commission. It was impossible for the Government to place on the Commission representatives of all the interests which were concerned in the inquiry.

MR. NORRIS: May I ask whether there will not be a representative of the shipping interest of London?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: It is impossible to place upon this Commission representatives of every interest in every locality. If we had attempted anything of the sort the Commission would have become a Congress, and it would be impossible to expect a satisfactory result. Any hope, indeed, of such a result would have been compromised if we had done as my hon. Friend suggests.

*MR. COBB: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether the only reason which the Government had for not recommending to Her Majesty the name of Mr. Michael Davitt as a member of the Royal Commission on Labour was that he was a Republican; whether he can give specific references to speeches or writings of Mr. Davitt showing that he holds Republican opinions; whether there is any precedent of an appointment by Her Majesty of any person holding Republican opinions upon a Royal Commission, or as a Member of Her Majesty's Government; and whether the Government will re-consider their decision, with a view of still recommending Her Majesty to appoint Mr. Davitt a member of the Commission?

COLONEL SAUNDERSON (Armagh, N.): Before my right hon. Friend answers that question, may I ask him whether it is not the case that Mr. Michael Davitt was tried, convicted, and sentenced to a term of penal servitude for felony?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I will answer the question of the hon. Member for the Rugby Division first. I am not aware whether the hon. Member has any authority for the allegations contained in his question. All the communications which passed with reference to Mr. Michael Davitt were confidential. The evidence given by Mr. Michael Davitt before the Special Commission, and the recitals and the judgment of the Commission with regard to him were carefully considered by Her Majesty's Government, and they did not think, with those facts before them, that Mr. Davitt was qualified for appointment to the Labour Commission. In reply to my hon. and gallant Friend, I may say that I believe Mr. Davitt was tried and sentenced for treason felony.

*MR. COBB: With respect to the query put to me by the right hon.

Gentleman, I may say that the question has been altered since I put it down on the Paper. I asked him whether—

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! I struck the words out myself, and for this reason. The hon. Gentleman proposed to ask, "Whether it was true, as stated." That is a form which is sometimes adopted by hon. Members; but I think the responsibility attaches to an hon. Member when he puts a question that he should not simply take up a rumour, but should assume the responsibility, and ask whether or not a certain fact is true.

*MR. COBB: Perhaps I may be in order, as the right hon. Gentleman has raised the question, in saying that I saw the statement in one of the morning papers—I believe it was the Standard, but I am not sure. I trust the right hon. Gentleman will allow me to ask him this—whether, to avoid misapprehension, he will say whether any of the proceedings before the Special Commission influenced the Government in refusing to recommend Mr. Michael Davitt as a member of the Commission?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I have answered the question upon the Paper.

DR. TANNER: May I ask whether the House is to understand from the right hon. Gentleman that Mr. Davitt, having served his term of penal servitude for treason felony, is to be subject to future disqualification?

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order!

THE WEST HIGHLANDS AND ISLANDS.

MR. FRASER - MACKINTOSH: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether, in view of the importance and urgency of the Government proposals with reference to the West Highlands and Islands, he will give an opportunity for their discussion prior to the Whitsuntide Recess?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: The Government are doing all they can to meet the necessities disclosed by the inquiry held by the Highlands and Islands Commission; but I am unable to give a pledge that the Estimates to carry out our proposals will come up for discussion before Whitsuntide. I hope, however, it may be possible to meet the wishes of the hon. Gentleman in this respect.

SCIENCE SCHOOLS AND MUSEUMS, &c.

SIR H. ROSCOE (Manchester, S.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he will have sketch plans prepared and placed in the Library, showing the relative positions of the existing Science Schools and Science Museums, the proposed buildings for the same purposes, and the proposed Gallery of Modern Art, on the land at South Kensington?

MR. GOSCHEN: Perhaps I may be allowed to answer the question. As no definite scheme has yet been framed, it would be impossible to show exactly the appropriation of land now vacant; but I can promise the hon. Member a ground plan showing what land is available for further science buildings.

SIR H. ROSCOE: May I ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he will give an assurance that the final step will not be taken in the appropriation of the land until after hon. Members have had some opportunity of inspecting the plan?

MR. GOSCHEN: The position of the matter is this. The House knows of the very generous offer that has been made of £80,000 to erect a building. A great deal of necessary and unavoidable delay has taken place, and I think it would be unwise to risk the failure of that generous gift by any further delay. Therefore, I am unwilling to pledge myself to any further delay; but I can assure my hon. Friend that every security will be given to gentlemen interested in science that their wishes shall be met as far as possible.

MR. DE COBAIN.

COLONEL SAUNDERSON: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he is aware that a warrant has been issued against Mr. De Cobain, Member for East Belfast, for a serious crime; whether it is a fact that Mr. De Cobain has communicated with persons in this country admitting his cognisance of the charge made against him; whether Mr. De Cobain has made any communication announcing his intention of meeting the charge made against him; and whether, should Mr. De Cobain continue to remain outside the jurisdiction of this country, he will take the sense of the House on the conduct of Mr. De Cobain?

MR. W. H. SMITH: I am aware that a warrant has been issued against Mr. De Cobain. I am not aware that he has communicated with persons in this country as to his cognisance of the charge made against him, or as to his intention of meeting that charge. Should Mr. De Cobain continue to remain outside the jurisdiction of this country, it will have to be seriously considered whether the same procedure should not be followed as in the Sadleir case; but the House was on that occasion of opinion that a proper interval of time should elapse after the issue of the warrant for arrest before the proceedings were taken which led to expulsion.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I beg to give notice that if any attempt of this sort is made I shall move that, as Mr. De Cobain is Grand Master of the Orange Lodge, a Special Commission shall be appointed. [Cries of "Order!"]

COLONEL SAUNDERSON: He is not Grand Master.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Well, Past Grand Master. ["Order!"] I would ask whether any of the accessories to the crime have been convicted?

MR. W. H. SMITH: I have no information beyond that which I have communicated to the House.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Then I will address the question to the Chief Secretary.

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): I have nothing whatever to do with the matter, and take no interest in it.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I will put a question to the Attorney General for Ireland to-morrow.

THE COMMISSIONERS OF INTER-MEDIATE EDUCATION.

COLONEL WARING (Down, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that the Commissioners of Intermediate Education refuse to accept as evidence of the age of candidates, certified extracts from the parochial registries of the Church of Ireland, recording the dates of birth and baptism; and whether they are authorised thus to reject evidence which is regarded as sufficient in the Courts of Law, and in the various Departments of the Public Service?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Assistant Commissioners of Intermediate Education report that candidates are required to produce as evidence of age a certified extract from a public registry of births. As this evidence exists under statute since 1864 and is readily obtainable, the Commissioners are of opinion that it is the most advisable to adopt as a uniform standard.

ILLITERATE IRISH VOTERS.

MR. WEBSTER: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that at the recent North Sligo election, owing to a large number of illiterate voters presenting themselves at one time at one polling station, the forms for illiterate votes ran short, and in consequence that polling booth had to be closed for a considerable period, and also that, when many of the voters presented themselves to vote as illiterates, long discussions arose between the personation agents of the two candidates as to whether the several claims to vote as illiterates were bona fide ones or not, and in consequence great delay arose; were any persons who had not taken the oath of secrecy permitted to remain in the polling stations while the illiterates' votes were being taken; and whether the Government propose to cause inquiry to be made into the subject?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Sheriff reports that it is the case that at No. 3 booth of Grange polling station the forms for illiterate voters ran short, but that the booth was not closed. Discussions did arise there between the personation agents as to the bona fides of some claims made to vote as illiterates. The Presiding Officer informs the Sheriff that he ordered out of the booth any person not producing a declaration of secrecy. Similar discussions as to inability to read occurred in the other booths. It appears from further inquiries that the number of illiterates was nearly accurately stated in the Press; I stated it inaccurately. It was 1,783.

PRESENTMENTS AT THE DONEGAL ASSIZES.

MR. MAC NEILL (Donegal, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that, at the last Assizes for the County Donegal, every presentment for the town of Ballyshannon was thrown out by the Grand Jury, on which that district was entirely unrepresented; that at the previous Assizes, in the summer of 1890, every presentment for the town of Ballyshannon was likewise thrown out; and that among the presentments so thrown out at the latter Assizes was one for the repair of Ballyshannon Bridge, which is in a dangerous condition, the water having soaked to the foundations, which are undermined by the washing away of the lime and cement; whether he is aware that, although the said presentments have been thrown out, a County Donegal Grand Jury granted £4,000 to the widow of District Inspector Martin with the full knowledge that the Government were about to provide for that lady; and whether he will take any steps, by legislation or otherwise, to secure that works for the safety of the public should not be hindered by persons who do not represent the community?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The presentments of Grand Juries do not come under the cognisance of the Executive Government, but I understand that the statements contained in the question are not correct.

ETHER DRINKING IN IRELAND.

MR. S. SMITH (Flintshire): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been drawn to an article in the Christian Herald of 26th March, wherein it is stated that there are 46,000 ether drinkers in the North of Ireland, imbibing annually 18,000 gallons of this liquid; whether he is aware that ether is sold by chemists, publicans, grocers, and hawkers or ragmen who go through the country districts; and whether the Government can see their way to put down the sale of this drug by re-imposing the tax upon it, or otherwise?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The hon. Member has been good enough to send me the article from the Christian Herald to which the question refers. The Local Constabulary Authorities report that from close inquiry and observation they are satisfied that the numbers given in the article in question are wholly exaggerated. The improper sale of ether as an intoxicant had been promoted through the agencies indicated in the second paragraph; but the matter having come under the notice of the Government they took prompt steps in November last to suppress it. Ether was thereupon scheduled as a poison, and can now only be sold by authorised chemists, and by them only as a poison. Inquiries show that since that time the sale has largely diminished.

CAVAN, LEITRIM, AND ROSCOMMON LIGHT RAILWAY COMPANY.

MR. KNOX (Cavan, W.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether his attention has been called to the fact that the Directors of the Cavan, Leitrim, and Roscommon Light Railway Company maintain an office in Dublin, with a manager, secretary, and large staff of clerks, though they have also ample offices in Ballinamore with another manager and staff; whether a large part of their offices at Ballinamore has been let to the Arigna Mining Company at less than a fair profit rent; whether he is aware that the Baronial Auditor, appointed at Presentment Sessions for the Barony of Carrigallen, has been refused access to the books of the Company prior to the 1st November, 1889, though without such access he cannot properly audit the accounts of the Company now under audit; whether the Company are in the habit of inviting tenders for contracts; and whether he will consider the advisability of taking further action, either by the enforcement or amendment of the existing law, in order to control the expenditure of the Company in the interests of the cess-payers and the Treasury?

MR. JACKSON: The matter referred to in the question has not been otherwise brought before me, and I do not know whether the statements made are correct or not.

MR. KNOX: I beg to ask the Postmaster General what are the obstacles which prevent the use of the Cavan, Leitrim, and Roscommon Railway for the conveyance of mails; and what would be the cost of conveyance of the English mails arriving at Belturbet at 1.30 p.m. to Ballinamore and other stations on the Cavan, Leitrim, and Roscommon Railway, and by car to Swanlinbar from Bawnboy Station, thereby expediting their delivery by more than 12 hours?

MR. RAIKES: As regards the use of the Cavan, Leitrim, and Roscommon Light Railway for the conveyance of the mails, inquiry has shown that, independently of the question of expense, there would be no general advantage in using it for the night mails. As regards day mail services, I have received to-day some suggestions which I will carefully consider, and come to a decision upon them as soon as possible.

POSTAL SERVICE BETWEEN CAVAN AND CLONES.

MR. KNOX: I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether he can now say whether any arrangement can be made with the Great Northern Railway Company of Ireland for an improved postal service between Cavan and Clones?

MR. RAIKES: Steps are being taken to ascertain for what payment the Great Northern Railway Company of Ireland would provide a night mail service by train in both directions between Clones and Cavan. As soon as this information is received, I shall be in a position to deal with the matter.

POST OFFICES AT DOWRA AND GLANGELVIN.

MR. KNOX: I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether he can now say whether any arrangement can be made for connecting the post offices at Dowra and Glangelvin with the post office at Blacklion, in the County Cavan?

MR. RAIKES: As already explained, the present arrangements admit of an earlier delivery of letters at Dowra and Glangelvin than would be possible by way of Blacklion and Enniskillen. Yet, in order to ascertain if the views which have been expressed by the hon. Member can be met, I have ordered careful accounts to be taken showing the origin and destination of the correspondence. When these are rendered, I shall be in a position to decide the matter.

INTERMEDIATE EDUCATION IN IRELAND.

MR. JOHNSTON (Belfast, S.): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether, in pursuance of the Rules of the Intermediate Education Board for Ireland, as approved by His Excellency the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland on the 8th December, 1890, additional results fees have been or will be paid in 1891 out of the residue of the Irish share of the Local Taxation (Customs and Excise) Duties; whether there is a sufficient surplus likely to accrue to permit of this grant being made annually; and what the amount will be for the present year?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Additional results fees will be paid in 1891 by the Intermediate Education Board, in pursuance of the Rules of the Intermediate Education Board for Ireland?

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): Have the Commissioners published any scheme for the appropriation of money?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I must ask the hon. Gentleman to give notice of that question.

FISHERIES IN THE LONDONDERRY DISTRICT.

MR. J. M'CARTHY: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that Mr. Thomas M'Dermott is an Inspector of Fisheries for the Londonderry District, nearly the whole of the net fishing in it being worked by the "Foyle and Bann Fishery Company," in whose employment he also is, and when as Inspector he is supposed to prosecute for any infringement of the law; and, if this is so, whether such a combination of offices has been sanctioned by the Irish Government?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Mr. M'Dermott holds office under the Londonderry Board of Conservators. He is represented to be a good officer in every way. Appointments of Local Inspectors are not made under the sanction of the Irish Government, but rest solely with the Conservators.

THE IRISH CONSTABULARY.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I had intended to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland what is the explanation of the removal of the Head Quarters of the Royal Irish Constabulary for Antrim from Ballymena to Lisburn, and upon whose application was it done? I will defer the question until tomorrow.

Mr. Johnston

RELIEF WORKS IN TUAM, &c.

COLONEL NOLAN (Galway, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if, now that the spring sowing is nearly over, he would start relief works in the Tuam and Clonamaddy Unions, at a slightly higher wage than 5s. 6d. a week?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I find that through the slight rise in the price of Indian meal, the money equivalent to a stone of meal a day will be about 6s. a week. This is found sufficient in districts where real distress prevails. For the week ended 11th April as many as 3,379 persons in other districts were receiving payment in meal for their labour.

DUBLIN TELEGRAPH STAFF.

DR. KENNY (Cork, S.): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether he can state the cause of the delay in putting into force the promised scheme of revision for the supervising officers of the Dublin Telegraph Staff, having regard to his assurances, on the 15th April, 1890, that the said revision had been already applied to Liverpool, Glasgow, Manchester, &c., and that other offices were to be dealt with in their order of importance; whether Dublin is in the same group as to importance as the offices above named; whether several offices belonging to a group of minor importance, namely, Newcastle-on-Tyne, Leeds, Bristol, Belfast, &c., have been already dealt with; whether he will now carry out the revision in Dublin, and make it retrospective in action, so as to put the Dublin officers on an equality with officers of the towns belonging to the same group as Dublin, who have had the advantage of the revision for a year; and can he state whether the delay, in dealing with Dublin, arises from local causes, or does it lie with the Central Department?

*MR. RAIKES: In reply to the hon. Member, I have to state that I have before me now the cases of Dublin and Edinburgh. Some important questions connected with them have arisen, which present difficulty and require careful consideration. Until the difficulties are removed I can come to no conclusion, and I am, therefore, not in a position to say more than that I am giving to the subject my earnest attention, and shall endeavour to settle it as soon as practicable. I fear I can at present make no promises as to dates of commencement.

LAND PURCHASE BILL.

MR. KNOX: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland what does he estimate to be the number and acreage of the holdings in each province in Ireland which will be excluded from the operation of the Land Purchase Bill by Clause 6, (a) as pasture, and (b) because the tenant is non-resident; and what are the sources of the information upon which his estimate is based?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: As I have already stated, I have not in my possession information which would enable me to give anything more than a rough estimate upon the subject referred to in this question. The general basis of the estimate is material collected by the Registrar General, partly under the Census Act for 1881, and partly by special inquiries made from time to time through the police. Taking first the total number of agricultural holdings and their valuations, we have deducted an estimate prepared from the best information at our disposal of farms used wholly or mainly for grazing, farms over £200 valuation, farms upon which the occupier does not reside, demesne lands, and perpetual interests not held at full rent. The general result of deductions made on this plan is as follows:—The number of holdings excluded in this way as having been used wholly or mainly for grazing were, in round numbers—in Leinster 18,000, in Munster 16,000, in Ulster 8,000, in Connaught 10,000—total 52,000; and the number excluded as being non-residential were, in round numbers—in Leinster 2,400, in Munster 2,300, in Ulster 1,100, in Connaught 2,300—total 8,100, exclusive of non-residential farms already excluded as grazing farms. I regard all these conclusions as of so doubtful and speculative a character that I am in some doubt whether I ought to give them to the House, even though accompanied by these words of warning and caution.

MR. KNOX: The right hon. Gentleman speaks of the number of farms which have been excluded. Does he mean excluded under the Act of 1881?

If so, is he aware that the provisions in the Bill before the House are different and more exclusive than those of the Act of 1881? I may also remind the right hon. Gentleman that he does not give the acreage of the holdings.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have not got the acreage. As to the farms which are excluded I have endeavoured to give them in accordance with the provisions of the Bill, and I give what is still more important, namely, the valuation. As to the acreage, if the hon. Member will put down another question I will make the inquiry.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Was the information obtained by the Constabulary?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Yes, Sir.

THE HANSARD PUBLISHING UNION.

MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Cambridge): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether the warehouse men and cutters employed by the Hansard Publishing Union are paid on the average about 5s. below the Trade Union rate; whether he is aware that, as a consequence, the men have refused to work at those rates, and that delay and inconvenience have arisen in the delivery of the Parliamentary Minutes and other Papers; and what steps he proposes to take to obviate such delay?

MR. JACKSON: I have no information as to the wages paid by the Hansard Publishing Union. No complaints have reached me that delay and inconvenience have arisen in the delivery of Parliamentary Minutes or Papers.

MR. SYDNEY BUXTON (Tower Hamlets, Poplar): Arising out of that, may I ask whether, when this contract comes to an end, in the new contract the right hon. Gentleman will take care that, according to the Resolution of the House, the specified standard rate of wages is paid?

MR. JACKSON: No, Sir; after the declaration made by the House it is unnecessary for me to make any statement on that point.

NEW WRIT.

For the County of Suffolk (Stowmarket Division), Edward Greene, esquire, deceased.

NEW MEMBER SWORN.

Henry Hucks Gibbs, esquire, for the City of London.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

LONDON (CITY) TRIAL OF CIVIL CAUSES BILL—(No^o 269.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Sir R. Webster.)

(4.34.) MR. COGHILL (Newcastle-under-Lyme): Although this Bill appears to be a very innocent measure, it really embodies a policy the reverse of that which has been adopted in past years. It is said that there is not sufficient accommodation in the present Courts of Justice. May I remind the House what the sittings of the Courts amount to? For four months in the year, during the vacations, there are no Courts sitting, for another four months there are very few sitting, and in the remaining four months there are nearly always one or two of the Judges away. I do not suppose the Attorney General will find that there are six days in the year in which all the Courts are sitting. This is an attempt to give greater jurisdiction to the City. If the Royal Courts had been erected 150 yards further East, so as to come within the boundaries of the City, I do not suppose we should ever have heard of this Bill. It is simply an attempt to give the City a certain amount of prestige which does not properly belong to it.

(4.36.) MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): I think the Government have taken a very unwise course with regard to this Bill. I have read the two Acts which are said to render it necessary; but if the Bill is necessary in London it is necessary everywhere else. In my opinion the measure is of a dangerous character, in view of the arguments that can be based upon it elsewhere. Take the case of the City of Cork. A fire occurred in the Court Houses there, and a number of gentlemen were on trial. The Court was removed to a schoolhouse in another portion of the city, and of the gentlemen on trial some were acquitted, and with regard to some there was a disagreement. It is quite open to argument, that if this Bill is necessary in regard to London it was necessary in that case. In the year 1881 there was a fire in the Court House at Carrick-on-Shannon, and the Court room was only shifted. Once lay down the proposition that in order to create invalidity at Common Law it is necessary to have an Act of Parliament, and all kinds of arguments may be used for applying that proposition in civil or criminal matters. If anyone reads the two Acts on which this Act is supposed to be founded, he must come to the conclusion that, at any rate, there is nothing in those Acts prohibiting the removal of the Courts. I consider that a hasty step of this kind ought not to be taken by Her Majesty's Government unless it has been fully approved of by a large body of opinion, not only on the Bench but among the practitioners who practise at the Royal Courts. As far as we understand, no necessity has arisen for the Bill. I protest against a step of such gravity being taken without a word from the Attorney General, as the head of the profession in England.

(4.41.) THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir R. WEBSTER, Isle of Wight): I can only repeat the explanation I gave the other night. Great difficulty has been experienced in accommodating all the Judges in the Royal Courts of Justice when the services of all are available, which is only for a very small part of the year. It has been suggested that some Judges might sit for a limited time in the City; but a doubt has been raised whether there is statutory power to issue a Commission to try cases in London. The Bill applies to London only, and the corresponding question does not arise in the Cork case, because the Court removes only from one part of the county to another. When the Act under which the new Courts were constructed was passed, no part of the building was brought into the City of London. It is, therefore, proposed that at the beginning of each sitting the Judges should sit for a limited time in London to try London cases. I say there has been a doubt raised as to whether there is power to issue a Commission to try cases in the City of London, and this Bill is to remove the doubt.

It gives no new power, so far as my own opinion is concerned, and in some quarters it is held to be unnecessary. I need not point out, however, how extremely desirable it is that when a trial takes place there should be no question raised about it afterwards.

Bill read a second time, and committed for to-morrow, at Two of the clock.

COMMITTEE.

Considered in Committee.

Clause 1.

Amendment proposed,

In page 2, at end of Clause, to add the words, "Half-yearly returns, ending on the thirtieth day of April and thirty-first day of October respectively, shall be presented to Parliament by the Land Commission, giving the following particulars respecting cases of default in the payment of any purchase annuity:—Name of purchaser; name of vendor; province, county, and townland in which the holding is situate; date of purchase; area (in statute acres) of holding; tenement value of holding; rental of holding when purchased, and whether judicial or non-judicial; amount of purchase money; amount of instalments paid; amount of instalments in default; proceedings taken for recovery."—(Mr. J. B. Ellis.)

Question again proposed, "That those words be there added."

(4.56.) MR. KNOX (Cavan, W.): I would propose in the tenth line of the Amendment to leave out "tenement" in order to insert "rateable."

Amendment to the proposed Amendment agreed to.

Amendment, as amended, agreed to.

MR. KNOX: I beg to move the Amendment standing next on the Paper, save that I desire in the fourth line to leave out the words "twenty-five" in order to insert "fifteen." I do not know whether the Chancellor of the Exchequer is prepared to accept the Amendment, or if he proposes in any way to meet the difficulty. If he does I will not propose this addition to the clause. If Consols and other securities rise considerably in value the tenant may lose a great deal in consequence, and in respect of future issues this Guaranteed Land Stock ought to be reduced proportionately, also the tenant's instalments. I do not know whether there is a better way of effecting this object than by the Amendment I now move.

Amendment proposed,

In page 2, line 2, at end, to add, "(4.) If at any time the National Debt Commissioners shall report to the Treasury that Guaranteed Land Stock, consisting of annuities yielding dividends at the lowest rate of any theretofore issued under this Act, and not redeemable within fifteen years thereafter, is not purchasable by them at a less price than £105 for every £100 Stock, the Treasury shall order that all Guaranteed Land Stock thereafter issued shall consist of annuities yielding dividends at such rate that, in their opinion, the Stock so issued would be purchasable at par, and such Stock shall be issued accordingly, and the annuity payable by any purchaser purchasing after such order shall be reduced to the same extent that the rate of dividend shall have been so reduced."—(Mr. Knox.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there added."

*THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square): I quite understand the object of the hon. Gentleman, and I will consider what steps, if any, can be taken. But I will venture to lay down this proposition that there should not be frequent changes, and if any changes should be made, that they ought to be extremely simple so as not to endanger any financial calculations. Hon. Members will see if anything should be done in the direction suggested by some hon. Members, namely, that the tenants should be able to find a Stock in order to pay the amount of their Sinking Fund, that this Stock ought to be Stock very easily negotiable; in fact the more negotiable the better for all parties. With that object one large Stock would be inscribed by the Bank of Ireland. I will consider this point whether if it should appear that this Stock would command a price considerably above par for a certain time, after a certain amount of Stock has been issued, any change on the part of the Treasury should be made. I think the hon. Gentleman will see that in that suggestion, I am going in the direction he desires, and appreciating the point he has raised. I will see whether the object can be met by some clause introduced in the Bill.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): Suppose a tenant owes a balance of £100, would he be entitled to go into the market and buy a few hundred pounds of Stock at £96, and apply that to the extinction of the balance of his debt?

*MR. GOSCHEN: I think that so far as he owes, for the extinction of Stock, that that would be a perfectly fair arrangement.

MR. SEXTON: I suppose the right hon. Gentleman will bring up words on Report. But there is one other matter connected with this. The National Debt Commissioners have power to purchase Stock from time to time for the extinction of the debt. What I want to know is this: Suppose the Treasury would get £100 cash for every £100 of Stock at the end of the 49 years, and the National Debt Commissioners purchase Stock of this kind, of course there will be a profit—I would ask the right hon. Gentleman whether, in view of the fact which the right hon. Gentleman has before stated, that the State should have no profit, he would consider whether the profit should be devoted to Irish purposes.

*MR. GOSCHEN: It will be necessary to look to the whole course of the 49 years. Looking at the possibilities of the future, it will only be towards the end that the State could say it would derive profit. I should not like to go so far as to say that every possible profit should be devoted to Irish purposes.

MR. SEXTON: The matter will not be regarded as finally closed at present.

*MR. GOSCHEN: No; but I do not think it arises on these two Amendments.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): This is a matter of considerable importance. I would like to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether the landlords, who have the advantage in the event of their being called upon to extinguish tithe rent-charge and the Stock depreciates—whether they will then be entitled to tender the Stock for the extinction of this tithe rent-charge?

*MR. GOSCHEN: That is a totally different question. I do not see my way to that. The point is new to me, and the hon. and learned Member will scarcely expect me to give an answer to the matter without notice.

SIR G. CAMPBELL (Kirkcaldy, &c.): It seems to me that the concessions which the Chancellor of the Exchequer has shadowed forth are likely to lead to great confusion and loss to the British taxpayer. There is the concession that if this Stock should be depreciated the tenant might pay with Stock, but if, on the other hand, the Stock is appreciated then the tenant might pay in cash, and the loss will be borne by the Treasury.

*MR. GOSCHEN: No. There is no loss, because we are not bound to redeem above par. The Stock is redeemed at par.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

(5.10.) MR. SEXTON: I beg to move to add, after line 2, the words—

“(4.) The sums paid to the sinking fund for the purpose of the redemption of such stock shall be applied in such redemption, and any stock issued under this Act shall be redeemed within forty-nine years from the issue thereof.”

The Chancellor of the Exchequer was good enough on my suggestion a little time ago to promise to bring up words to carry out this view, but perhaps the right hon. Gentleman might not have had time. The arrangement of the Bill is that by a Sinking Fund a sufficient sum of money should be raised for the extinction of Stock. I consider it of great importance with reference to the future relations between Great Britain and Ireland that there should be no out-standing liabilities with regard to this Stock, and that what the Sinking Fund intends to do should be done.

Amendment proposed,

In page 2, after line 2, to add, “(4.) The sums paid to the sinking fund for the purpose of the redemption of such stock shall be applied in such redemption, and any stock issued under this Act shall be redeemed within forty-nine years from the issue thereof.”—(Mr. Sexton.)

Question proposed, “That those words be there inserted.”

(5.12.) MR. GOSCHEN: I cannot accept these words as they stand, but the hon. Member is right in saying that it is the purpose and intention of the arrangement that the Stock should be redeemed within 49 years of the issue, and also that the Sinking Fund should only be applied to the purpose of this Act, and should be kept perfectly apart from any other financial purpose of the State. We should employ the Sinking Fund in the purchase of Stock, but the hon. Member and the House would have every security that it would be absolutely tied down and would not be available for any other purpose than for the redemption of this Stock. There will be no diversion of the Sinking Fund to any other purpose than the redemption of such Stock. I think I shall be able to meet the hon. Member's wishes in the main.

MR. SEXTON: I think the right hon. Gentleman's reply substantially meets my purpose, and I suppose he will bring up words on Report.

Question proposed, "That the Clause, as amended, stand part of the Bill."

(5.14.) MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): As I understand it, on the Second Reading of a Bill we do not absolutely assent even to the principle of the Bill. What I think we do is to concede that there is sufficient in the Bill to warrant that the gentlemen proposing them should have the opportunity of defending and explaining them, and showing whether they are practical in Committee. I know this is not the Tory theory just at the present moment. There is all the difference between the "ins" and the "outs." When the Gentlemen opposite were out, as they showed on the Hares and Rabbits Bill and many other Bills, they considered they had a perfect right to discuss the Bill in Committee. But having come in, they lay down the rule, that in Committee we ought only to make clerical Amendments; that it is our business to hear and obey, and that any real discussion amounts to obstruction. That is not our view. We intend, subject to your ruling, to oppose this Bill, because it is bad in detail. In fact, there is no part of the Bill but which is thoroughly rotten, and I shall do my best to oppose it. The most rotten part of the Bill is Clause 1, which creates Guaranteed Stock. Of course, land purchase might be carried out in many different ways, and we should not destroy the Bill if we did away with this Guaranteed Stock, though that would make it necessary to introduce great and important modifications. We have discussed several Amendments to this Bill, all of which have been rejected, including that of my hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle.

Under these circumstances, it seems to me that the only thing we have got to do is to strike out the clause altogether, leaving it to the Government, if they can, to find the money in some other way. Hon. Members opposite come down here with a foregone conclusion, and far from my poor arguments having weight with them, were I to speak with the tongue of an angel, they would remain unconvinced. ["Hear, hear!"] Yes, the hon. Gentleman opposite says that even an angel would not convince him; he would stick to his view, even if addressed by an angel. The object for which this money is guaranteed is not so clearly advantageous that it justifies us in incurring this liability of £30,000,000. I do not believe myself that there is any value in the present dual ownership in Ireland.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Gentleman is not entitled to enter into a general discussion on the whole scheme of the Bill.

MR. LABOUCHERE: This is a scheme of land purchase. Might I point out that it will not pay; that the speculation is bad?

THE CHAIRMAN: No.

MR. LABOUCHERE: Not bad? Then what arguments can we adduce against this clause? I have plenty of arguments, but I do not know which would be consistent with the point of Order. But let us admit that this money is to be spent in the best way possible. Let us admit that it is the business of the House to do away with the existing dual ownership, and to introduce the taxpayer as the partner in this dual ownership. Then, Mr. Courtney, we have to consider whether this great and valuable and useful reform can be effected without any sort of liability to the English taxpayer. We are told that there will be no liability to the English taxpayer, because these new owners or partners will pay every year these annuities for 49 years. I doubt whether they will be able to pay them. I think it very probable that agrarian and political feeling will be welded into one, and that there will be a general strike, in which case it is obviously impossible for us to go into the matter, because the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West

Birmingham has said that he will not be a party—and I suppose he is in some way one of the authors of the Bill—to any sort of evictions. But it is urged that the tenants will pay because the Ashbourne tenants pay. But that is not germane to the point. The question is, will these tenants pay? Will we get back our money? According to a pamphlet by Mr. Sydney Halifax, some of the tenants who have purchased under the Ashbourne Act deny that they entered into the contracts voluntarily. Hear what the tenants of the Marquess of Waterford state. The Marquess received the sum of £124,000, but the tenants are not able to pay, and the majority of them say that being in arrears they were threatened with eviction if they did not agree to buy on the landlord's terms.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Gentleman is anticipating several Amendments to Clause 6.

MR. LABOUCHERE: I desire to ask what we are going to do if we find that these tenants cannot pay? I can only say that I know of reasons that would last me a couple of hours against this particular clause. But to put it generally, I object to the mode in which this money is to be expended, and I deny that we will get it back. I protest against the present Parliament guaranteeing this money, because the majority of this House were elected on the specific assurance that they would not expend money in this way. It is said that we Radicals are acting against the interests of Ireland, but I would point out to hon. Members for Ireland that we are bound to represent our constituents just as they are bound to represent theirs. I perfectly understand the position of Irish Members. They regard this as some boon. It is said that "A bird in the hand is worth two in the bush." That depends upon what the bird in the hand is and what the bird in the bush is. A sparrow in the hand is not worth a turkey in the bush, especially if the sparrow is intended to prevent you from getting hold of the turkey.

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! The hon. Gentleman is arguing against the Bill, and is not directing his observations to the clause.

MR. LABOUCHERE: All I can say is, that though we have great sympathy with Irish Members on this matter, that will not prevent us from acting as our constituents wish, notwithstanding the taunts and misrepresentations of the hon. Member for Cork. We know perfectly well that we shall be defeated in this House; but it is our object to show the public that they are being tricked, cozened, and robbed by the men they were foolish enough to send to this House. I trust, when the next General Election comes, that it will be proved we were in the right, and that we shall be thanked by the country for having done our best to prevent what we consider nothing better than a gross robbery of public money.

*(5.29.) MR. CHANNING (Northampton, E.): I wish to put one or two arguments before the Chancellor of the Exchequer in order to induce him to re-consider his answer to the Amendment of my right hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton. I think the reply of the Chancellor of the Exchequer to the question with regard to the repayments by the tenants to the Sinking Fund illustrates exactly what I wish to lay before the Committee. The right hon. Gentleman said he would allow the tenant, if the Guaranteed Land Stock falls to a discount, to repay his loan (so far as the Sinking Fund is concerned) out of the depreciated Stock, but he would not allow him to employ the Stock generally for the repayment of the total amount of the annuity. Would it not be wiser to adopt the plan of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton, and have but one Stock—a Stock which would incur the minimum of risk of fluctuation and depreciation, and would stand in the closest possible relation continuously to the amount contemplated to be handed over by the tenant to the landlord? Now, what the opponents of the Bill feel is this. We cannot prevent its passing through the House, but we hold with regard to the financial arrangements that there is a responsibility upon us which we cannot ignore. Now, the financial arrangements between the purchasing tenant and the selling landlord, and between the purchasing tenant and the Exchequer, should be of the greatest stability, causing the minimum of injustice to all concerned. It should also be the nearest approach to certainty and solidity, and afford some guarantee for promoting an agrarian settlement in Ireland. We know that the Government laid it down in the first instance in 1888 that these payments should, as nearly as possible, correspond—that, so far as possible, £100 should be given to the landlord in cash for every £100 nominal debt. Last year the Chief Secretary, in introducing the Bill, made use of an expression of considerable importance in regard to this matter. He said not only ought the landlords to be paid in what is practically cash, but they ought to be paid in a form directly and immediately convertible into Consols or Land Stock which would really be equivalent to Consols. But the Chancellor of the Exchequer, in the course of these Debates, has made it perfectly clear that Clause 7 of the Bill as now drawn does not correspond with Sub-section 2 of Section 22 of the Bill of last year; and, instead of allowing the Stocks to be interchangeable to one another, he gives only a limited power to the National Debt Commissioners to invest in this Land Stock. There will not, in fact, be a direct interchangeability. Last year the Chief Secretary said—

“The selling landlord will be repaid in Government Stock bearing 2½ per cent. for 30 years. The Chancellor of the Exchequer tells us that in his opinion that Stock is at least as good as Consols, and if any landlord is foolish enough to take a different view there is a provision in the Bill which obliges the National Debt Commission to exchange Consols for the Guaranteed Land Stock should he so desire.”

Now, the whole of that has been cut away by the statement of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. The National Debt Commissioners, instead of being under an obligation to exchange, have only discretionary powers to invest under strict limits laid down by the Treasury. I submit the result will be that this new Stock which we are creating will be subject to great fluctuations and great depression. The Debates of the last few days have disclosed great differences of opinion on this point. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton holds that a Stock bearing 2½ per cent. for 30 years is a superior Stock to Consols; that it would have a higher value, and that the landlords of Ireland would be receiving too much. On the other hand, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, after making a great many statements on this question, has practically come to the conclusion that in all probability the Stock will stand about equal to Consols for the next three years; but he will not commit himself to anything further. I rather take it he means that for future purposes the Stock may be somewhat inferior to Consols. If the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton is correct we are committing an injustice on the English taxpayer; but if the Chancellor of the Exchequer is right you are encouraging the payment from one class of men to another of a depreciated currency. Some may say the difference will have to be paid by the landlord. I say it will fall on the tenant, because the landlord will not only demand a larger number of years' purchase in proportion to the discount at which the Stock may be standing, but also, bearing in mind the possible depreciation of the Stock, will charge the tenant so as to cover future contingencies. And, again, while the tenant will be borrowing from the State in a depreciated currency, and paying the landlords in that, he will have to pay the State back in hard cash. The Chancellor of the Exchequer has intimated that he will consider the possibility of permitting the tenant to buy this Stock if it is at a discount, and pay that portion of the annuity which goes to the Sinking Fund with it; but why will he not extend that privilege to the whole annuity? The Chancellor of the Exchequer says that doing so would possibly entail a loss to the Exchequer. I submit, however, that the refusal of that right would entail a still heavier loss on the tenant, and I hope, therefore, that the Chancellor of the Exchequer will re-consider his decision on that point. Again, I ask would it not be a wiser and a sounder policy to have but one Stock in the form of Consols? It is singular that a Minister who has distinguished himself and his financial reputation by a grand policy for the consolidation of all branches of the National Debt should support a proposal of this kind by his authority—a proposal which will multiply accounts, make new Stocks, and create financial confusion. I should have preferred, in the treatment of the Irish land question, to have seen the Government adopting the policy which is to be applied to small holdings in England and make the advances to the Local Authority and to Land Banks; but, seeing that the Government have adopted the policy embodied in this Bill, I hold I am justified in supporting the rejection of the clause in order to emphasise once more the contention that if these things are to be done well they should be carried out so as to produce the least friction between the parties themselves and between them and the State, and that the Stock created should not be of a varying and fluctuating nature. This is a strong argument for the Government adopting one Stock which would cause least loss to the State, would place these matters on a solid and permanent basis, and would produce less confusion, uncertainty, and discontent in Ireland.

*(5.44.) MR. W. P. SINCLAIR (Falkirk, &c.): As I understand the object of the Amendment of the hon. Gentleman the Member for Northampton, it is practically to destroy the Bill. After your ruling, Sir, I think I should be wrong to do more than direct my observations to the point that the Stock which it is proposed to issue under this clause is to be Guaranteed Stock; that is to say, it will be supported by Imperial credit. This is, generally speaking, contrary to the usual custom of the House. We are now supporting by Imperial credit a measure of this kind, and it is only fair the question should be asked, "Why do we do so?" The answer is, I think, a simple one, and can be given in a very few words. It is this: The character of past legislation in this House bearing upon land in Ireland has been such that it requires an effort on the part of the Imperial Parliament to assist in changing the system of land tenure; a change most desirable to bring about. Dual ownership has been created by the legislation of the past. It was brought about, in the first instance, by land legislation, which enabled the landlord to confiscate in days long gone by the property of the tenants; and such a state of things having been created, it requires the intervention of Imperial credit in order to bring about that which sought to be established, namely, the cultivator of the soil being the owner of the land which he is cultivating. That is the defence to be put forward for the use of Imperial credit. It is one which, when stated distinctly and plainly to my constituents, has willingly been accepted by them as being a good and sufficient reason for the introduction of Imperial credit to effect this object. It has frequently been said in the course of these Debates that some of us won our election in 1886 by opposing the Land Purchase Bill of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian. It is true, Sir, that we opposed his particular scheme; but we did not oppose land purchase as a whole, nor land purchase backed up by British credit. I need not dwell upon this point. I simply emphasise the fact that so far as myself, and I believe many of my colleagues, are concerned, the statement to which I have referred is not correct.

(5.48.) MR. PICTON (Leicester): It is not possible to deal with the point raised by the last speaker without, I fear, transgressing the rules laid down for the government of this Debate, and I therefore will not attempt to reply to him. I may, however, say this: that if the hon. Member could be allowed to be correct in urging that the difficulties of the Irish landlord ought to be met out of the British Exchequer by British credit, at any rate the Irish landlord ought not to be treated more favourably than the holder of British funds, and I do urge the Chancellor of the Exchequer to realise the injustice he is doing to the present holders of Imperial Stock by giving better terms than they now have to those who will be the holders of the new Stock. The Chancellor of the Exchequer, when he brought his great conversion scheme before this House, gave very good ground for his confidence that any amount of money might be obtained on British credit at $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., and he argued that it was an injustice to the taxpayers generally to go on paying more than $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. I think if this new Stock be at all required he ought not to offer more than $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. for it. After all, he is creating but a new variety of Consols which rest on Imperial credit, and which constitute an addition to the National Debt. I consider that what he is doing is a piece of that policy of bribery and corruption by which we have endeavoured to rule Ireland through the landlords in the past. It has been shown that the difference between $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. and $2\frac{3}{4}$ per cent. will amount to £75,000 a year. That, in 49 years, gives us £3,684,000 to be put into the pockets of the Irish landlords as a bribe. I contend that it is utterly unnecessary thus to waste money. If the Irish landlords or the holders of this new Guaranteed Stock had been treated on the same terms as the present holders of Consolidated Stock, if they had been offered $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. for the first 15 years and $2\frac{1}{4}$ per cent. for the remainder of the 49 years, we should have had to pay less by £2,500,000. But here we are giving simply more than £3,500,000 to the Irish landlords to bribe them into selling their land. I say there is no justification for this whatsoever, and, therefore, I cannot see this clause pass without uttering a final word of protest against it. I shall vote against it, as I intend to vote against every other clause and against every stage of the Bill.

(5.52.) MR. J. E. ELLIS (Nottingham, Rushcliffe): I wish also to utter a word of protest. I am not one of those, I confess, who have always said that under no circumstances would they support a scheme of giving Imperial credit for the assistance of the Irish Government in the matter of land purchase. Looking historically at the question of Irish land as it has been dealt with in this Bill, and especially at the aspects it has presented in the lifetime of many of those now here, there is, in my opinion, a debt due to Ireland from the Imperial Exchequer. At the same time, I think that those who sit below the Gangway will agree with me that this debt should be discharged in a way not dangerous to the Imperial Exchequer. In December last a large number of Members of this House voted in favour of a Resolution that this Bill was dangerous to the British taxpayer and hurtful to the Irish occupier, and it is because I believe it has both these elements of danger that I intend to oppose every line of every clause of this Bill. I take it that the objects set up by this clause are twofold. It is intended to settle the question of social order in Ireland and to create a peasant proprietary. At any rate, these have been objects which have been put forward by the Chief Secretary in supporting the Bill of which this clause is the essence. I think we are entitled to inquire whether there is any experience of the past to show that similar provisions in former Acts of Parliament have attained these particular ends. Now, there are three very instructive Returns as to the danger we have run by bringing Imperial credit to the benefit of Ireland by advancing money under the Ashbourne Acts. So far as the Returns—No. 81, Session 1889, and No. 115, Session 1890—are concerned, they are the only two before this House which give adequate particulars of the operations of the Ashbourne Acts, and certainly it cannot be gathered from those particulars that either social order has been promoted or a peasant proprietary created. I have to acknowledge the courtesy and reasonableness of the Government in importing into this clause two Amendments which I have suggested with regard to the Returns under various heads; and if we had had before this House as regards the Ashbourne Acts full particulars, I think I should have been able to show that the result of the advances under those Acts had been nothing like those which had been suggested by the right hon. Gentleman in the direction of promoting social order and creating a peasant proprietary. I am going to refer now to a Return which carries the Return of last Session a little further and gives the list of defaulters—a list of those who have not paid their instalments under the Ashbourne Act. It is a very instructive Return indeed, and in the hands of some Members of the House might occupy a considerable time in examination before the Committee. But I am not going into it in any great detail. I wish to draw the attention of the House to two or three facts arising out of the Return.

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! The hon. Gentleman, to judge from his own language, is speaking to the principle of the Bill, and not to the machinery of this special clause.

MR. J. E. ELLIS: I am sorry, Sir, to have transgressed. It is my earnest endeavour not to do so. Do I understand your ruling to be that I am not entitled to show on this Return that danger has attended the issue of advances in the past, and that similar danger to the Exchequer may attend the operations of this clause?

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! That is an argument against the Bill as a whole. No doubt it is an argument, too, against every part of the Bill, but it is not an especial argument to be used against this particular clause.

MR. J. E. ELLIS: May I put it to you most respectfully that we are by this clause to bring Imperial credit to the aid of the Irish Exchequer? My contention is that that may be attended with danger to the English taxpayer. We are here as representing the English taxpayers. I have a Return in my hands submitted to Parliament showing that by advances under certain Acts for purposes identical with those set forth in this clause danger has arisen, and, therefore, I respectfully submit to you, Sir, it is in order for me to show upon this evidence à priori that the same danger will arise to the British taxpayer from this clause.

THE CHAIRMAN: That argument would be relevant to the Second Reading or the Third Reading, but it is not relevant to the question now the Bill is in Committee. It does not affect this special clause.

MR. J. E. ELLIS: If you, Sir, rule that we cannot discuss the danger to the British taxpayer arising under this clause, then I have nothing further to say.

(6.0.) MR. W. E. GLADSTONE (Edinburgh, Mid Lothian): Do I understand that on this clause, which guarantees certain loans from the Public Exchequer, it is not open to us to discuss the danger that may occur to the Exchequer?

THE CHAIRMAN: That is not quite correct. The question of guarantee has already been argued and decided by a Division in the Committee. The Committee cannot go back on that decision. The question now is whether Clause 1 stand part of the Bill.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: I confess I am totally unable to understand the decision, and I will not attempt to address the Committee in regard to it.

(6.1.) MR. SEXTON: I think the discussion to-day has been vindicated by the useful results secured. For example, it was understood that there was to be £30,000,000 of Stock, and yet the Bill contained no provision whatever for the creation of the Stock. It would have been very awkward if the Stock had not been created. It was also important in the discussion to reveal the fact that there was no provision in the Bill for dealing with the unexhausted balances under the Ashbourne Acts. The Chief Secretary has put down Amendments permitting the use of those unexhausted balances. I myself brought to the notice of the right hon. Gentleman another important matter, namely, that there is no provision for the issue of the repayments under the Ashbourne Acts. Such provision has been withdrawn from the Bill of the present year without any explanation. It constitutes a very important part of the sum available, and I trust, before we reach Clause 6, the Chief Secretary will think it his duty to re-consider the subject and make these resources available. The Irish Representatives will certainly consider it their duty to press the point. As the hon. Member for the Rushcliffe Division has very truly said, he has been successful in his two attempts to amend the clause. It is important that the House should have before it from time to time authentic records, firstly, of the transactions under the Act; and, secondly, of any defaults that may arise. I think the right hon. Gentleman will agree with me that the insertions of these Amendments have improved the clause. The Chancellor of the Exchequer has also made some concessions to-day. In the first place, at the suggestion of the hon. Member for Cavan (Mr. Knox), he has agreed that when this Stock reaches a high premium, as it undoubtedly will, the Treasury will give the purchaser of the farm the benefit of any reduction in the price of the Stock. That is a very great improvement of the clause, and my hon. Friend deserves the thanks of the Committee and of the tenant farmers of Ireland for the foresight which enabled him to initiate an Amendment so reasonable. I am also sensible of the importance of the concession, that the Bill should contain a specific engagement that the purchase for which the Sinking Fund is intended shall be effected within the contemplated term. These Amendments and concessions, if there is nothing else, amply vindicate us in occupying the time of the Committee. Personally, I am not hostile to the principle of the Bill. I consider it a necessary principle. I suppose no one will be more surprised than the Chief Secretary that the hon. Member for Cork

(Mr. Parnell), in a speech delivered in Ireland yesterday, boasted he saved the Bill on Friday night. I do not suppose the Chief Secretary imagined the Bill was in any danger; if it had been in danger, I do not think it would have been saved by the hon. Member for Cork and the 10 Members who followed him into the Lobby. The hon. Member for Northampton proposes to leave out the clause because it provides an Imperial guarantee for the stockholder. That, I think, is a just and necessary measure, not only for the sum of £30,000,000, but for such a sum as would effect a transformation of the whole abominable land system England has imposed on Ireland. No doubt the clause contains a pendant, which provides that, while in the first instance the guarantee shall be provided from the Consolidated Fund, any loss sustained shall be borne by the Guarantee Fund as provided by the Act. If the Guarantee Fund were defined in the clause I should feel it my duty to vote against the clause, because I object in principle to any local guarantee for what I consider a strictly Imperial responsibility. But as the final words of the clause do not define the amount or the sources from which it is to be provided, and seeing that the whole intention of the clause does not determine the subject of the Guarantee Fund, and does not preclude me from discussing at a future stage from what source the fund shall be derived, and that the question remains open, recognising that the essence of the clause is the establishment of an Imperial guarantee, and that the question of local guarantee is not, in fact, determined by the clause, if the hon. Member for Northampton goes to a Division, I shall think it my duty to vote against him.

(6.9.) MR. E. ROBERTSON (Dundee): If I am in order, I should like to submit one point to the Committee. You, Sir, will recollect that the first evening the Bill was in Committee I moved the rejection of Sub-section 1 of Clause 1. I did so on the ground that by the Bill, and particularly by the 1st sub-section, we were not called upon to give direct power to grant money. The Bill did not authorise the issue of a single penny beyond the £10,000,000 under the Ashbourne Acts. I withdrew my Amendment in consideration of a promise by the right hon. Gentleman that he would meet all I demanded by words to be introduced in Clause 6. What I propose to submit to the Committee is that the Amendment the right hon. Gentleman has given notice of does not meet the difficulty I suggested.

THE CHAIRMAN: It is extremely inconvenient to anticipate a discussion of words which are proposed to be added to a subsequent clause. If the hon. Gentleman tells me his action in respect of this clause depends upon the meaning to be attributed to these words, I do not see how I can prevent him examining them. It may be that the object aimed at is common to the hon. Member and the Chief Secretary, and that the only question is how the object is to be accomplished. In that case, the hon. Member may agree to withhold the discussion until Clause 6 comes up.

MR. E. ROBERTSON: I may, perhaps, save time if I state my objections to the right hon. Gentleman's Amendment. The right hon. Gentleman proposes to amend Clause 6 by inserting the words—

"Advances may be made under the Land Purchase Acts as amended by this Act, notwithstanding any limitation contained in the Land Purchase Acts, 1885 and 1888, by the issue of Guaranteed Land Stock, but such advances."

I submit that in three points these words fail to serve the purpose for which he has introduced them. Section 6, after these words are inserted, will do no more than Section 1 already does. Advances may still be made under the Purchase Act notwithstanding any limitation contained in the Acts of 1885 and 1888. The aggregate limitation of £10,000,000 is not the only limitation in the Purchase Acts of 1885 and 1888; there was an individual limitation of £3,000 on each individual advance—£5,000 in the Purchase Act of 1885, reduced to £3,000 in the Act of 1888, but capable of being raised to £5,000 in exceptional cases.

(6.17.) THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): On the point of Order as suggested by you, Sir, may I ask whether, considering that the whole object of the Bill is to authorise advances, and that the words the hon. Gentleman is criticising occur in an Amendment to Clause 6, this is the proper time to take the discussion?

THE CHAIRMAN: It is extremely inconvenient, as I have said, to discuss these words here. It appears the object aimed at is common to both the hon. Member for Dundee and the right hon. Gentleman, and the only question is, what the words proposed to be inserted in Clause 6 accomplish. If that is so, it would be better to wait until we come to Clause 6.

MR. E. ROBERTSON: My main purpose was to inform the Government of the grave objections to the Amendment. I believe the new words make the Bill ten thousand times worse than it was before. The promise of the Chief Secretary to introduce satisfactory words, on which promise I withdrew my Amendment, remains unfulfilled. I am, therefore, obliged to vote against the whole clause.

(6.16.) SIR G. TREVELYAN (Glasgow, Bridgeton): I shall most certainly vote against this clause, and my reason for doing so is drawn from the clause itself. The clause establishes a complicated machinery for carrying out most important objects. The clause says—

"For the purpose of such redemption a Sinking Fund shall be established by means of an annual sum, at the rate of 1 per cent. on the nominal amount of the capital payable in equal half-yearly payments."

We know what the whole clause is, and under what conditions this Sinking Fund will be carried forward, and I maintain that to put these words into the clause is to state something which will not be carried out. There is one county in Ireland where £450,000 in round figures has already been issued under the Ashbourne Act. Of the £450,000, £270,000 has been issued to the tenants of two landlords. One of the landlords sold land of which the rent was £4,000 a year, and the tenants of farms which paid £3,000 or three-fourths of this rent, have already applied for an extension of the time of repayment which would make it absolutely impossible to carry out this which Parliament is asked to pronounce shall be carried out in the clause. But that is not all. Another landlord in the county has sold land for £12,000. Already farmers who pay rents of £3,800 a year have appealed for an extension of time, and to show that the bargains were such that they had reason so to appeal, I say that some of the farmers have already been sold up. Now, Sir, if so quickly after that Act has been put into operation so large a number of farmers have applied for an extension—an extension which would render absolutely nugatory the machinery for setting up a Sinking Fund, what would happen with regard to the whole of Ireland? Observe what an extension will be required. All you have to deal with is this 1 per cent. which goes to the Sinking Fund, and in order to grant the extension which these tenants desire, and which from private inquiries I have made I believe they do require, considering the sums that have been paid to the landlords, you would have to apply the extension to an enormous area of time, and would have to maintain for a long time indeed the relations we object to enter into with Ireland. I believe that since these tenants have what is called purchased their holdings—as if it was they who had purchased them, and not we—there has been no bad seasons. How can you expect the Sinking Fund to go on successfully when they have had seasons? The right hon. Marquess the Member for Rosendale (Lord Hartington), speaking not very long ago, said that the bad harvests which had prevailed in Ireland had rendered the payment of rent impossible. When you have a bad harvest, the carrying out of the machinery of the Sinking Fund will be an impossibility. The reason for these great difficulties in Waterford, as well as in many other counties, is that the Commissioners are not able sufficiently to inform themselves of the local circumstances of all these farmers. If this clause had provided for a reference to some body who knew the farmers and the district, I should have felt very differently about it; but this it does not do, and we are left at the mercy of the ignorance of the Commissioners and the greed of the landlords.

(6.25.) MR. ROBY (Lancashire, S.E. Eccles): I have not troubled the Committee on this Bill before, and I am only desirous now of saying a few words, in order to prevent any misunderstanding of my views. I purpose voting with the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere) in favour of putting an end to this clause, but I hold, in some degree, different views from his. I am not at all opposed to the use of English money or English credit for the purpose of a real settlement of the Irish land difficulty; first, because I think that looking at the past transactions with Ireland we owe them much, and, secondly, because I take it that the removal of any great grievance is a legitimate object for the use of Imperial money and Imperial credit. I object, however, to this clause on three main grounds. First and foremost, it does not establish or provide for or refer to or permit any local control over the purchase. Secondly, the guarantee proposed is, to my mind, most objectionable; thirdly, I am not at all convinced that there is any advantage whatever in creating a new and peculiar Stock for this purpose. It seems to me in every way that it would have been better to raise the money required on the same terms and conditions as the Consolidated Stock. As my election has been tolerably fresh, I think I have a perfect right to express these views in the name of my constituents.

(6.27.) MR. LABOUCHERE: If this liability of £30,000,000, which is to be thrown on the British taxpayer, would bring about a settlement of the real Irish question, I should be very glad to assent to the proposal, even if the money were to be thrown into the sea. The reason why I am opposed to it is that I believe the expenditure will not be of any advantage to Ireland, and I do not believe it will lead to Home Rule. With your ruling before me, Mr. Courtney, I will not attempt to go into the whole question of Home Rule, but I think it ought to be understood that we consider we have a plan by which, if Home Rule were granted, Ireland would be able to borrow this money at precisely the same price as she will be able to borrow it now without involving the British taxpayer in any sort of guarantee or liability. We are asked to vote this money under an absolute and entire misconception as to the figures on the part of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. Remarkable as it would appear, the Chancellor of the Exchequer has himself furnished us with a Return in which he acknowledges his error. I think it will be admitted that the object of the clause is to create £30,000,000 of Guaranteed Stock, which is to be paid off by a Sinking Fund at 1 per cent., and we are told that this will be covered by the £1,200,000 which we are supposed to have in hand in respect of the Irish contributions to the Treasury. But, remarkable as it may seem, this does not cover it in any sort of way. This is due to the use of the Sinking Fund for the object of the Bill. I think it will be admitted that the object of the clause is to create £30,000,000 of Guaranteed Stock to be paid off, and a Sinking Fund of 1 per cent., with 3 per cent. to be used as interest. I will try to make myself clear, taking an advance of £100 as an example. Each year you assume it is £100, and you never exceed that. What occurs? The first year there is 1 per cent. paid into the Sinking Fund, leaving £99; the next year it is £98. You are employing also your interest to your Sinking Fund and increasing your liability each year; you are not covered each year by the annuity. Now the Chancellor of the Exchequer has furnished us with a Return which admits the fact. He has given us a table showing the maximum gross advances that may be made under the Bill for the first 30 years. I do not know why he does not go beyond that period unless it is that the sum proves so enormous. The Return which has been issued by the Chancellor of the Exchequer proves that he is wrong, for he himself shows that the annuity will increase to £1,212,000 in the second year and to £1,845,587 in the thirtieth year—that is to say, that if the tenants should not pay, the implication is that the deficiency will be covered by the £1,200,000. But that cannot be, because, as the Return itself shows, the tenants will in the thirtieth year owe more than £1,800,000. Some explanation is surely required from the Chancellor of the Exchequer or the Chief Secretary, because the very essence of the plea for this loan is that we shall be absolutely covered by the £1,200,000. I may be wrong and the Chancellor of the Exchequer may be able to convince me that I am, but I think we ought to get some explanation.

(6.34.) MR. A. J. BALFOUR: As I understand the point of the hon. Member it arises only on the amount of the advances made and the amount paid to and from the Sinking Fund, and I would ask whether it is in order to discuss this on the clause that does not deal with it. As I understand the hon. Member, his question would arise on a later clause (6) dealing with re-advances.

*(6.34.) MR. KEAY (Elgin and Nairn): Before you reply, Sir, on the point of order, may I supplement the right hon. Gentleman's remark with another, which strictly affects the present clause—that this clause in the three last lines contains, as I shall show, if your ruling permits, two gross mis-statements of fact. In the first place, the advances from the Consolidated Fund cannot be temporary; and, secondly, it is provided that every such advance shall be re-paid to the Consolidated Fund out of the Guarantee Fund which is simply an arithmetical impossibility, for the reasons shown by my hon. Friend.

THE CHAIRMAN: The point of objection taken by the right hon. Gentleman seems to be a good one. As I understand the figures to which the hon. Member for Northampton refers they have relation to Clause 6, Sub-section 3, and on that would come the opportunity to raise the question. The point arises out of the re-issue of money which has been received in repayment of capital advanced, and it will not be in order to discuss that re-issue until we come to the clause dealing with it.

Ayes 247; Noes 126.—(Div. List, No. 142.)

Clause 2.

(6.53.) MR. SEXTON: I wish to move an Amendment to line 5, after the word "moneys" to insert the words "except as hereinafter mentioned."

MR. T. M. HEALY: Before my hon. Friend does that I should like to ask the Chief Secretary what is meant by the words "under the prescribed regulations." These may be matters of great importance. If the Government will undertake that the regulations shall be laid before Parliament in the usual way, there will be no objection, but practically the Treasury will be free to make any regulations they please.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I think the hon. and learned Gentleman will see that Sub-section 2 of Clause 9 meets his point.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Yes; but in that sub-section the reference is to "rules." If by "regulations" you mean rules, and will alter the word, that will meet the point.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: It would be well to substitute "rules" for the word "regulations."

Amendment proposed, in line 4 to leave out the word "regulations" and insert the word "rules."

Amendment agreed to.

(6.56.) MR. SEXTON: I beg to move in line 5, after the word "moneys," to insert the words "except as to the percentages hereinafter mentioned." The clause provides that a Land Purchase Account shall be established to which shall be carried all moneys received on account of any purchase-annuity for the discharge of an advance, and from this provision the object of my Amendment is to except the county percentage of 5s. per cent. I do not see why this should be paid into the Guarantee Fund. The Stock you create costs you 2½ per cent., and the Sinking Fund 1 per cent., together 3½ per cent., and you have nothing else to provide for but the current dividend and the Sinking Fund. Why then add another ¼ per cent.? The required 3½ per cent. is sufficient without it, and I consider it a purely arbitrary exaction. I want some explanation of the reason why this is exacted. However, if the Government insist on levying this ¼ per cent., then I come to the object of this Amendment. Why should this ¼ per cent., which is called the county per centage, be carried to the Land Purchase Account, which account will be sufficiently filled if it receives the 2½ per cent., with 1 per cent. for the Sinking Fund? I propose that instead of this ¼ per cent. being carried to the Land Purchase Account it should be carried to a separate and independent account, to be applied as I will presently state. Your Guarantee Fund is precedent to the issue of Stock, but this is something subsequent—is a matter entirely foreign to the Guarantee Fund, and should find no place in it. Your Guarantee Fund is complete without it. I seriously ask the right hon. Gentleman what is the utility of his proposal? It is unjust that money contributed wholly by occupiers should be divisible partly among landlords. No farmer will feel the benefit of this county percentage. Will the Chief Secretary say that its distribution will produce any appreciable effect, or that any county ratepayer will feel himself better off in consequence of it? I believe that this clause, however, can be made into something that will confer a notable and memorable benefit upon Ireland. As the clause stands now the county percentage will sink into the sand. If the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary is unwilling to leave this out of the Guarantee Fund, let him put it into that fund first and then, if it is not wanted there, let it be added to the Fund for the erection of labourers' cottages. The Labourers' Acts have hitherto failed in their effect. A contribution was given to us last year for the purpose of erecting cottages, and we had some hope that the Exchequer contribution would be available for some time for the purpose. Now you are going to lock this money up for five years, and, therefore, the labourers will be deprived of any chance of the continuance of the £40,000 you agreed to give us last year. The Guarantee Fund can do extremely well without this paltry £2,500 a year, and I would therefore urge the right hon. Gentleman to allow it to pass into the fund at the disposal of the Lord Lieutenant to be by him divided, as if it were Probate Duty, among the various Poor Law Guardians. I think the farmers would not object to this, and the labourers would bless you for it. The expenditure of this sum of money in this way would create a most happy, salutary, and memorable change throughout Ireland. It is as true to-day as it was formerly, of the Irish labourers, that they are not only the worst clothed and the worst fed, but the worst housed men in Europe.

Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 5, after the word "moneys," to insert the words "except as to the percentages hereinafter mentioned."—(Mr. Sexton.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

(7.7.) MR. A. J. BALFOUR: By this Amendment the whole question of county percentage is raised. It is alleged that some injustice is done to the Irish tenant by not giving him full advantage of English credit. I consider that full justice is done by the Bill. The payment will be made, in some cases, by the tenant, and in some cases by the landlord; probably in more cases by the landlord than by the tenant. If the tenant thinks only of the amount of the annuity he has to pay in lieu of rent, and will bargain with his landlord on that consideration alone, I imagine that probably it will be the landlord who will pay the 5s. per cent., and not the tenant. Do not, at all events, let anyone assume too rashly that the party to the bargain who will pay this will be the tenant. I have to ask whether it really is unjust that we should ask those to whom we lend British credit to use part of the great boon bestowed upon them for purposes outside their own special requirements. Many important Members of the House not only agree with me in this, but think I have not gone nearly far enough. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham, and many others who do not agree with him in politics, are of opinion, not that I have given too much to the Local Authorities, but that I have not given enough, and have too rigidly confined the advantages to the class of the landlords, and the class of the tenants. The course adopted in the Bill, I think, best meets the equities of the case. The hon. Member says, "After all, the boon you have given to the Local Authorities is so trifling that it may be ignored." I am not sure that that is the case. It may almost be regarded as a fee to the Local Authorities for the collection of the annuities. It gives them an interest in collecting the annuities—an interest far greater than is given to any agent in Ireland in the collection of rents—and I cannot admit that that boon is of the insignificant and contemptible character stated by the hon. Member.

MR. SEXTON: It will only amount to 1d. in the £1.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Well, even so. I do not know what Irish ratepayers think, but in England we do not regard 1d. in the £1 as insignificant. Does the hon. Gentleman wish to withdraw this 5s. per cent. altogether from the guarantee? Does he wish that if there be a default in the locality the locality should not suffer? I think that would be bad in every way. I entirely agree that we should, as far as lies in our power, associate the Local Authorities with the punctual payment of the annuities. If the hon. Gentleman's proposal were accepted, and we were to divorce the localities and the payment of annuities, we should leave the localities animated by the dread of losing their share of the Guarantee Fund, and nothing else whatever. For these reasons I do not agree with the earlier part of the speech of the hon. Gentleman. But he concluded by making an appeal which really assimilates itself far more to the proposal we have in the Bill than it does to the proposal in the earlier portion of his remarks. I do not see how the hon. Gentleman's proposal materially differs from the proposal in the Bill. He says, "I will show you a plan that will confer a great boon on the labourers in Ireland, and one which the farmers will not grudge." I thought he was about to propose a plan which had entirely escaped the notice of Her Majesty's Government.

MR. SEXTON: Under the Bill it is only at the discretion of the Lord Lieutenant, by exemption from the rule, that the money is to be spent on labourers' cottages. I want to alter that, and make it the rule and not the exception.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Quite so; but the hon. Gentleman said there was to be some enormous benefit given to the labourers, and I do not think that that would be the case. Our own idea was that whenever the Local Authorities showed a desire to spend the money on labourers' cottages, it should be given to them for general purposes; but that where the Local Authorities did not show this desire, the Lord Lieutenant should earmark it and say that it should be devoted to this purpose. I believe that there would be very little difference indeed between the hon. Gentleman's proposal and our proposal. I have no doubt that under our proposal labourers' cottages will be erected in those Unions where the Guardians object to erecting them at present, whilst there will be no need for them in the Unions where the Guardians have exerted themselves to erect such cottages.

MR. SEXTON: For my part, I should not wish to see any part of this money thrown away on Unions where they are not willing to devote it to the building of labourers' cottages.

*(7.17.) MR. MAHONY (Meath, N.): The hon. Member for West Belfast will not be surprised if I say that I cannot support this Amendment, because I have two Amendments upon the Paper which I think would make the Bill more effective than the present Amendment, which only, so far as I understand it, provides that the money shall not pass through the Land Purchase Account. I do not think it matters very much whether the money passes through that account or not, so long as it ultimately comes into the possession of the Labourers' Cottage Fund. The tenants in Ireland are quite intelligent enough to be able to calculate how much they will have to pay at so many years' purchase, and therefore it will be no direct benefit to them to reduce the instalments to 3½ per cent., because if it remains at 4 per cent. they will not be prepared to pay quite so many years' purchase. But there is a direct reason why you should give this small amount of 5s. to the labourer. They are part of the community who will have to guarantee payment year by year of the 4 per cent. I heard an hon. Member allege the other night that the labourers would not have to guarantee 4 per cent., but he was in error in the matter, for he assumed that persons occupying holdings of under £4 valuation do not pay county cess. It is true they do not pay poor rates. The landlord has to pay those, but they do pay county cess, and are liable for it as much as any other class of occupiers; and if there is any default in the payments under this Act, it is by means of an extra payment to the county cess that it will be made good. Therefore, the labourers will have to contribute towards this; and I say that, under those circumstances, they have a special claim to consideration. They are in the same position as tenant farmers, save that the latter have a chance of securing benefit by purchasing these holdings, whereas the labourers have not. The labourers have a special claim to get this 5s. My hon. Friend says it will be a trifling amount, but if the whole £30,000,000 were expended it would be £75,000 a year, which would hardly be a trifle. I think we may press on the Chief Secretary to make some concession on this point. I ask that instead of throwing the onus of proof as to whether the money is required for building labourers' cottages on the locality we should assume—what everybody who knows Ireland is willing to assume—that there is no district in the country where labourers' cottages are not wanted. Let us leave it to the ratepayers to show that the money is not wanted for this purpose, and to apply, if they think it necessary, to the Lord Lieutenant for power to spend the money in relief of the rates. If no such application is made, I ask that the money shall be used for the erection of labourers' cottages, and for no other purpose. The Chief Secretary could give this small amount of money out of the Guarantee Fund, and do so without any risk to the British taxpayer. I hope he will seriously consider the matter.

(7.25.) SIR G. CAMPBELL: I must say that I view with great apprehension what has happened to-day. The hon. Member for Cork made a speech in Ireland yesterday and said that Irish traitors refuse to take British money when they have the chance. That may have an effect on the people of Ireland, and the English people may think with the hon. Member that the Irish Members have now the chance of taking British money. These hon. Gentlemen get up to-day and say, "We want your money, but what we object to is the provision for its repayment. We object to the repayment coming from Irish pockets." It seems to me that this $\frac{1}{4}$ per cent. is the only real assurance we have for the repayment of this money. There are likely to be some bad debts, and this amount will go to make them good and to reconp the British taxpayer to the extent of $2\frac{3}{4}$ per cent. This $\frac{1}{4}$ per cent. will be security against bad debts, and if it is not wanted for that purpose it will go to the improvement of the cottages of the Irish labourers. I do not like the friendly approximation we see between the Chief Secretary and hon. Members below the Gangway on this side of the House, who have just voted for the 1st clause. The Chief Secretary says, "The first part of the speech of the hon. Member for West Belfast I do not accept, but the second part does not seem to be so bad." He seems inclined to give up the security for the payment of Irish debts in order to devote it to Irish local purposes—

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Nothing of the kind.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: We hear that when a certain class of people differ, honest men come by their rights. May not the converse of that happen; and that if a certain class of people agree together, honest men will be deprived of their rights? I hope the Committee will insist on retaining this small Irish security for the repayment of these loans.

(7.28.) COLONEL NOLAN (Galway, N.): I do not deny that the hon. Member who has just sat down is an honest man, but I am sorry he compares us to people who are not quite honest. However, the courtesy of the hon. Member is well-known, and I pass from his courtesy to his argument. I would point out that Irish credit has been pledged for the benefit of the English Empire over and over again. Our credit is pledged with yours in India; and although you benefit, it has been computed, to the extent of £14,000,000 a year by the possession of India, we derive no benefit at all. We ask in return for the pledging of our credit in this and other directions that we in Ireland should derive some slight benefit from British credit. Passing from the hon. Gentleman's speech I will deal with the Amendment. It is a double-barrelled one, the hon. Member seeking with the left barrel to bring down the small tenant in the West of Ireland, and with the right barrel to bring down the labourer in the South of Ireland. There are not many of either class, but I think we are at some disadvantage in discussing an Amendment which has this twofold object. I should have preferred to take each object separately. However, they are both very good. The hon. Member says the tenants should get the loans at £3 15s. interest. There is a large sum of money given from the Probate Duty to Ireland; and before the Imperial credit would come in, the whole of this Probate Duty could be come upon, consequently the Government could very well afford to allow the tenants in Ireland to buy their lands at the rate of £3 15s. per cent. I have an Amendment dealing with small tenants only, but I will take the case of the whole of the tenants, and I think it is a great mistake to endeavour to tax them for the benefit of any other class of the community by putting on this extra 5s. I think they ought to get the money at the cheapest rate at which the Government can give it. What I chiefly object to is that this 5s. fund combines the two characteristics of a Guarantee Fund and a Benevolent Fund. It ought to be either a Guarantee Fund, when the Guarantee Fund would come back to the tenants, or it ought to be a Benevolent Fund upon which the Poor Law Unions and the neighbours ought to be able to reckon. I think it is highly disadvantageous for every one concerned. It is bad for the State, because it prevents bargains being made, and also bad for the landlords, because it stops bargains; but it is worse for the tenants, who have to pay 5s. more. It will be ultimately, no doubt, borne partially by the tenant and partially by the landlord, but at first the burden will fall chiefly on the tenant. In this way, I think, this is a most objectionable part of the Bill. As regards the case of the labourers, they ought not to be set against the farmers; and, as in my own part of the country, the farmers are nearly all small farmers, and they are intermingled with the labourers in many ways, this proposal of the Bill is particularly objectionable. What this Bill ought to do for the labourers is to give them facilities for acquiring land. That I do not think the Bill adequately provides for at present. But the labourers ought not to be benefited by a tax under this Bill as against the farmers. The worst of all, however, is that they are to be benefited by an uncertain tax, which will prevent them from getting some other benefits. It will be argued that the labourers pay some county cess to the Guarantee Fund, but we know they pay an almost infinitesimal amount of county cess, so that the actual contribution under the Bill is very small. The labourers pay a good deal in the shape of taxes on alcohol, tobacco, and tea, and if the labourers are to benefit at all, it should be out of the Imperial Funds to which they are larger contributors. As a class they pay far more for Imperial purposes than rich men, and I personally would like to see all reference to labourers struck out of the Bill so far as surplus money is concerned, and I should like to see introduced facilities for the acquisition of half an acre or an acre of land on the same terms as the farmer buying 100 acres. I hope the Government will re-consider the case, and will seriously consider the point whether it would not be far better to strike out altogether the extra 5s. and let the tenants have the land for £3 15s. per cent.; or if they cannot do that, at any rate, when the Guarantee Fund is satisfied, let the 5s. be refunded. On the whole, I am inclined to support the Amendment of the hon. Member for West Belfast (Mr. Sexton), because it is an Amendment that depends entirely upon how it is looked at. The actual wording is rather difficult to follow, but I interpret it in the shape in which I have endeavoured to put my remarks. I look upon this as the most important part of the Bill, but one upon which the Government have gone wrong.

(7.40.) MR. MACARTNEY (Antrim, S.): The hon. Member for West Belfast lays great stress upon the Amendment; but if that is so, and if he considers that very great benefits would accrue from it, I think it is a matter of great regret that it was not placed on the Paper. The hon. Member will know from experience of this House that it is a very awkward and inconvenient thing to propose in manuscript an Amendment upon which any hon. Member relies. If it is desired to obtain a very important alteration in a clause, certainly it is much more convenient that hon. Members should have an opportunity of judging clearly its effect. I have listened to the argument of the hon. Member, and, in the first place, I do not agree that his Amendment would make much alteration in the bargain to be arrived at between tenant and landlord. I do not think it would be of that great benefit to the tenant which some hon. Members opposite seem to think. I fancy, if this 5s. were struck out altogether, it would only result in the landlord and tenant coming to an agreement on a slightly different basis, which would end, in all probability, in the tenant paying a higher price for his land. So far as the Amendment regards the labourer, I have listened to what the hon. Gentleman has said, and I cannot see that the alteration which he proposes in the machinery of the clause will lead to any material benefit to the labourer. If it did I should be extremely glad to join him. It is my opinion that the benefits conferred on the labouring population of Ireland in the Bill are extremely minute. I regret much that the Government have not been able to see their way to make them more effective. Everybody seems to have his own little plan to improve the Bill in that direction, and possibly before the end of the Committee I may venture to offer a plan, which I think will, at all events, place a more effective sum at the disposal of the Government and the Local Authorities for the benefit of the labourers. If I felt convinced that the alteration proposed was a really effective alteration in the direction of conferring a much larger material benefit or placing a much larger sum at the disposal of the authorities for the labourers, I should vote for it, but I cannot see that the distinction is very great, and I shall therefore support the clause as it stands, hoping before the Committee comes to an end to do something in a more material way to amend it.

*(7.44.) MR. SHAW LEFEVRE (Bradford, Central): The proposal of my hon. Friend the Member for West Belfast (Mr. Sexton) is one which has my cordial approval. It seems to me that this 5s. out of the £4 which is to be handed over first to the Guarantee Fund and then to be devoted at the discretion of the Lord Lieutenant to labourers' cottages is very important. For my part, I should like to see it a larger amount; and if the Government had been inclined to support the Amendment of my right hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton (Mr. H. H. Fowler), this fund would have been increased by £75,000 a year. I am sure my hon. Friend the Member for West Belfast is justified, from his point of view, in moving his Amendment. He proposes, I understand, that the tenant should be paid the sum of 5s. per cent. out of the £4.

MR. SEXTON: I did not put that forward. I only mentioned it casually.

*MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: I entirely agree with what the Chief Secretary has said, that this is not a reduction from the tenant, but rather from the landlord. My impression is that if the tenants paid 3½ per cent. the landlord would get rather a larger price for the purchase than he otherwise would do if political economy—and I am afraid it does not—prevailed in Ireland. The importance of the clause as it stands is this: The 5s. out of the £4 goes to the Guarantee Fund for the security of the English taxpayer beyond the amount of the instalments; secondly, it gives a bonus to the labourers; and, thirdly, it associates public opinion in Ireland with the payment of these instalments. Now, all these objects seem to me well worthy of assistance, and I should be very unwilling to see the Bill altered in this respect. If, therefore, my hon. Friend means that the 5s. should not pass through the Guarantee Fund, then I, for my part, could not support the Amendment. If, on the other hand, he means that the discretion to the Lord Lieutenant as to labourers' cottages should be more mandatory, I should be willing to support him.

MR. SEXTON: I am willing to agree to the point that the money should pass through the Guarantee Fund, and that, on being released from that fund, it shall be applied directly to the purpose specified.

(7.50.) MR. T. M. HEALY: I understand that this 5s. is to be disposed of according to the principle on which the Probate grants are now made. I have two or three times raised the question, and certainly I shall move the omission of the words when we come to that part of the Bill, because a more mischievous way of distributing money I have never known. I think the Government would do well to accept the Amendment at this stage. Now, this 5s. per cent. over the whole £30,000,000 will amount to £75,000—or £2,500 for every £1,000,000 paid out. The Government, by their present attitude, are really refusing practical benefit to the labourer. The labourers in all the provinces of Ireland, except Ulster, have used the Labourers' Act, but in Ulster it has not been put into operation at all; and the result will be that the Lord Lieutenant will make an Order which will benefit the Orange districts, where the Labourers' Act has not been put in operation at all; while the labourers in other parts of the country, where the Act has been used, will gain no benefit whatever. In other words, you will be able to take advantage of your own wrong. The result will be that the Lord Lieutenant will use this provision for the Province of Ulster, and Ulster alone. I therefore think my hon. Friend is well advised in moving his Amendment at this particular stage. I wish to make a remark in reference to what was said by an hon. Gentleman in regard to the speeches—he said “the very important speeches”—delivered in Ireland by the hon. Member for Cork. I would venture to assure him that they have about as much influence in that island as the speeches of the hon. Gentleman himself have in this House. The only other remark I have to make is this: that they attract as much attention as the speeches of the respected Grand Master of the Orangemen about whom a question was asked to-day.

MR. SEXTON: The Amendment in its present form is quite consistent with the use of the Guarantee Fund. The money may be kept out of the land purchase account, and yet may come into the Guarantee Fund.

(7.55.) MR. KNOX: I venture to think that there is no reason why some arrangement should not be come to between both sides of the House. The hon. Member for North Antrim, for instance, was largely in sympathy with the object of my hon. Friend the Member for West Belfast. My hon. Friend's Amendment would leave the county percentage as before, but it would ensure that it would go to the labourer, there being little security at present that it will go in that direction. If real benefit is to be conferred on the labourer in Ireland, the sum should go to him directly. The Government have ample guarantees in the latter part of the measure in the Irish Probate, and in the Exchequer contribution. Suppose the Lord Lieutenant ordered that the county percentage should be devoted to the erection of labourers' cottages, you would have no guarantee, nothing really that would make the farmer more anxious to pay his instalments. It would not hurt the farmers to find the labourers in cottages like pig styes. Therefore, we say there is no real guarantee. We urge the Government, if possible, to accept this Amendment, and to provide that this money shall go directly to the labourer. We think he ought to get some benefit under this Bill. So far he has reaped but little advantage from Irish land legislation. But the Government propose that the money shall be ladled first from the tenant's pocket into the land purchase account and thence into the Guarantee Fund, and it will be only after a considerable lapse of time that it can reach the labourers. The object of this Amendment is to make it certain that the labourer will get this not inconsiderable sum which, if it is employed as we suggest, will effect a great and beneficial change on the face of Ireland. If the Amendment is not carried it is evident the labourer will get nothing at all.

(8.3.) MR. MACARTNEY: I am as anxious as hon. Members opposite that this money shall go direct to the labourers. I understand the contention to be that it should be withdrawn from the cash portion of the Guarantee Fund and go directly to that fund over which the Local Authority has control. Now, that is a matter entirely for the Government and the Representatives of the British taxpayer to settle. For myself I am quite prepared to agree that this $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. shall go directly into the hands of the Local Authorities to be applied to the erection of agricultural labourers' cottages in Ireland.

*MR. MAHONY: May I point out there will be really no risk to the British taxpayer if this money does go direct to the Labourers' Fund, because if the county percentage is not paid the person who will be the sufferer will be the labourer. The money is not due to the State; what is due to the State is the $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. I hope that the Government will grant this small concession.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.): It is rather inconvenient to discuss an Amendment which does not appear on the Paper. I can state my objection in a couple of sentences. This is not a labourers' Bill, but a measure for the creation of an occupying ownership in Ireland. I am not prepared to nibble here and there at the securities provided in the Bill, and, therefore, I support the clause as drawn. At the same time, I believe the labourers will reap great advantage under the clause.

Good!

(8.6.) MR. LABOUCHERE: I cannot agree with my hon. Friends that this is not, to a certain extent, covered by the advances. Unquestionably, this £75,000 per annum is part of the compulsory Guarantee Fund. What I would suggest is this: If they wish it to go directly to the labourers instead of to the county there will be no objection, so far as I can see, from the standpoint of the British taxpayer, but it must be provided there is no default anywhere.

MR. T. M. HEALY: We have now had an expression of opinion from the most watchful guardian of the British taxpayer. I really think the Government might make some little concession on this point. The hon. Member for South Antrim is in favour of our proposition, so is the hon. Member for Northampton. Of course, the Government are not in the habit of taking notice of what the hon. Member for South Tyrone says, so there is nobody in the House of any account against our Amendment. The Chief Secretary treated the County Board, the Grand Jury, and the Board of Guardians as if they were composed of persons who were the safety-valves of the successful working of the Act. He seemed to have an idea they would have a temptation to see that no fault was made. But I venture to say that if a man knew a neighbour was about to make default, the infinitesimal loss which would thereby accrue would not cause his remonstrance to amount to sternness. The right hon. Gentleman spoke as if everybody would be watching the operation of the purchase system in the same way as a gardener watched the growth of a new plant. Why, that is absurd. I could not understand what the hon. and gallant Member for Galway was aiming at. He seemed to argue that the labourers ought to get nothing under this Bill. He seemed to say that in his district there were no labourers, but that they were all small farmers. Well, my point is that the labourer does not get a sufficient advantage, and I appeal to the Government, as there is considerable discontent in Ireland as to the distribution of the Probate Duty, to concede this direct benefit to the labourer—a benefit which would be real and substantial, while causing infinitesimal loss to the farmer and to the rates.

*(8.12.) SIR J. COLOMB (Tower Hamlets, Bow, &c.): I cannot see that a case has been made out for the Amendment. The amount of money which would be placed at the disposal of Boards of Guardians would be so small that scarcely any cottages could be built. I sympathise with the agricultural labourer in Ireland; but if we intend to confer any substantial benefit on him under the Bill, it should be in a direction that is practical and not theoretical. I am strongly of opinion that labourers occupying cottages under the Board of Guardians should be allowed to purchase; but I think it is unnecessary to tamper with the financial arrangements of the Bill, especially when there has not been placed before the Committee any reason showing that there will be any substantial benefit conferred on the labourers.

(8.14.) COLONEL NOLAN: I am sorry the hon. Member for North Longford failed to understand my point. I think if the labourers are to get any benefit they should be allowed to purchase their holdings, but I do not think a tax should be put upon Consols for their benefit. The hon. Member in one of his speeches said the arguments of the hon. Member for Cork would have no weight in Ireland. I will not say what the general effect is, but I know that in the Counties of Roscommon, Mayo, and Galway they will have great weight on the smaller tenants. I have just had an opportunity of speaking to a local gentleman, who—

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! The Committee had better attend to its own business.

(8.16.) MR. SEXTON: I venture to point out to the hon. and gallant Officer opposite that his Amendment does not merely confer a theoretical benefit; the benefit it confers is of an extremely practical character. The £75,000, which would be the amount available when the full £30,000,000 is advanced—

MR. T. W. RUSSELL: When will that be?

MR. SEXTON: I hope very soon. The £75,000 will be sufficient to erect 1,000 cottages per annum. It appears to me that the Chief Secretary's object in regard to the county percentage is substantially the same as that of the Irish Members; and, if that is so, I do not see why the right hon. Gentleman should object to have it stated in the Bill. I would, therefore, propose that the clause be amended by providing that the money in question shall be applied towards the cost of erecting labourers' cottages under the Labourers' Cottages (Ireland) Acts, subject to such regulations as the Lord Lieutenant may think expedient. I will go further. If the right hon. Gentleman thinks the Lord Lieutenant should have a more general discretion as to the application of the money, I will not make it a mandate that the money shall be applied in a particular way. But anyone who knows anything about the condition of Ireland must be aware that the great bulk of the agricultural labourers are miserably housed, and are yet paying intolerably high rents, and, therefore, for many years to come this money could be most usefully employed.

*(8.21.) MR. MAHONY: If the Chief Secretary falls in with that suggestion it will preclude the necessity of my moving several Amendments which stand in my name.

(8.22.) MR. A. J. BALFOUR: There were originally three questions before the Committee. The first was whether this money should form part of the Guarantee Fund. I understand that the hon. Gentleman does not press that. The second question has never been clearly stated, but I think it was whether this 5s. should be put into a common purse for the whole of Ireland or be distributed only in the county in which the holding is situated. I do not think any change is possible in the Bill in that respect. I hold that the county in which the sale takes place is, ought to be, and must be, the county to derive the benefit from the 5s. The third question is as to whether the whole money should be given for the purpose of erecting labourers' cottages, or whether some discretion should be left to the Lord Lieutenant, who is the Executive Government, as to how it shall be used. I take it the Debate is now narrowed down to one point, and I think I can show the Committee reasons for preferring the present form of the Bill. I agree with everything that has been said in favour of substituting tolerable houses for the miserable hovels in which many labourers at present live in Ireland, but I think that every one acquainted with the condition of Ireland will admit that to do anything to make the number of labourers in a district in excess of the employment to be obtained there would be most disastrous to the labourers themselves. A careful eye must be kept on the needs of the district, and public money must not be used for the purpose of encouraging labourers to remain there.

MR. SEXTON: The Local Government Board Inspector will do that.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The point of the hon. Member is that the whole of the money must be spent on labourers' cottages and within the county. I can conceive cases in which the erection of large numbers of cottages would be a serious evil in the county in which they may be built. I agree that there is probably no county in Ireland in which a considerable sum might not with advantage be spent in that way. That, however, is a different thing from putting a provision in the Bill compelling a sum of £75,000 to be spent annually for that purpose. I cannot agree to earmark the money in this way. There is no danger that the Lord Lieutenant, who through the Chief Secretary is subject to the will of the House, will not do his best to see that the money is spent to the utmost advantage and for the benefit of the labourers. I think he will have the strongest possible motive for using it for the erection of labourers' cottages in every county in which such cottages are required. Therefore, I think there is no necessity for a change in the Bill.

*(8.27.) MR. MAHONY: I think we are all practically agreed, but I fear the Chief Secretary has not quite appreciated the object of the Amendment. It is that Clause 2 presumes, in the first place, that the money is to be used for the reduction of the county cess and poor rate, save where it appears to the Lord Lieutenant, on the representation of the Local Government Board, it should be applied to the erection of labourers' cottages. The presumption, then, is that it is not to be applied to the erection of labourers' cottages unless a special case can be made out. We want the presumption to be the other way. We do not object to giving the Lord Lieutenant power to apply the money to the reduction of the county cess if it can be shown there is no necessity for labourers' cottages in the county. All we want to do is to reverse the order of this clause, and to avoid the necessity of incurring the expense of making application to the Lord Lieutenant. We want to secure the money without expense. There is one other alteration I would suggest to the Chief Secretary, and it is that there should be power, under the direction of the Lord Lieutenant, to use this money not only for the purpose of erecting new cottages, but for the purpose of paying the annual instalments on cottages already erected.

(8.31.) MR. T. M. HEALY: What we suggest is that the right hon. Gentleman should reverse the order of things; that is to say, that the presumption should be that the money should go to labourers' cottages in the first instance, and in the second case be diverted to the relief of local taxation.

(8.32.) MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I prefer the clause as it stands, but I shall be glad to make a concession on this point. Hon. Gentlemen have given up their ideas on several matters, and I should be glad to join hands on the suggested terms, namely, that this money should not necessarily be applied to labourers' cottages in cases where it is not required, but that the clause should be so framed that the presumption should be in the direction of so applying it.

MR. SEXTON: On that understanding I ask leave to withdraw my Amendment.

(8.33.) MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camborne): We are not all agreed about this matter. There is one important individual who has not been consulted at all, and that is the British taxpayer. I regard with great suspicion every attempt to devote any money, whether it comes from—

THE CHAIRMAN: I understand the hon. Member for West Belfast wishes to withdraw his Amendment, so as to leave this fund primarily in the Guarantee Fund.

*MR. MAHONY: Are we to understand the right hon. Gentleman agrees that this money may be used for the purpose of paying off some of the instalments on cottages already erected?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR'S answer was inaudible in the Gallery.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

(8.35.) MR. T. M. HEALY: In the absence of my hon. Friend (Mr. Chance), I beg to move, in Clause 2, page 2, line 9, after "(a)" to insert—

"In paying to the Labourers' Dwellings Fund hereinafter established a sum equal to the difference between the nominal value of the Guaranteed Land Stock purchased by the National Debt Commissioners and the price paid by them therefor."

The object of the Amendment is that in case the National Debt Commissioners are able to purchase the Stock at 98, and so to make a profit of £2 on each £100, the profit should go into the Labourers' Dwellings Fund. The Chancellor of the Exchequer has stated that the Government do not desire to make any profit by the transactions, but it is clear that if the Stock is depreciated there will be profit somewhere.

Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 9, after "(a)" to insert the words—

"In paying to the Labourers' Dwellings Fund hereinafter established a sum equal to the difference between the nominal value of the Guaranteed Land Stock purchased by the National Debt Commissioners and the price paid by them therefor.—(Mr. T. M. Healy.)"

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. GOSCHEN: It is quite true that the Government do not desire to make a profit; but the real point is, how the Sinking Fund will stand. It may happen that the Government or the National Debt Commissioners may not be able to invest the money without loss. The hon. Gentleman need not be afraid; this balance will simply be used in the redemption of so much more Stock.

(8.37.) MR. T. M. HEALY: I will withdraw the Amendment; but will the right hon. Gentleman undertake that, in case there is an appreciable profit, we may have a claim to devote the profit to some purpose connected with Ireland?

(8.38.) MR. GOSCHEN: The hon. Member is putting this claim forward in the interest of Ireland 49 years hence, but the interest of the British taxpayer 49 years hence should not be lost sight of. The Government will consider whether, if after the whole operation, there be a surplus, the surplus may not be applied to Irish purposes. It is certainly not the intention of the Government to make one atom of profit out of the transaction.

(8.39.) MR. CONYBEARE: I am exceedingly relieved to hear that the right hon. Gentleman has not altogether forgotten the existence of the British taxpayer. What I and many others contemplate is that these operations will land the country in great loss, and we do not view with equanimity a proposal that whatever profit there may be on the Chancellor of the Exchequer's Stock-jobbing transactions, should inure to the Irish tenant, but think it should inure to the British taxpayer.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: I do not agree with my hon. Friend. I think if there is a profit it ought to go to the Irish people. They have to bear any loss, and, therefore, they ought to receive the benefit of any profit.

(8.40.)

*(9.16.) MR. MAHONY: The Chief Secretary has made a concession which will render it unnecessary for me to press the Amendment which stands in my name, and I only want the Attorney General for Ireland to consider this matter before the Bill reaches Report stage—

(9.17.) Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; House counted, and 40 Members being found present,

*(9.19.) MR. MAHONY: There is no necessity for me to press my Amendment, owing to the concession made by the Government, but I suggest, the consideration of this further concession before the Report stage is reached, that in any county where the Lord Lieutenant decides that such percentage is not required, he may have power to apportion, in that particular county, any part of such sum in any way he thinks fit, for the reduction of annual payments in the case of houses already erected under the Labourers' Dwellings Act. My reason for asking this is that I know as a positive fact that there are many districts in Ireland where the instalments necessary on the erection of labourers' houses are a very heavy payment. It is all very well to provide labourers with better dwellings than they formerly occupied, but I am not at all sure that when a man can hardly earn the money to supply his family with food, he appreciates this benefit he has to pay for'; and if this money is not required in any particular county for the erection of new buildings, then the Lord Lieutenant should have power to apportion the money for the reduction of instalments on this account.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I think it was understood that, having this substantial concession, we should proceed to make progress.

(9.21.) MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Amendment which I would suggest to carry out the pledge I gave earlier in the proceedings, would be to omit the words after "advance," in line 14, down to "that," in line 19. Perhaps I had better read the sub-section as it would read when amended—

"In paying to the Guarantee Fund an annual sum (in this Act referred to as the county percentage) at the rate of every 5s. for every £100 of the advance, the whole or any part of such percentage not required for the purposes of the Guarantee Fund shall be applied to erection of labourers' dwellings in the county wherever such holdings are situate under the provisions of the Labourers (Ireland) Acts, subject to such regulations and terms as the Lord Lieutenant may think expedient, save where it appears to him, on the representation of the Local Government Board, that the whole or any part of such percentage should not be so applied he may order it to be applied as if it were part of the Irish Probate Duty grant, and subject to such regulations as he thinks expedient he may withhold or suspend the distribution of the whole or part of the said percentage when paid to the Local Taxation (Ireland) Account."

As a preparatory Amendment, I would move the omission of the words from "which," in line 14, to "that" in line 19.

(9.23.) COLONEL NOLAN: I have an Amendment to propose before that. It is necessary, before we proceed to the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman, that this should be first considered. The object of my Amendment has relation to the small tenants, and I fix the limit of those at £15, because in other Acts I observe that has been adopted as a limit, though I attach no importance to that exact limit; it may be fixed at £10 or £20. I will accept any limit to the large number of tenants between £1 and £20. My object is to provide that the annual payment to the Guarantee Fund shall be at the rate of 1s. for all holdings paying a purchase annuity under £15. I may say that in the West of Ireland, at all events, with which part of the country I am best acquainted, the great bulk of the tenants have holdings ranging in value from £1 to £20. I do not think that these people should pay any tax or contribution to any account beyond what they pay at present. I think that above all classes in the community these are the people who should be made peasant proprietors. One reason is that these very small tenants are so very much more numerous, and if our great object is to solidify society, and the peasant proprietor class in Ireland, then this can be accomplished to a much larger extent and by the same expenditure where you deal with 50 tenants of £4 than with one tenant at £200. Now of the £30,000,000 these small tenants, though so much more numerous than the large tenants, will have the benefit of £6,000,000 or £8,000,000 only, the larger tenants will have the great bulk of the advances. For the advantage it will be to the scheme as a whole, I think the small tenants might have the benefit of obtaining money at a slightly lower rate than the larger tenants, and the possible loss to your Guarantee Fund will be extremely small. It cannot, I suppose, exceed at the utmost £20,000. I ask that they should have slightly better terms, £3 16s. on each £100 Stock, £3 15s. to the State, and 1s. to the Guarantee Fund, instead of £4 paid by the larger tenants. You will thus more rapidly solidify the class of small proprietors at a cheap rate, and you will have some lien on their gratitude when they appreciate the advantage of British credit. On the other hand if you demand this extra 4s. they will be entitled to say that they are subjected to extra taxation for local purposes, for labourers' cottages, or the Poor Law or other purposes. They are in fact their own labourers where these small tenancies prevail, so that by this slight modification you would be really taking nothing from the labourers of the district. This is the only Amendment I have on the Paper, and if the Government accept this I will undertake to put no other Amendment down. I attach great importance to the Amendment, and I am sure it will make this Bill very popular among the small tenants to whom it would apply. About five-sixths of this very Guarantee Fund is formed by the tenant purchasers themselves, and my Amendment will not prevent the larger tenants paying to that fund, and I believe that if my proposal is carried it will confer a great benefit on society and on the smaller tenants especially.

Amendment proposed,

In page 2, line 13, after the words "rate of," to insert the words "one shilling for all holdings paying a purchase annuity under fifteen pounds, and for all other holdings."—(Colonel Nolan.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

(9.32.) MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am sanguine enough to think that I can show the hon. and gallant Gentleman conclusive reasons why this particular Amendment shall not be accepted. In the first place this Act is based upon the Ashbourne Acts of 1885 and 1888, where the amount required from the tenant is 4 per cent., and if this relief, as the hon. and gallant Member considers it, were given to the tenant, the only effect would be that 4s. out of the 5s. would be unappropriated and unused. This Amendment would lead to an additional second clause. But ought they to pass such an inconsequential clause? The hon. and gallant Member says that in Galway there are practically hardly any labourers, and that almost the whole of the poorer population are excluded from the operation of this clause, because they are excluded from the operation of the Acts on which the clause is based. It is undoubtedly accurate that in Galway and other counties there are many small tenants. But what would be the result of this proposal? It would be that when the poor labourers were provided for, the whole of this money would go to the mass of the cess payers, and the mass of the cess payers are those whom the hon. and gallant Member desires to serve—the small tenants. He seems to think we are taxing the small tenants. I object to the phrase. What we are doing is to take some 50 per cent. off the rent payable by these small holders, and you can not call this enormous boon in any sense taxing those to whom it is given. The hon. and gallant Member wishes us to introduce the principle of the graduated Income Tax, and to use our credit in a different manner for the poor and for the relatively well to do. I do not think you can adopt that principle. If you did, you would have to give it great development in the Bill. The proposed relief would go more to the mass of the cess payers and to the landlords than to those whom it is intended to benefit, and under all those circumstances I hope that the hon. and gallant Member will not press an Amendment which, in view of the framework of our measure, it would be absolutely impossible to adopt.

(9.37.) COLONEL NOLAN: I certainly admit that this would necessitate the adoption of a consequential clause, but we are not likely to reach the new clauses for—I suppose even the sanguine Chief Secretary would say—at least three weeks, and therefore there will be plenty of time to consider the new clause. I believe that nine-tenths of the benefit that would be given by my Amendment would go to the small tenants. As a general rule, if you give an advantage to any small class of the community, although some other classes reap a certain amount of the general benefit, the bulk of the benefit sticks to the man to whom you give it first. If you let these small tenants off with 1s. per cent. the great bulk of the benefit will stick to them. The Bills drawn in this House have been nearly always framed in favour of the larger tenants. I have always been most anxious to help the larger tenants, but I have often wondered during the last 10 or 15 years at the conduct of statesmen on both sides of the House. For a comparatively small sum of money they could have done a great deal, simply because the same amount goes infinitely so much further in dealing with small than with large tenants. I believe that in the interest of punctuality it would help to let the people see that they were only paying the bare minimum the State could afford to lend them the money for. If this were only a small Guarantee Fund, they would be much more ready to pay up, I think. They will think the interest they pay according to the Bill a very heavy one, and it will act as a deterrent to their paying their instalments with punctuality. I am sorry the Government will not accept the Amendment which is one of great importance, and one which will be heard of a great deal later on if the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary does not make some movement in the desired direction.

(9.42.) MR. M. J. KENNY (Tyrone, Mid): The Amendment will reduce the instalments from the small farmers, and as the hon. and gallant Member said on a previous occasion, that the higher the rate from the Stock, the more valuable it will be, it seems to me that his present proposal is directly in the teeth of his earlier declaration. He is now attempting to undermine the argument he very gravely urged previously, and it, therefore, appears to me that he is trifling with the House. The effect of the Amendment would be to withdraw from the labourers the advantages proposed to be given by the proposal the Chief Secretary gave notice of. In my opinion, we should do nothing on this side of the House which would tend to deprive the tenants of Ireland of the advantages promised at the suggestion of the hon. Gentleman, the Member for West Belfast. But with regard to the Labourers' Act, not being of any advantage to the labourers in towns, I would say that where the Acts have been properly applied in Ireland, the effect has been to withdraw from small towns a considerable number of labourers who were hanging about and idling away their time to the rural districts where they have since led a much better and more useful life.

(9.45.) MR. SEXTON: I think the right hon. Gentleman would do well to consider whether it would be possible, whilst preserving the efficiency of the machinery of the Bill, to adopt some considerate line of treatment with regard to the small agricultural labourer. The right hon. Gentleman should consider whether he could relieve the small holders by making the insurance money less and postponing the payment of it to those paying 20 years' purchase—which will be harder than paying 10 years' purchase. It would be a relief to them to postpone it until five years before the date when the guarantee deposit has to be paid to the landlord, even if they were charged 10 per cent.

(9.47.) MR. MACARTNEY: I desire to warn my right hon. Friend that if at this early stage of the Bill he endeavours to differentiate between the various classes of tenants he will be entering upon a sea of troubles, from which he will find it difficult to extricate himself. There is not an hon. Member, from whatever part of Ireland he comes, who would not have a special grievance for the tenants in his constituency. It would be safer for my right hon. Friend to adhere to the broad lines on which the Bill is now based.

(9.49.) COLONEL NOLAN: If the Chief Secretary will make a difference in favour of these people, as suggested by the hon. Member for South Belfast, I shall be willing to accept the proposal. I do not much care about the manner in which it is given, provided these people do get an advantage. I cannot think that the hon. Member for Tyrone altogether misunderstood my remarks, as his words would seem to imply. It is one thing to say that the higher the rate for a Stock the more valuable it will be, and another to say that the lower the rate of interest the better it is for the tenant. The less the tenant pays on the Stock the better. The foundation of the fallacy in the hon. and learned Gentleman's mind is that he seems to think that there is only one set of interests, whereas there are two. No doubt it would be better if there was only one, namely, the £2 15s. interest. As to differentiating between classes I would point out that we have already done that under the Ashbourne Acts. I think we should regard differently men who pay small sums and men who pay large sums. I am sorry the Government will not accept the Amendment, and that the hon. Member for Tyrone has given it such opposition.

(9.51.) MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: I think the proposal of the hon. Member for West Belfast is worthy of attention in the interest of the small tenants, who should be relieved. I would suggest that when we come to the proper clause there should be some relaxation in the case of small holdings.

*(9.52.) MR. KEAY: The Chief Secretary has not been able to reply on the financial part of this matter, but I think he will be able to reply to a question I would now venture to ask him. The hon. and gallant Member for Galway said that in the West of Ireland there are very few labourers and a great many very small tenants, if you exclude the cities and towns. There will, therefore, be very little direct advantage to the labourers, and the hon. Member wants a corresponding advantage for the small tenants. The right hon. Gentleman's reply to that was very specific. He said that it must be remembered that although there are very few labourers in these poor country districts in the West of Ireland, yet it is also true that the small tenants there get an enormous reduction in the rent of land under the Land Purchase Bill. He said the tenants would have to pay only 50 per cent. in their instalments compared with the rental they now have to pay. We on this side of the House think the landlords have an unlimited power of extortion in forcing up the purchase price, and consequently the amount of the instalment. I want to know on what grounds the right hon. Gentleman has made his statement?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: My general impression of what land lets for in Ireland.

Ayes 5; Noes 202.—(Div. List, No. 143.)

Verbal Amendments made.

*(10.10.) MR. KEAY: The Amendment I have to propose is Clause 1, page 2, line 32, to leave out the words after "Fund"—

The "guarantee deposit" means the landlord's fifth. Now the Ashbourne Act provides that if £100 is advanced, £20 of it is to be retained by the State, and applied as a security in case of default by the tenant purchaser. But we have here an innovation which is perfectly inexplicable, and I want to know on what principle of rectitude such an alteration of the Ashbourne Act is introduced here in favour of the landlords. The landlords' deposit should be the first security in case of attempted or absolute default by the tenant, and this proposal is an insidious design upon the part of the Government to favour their friends, the landlords. By the provision in this Bill the landlords' fifth has practically become one-tenth—that is to say, only one-half of the fifth is to be practical security for the default of the tenant. Along with this innovation there was, in last year's Bill, another iniquitous provision, by which even this one-tenth was made to disappear altogether. It may be remembered that last year the combined effect of those two provisions was such that it elicited a considerable amount of opposition on both sides of the House, especially amongst Irish Members, as was only natural. What do the Government do now? They put one of these provisions only into this Bill, and reserve the other one, hoping that this Bill will pass, until the next Bill, namely, the Land Department Bill, in which it is inserted as Clause 17, Sub-section (2), so that they will, they believe, be able as it were to defeat opposition in detail. I fancy their policy is that of the well known saying, "Here a little and there a little." They will take a little in this Bill—that is to say, they will take away half of the landlords' fifth, and when the next Bill comes on they will take away the other half, and the result will be that they will have the whole entirely to their own satisfaction, in favour of the landlords, and there will be no landlords' deposit remaining at all. The full significance of this insidious design is only to be estimated by another reference to the Land Department Bill. The present Bill says nothing about the process of when and how the landlord's fifth is going to be drawn upon; but the Land Department Bill says that the landlord's fifth is only to be drawn upon after eviction, and all sorts of processes, in which the Imperial Government and the British taxpayer are very much interested, have taken place. This clause here provides that even after eviction, after the British taxpayer, after the Imperial State has incurred all the difficulty and all the odium of evicting the tenant, only one-half of the deposit shall go as an irrecoverable debt, and the other half be retained in the name of the landlord. I hope this side of the House will make a decided stand against the introduction of any such provision; and it is to be hoped the Government themselves will consider the desirableness of accepting this Amendment, in so much as it surely is a matter of fair consideration and equity that the landlord who, alone in Ireland, under this Bill escapes all subsequent penalty, and all subsequent levies, should be put in the position of one against whom the State have a certain claim with regard to the guarantee deposit.

Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 32, to leave out from the word "Fund," to the end of Sub-section (3)—(Mr. Keay.)

Question proposed,

"That the words 'Provided that where a sum is applicable out of the guarantee deposit for the discharge or reduction of an irrecoverable debt' stand part of the Clause."

(10.25.) MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The hon. Gentleman bases the Amendment he lays before us upon the grounds of high equity. I confess I fail to follow him in the reasoning with which he supported his argument. If you are to have a Purchase Act at all you must trust the tenants to pay the annuity. You will also have to contemplate the possibility that certain tenants will not pay their annuities either through idleness or through misfortune, some fault of their own, want of skill or otherwise. If there be default, as default there must be in a certain proportion, I hope a very small proportion of the cases in Ireland, on whom is it to fall? Under the Ashbourne Act it necessarily fell first on the landlord, so far as one-fifth was concerned, and then on the taxpayer, because there was nobody else upon whom possibly it could fall. Now that we have introduced other guarantees, I am perfectly unable to see why they should not bear their portion of the loss. Take the case of a landlord who sells his land very cheap. The year after he sells it the tenant-purchaser sells it to a man who is drunken and incompetent and who fails to pay his instalments. The holding has to be sold, and when sold it does not realise the price paid. Why is the landlord to bear that loss? Why does equity declare that his fifth shall be exhausted before the collateral guarantees are come upon? Surely the fair plan is the plan by which the two collateral guarantees shall be called upon for the same amount at the same time. There is a further argument not based upon equity, but based upon expediency, which points in the same direction. It is very important that the locality should be deeply interested in the payment of the annuity. If the interest of the locality is only to begin when the landlord's fifth is exhausted, I fear that habits of non-payment will have time to form before antagonistic influence of a powerful character is established in the district. So that, apart from the ground of equity, I think on the ground of expediency there should be maintained an arrangement which is obviously the best one. The locality is called upon to pay its half, and the landlord is called upon to pay his half. Neither will be called upon to pay anything unless the debt is proved to be irrecoverable.

*(10.28.) MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: I think the Chief Secretary has given no reason whatever for the change he proposes from the Ashbourne Act. He has argued the question as if a deficiency or defalcation would arise only from the incompetency or neglect of the tenant, but there is another cause very likely to arise, namely, the high price paid for the land. When the clause of the Ashbourne Act was under discussion I myself was of opinion that it was hardly worth while to insert it. It appeared to me at that time that the tenant's interest was likely to be so valuable that it would not often occur that the holder, when there was a defalcation, would sell at less than his debt to the State. But the experience we have had of the Ashbourne Act has shown that I was mistaken, and that there have been many cases in which tenants have been unable to pay their instalments, and the holdings have been sold by the Land Commission, and have produced nothing at all. Here are one or two cases which will show the working of it. There was a case on an estate in Limerick, where the extent of the holding was 175 acres. The Poor Law valuation was £168, and the rent was £130. It was sold by the Land Court. The purchase money was £2,500. £500 was deposited by the landlord. After the tenant had been in about two years he became unable to pay, and the estate was put up for sale and realised nothing, there being no bidder. That showed that the tenant's interest was all gone, and that the rate of purchase had been a great deal too high. The defalcation amounted to £170.

MR. MACARTNEY: What is the number of the case?

*MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: No. 1 in the Return. The property was put up for sale by the Land Court. I ask is it fair that any portion of the defalcation of £170 should fall on the ratepayers of the district. It seems to me it is only right and fair that it should fall on the guaranteed deposit of the landlord in consideration of the fact that the purchase money was in the first place too high, and that the rent also was excessive. I will take another case—that of a farm in Waterford. The valuation was £82, the rent £92, and the purchase money £1,670. The instalment payable by the tenant was £66, and the tenant defaulted three years after the sale. The holding was thereupon put up for sale. It fetched nothing, and the Land Commission then applied for the guaranteed deposit. The landlord out of his own pocket had to forfeit his one-fifth to the Land Commission. Would it have been fair for any portion of that sum to have fallen on the ratepayers? Ought not the whole of it to come out of the guaranteed deposit? If you get rid of that security, it seems to me that you very much lessen the chance of repayment to the State; and, therefore, I hope that the Amendment of my hon. Friend will be allowed to pass.

*(10.34.) MR. MAHONY: One of the strongest arguments in favour of this Amendment appears to me to have been put forward by the Chief Secretary himself. The fact is that this is a proposal to treat the ratepayers of Ireland in a less fair manner than the British taxpayer is treated under the Ashbourne Act. Under the Ashbourne Act the British taxpayer had this guarantee to be used in its entirety; now are you going to force the Irish ratepayer to give security to the British taxpayer, and you will not allow him as you allowed the British taxpayer to come down in the same way on the guaranteed deposit? If it was fair to the British taxpayer that he should have the full advantage of this guarantee, surely it is equally fair to the Irish ratepayer that he, too, should have it in its undiminished extent. And all the more is it so, because the Irish taxpayer has no voice whatever in fixing the amount which the Land Commission may advance on the security. Unquestionably no risk of this kind ought to be borne. The person who ought first to bear any loss incurred, owing to the Land Commission advancing too much, surely should be the landlord who gets the amount advanced. I hope the Chief Secretary will treat the Irish ratepayer as he held that the British taxpayer was entitled to be treated under similar circumstances.

(10.36.) MR. SEXTON: Why does not the Chief Secretary adopt a straightforward mode of dealing with this matter? It seems to me that his conscience is uneasy. The candid way of dealing with it would be to provide that the guaranteed deposit should be one-tenth instead of one-fifth. Does the right hon. Gentleman mean to say that the whole of the fifth, which is retained for the landlord, will be available for the satisfaction of arrears?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Yes. If there is default it will be available until it is exhausted. It will be used pari passu with the local rates for the purpose.

MR. SEXTON: Undoubtedly, the local funds will always be available. But I say that immediately you touch the landlords' fund you can only take one half from it. Under the Ashbourne Acts, the moment a tenant fell into default the arrears were wholly realised out of the guaranteed deposit. But, for the future, that deposit is to be relieved at the expense of the local rates. I think it is incumbent on the Chief Secretary to show cause why the system embodied in the Ashbourne Act should be departed from. We have had that system enforced for six years. It was initiated in 1885 and revised in 1888; it has worked satisfactorily up till now, and I ask why should the guaranteed deposit not continue to be wholly liable as at present? The right hon. Gentleman asked why should the deposit of the landlord be entirely liable, and he suggested that, if it were entirely liable, it would differ from the general system of guarantees under the Bill. Let me ask the right Gentleman what are the securities under the Bill? Suppose there is a default on the part of the tenant. You take first the purchaser's insurance money. You do not take half of it, but you take the whole of it, in order to make up the default of the tenant, and then, if that be not sufficient for the purpose, you come on the holding. Do you sell a part of the holding, or half of the holding? Not at all. You sell the whole of the holding—you sell every acre and every stone upon it, and you turn the tenant out into the world. And then, if after all that you have not sufficient, you come, in the third place, on the landlord's guaranteed deposit. You have realised to the utmost extent against the tenant, but the moment you come to the landlord you say, "Oh! we will only ask him to pay one half, and we will come upon the public for the remaining half." I ask is it fair? Why should not the landlord be treated in the same manner as the tenant? Why, if you exhaust the tenant's property, should you not then exhaust the landlord's deposit? Moreover, if the half of the landlord's deposit is not sufficient, what do you do? You come upon the contingent deposit, and you stop thereby the working of the schools and the asylums, and other public institutions in Ireland. Surely that is not a desirable thing to do. I claim that we have an unanswerable case against this scheme of the Government. I heard just now an ejaculation from an hon. Member opposite. I take it that he is willing that the whole of the landlord's deposit should be utilised.

COLONEL WARING (Down, N.): Certainly not.

MR. SEXTON: Well, I have pointed out how the landlord is favourably treated while the tenant's funds are exhausted to the uttermost. I maintain that there should be no distinction between the two, and that the personal interest and realisable assets should all be exhausted before you come either on the ratepayers of Ireland or on the taxpayers of the district.

(10.45.) MR. M. J. KENNY: I maintain that this clause is intended merely for the relief of the landlords. They will not only receive 2½ per cent. but after 18 years they will be entitled to payments of 3 per cent. on the one-fifth of the purchase money which has been retained by the Government, and in addition to that, one-half of the one-fifth so retained cannot, under this provision, be used to make up any default. It can never be exhausted. The right hon. Gentleman says that this sum will be exhausted pari passu with the sum which was originally guaranteed by the tenant. I think that is not so. The tenant's guarantee has first to be exhausted, and when the landlord's guarantee comes to be resorted to—if ever it is—then you come upon the local rates. The tenant, under this Bill, has to provide a series of securities, and these have to be exhausted before the guarantee of the landlord can be touched. I invite the attention of the right hon. Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland to this point. If his contention is that the landlord's deposit can be ultimately used up in case of default, I submit that that is not so; that it can never be fully exhausted, and that at the period of 18 years the landlord will be entitled to withdraw one-half of the one-fifth. In the observations which we have heard from the Chief Secretary, I can find no reason advanced for this departure from the policy of the Ashbourne Acts.

(10.50.) MR. LABOUCHERE: Assuming that the money will be paid by the tenant, I do not think that the landlord will lose anything. On the contrary, I think he will be a considerable gainer. The landlords in Ireland have proved themselves to be exceedingly reckless persons in the matter of money. They have mortgaged their lands, and generally speaking, spent over and above their incomes. Suddenly they will be given a large sum of money, and surely it is an advantage to them to have a certain portion of it tied up, and to receive 3 per cent. upon it for a good number of years. As a matter of fact, we are acting as a species of trustee for the improvident Irish landlords because, no doubt, if the landlords had all the money down at once it would be recklessly squandered. I do not assume that the tenants will always pay. I think it is exceedingly probable that in many cases the landlords will manage to screw out of them a great deal more than the holdings are worth, and in the long run the tenants will find it exceedingly difficult to pay, owing to a fall in the value of produce, or other matters. Let us clearly explain what will be the position of the landlords. I will assume that the produce has fallen in value. If the estate had not been sold to the tenant, the landlord would have been unable to get in his rent, and therefore by the purchase transaction the landlord is to a certain extent indemnified, although he has to deposit one-fifth of the purchase money with the State. But under the proposal of this clause, although the call upon the guaranteed deposit may be £10, only £7 10s. will have to be paid by the landlord, while £2 10s. will have to be contributed by the locality. The Chief Secretary for Ireland says that that is placing the landlord in the same position as he was under the Ashbourne Act.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I did not say

MR. LABOUCHERE: Then he admits that the landlord is in a better position. Yet Gentlemen opposite, who represent the landlord interest, are perpetually complaining that they are injured by this Bill, and will not be placed in the same position as they were under the Ashbourne Act. There is, therefore, a difference of opinion between the Secretary of State for Ireland and his supporters, which will, no doubt, lead to a very interesting Debate. I take the liberty to agree with the Chief Secretary. I say that the landlords are benefited by this, and placed in a more advantageous position than they were in under the Ashbourne Act. I have in my hand a pamphlet. You told me, Mr. Chairman, when we were discussing a previous Amendment, that I was then out of order. It, no doubt, occurred to you that I should be in order in quoting from it on this clause. The point raised is, whether the tenants are likely to pay or not, and this pamphlet deals with that matter. It goes beyond a Return which we have had presented to us in this House. It gives certain memorials from tenants who have purchased their holdings under the Ashbourne Act, and those memorials show the difficulty they have in meeting their engagements. This is not the case of purchases made from the small landlords. They are purchases made from men of whom I speak with greatest reverence—men belonging to the nobility. For instance, the Marquess of Waterford obtained £124,000 under the Ashbourne Act. What do his tenants who purchased from him say? They say that the majority of them had no voice in arranging the contract; that they were obliged to agree to the landlord's terms under threat of eviction. Again, the Marquess of Bath's tenants ask for a reduction, and pray that in the Land Bill about to be brought before Parliament, some provision may be inserted to reduce the amount of annuities they now have to pay. The tenants of the Duke of Leinster say—

"Inasmuch as we, the majority of 365 Leinster tenants, were induced to purchase our holdings under the Ashbourne Acts, are now, through no fault of our own, unable to pay this year's instalment or purchase-money without disposing of the requisites for the working of our farms, we strongly protest against the confiscation of our property and our expulsion from our homes."

Memorials to a similar effect have been presented by the tenants of George Lane Fox, Meredith, and others. Now, what do these things show? They show that in the opinion of those tenants who bought under the Ashbourne Act they were forced to pay higher prices than the value of the holding, and that they are unable to meet the instalments. Why should we not have the same allegations raised in respect of purchases which may be made under this Act? Remember that this Act will have a far wider operation, and that, consequently, greater injustice may be committed. I think I have shown good cause for supporting this Amendment, and that the Committee will agree with me that the landlords' deposit ought to be exhausted, at any rate, before the local rates are trenched upon.

(10.57.) SIR H. DAVEY (Stockton): I think the Committee should have some further explanation and information as to the reason for the making this most important departure from the policy of the Ashbourne Acts. We were told on a former occasion that the machinery of this Bill was taken from the Ashbourne Acts, and that the only difference was that there was to be a much larger expenditure of money. But this is a most material alteration. Under the Ashbourne Act the whole of the landlords' deposit was applicable to making up the default of the tenant; but by this Act it is proposed that the ultimate liability shall fall on the ratepayer, and that the landlords' deposit shall only be affected to the same extent as the local rates. To my mind, that is all moonshine, because I hold that it would be perfectly impossible to enforce the liability on the Irish ratepayer, or to take away the local resources of an Irish county in order to make up that default. In my opinion, the ultimate liability will be upon the British taxpayer. If it was right at the time the Ashbourne Act was passed, why is it not right now that the landlord's guaranteed deposit should be the fund available for making good defaults? I do not understand the right hon. Gentleman to say that any experience he has gained of the working of the Ashbourne Act has led the Government to consider that the arrangement then made was unjust. What I want to know is why a change is made now? As I have already said, the ultimate liability of this Bill will be on the British taxpayer. But assume that it is on the Irish taxpayer. Why is it not equally right that the Irish ratepayer should have the benefit of the landlord's guaranteed deposit, as it was in previous years that the British taxpayer should have the benefit of it? Another question arises on this Amendment. I have always been of opinion that the Bill was defective in many particulars, and especially in that it did not state clearly or, as far as I can discover, at all the order in which the different securities are to be applied. I cannot anywhere in the Bill find the point at which the debt is to be released by ejecting the tenant, or by selling up his holding, and I should like to know whether the guaranteed deposit and the guaranteed fund are to be made applicable pro rata, or, if one is to be made applicable before the other, what the priority is to be. I infer from the language of the clause that the tenant's holding must have been released before this clause comes into operation. The debt cannot be pronounced to be irrecoverable until all means of recovering it have failed, and, therefore, you must, before this is brought into operation, have sold the holding. I do not, however, find that in the Bill.

*(11.5.) THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. MADDEN, Dublin University): I do not know whether the hon. and learned Gentleman was in the House when my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary explained the reason for this change, but I rather fancy he could not have been, or he would not have asked for a second explanation. I will, however, answer his questions. There is this very important consideration to be borne in mind—that, under the Ashbourne Acts, there is only a single guarantor, the sole guarantee being that of the landlord. When there is only one guarantor it is evident that he must bear the entire responsibility. But under the present Bill there are two distinct sets of guarantors—the landlord and the locality. In those circumstances it would be most unfair to throw the whole responsibility on the landlord and none on his co-guarantor. That is simply the explanation of the departure from the Ashbourne Acts, the machinery of which we have adapted to the altered financial arrangements of this Bill. The hon. Member for West Belfast (Mr. Sexton) asked whether we might not just as well at once provide that one-tenth should be retained. Assume that you retain one-fifth, say £100, and a default say of £10 is made; under the Ashbourne Acts the whole of that £10 must be borne by the sole guarantor. Under this Bill £5 would be borne by the landlord's deposit, and £5 by the Guarantee Fund. The hon. and learned Gentleman opposite seemed to forget that there may be subsequent defaults. It would take 20 defaults of £10 each to eat away the entire deposit, whereas after 10 defaults under the Ashbourne Acts the entire deposit would be gone.

SIR H. DAVEY: Will the right hon. Gentleman excuse me? This only applies where the debt is irrecoverable, and before it is proved to be irrecoverable the tenant will be sold up.

*MR. MADDEN: That is an entirely different question, and is absolutely not relevant to the argument I was addressing to the House. I must remind the hon. and learned Gentleman that this Act must be read with the Ashbourne Acts, and that you cannot resort to the guarantee deposit at all unless the Land Commissioners declare the debt to be irrecoverable; but, whilst under the Ashbourne Acts you can resort to the deposit for the entire debt, under this Bill you can resort for only one-half to the deposit. The hon. and learned Gentleman asked me to point out in what part of the Bill is to be found the order in which the liability shall be applied. The 1st sub-section of Clause 4 makes provision for the order of application.

(11.14.) MR. SEXTON: The practical effect of the change seems to be that assuming the prospect of default to be the same as under the Ashbourne Act, and the chances of payment being the same, one-half the landlord's deposit is saved for him at the expense of the local rates. There are to be three personal guarantees in the case—one afforded by the landlord and two—the county percentage and the insurance money—by the tenant. You put the county percentage into the Guarantee Fund, and if there is any call on the Guarantee Fund, you exhaust every penny of it. If there is any default at any time, you take the right to take every penny of the insurance money. I repeat the contention I formerly urged, namely, that the personal guarantee of the landlord and that of the tenant should be treated alike.

(11.15.) MR. J. MORLEY (Newcastle-upon-Tyne): Surely there was one obvious fallacy in the speech of the right hon. and learned Gentleman. He spoke of there being two guarantors and spoke of them being entirely on an equal footing; but he forgot that one of those guarantors has given his consent by being a party to the bargain, whereas the other party, the ratepayer, has had no voice or choice in the transaction. Yet the two guarantors are treated as if they are equally spontaneous and equally voluntary. It would be well if the Government would state precisely in what order the Commissioners or the Treasury will proceed to realise the securities. When will they sell up the holding? What will they do with the collateral securities? Will the right hon. Gentleman tell us plainly—firstly, secondly, and thirdly—how they will proceed to realise one security after the other? Under the Ashbourne Act, the landlord, so long as his guarantee deposit remains in the hands of the Commissioners, is to receive 3 per cent. interest. Why is the landlord to receive 3 per cent., while other people receive only $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., and, in a short time, $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent.?

(11.18.) MR. M. J. KENNY: Under the Bill the tenant's deposit is to be exhausted before the landlord's guarantee is touched. I submit with confidence that is what the Judges in Ireland will hold. If the clause stands as it is, the landlord's guarantee deposit becomes a portion of the Guarantee Fund. Clause 4 of the Bill governs the priority of the securities, and everything in that clause goes to exclude the landlord's deposit. The landlord's guarantee deposit is not liable pari passu, as the Chief Secretary said, with the tenant's deposit, it is only liable in the event of the Local Guarantees, both contingent and cash, being absolutely exhausted; then, there is the further injustice that while the landlord can get a charging order in the Courts as against the holding for any portion of his one-fifth guarantee which becomes exhausted, the Bill does not give the localities power to get a charging order for their contributions to the guarantee. I submit something ought to be done to remedy that defect.

(11.21.) MR. MADDEN: The current payments will go to the Land Purchase Account, and any deficiency will be made up out of the Guarantee Fund, which is applied as provided in Sub-section 1 of Clause 4. By this arrangement, the Land Purchase Account will be made solvent, and subsequently into the Guarantee Fund will flow all sums in respect of arrears of purchase money. Under Clause 7, Sub-section 8, provision is made for such adjustments being made. No doubt the system is a complicated one, but does anyone suppose that these guarantees could be worked with the simplicity of the Ashbourne Act which has only one guarantee?

“First out of the cash portion of the Fund, and out of the Exchequer contribution.”

What is the meaning of that? As I understand it it ought to be—

Then the right hon. and learned Gentleman refers us to Sub-section 8 of Clause 7. Will he tell us what the adjustments are? I deny that anyone can gather the facts from the wording of the sub-section.

MR. MADDEN: The arrears are carried to the Guarantee Fund. Before they come in it may be necessary to resort to the cash portion of the Guarantee Fund, but according as the arrears come in they will be made available to recoup the Guarantee Fund.

MR. J. MORLEY: I think the right hon. and learned Gentleman is mystifying the Committee. I invite the right hon. Gentleman to tell the Committee plainly in what order the securities are going to be realised. What is the meaning of all this mystification?

MR. MADDEN: I am sorry I cannot convey my meaning to the right hon. Gentleman, but I have no doubt it is my fault. What I was endeavouring to explain is extremely clear. If all annuities are paid up to date, there will be no need to resort to anything but the Land Purchase Account. If they are not paid up to date then resort must be made to the cash portion of the Guarantee Fund. I have explained the order in which that fund is to be resorted to. I cannot say in what order subsequent transactions will occur after that. They will depend on the order in which the receipts in respect of arrears or guarantee deposit occur, by which the Guarantee Fund is recouped. According as the arrears come in they will be available for the purpose of the Guarantee Fund, and adjustment will take place, as provided in Clause 7, Sub-section 8. Until the order is made by the Commissioners declaring the debt to be irrecoverable, there can be no receipt for the guarantee deposit. How long may be the period between the default and the making of the order I cannot say. I cannot state the time at which the Commissioners may declare the debt irrecoverable. All I can say is that whenever, in consequence of such a statement, they capture the guarantee deposit, that comes into the Guarantee Fund. When arrears are recovered they also come into the Guarantee Fund. The Guarantee Fund has, to a certain extent, been applied to make the system solvent, but it will be recouped to the extent of any payments made in respect of arrears of guarantee deposit.

(11.32.) MR. J. MORLEY: We have heard several complaints that my hon. Friend the Member for Elgin and Nairn has not been always perfectly lucid, but my hon. Friend is lucidity itself compared with the right hon. Gentleman. The right hon. Gentleman talks about the landlords' guarantee deposit coming in. But surely that deposit is retained, and therefore cannot come in?

MR. MADDEN: The right hon. Gentleman is under a mistake. I do not wish to bandy complaints about lucidity, but I must say the right hon. Gentleman's complaint is founded on a total misapprehension of the position. The guarantee deposit is retained by the Land Commission, but no portion of it is paid into the Guarantee Fund until the debt has been declared by the Commission to be irrecoverable?

MR. J. MORLEY: Are we to understand the right hon. Gentleman to say that the deposit is not to become a fund until the debt is found to be irrecoverable?

*MR. MADDEN: Certainly not a portion of the Guarantee Fund.

MR. J. MORLEY: Are we to understand that the holding will be brought into the market before the landlords' guarantee is touched?

*MR. MADDEN: The Land Commissioners must come to the conclusion that the debt is irrecoverable, and they cannot come to that conclusion unless they have tried to sell the holding.

MR. J. MORLEY: Then we are back at this point, that no reason has been shown why, when the Guarantee Fund is resorted to, at one time or another, only one half of the landlords' guarantee deposit should be attached.

*(11.35.) MR. KEAY: I think we are worse off instead of being where we were in consequence of this explanation, if I may call it so. The right hon. and learned Gentleman has inverted the pyramid altogether. Excellent lawyer as he is, I am afraid that book-keeping is not his strong point. The sole point on which he has founded his remarks about this complication of accounts, this changing and interchanging and ladling of amounts from one fund to another is based on an absolutely wrong conception of the facts. How often has the right hon. Gentleman told us in the last five minutes that the guarantee deposit if required is to be paid into the Guarantee Fund and then the Guarantee Fund is to be paid into another fund. If the right hon. Gentleman will look at Sub-section 3, Clause 2, he will see that the guarantee deposit, which is the landlords' fifth, is never paid by any possible chance into the Guarantee Fund at all, but into the Land Purchase Account.

(11.36.) SIR H. DAVEY: The fault of obscurity is not with the Attorney General for Ireland, but with the Bill itself. It is one of the most obscurely and badly drafted Bills that I have ever seen. The right hon. Gentleman has now cut away the ground he took in giving his first answer. I had some glimmer of what was meant when the right hon. Gentleman first answered my queries, but my notion on that head has been entirely removed by what he has said since. He has spoken of the Guarantee Fund and the landlords' guarantee deposit as being co-guarantors; but now it appears that the deposit is only resorted to after the Guarantee Account has been made solvent from the Guarantee Fund. The right hon. Gentleman has not touched the question which is really the essential point of the matter. At what point is the holding to be sold up? At what stage does the guarantee deposit come in? I must say the Attorney General for Ireland has not approached an answer to our questions, asked more than once. He has given us a more or less clear account of the adjustments contemplated in the Bill, but of these we do not ask. There is a guarantee of the deposit, there is the guarantee of the Guarantee Fund, and the purchased holding is also security for the debt. What we want to know is where the guarantee deposit comes in? At what stage is it brought in? It comes in when the debt is irrecoverable. The guarantee deposit is not applicable until the debt is declared irrecoverable, and the Attorney General for Ireland has admitted that involves that the holding has been sold or that there has been an attempt at sale. Now, we want to know where that comes in—we want to have a clear idea of the process between the application to the Guarantee Fund, the sale of the holding, and the application to the guarantee deposit, and not how the accounts in this complicated Bill are to be adjusted by the Treasury. I must also say, and I gave all the attention I could to what the right hon. Gentleman said, that I am at a loss to know why this change is made from the Ashbourne Act. We are told they are co-guarantors, but we are also told that the Guarantee Fund is the guarantee in the first instance, and the guarantee deposit not until afterwards. This is not a co-guarantee in any intelligible sense. The landlords' deposit is made liable because the default may be made in the first instalment, and it is not an unfair inference that the default is made because the purchase-money is too high, as may be proved from a fall in the price of produce and change in the value of land. It is perfectly right that the guarantee deposit of the landlord should be retained on that ground, but the Guarantee Fund stands on a different footing, it is a mere surety. The landlord is not a surety, his money goes to recoup the Exchequer when default arises from the advance having been made at too high a rate.

They are not I say co-guarantors in any intelligible sense, and the origin of the liability in the one case is totally different from that in the other.

(11.43.) MR. A. O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.): The Attorney General for Ireland has admitted that the machinery of the Bill is somewhat complicated, and it has been suggested that the difficulty has arisen from that cause, not from his explanation. Now it seems to me that the right hon. Gentleman is in error in supposing that there is any provision in the Bill for the payment into the Guarantee Fund of ld. of the guarantee deposit. There are a great many different accounts arranged for, the Land Purchase Account, the Consolidated Fund Account, the Guarantee Fund Account, the Sinking Fund Account, the Reserve Fund Account, and there is the guarantee deposit for which a separate account will have to be kept. The Attorney General stated what is in direct contradiction to the Bill when he spoke of the payment of the guarantee deposit into the Guarantee Fund. The right hon. Gentleman has referred to Sub-section 8 of Clause 7, but when I look at this I find that it merely provides that the Treasury may cause adjustments to be made between the Sinking Fund, inclusive of the purchaser's insurance money, the Land Purchase Account, the Guarantee Fund, and the Reserve Fund; and may cause payments to be made from one account or fund to another, and sums to be placed to such credit and such securities to be sold or bought as may appear to them necessary for the purpose of carrying the Act into effect. There is not a single word about the guarantee deposit. Now this is a very nice piece of financial scratch-cradle, but it is perfectly unintelligible to the ordinary mind, and I doubt very much if the thing will work out in practice. There is no provision for the appropriation of the guarantee deposit at any particular stage in Sub-section 3 with which we are now dealing. The design seems to be that when the debt has been declared to be irrecoverable, that is to say, when every other asset or security has been drawn upon—and all have precedence of the guarantee deposit—then only is the guarantee deposit to be drawn upon, and then only to the extent of 50 per cent. We now find that every other form of security is to be exhausted before the landlords' guarantee deposit is to be touched.

(11.45.) MR. KNOX: There is, I think, what will be admitted to be an omission, in there being no mandatory provision ordering the Commissioners to pay over the guarantee deposit to any other account. There ought to be a mandatory provision ordering this payment to the Guarantee Fund. In Sub-section 3 of Clause 2, now under discussion, it is assumed that these sums will be repaid from the guarantee deposit, but there is absolutely no provision in the Bill for that.

MR. MADDEN: The hon. Gentleman will find by Sub-section 3 there is a mandatory direction to the Land Commission that all the moneys in respect of arrears, whether paid by the proprietor of the holding or from the guarantee deposit, or from any other source, shall be paid into the Guarantee Fund.

MR. KNOX: I venture to say I do not think it is likely that there will be any payments from the guarantee deposit. In Sub-section 3 it is clear that it was the intention of the draftsman that the guarantee deposit should go to the Land Purchase Account; but though it is assumed that in certain cases it may go to the Land Purchase Account there is no provision in the Bill ordering the Commission, at any fixed period, to pay over this money to any particular fund. I venture to think some further provision is necessary, and it may perhaps be introduced later, dealing with this point in explicit terms. But after all, the immediate question under discussion is one of principle, not of drafting. We are discussing a provision in this Bill which is an absolute innovation on the provisions in the Ashbourne Act. The Attorney General for Ireland and the Chief Secretary have both assumed that under the Ashbourne Act the risk is borne wholly by the landlord, but that I entirely deny. I say under the Ashbourne Act the risk is borne rather more by the tenant than by the landlord; there is the risk of his interest in the holding, which the Attorney General for Ireland has declared in this House is in many instances equal to the landlord's interest in the holding. The first charge in default of instalment is the tenant's interest in the holding, whereas the landlord's guarantee deposit is only a fifth of the value, so the liability is not I say fairly distributed, the tenant bearing rather more than his proper share of the risk. But the proposal of the Government does not mean an equal risk, even if that equality is just, because, as the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle has pointed out, the positions of the two parties are entirely different. The Local Authority is not consulted as to the arrangement, and has no voice in the matter. The landlord gets the money from the sale, the Local Authority gets no benefit whatever. There is no equality of risk as the Bill is drawn. The Chief Secretary assumed that half the guarantee deposit might be taken in certain cases, and that therefore half the risk is borne by the landlord, but that is not so. The landlord's guarantee deposit remains for only 18 years, the risk of the Local Authority remains throughout the whole term of the purchase annuity—and is therefore three times as large as the risk borne by the landlord. The Attorney General for Ireland spoke of the tenant committing default on 20 occasions in which case he assumed the whole of the deposit would go, but as a matter of fact, this is almost an impossibility. Before the tenant could have committed 20 defaults the landlord would have gone off with his money, and his liability would have ceased. The Bill provides that you may take the whole of the tenant's interest and the whole of the tenant's insurance deposit, and yet after that you can only take half the landlord's guarantee deposit. There is no equality between the risk of the landlord, the tenant, and the locality.

(11.55.) SIR G. CAMPBELL: I really think that before the Division is taken the Attorney General for Ireland ought to answer clearly the question that has been repeatedly put to him—namely, at what point in the proceedings the tenant's holding is to be sold. I can only suppose that the right hon. Gentleman has not answered because he does not know. The Bill, I maintain, is unintelligible, that is the opinion I expressed many weeks ago, and it is now confirmed by the hon. and learned Member for Stockton.

(11.56.) MR. J. MORLEY: I cannot suppose the Government are going to force on a Division without a clear explanation of the questions we have put.

For my part, I cannot consent to the judgment of the Committee being taken before full and adequate information has been given on the point which has been raised again and again. At what point is it that the landlords' guarantee deposit is going to be appropriated? Is the first process the attempt to realise by the sale of the holding, or at what point is this step to be taken?

MR. MADDEN: It will be the duty of the Land Commissioners at once to realise. The Commissioners, of course cannot declare that the debt is irrecoverable until an attempt has been made to sell.

MR. J. MORLEY: Then it appears that, first of all, the Commissioners will proceed to realise what may be called the tenants' deposit before even half of the landlords' deposit is touched? The right hon. Gentleman has spoken of co-guarantors, but the ratepayers have never been consulted—

MOTION.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE (SITTINGS AT NINE O'CLOCK).

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That the Sitting of the House at Nine o'clock be held subject to the provisions of Standing Order No. 1 which relate to the Interruption of Business and the Adjournment of the House; that the said Resolution be a Standing Order of the House; that Standing Order No. 8 be repealed."—(Mr. William Henry Smith.)

(12.7.) DR. CLARK (Caithness): I should like to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether the Government intend to avail themselves of the hour from 12 to 1 o'clock for the purpose of their own privileged business, such as Report of Supply, Committee of Ways and Means, and Money Bills? If so, the effect of this Resolution will be, not to enable Members to go home earlier, but merely to take an hour from private Members and give it to the Government. Under the circumstances, I think we ought not to make the change in this form, and unless the Government pledge themselves not to put down their privileged business after midnight on Tuesdays and Fridays our position will be that whilst we have lost an hour the Government will have gained it. I would suggest that we should pass the Resolution in this form—"on Tuesday and Friday at 12 o'clock all disputed business shall cease."

*(13.10.) SIR R. FOWLER (London): Of course, I should be wanting in Party allegiance if I exercised the privilege which every Member of this House possesses of objecting to this Motion. At the same time, I must say I very much regret that my right hon. Friend has brought it forward. If carried, it will only leave three hours for the consideration of Motions on Tuesday and Friday nights, which in cases such as that of the Opium Resolution of last Friday week will be quite inadequate. In the Opium Debate an hour and a half, or rather more, were taken up by the Mover and Second. Another half hour was very properly taken up by the speech of my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House, so that if we had had only three hours not much more than half an hour would have been left to Private Members, and as it was there were some we should like to have heard. My right hon. Friend who represents the Party opposite on Indian questions (Sir U. Kay-Shuttleworth) and my hon. Friend the Member for Hackney (Sir Guyer Hunter), whose knowledge of the subject in some respects is unrivalled, neither of them addressed the House. As I had an Amendment to which allusion has been made this evening I should have been glad of a few minutes. Four hours is quite a short enough time for the discussion of such a Motion. An hon. Member opposite has a Motion on the Paper for to-morrow attacking the English Church. I do not think an important question of this kind can be satisfactorily debated in three hours. I very much regret that the House has not had an opportunity of taking a Division on this question. No doubt on a great many questions we give way to the Government, and hon. Gentlemen opposite to their leaders, but this is a question upon which every Member of the House is equally able to form a judgment. Some Members say that the House of Commons has degenerated. I do not express any opinion as to whether it has degenerated morally or intellectually, but I do say that this Motion shows that the House has degenerated physically. Go back 10 years. We thought ourselves fortunate in those days if the House adjourned at 3 o'clock in the morning on Mondays and Thursdays, and at 2 o'clock on Tuesdays and Fridays. But now we find young Members of the House doing all they can to shorten the Sittings. I regret that this Motion has been brought forward, but I should be wanting in Party allegiance if I opposed it. I can only offer an humble protest against it.

*(12.15.) SIR G. TREVELYAN (Glasgow, Bridgeton): The hon. Baronet who has just sat down, and whom we all like to hear, more especially when he is not dealing with a Party question, has spoken with strong feeling on this matter, but I am not sure that he has proved the main part of his case. There are many of us who think that 13 hours of work, with a break of two hours, is too much, and that is the amount of work to those who have begun the day by sitting on a Committee. There are others who think very strongly that the Debates gain very much by compression. It may be the case that when a new subject is being brought forward a long speech is required, but I am satisfied—and many hon. Members will agree with me—that in the discussion of an abstract Motion, on which no hon. Members have an interest in delaying business in order to keep out of the way some particular result which they dread, the Debate is all the better if the speeches are of a moderate length. For my own part, I should never wish to make a speech of more than 20 minutes' duration on an abstract Motion, however much I might be interested in it; and if you give 40 minutes to the Mover that would enable eight speeches to be made within the three hours. I must say that under the present Standing Order the hour between 12 o'clock and 1 is very dreary. I am informed by hon. Members that so little were they aware of the nature of this Standing Order that on the first night after a Morning Sitting, when they found that the House did not adjourn at 12 o'clock, they were unpleasantly surprised. These considerations, however, do not take away from the weight of the remarks of the hon. Member for Caithness. It appears to me, if I may say so without disrespect, that in the proposed arrangement personal advantage is more on the side of the Government than on the side of the Opposition for private Members, and especially private Members who are supporting the Opposition, may go away very freely on nights when abstract Motions are on, but, if once the House is formed, and the Debate set going, the Members of the Government and their warm supporters are not able to do this. The personal advantage to the Government is very great, and I do not think they should insist on any political or Parliamentary advantage in addition. The Government at present cannot use Tuesdays and Fridays after a Morning Sitting for the purpose of advancing Money Bills or Reports of Supply; so that if the Government are willing to give an assurance that they will not—except in most extreme cases—use this hour for the purpose of Supply, and so keep the House up for Government Business, when we have consented to renounce an hour of private Members' time, then I almost hope the Resolution may pass. I would suggest that the right hon. Gentleman should consider whether it is not better to make the Order a Sessional Order, instead of a Standing Order. If that is done, I feel certain that when the proposal has been adopted the House, and especially the hard-working Members of the House, will regard it with very great favour. For my own part, I should be quite as glad to have it a Sessional as a Standing Order.

(12.20.) MR. J. E. ELLIS (Nottingham, Rushcliffe): I entirely agree with the right hon. Baronet as to lengthy speeches in the abstract, but I also must express some sympathy with some remarks that fell from the hon. Baronet the Member for the City of London (Sir R. Fowler). If I mistake not, when we first adopted the 12 o'clock Rule, the hon. Baronet expressed a doubt as to its consequences. I entirely agreed with him in certain respects with regard to that Rule. I am satisfied, having considered the matter carefully, that in certain directions if we make this change in haste, consequences will flow from it, especially in matters in which the Secretary to the Treasury is interested, which are not at present anticipated. I hope we shall have an assurance from the right hon. Gentleman as to the cogent remarks that fell from the hon. Member for Caithness, and that he will consent to make this a Sessional Order until we see how it affects the Business of the House. If the last few words of the Motion are omitted, it will carry out the suggestion as to a Sessional Order.

(12.23.) MR. SYDNEY BUXTON (Tower Hamlets, Poplar): I agree with the hon. Member for Caithness as to Government Business; but the striking out of "one" and the insertion of "twelve" in the Standing Order would have the necessary effect. The House would then necessarily have to adjourn at 12 o'clock, and uncontested business that many hon. Members are interested in would have an opportunity of being brought forward; whereas, under the proposal of the Leader of the House, Bills on which no Division is taken would have an opportunity of being further forwarded. Therefore, I think the proposal of the right hon. Gentleman is the better of the two. I feel sure, from the way in which the right hon. Gentleman has met the views of the House, that he will be prepared to give an undertaking, which I quite believe he intended when he made his proposal, that these evenings shall remain as they are at present in the hands of private Members. I do not understand that the right hon. Gentleman proposes that the Government should derive any advantage from this proposal. I take it that his Motion is simply to enable Members, on Tuesdays and Fridays, to go home earlier than 1 o'clock in the morning. I am glad to find the House so unanimous on this subject. We are not all so enamoured of long hours as my right hon. Friend opposite. We do not all look back to ancient days as being the greatest pleasure of our lives.

(12.25.) MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): I think the proposal of the hon. Member for the Bridgeton Division of Glasgow might well be accepted by the House. I confess I feel surprised at what has fallen from the hon. Baronet the Member for the City of London. We are all interested in the speeches of the hon. Baronet in the early hours of the morning. I can say for myself he has always seemed to me an honest watch dog. We know very well that this Resolution imposes a severe disability on hon. Members opposite. They cannot talk in Government time; therefore, it is only natural that they should desire to talk in private Members' time. But I would point out to them that, after all, the time will come when they will again be in Opposition—and will come very soon. They will then be able to carry out the famous rule, which almost amounted to a Standing Order with my late lamented Friend (Mr. Biggar)—“Never talk except in Government time.” Apart from these considerations, I give my absolute support to the proposal of the Government.

*(12.26.) THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster): One would suppose, listening to hon. Members opposite, that this is a deep design on the part of Her Majesty's Government to deprive them of some of the ancient privileges to which they are entitled. I would remind them, however, that it was only in response to what might be called a conspiracy on the part of hon. Members opposite that I undertook to make this proposal, at the same time explaining that it was for the House itself to say whether it should be adopted. We have no desire to obtain more time for the transaction of Government business, but we cannot consent to deprive ourselves of the power in the event of an emergency of using the existing conditions to put forward Government business, which must be transacted sooner or later. There are, sometimes, occasions when exempted business is of such an urgent character that it is absolutely necessary that we should ask the House to consider it, even after 12 or 1 o'clock. It is suggested that this should be a Sessional Order. I am perfectly willing to accept that suggestion, so that the House can see whether the change that is now desired is one which is for the convenience of Members. I cannot consent to the change proposed by the hon. Member for Caithness, but I consent to the Order being a Sessional one, and we shall never ask for Report of Supply to be put down on Tuesday or Thursday, after a Morning Sitting, unless it is absolutely necessary in the public interest. I would remind hon. Gentlemen that this will give us no priority after 12 o'clock on Tuesdays and Fridays. The Orders of the Day will have to be gone through before any Government business can be taken, therefore, hon. Members will see that they will have the great advantage of being able to take unopposed Motions and stages of Bills, and of fixing the stages of Bills for other days, which at present it is impossible to do on Tuesdays and Fridays. I think it is greatly to the advantage of the conduct of the Business of the House that Bills down on the Paper and undisposed of should be fixed for a future occasion, whereas at present you, Mr. Speaker, have to leave the Chair on Tuesdays and Fridays at 1 o'clock without going through the Orders of the Day. I think it would be to the convenience of the House to accept this Motion, but if there is an indisposition to do so I shall be perfectly prepared to abandon it.

MR. J. E. ELLIS: I move that the last line but one, which says, “That the said Resolution be a Standing Order of the House,” be omitted.

*MR. SPEAKER: I will put the first part of the Motion.

Question,

—put, and agreed to.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: It is not necessary to alter the last line but one, so as to substitute “Sessional Order” for “Standing Order.” The line need not be put.

Question, “That Standing Order No. VIII. be suspended for the remainder of the Session,” put, and agreed to.

House adjourned at half after Twelve o'clock.

MERCHANDISE MARKS BILL.—(No. 86.)
SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

THE SECRETARY TO THE BOARD OF TRADE (Lord BALFOUR OF BURLEIGH): My Lords, the Bill which I have the honour to present to the House and to ask your Lordships to give a Second Reading to is a very short Bill for the purpose of amending in two points the Merchandise Marks Act of 1887. That Act, as your Lordships are aware, imposes penalties for the fraudulent or improper use of trade marks and trade descriptions, and amongst other things gives power for the detention and confiscation of goods which are falsely and improperly marked. The Act was made the subject of inquiry by a Committee of the House of Commons last year, and they reported that its operation had been generally most beneficial to the trade of the country, and that the importation of fraudulently marked goods had been materially diminished. Several proposals for the amendment of the Act, some to make it more stringent, and some in the contrary direction, were put before the Committee, and were almost in every case rejected by the Committee which, with practical unanimity, advocated the amendment of the Act in regard to two points only. Two defects were pointed out. In the first place, there are a certain number of articles of a perishable or consumable kind which cannot by their nature be the subject of trade marks, and there is, therefore, a difficulty in getting sufficient evidence to warrant the Customs authorities, in whose hands the enforcement of the Act is placed, in taking action with regard to them. There are also cases which do not affect individual trade marks, but which are cases rather of adulteration or fraudulent misrepresentation of the quality of the goods as being different to what it really is. In the second place, there are cases which do not so much affect individual interests, but rather the general interest of the community, or a considerable section of the community, or a large section of trade, and, therefore, it is unfair and improper that the onus of prosecuting should be placed upon individuals. The object of this Bill is to remedy those two defects. It has only two clauses, the first of which provides that the Customs' entry shall be held as sufficient evidence to prove the fraudulence of the trade mark or the trade description. The other clause enacts that regulations may be made providing that in cases which appear to the Board of Trade to affect the general interests of the country, or of a section of the community, or of a trade, prosecutions for offences under the Act may be undertaken by the Board of Trade. Of course, that is a power which must be exercised with great care and under definite conditions and regulations. The same clause provides a power to the Board of Trade, with the concurrence of the Lord Chancellor, to make regulations for putting in force this part of the Act. I may mention to your Lordships that this Bill has passed absolutely unopposed, and without any alteration whatever, through the other House of Parliament, and I think, therefore, I may appeal to your Lordships with confidence to give it a Second Reading.

Bill read 2^a (according to order), and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Friday next.

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

LORD HERSCHELL: I have to ask your Lordships to give a Second Reading to this Bill which has come from the other House, and which I believe has the support of the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack as it had the support of the Government in the other House. The object of the Bill is this: It frequently happens that small sums are due to charities which remain unrecovered because the trustees of the charities have no funds for the purpose of, and are, of course, unwilling to incur expenditure in, enforcing payment of them. The only means now of recovering payment is by proceeding at the instance of the Attorney General, which is a cumbrous and expensive process. This Bill proposes that the Charity Commissioners themselves may, with the sanction of the Attorney General, by a simpler method, take proceedings for the recovery of these sums in any case where the gross annual income of the charity does not, in the opinion of the Commissioners, exceed £20 a year. The only other clause (except one providing for practice and procedure) provides for making Reports of the Charity Commissioners prima facie evidence, leaving it open, of course, to any person to shew that they are not in accordance with facts.

Bill read 2^d (according to order), and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Thursday next.

COMPLAINANTS' FEES IN SUMMARY JURISDICTION CASES.

OBSERVATIONS.

THE DUKE OF ST. ALBANS: My Lords, I wish to call the attention of Her Majesty's Government to the question of the payment of fees by complainants in summary jurisdiction cases; and to ask Her Majesty's Government whether they will introduce a Bill authorising the Justices, in their discretion, to make an order remitting such fees as cannot be dealt with under the 14th and 15th Vict. chap. 55, sec. 12, or under the 8th section of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879. I would point out that though in Summary Jurisdiction cases when the costs are paid by the defendant the complainant receives the fees paid and payable, yet in many cases where the defendant goes to prison the complainant is fined to that amount. It is true that under the 14 and 15 Vict., chap. 55, section 12, the Magistrates have power to remit fees for poverty or other reasonable cause; but in most counties it is understood that the reasonable cause is to be either poverty or some cause ejusdem generis. In Notts and Norfolk the Magistrates are advised that this Act would not legally allow them to remit the fees in the event of the defendant going to prison in cases of trespass, assault, poaching, or of a colliery owner convicting miners of infraction of rules. I understand that this has also been considered to be the meaning of the Act in several of the northern counties, but I am told that in Huntingdonshire the words "reasonable cause" are understood to cover a variety of circumstances. If that is also the legal meaning of the Act, further legislation is unnecessary; but one does not require to be a lawyer to recognise that those various readings in different counties cannot all be correct, and they seem to show that the law on the subject is somewhat vague. It is desirable there should be uniformity of procedure among Magistrates in the different counties, and therefore I trust

I am not presumptuous in asking the Lord Chancellor to give an opinion as to the right interpretation of the Act as regards the words "reasonable cause," which are no doubt vague. I confess it seems to me, if the Magistrates had power under 14 & 15 Vict. to remit costs the provision in the 8th section of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, which enacts that in the case of a fine not exceeding 5s., an order shall not be made for payment of any costs by the complainant unless the Court thinks fit to expressly order otherwise, appears to have been unnecessary. I have seen a circular which has been sent round from the Home Office calling attention especially to the payment of these fees, and pointing out how very disproportionate in many cases the amounts appear of fines levied in regard to the questions involved. I cannot help reminding your Lordships that in these cases of summary jurisdiction the procedure presses very hardly upon poor persons. They have often, in the first place, great difficulty in collecting the half-crown which is necessary for the summons; then they have perhaps to spend a day or the best part of one in getting the summons, and a second day when it is heard before the Magistrates. On that ground it seems to me that the matter is worthy of consideration. To illustrate my meaning I would quote two cases which lately came before the Magistrates, in both of which the defendant was convicted. One was a case of stealing two penny loaves. In that case all the fees were paid by the Local Authority, and being a felony, the complainant's witnesses also. The other was a case of grievous assault, and, the defendant going to prison, the complainant had to pay the costs. That is to say, the defendant was sent to gaol and the complainant was punished, to the extent of a heavy payment. I do not know whether this is the law, it is certainly not justice, and I have ventured therefore to ask the question which stands in my name.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: My Lords, I have some difficulty in fully explaining this matter without going into it at greater length than the noble Duke probably desires, but I am afraid I must do so in order to make my answer intelligible. The policy of the law with reference to the minor offences which are tryable by Justices at Petty Sessions has left us very much in the position in which all offences against the law used to be; but with respect to felonies and serious offences this has long since passed away. That is to say, the public obtained justice at their own expense. With regard to the minor offences which come before the Courts of summary jurisdiction the position is still the same, and it would be a very wide question of policy indeed to say whether that should be altered. Personally I am disposed to think it is somewhat illogical that anyone should be put to any expense for the performance of a public duty. That is only my private and pious opinion upon the subject, and I cannot, of course, expect that everybody will take that view. Speaking generally—I will come to the specific question asked, in a moment—the position is this: The noble Duke, I think, confuses two quite separate things, costs or fees and expenses. To some extent, no doubt, fees are expenses of administration. If the arrangement made were carried out with regard to these fees, they would go to the Chancellor of the Exchequer instead of being paid to the Magistrates' clerk. As the noble Duke is aware, some time ago the system by which fees went to the officers engaged in the administration of justice was altered, and the fees go to the Exchequer. So much for the fees.

THE DUKE OF ST. ALBANS: They go to the county now.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: They did, as a matter of fact, go to the county, but they go now to the Exchequer. The Acts of Parliament on the subject are two. By the Summary Jurisdiction Act of 1879, which I do not understand the noble Duke to say has been the subject of doubt, the very question raised appears to be determined by the language of the Statute itself, which says that—

"Where a fine adjudged upon a conviction by a Court of summary jurisdiction to be paid does not exceed 5s."

then, so far as the Court does not think fit expressly to authorise it,

"An order shall not be made for payment by the defendant to the informant of any costs;"

but it goes on to provide that—

"The Court shall, as far as they think fit to expressly order, otherwise direct all fees pay-than half-past 11 o'clock in the morning, and there is no train to those places from Enniskillen later than 4.25. Yet the company say that they are anxious to secure the convenience of the public. There can be no wonder that the trade and commerce of the district do not flourish when so little provision is made for it. Enniskillen has a population of 5,000 or 6,000, two weekly markets, a monthly fair, two Courts of Assizes, County Court sittings, and a sitting of the Land Commission every year. The Courts sit from 10 o'clock in the morning until 5 or 6 in the evening, and Judges demand the attendance of suitors, witnesses, and solicitors long before the arrival of the first train, detaining them until long after the departure of the last. The result is, that all of them have to drive into the town, or to remain until the following morning. Then, again, there is a flourishing school.

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! I think the hon. Member is now going into too much detail. He is certainly exceeding the usual limits in giving reasons for moving the rejection of the Bill, and in opposing the powers asked for by this Railway Company.

*SIR E. HARLAND (Belfast, N.): I wish to inform the hon. Member that the Ardee branch of the Bill has been withdrawn.

*MR. JORDAN: As I was about to remark, at Enniskillen we have a large school.

*MR. SPEAKER: I have already pointed out to the hon. Member that it is irregular to enter into these minute details.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): By Clause 70 of their Bill the company ask for power to raise £120,000 additional capital, and also to borrow on mortgage, and I would humbly submit that in regard to these large powers it is legitimate to refer to their policy in the past.

*MR. SPEAKER: The points raised by the hon. Member are details unsuitable to be urged in opposition to this Bill, and the particular objections he was making when I interposed were rather for the consideration of the Railway Commissioners.

*MR. JORDAN: As the company asks for large and extended powers on the ground that they are anxious to make provision for the public convenience, I thought the manner in which they have provided for the public convenience in the past was a legitimate question to raise. Deputations from this part of the country have waited upon the Directors to endeavour to secure the reforms I have indicated, but I am afraid that their representations have been received with very scant courtesy. We have asked for the 7.15 train to be continued from Enniskillen to Clones in the evening. They now stop at Enniskillen, and we ask that they should go on 26 miles further to Clones, and for a train to leave Clones so as to arrive at Enniskillen between 9 and 10 in the morning, to suit pupils to the various schools and all others having business there.

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! The hon. Member is directly violating the ruling I have given, and is pursuing exactly the same line of argument.

*MR. JORDAN: I have no desire to trespass upon the patience of the House or to prevent this company from getting their Bill. My only hope was that before the House consents to entrust them with such large and extended powers as the powers of borrowing money on mortgage and of raising additional capital, it would demand that some guarantee should be given as to their future course. I beg to move that the Bill be read a second time on this day six months.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question, to add the words, "upon this day six months."—(Mr. Jordan.)

Question put, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

(2.20.) The House divided:—Ayes 123; Noes 35.—(Div. List, No. 144.)

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed.

QUESTIONS.

RE-BUILDING OF CORK COURT HOUSE.

MR. M. HEALY (Cork): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether an Act of Parliament will be necessary to enable the Cork Court House to be re-built a reasonable cause for taking the course prescribed. I have only further to say that I give that answer to the noble Duke with the full reservation to myself of the right, after hearing argument, of deciding exactly the other way.

House adjourned at Six o'clock, to Thursday next, a quarter before Eleven o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

The House met at Two of the clock.

PRIVATE BUSINESS.

GREAT NORTHERN RAILWAY (IRELAND) BILL.—(by Order.)

Motion made, and Question proposed,
"That the Bill be now read a second time."

*MR. JORDAN (Clare, W.): In rising to move that the Bill be read a second time on this day six months, I very much regret the necessity which compels me to take this course; but it arises simply from the fact that we have not been able to secure a satisfactory arrangement with the company. The company seeks powers (page 2 of the Bill) to divert a public road to Newry, to abolish a level crossing, and to acquire additional lands at Enniskillen in the county of Fermanagh, for the purpose of their undertaking. They say the powers they ask are for public and local convenience. That is the ostensible reason for which they promote the Bill, and if this were an honest effort to meet the requirements of the public, no one would be more willing than myself to assist them. But, in my opinion, their object is not to meet the local and public convenience, but to provide the minimum of convenience to the maximum of dividend. My charge against them is that they are adopting a cheese-paring policy, that their line and stations are untidy and insanitary, that their accommodation for third class passengers is inadequate and discreditable, and that their train service is insufficient for local purposes.

SIR E. WATKIN (Hythe): I rise to order. I wish to know if it is competent for the hon. Member to discuss the whole works and policy of this company upon a Motion for the rejection of a Bill which relates only to certain particulars and which is to be referred to a Select Committee.

*MR. SPEAKER: I do not think that the hon. Member, although he is entering into a wide field, is altogether irregular. The Bill is down for Second Reading.

*MR. JORDAN: I was about to point out that this company have provided neither sufficient lavatory nor urinal accommodation for their passengers. In most cases their third-class carriages are not only old, but badly constructed and filthy, and they provide compartments with 8 or 10 rows of seats, instead of two, as you have in England, with draughts which, especially in winter, are insufferable. Then, again, there is an insufficient arrangement for smoking and non-smoking compartments, to go into a non-smoking compartment is no protection against smokers, and the carriages are not upholstered as they are in England. I fail to see why a rich company paying 5 or 6 per cent. should not adapt their usages to those of England. I know it may be said that the company propose to alter this, but it is only a bare effort, and the seats upholstered as a trial were never so intended, and when upholstered will be too narrow and perpendicular. Then, again, there is very inadequate provision for the company's workmen, and they are allowed to enter the ordinary carriages in the dirtiest weather in their ordinary working clothes. [A laugh.] I quite understand that. The aristocracy know nothing about third class travelling, but in Ireland we are not overburdened with wealth, and we desire to make that which we have go as far as we can. For my own part, I would rather travel third class and be independent, than travel first on other people's money; but I do not object to workmen as such, but coming and going to their work, and in their working dress, they should have separate compartments. The train service by this company is most defective. No train arrives at Enniskillen from Dublin, Greenore, Dundalk, Belfast, and intermediate stations earlier than half-past 11 o'clock in the morning, and there is no train to those places from Enniskillen later than 4.25. Yet the company say that they are anxious to secure the convenience of the public. There can be no wonder that the trade and commerce of the district do not flourish when so little provision is made for it. Enniskillen has a population of 5,000 or 6,000, two weekly markets, a monthly fair, two Courts of Assizes, County Court sittings, and a sitting of the Land Commission every year. The Courts sit from 10 o'clock in the morning until 5 or 6 in the evening, and Judges demand the attendance of suitors, witnesses, and solicitors long before the arrival of the first train, detaining them until long after the departure of the last. The result is, that all of them have to drive into the town, or to remain until the following morning. Then, again, there is a flourishing school.

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! I think the hon. Member is now going into too much detail. He is certainly exceeding the usual limits in giving reasons for moving the rejection of the Bill, and in opposing the powers asked for by this Railway Company.

*SIR E. HARLAND (Belfast, N.): I wish to inform the hon. Member that the Ardee branch of the Bill has been withdrawn.

*MR. JORDAN: As I was about to remark, at Enniskillen we have a large school.

*MR. SPEAKER: I have already pointed out to the hon. Member that it is irregular to enter into these minute details.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): By Clause 70 of their Bill the company ask for power to raise £120,000 additional capital, and also to borrow on mortgage, and I would humbly submit that in regard to these large powers it is legitimate to refer to their policy in the past.

*MR. SPEAKER: The points raised by the hon. Member are details unsuitable to be urged in opposition to this Bill, and the particular objections he was making when I interposed were rather for the consideration of the Railway Commissioners.

*MR. JORDAN: As the company asks for large and extended powers on the ground that they are anxious to make provision for the public convenience, I thought the manner in which they have provided for the public convenience in the past was a legitimate question to raise. Deputations from this part of the country have waited upon the Directors to endeavour to secure the reforms I have indicated, but I am afraid that their representations have been received with very scant courtesy. We have asked for the 7.15 train to be continued from Enniskillen to Clones in the evening. They now stop at Enniskillen, and we ask that they should go on 26 miles further to Clones, and for a train to leave Clones so as to arrive at Enniskillen between 9 and 10 in the morning, to suit pupils to the various schools and all others having business there.

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! The hon. Member is directly violating the ruling I have given, and is pursuing exactly the same line of argument.

*MR. JORDAN: I have no desire to trespass upon the patience of the House or to prevent this company from getting their Bill. My only hope was that before the House consents to entrust them with such large and extended powers as the powers of borrowing money on mortgage and of raising additional capital, it would demand that some guarantee should be given as to their future course. I beg to move that the Bill be read a second time on this day six months.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

QUESTIONS.

RE-BUILDING OF CORK COURT HOUSE.

MR. M. HEALY (Cork): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether an Act of Parliament will be necessary to enable the Cork Court House to be re-built without delay; and what steps the Government propose to take in the matter?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): An Act of Parliament will be necessary for the purpose mentioned in the question of the hon. Gentleman. The provision to be made therein is now under consideration.

LORD ORMATHWAITE AND HIS TENANTS.

MR. STACK (Kerry, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been called to the proceedings by distress taken by Lord Ormathwaite against one of his tenants, named Daniel Regan, of Coolaclarig, in the County of Kerry; whether he is aware that in the face of the fact that Regan had paid a year's rent in each of the years 1887, 1888, and 1889, a year and a half's rent in 1890, and a half-year's rent in March 1891, Lord Ormathwaite has just distrained Regan for one year's rent, which only fell due on the 25th March last, and seized Regan's cattle in payment thereof; whether the protection of the police was given to enable the seizure to be effected; and whether the Government will consider the advisability of amending the law of landlord and tenant, so as to prevent a distress being made for at least six months after rent falls due?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: My attention has not been called to the proceedings referred to in the question, nor do I think it is a matter in which the Executive is concerned.

RELIEF WORKS IN ROSCOMMON.

DR. COMMINS (Roscommon, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether any, and what, relief works have yet been commenced in the County Roscommon; whether the condition of the people in several districts of that county has been reported by the Boards of Guardians and the Government Inspectors who visited them as one in which acute distress is imminent, and no sufficient means in the hands of the Poor Law Authorities to meet such distress; whether, as a means of meeting it, the Government has had their attention called to the steps taken and the guarantees given by the Grand Juries for the construction of a light railway from Dromod to Strokestown and Roscommon; and whether, if that project be revived, it would now receive the approval of the Privy Council?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: No relief works are in operation at present in the County of Roscommon, but the condition of that county is now engaging the careful attention of the Government. It is not possible to say what the action of the Privy Council will be in the event of the project referred to by the hon. Member being revived.

MR. DE COBAIN.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether any persons have been convicted as accessories, or are awaiting trial as such, in the offence for which a warrant has been issued against the hon. Member for East Belfast?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. MADDEN, Dublin University): The warrant in question was issued for the offence of inciting to the commission of the felony. There was no evidence implicating any persons as accomplices.

MR. T. M. HEALY: May I ask what is the date of the warrant issued against the hon. Member, and what is the date of the alleged offence?

MR. MADDEN: I cannot give an accurate reply unless the question is put on the Paper.

THE ROYAL IRISH CONSTABULARY.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland what is the explanation of the removal of the head quarters of the Royal Irish Constabulary for Antrim from Ballymena to Lisburn, and upon whose application was it done?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The removal of the head quarters of the Royal Irish Constabulary of the County Antrim from Ballymena to Lisburn has been for some time under consideration, and has been decided upon in the public interest. Next to Belfast, Lisburn is now the largest and most important town in the county; its population has within a few years largely increased. It is close to the Assize town where all the county Officers reside, and possesses the requirements necessary for the accommodation of the county head quarters of the Force. The change is being made on the recommendation of the Inspector General.

SCHOOL TEACHERS IN DURHAM.

MR. J. WILSON (Durham): I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education whether he is aware that in Mr. Bernay's (Durham) district the teachers have to wait sometimes for a period of ten weeks between the examination of the school and the payment of the grant; and whether he will arrange for the grant to be paid within a shorter interval, seeing that it forms a considerable portion of the teacher's income?

THE VICE PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Sir W. HART DYKE, Kent, Dartford): The efforts of the Department are constantly directed to shortening the interval between the inspection of a school and the issue of the report. I am aware that Mr. Bernay's work is sometimes in arrear, but he has been more than once reminded of his duty in this respect, and the present delay is due to his having been ill for a fortnight in March. It would be easy for managers to prevent such accidents directly affecting teachers by pursuing the preferable plan of making their salaries independent of the grant.

NATIONAL DAY SCHOOLS.

MR. SCHWANN (Manchester, N.): I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education whether at a National day school the rector of the parish has the sole right and power to appoint teachers, assistant pupil teachers, school cleaners, and other officials, or whether that right is vested in the whole body of managers, of whom he is one?

SIR W. HART DYKE: If the management of a school is regulated by a deed, the right to appoint teachers devolves on those who are therein described as managers, but in the absence of any such instrument, the right is, I believe, generally exercised by a Committee acting on behalf of the subscribers. The Department, however, have no power to determine in whom such rights reside.

BORSTAL CONVICT PRISON.

MR. E. KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN (Rochester): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether the salary of the Governor of Borstal Convict Prison was reduced on his promotion to that post from the post of Deputy Governor of Portsmouth; and, if so, whether it is customary to reduce the salary of officers when thus promoted?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. MATTHEWS, Birmingham, E.): By rules made under the Superannuation Act of 1887, an officer drawing an Army pension is made liable to a deduction of not less than 10 per cent. of his civil pay, if appointed after the date of the Act. A transfer to a new office in the same Service is equivalent to a new appointment. The result is that in this case, though the pay of the new office is higher than that of the office vacated, the appointee receives less, and will continue to do so until the salary of his new office rises by annual increments to its full amount.

SOUTH WALES MINES.

MR. D. THOMAS (Merthyr Tydvil): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if, in filling up the present vacancy in the South Wales Sub-inspectorship of mines, he will, in addition to giving, ceteris paribus, preference to candidates having a knowledge of the Welsh language, as provided by Section 39 of "The Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1887," also bear in mind the great desirability of appointing an Inspector with thorough knowledge of the peculiarities of the South Wales coal measures, and having some practical experience of the methods of mining employed in the district, such as that possessed in an eminent degree by the late Mr. Randell; and when the appointment will be made?

MR. MATTHEWS: The hon. Member may rest assured that in filling up the vacancy referred to I shall not lose sight of the two important considerations of which he is good enough to remind me; and I hope to fill up the vacancy before long.

WOMEN'S SUFFRAGE BILL.

MR. HALDANE (Haddington): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether it is the intention of the Government to propose the Adjournment of the House for the Whitsuntide Recess on a date subsequent to Wednesday, May 13th, on which date the Women's Suffrage Bill stands as First Order of the Day, and to leave that date as a Private Members' day?

*THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster): I received a deputation on this subject yesterday, and I informed them that the Government did not intend to propose the Adjournment of the House till after the 13th of May, that, so far as I could foresee, there would be no necessity for the Government to appropriate the 13th of May, which would therefore remain a Private Members' day, but that I was not in a position to give a definite pledge on the subject.

PUBLIC BUSINESS.

MR. J. E. ELLIS (Nottingham, Rushcliffe): I wish to ask the First Lord of the Treasury a question of which I have been unable to give notice. I see that the Government have put down for Wednesday a rather controversial measure connected with the London County Council. I wish to ask whether it is not unprecedented, or, at all events, unusual, to put down for Wednesday, which is a Private Members' day, a Government Bill which must take a considerable time in discussion? Does not such a course trench unfairly on the rights of Private Members?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I have very little doubt that there is a precedent for the course which the Government have taken; but I am unable to refer the hon. Member to any without notice. It is not at all an uncommon thing for Private Business to be taken on Wednesday, and the Bill to which the hon. Member refers is in the nature of Private Business, though the President of the Local Government Board makes a Motion. But I have no doubt that the President of the Local Government Board will move the Adjournment of the Debate at a reasonable hour in the afternoon, so as to give an opportunity for the consideration of the next business on the Paper.

MR. S. T. EVANS (Glamorgan, Mid): The first Motion stands in my name, and I should like to know whether the right hon. Gentleman will state positively that, if the Debate on the Private Business is likely to take much time, the adjournment will be moved so as to enable a Division to be taken on my Motion.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: The Private Business has been put down at the request of the County Council, and a further postponement of the Order might greatly imperil the County Council's financial plans. [Cries of "Thursday!"] I could not consent to put down the Bill for Thursday. Five and a half hours is time sufficient to allow of adequate debate on the hon. Member's Bill.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): May I ask what will be the business at the Morning Sitting next Friday?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: We hope to dispose of the Budget Statement on Thursday, and then we shall proceed with the Land Purchase Bill on Friday.

COMMITTEE.

Considered in Committee.

Clause 2.

Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 32, to leave out from "Fund," to end of sub-section (3).—(Mr. Keay.)

Question again proposed, "That the words

"Provided that where a sum is applicable out of the guarantee deposit for the discharge or reduction of an irrecoverable debt" stand part of the Clause."

(2.55.) MR. J. MORLEY (Newcastle-upon-Tyne): I hope that the Government will give the Committee a reasonable explanation of the operations which the Amendment deals with. The Chief Secretary and the Government seem to think that because the measure is one of the most complex Bills ever brought before the House, therefore the explanation to be vouchsafed ought to be as little as possible. The Bill itself contains the maximum of difficulties, and we have had a minimum of explanation and interpretation. I think the Committee are entitled to a full explanation of what the operation of this clause will be. We heard last night about irrecoverable debts which come into existence on the default of the tenant. A default takes place, and the Land Commissioners declare that it is an irrecoverable debt. Now, I am not sure what constitutes an irrecoverable debt. An irrecoverable debt was defined in the Act of 1889. I suppose we may take it that the first step in a case of default is to sell the holding; then, having sold, the proceeds of the sale are to be paid into the Guarantee Fund. I want to know whether the tenants' insurance money is to be the first resort? There are no specific instructions in the Bill as to what is to be done with the tenants' purchase money, except that it is to be paid into the Sinking Fund. The Lord Lieutenant is then empowered to take it from the Sinking Fund, and to apply it as a set-off against a default; but unless the Lord Lieutenant is satisfied that there is a representation from the locality, I gather that the tenants' insurance money is not available. The holding being sold and the money being paid into the Guarantee Fund, then you proceed, in order to make good the default, to attack the Guarantee Fund, and I want to know what will happen when you attack that fund. Of what does the Guarantee Fund consist? It consists of the county percentage, the Exchequer contribution, and the Probate Duty grant, but there is nothing in the Bill to tell us when the landlord's deposits are to find their way into the Guarantee Fund; whether they are to go in at once or only in case of default. It is quite clear that a common Stock is not created out of all these contributions. These questions are quite vital, and they show the importance of the Amendment we are now discussing. It was suggested last night that the landlord would suffer a hardship in having to make these deposits. It is not so at all. The guarantee deposit is simply a compulsory investment of one-fifth of the purchase money in Government Stock, bearing 3 per cent., and the only drawback is that the landlord cannot sell out under 18 years. Surely that is not a position of very great hardship. Under the arrangement proposed, the landlord would be able to realise, which he would not be able to do but for the resort to British credit. It is only the resort to British credit which enables him to realise. In these circumstances I fail to understand why, when the tenant makes default, the landlord's fifth should not be liable for the whole, as is the case under the Ashbourne Act, instead of for half of the deficit. The answer of the Government is one of the most paradoxical of the many paradoxical answers which they have given about the Bill; namely, that you ought only to take one-half of the landlord's guarantee deposit, because the local ratepayers will now be compelled to become a collateral security. Why should the ratepayer, who gave no assent to the bargain, and who, for ought we know, may be altogether opposed to it, be compelled to become a co-guarantor with the landlord, who entered into the bargain with his eyes open? I can see no reason why the landlord should not incur the same liability under this Act that was imposed upon him by the Ashbourne Act. If the bargain entered into between the landlord and tenant falls through, both ought to be made to pay before the Guarantee Fund is called upon to make good the default. The proposal of the Government will confer a new and a special advantage upon the landlord. It is most unfair to place a burden upon the ratepayer until you have exhausted all the available resources of both parties to the bargain. I am not prepared to say that the tenants' holding ought to be sold before you come upon the guarantee deposit, but this I will say: that a bargain having been made between the landlord and tenant, and the State having lent money to carry that bargain out, if the bargain falls through both ought to pay forfeit before you come upon the State or the locality. As the Bill stands you are safeguarding the Imperial Exchequer at the expense of the localities, and you are doing so in order to confer a new and special advantage upon the landlord. I am perfectly willing to protect the guarantee deposit in which the landlord has placed one-fifth of the money, but I am not willing to protect it at the expense of the ratepayers who have never been consulted.

(3.10.) THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): There are two questions before the Committee — one is the character of the proposals in the Bill and the other is whether these proposals are justifiable or not. Last year the discussion was carried on, not so much in reference to the merits of the proposals as to their immensity. If hon. Members desire to have a clear perspective of the financial proposals of the Bill, the most convenient way will be for them to look upon the Guarantee Fund as relating to two different matters—one the temporary charges made upon it, and the other the permanent liabilities it will have to bear. The order in the two cases is quite different. In the temporary case the Imperial Exchequer stands absolutely first, while in the permanent order the Exchequer comes last. What we are now concerned in is not the temporary but the permanent order, in which the liability will have to be borne by the various parties. That permanent order I take to be this: if the tenant makes default he will be sold up. The Insurance Fund which may have accumulated will not be taken as an Insurance Fund by the Government for the purpose of redeeming the debt. Nevertheless, the holding may be sold liable to the annuity, and, taken in conjunction with the fact that the Insurance Fund is part of the annuity, it will enable the holding to be sold for a larger sum than if there were no Insurance Fund. In that sense, and in that sense only, the Insurance Fund comes in on part of the tenants' assets. Let me now come to the position in which the landlord stands. It is undoubtedly true that it remains more or less in the discretion of the Land Commissioners as to the way in which proceedings are to be taken for the recovery of the debt, and it is true that the local contributions stand before the landlord in the temporary order of charges. They do not stand before it in the permanent order of charge but on an equal basis. In other words, if there be a default, and the sale of the holding is not sufficient to meet the liability, the Guarantee Fund undoubtedly becomes responsible. The landlord's fifth is there, and it cannot escape the grip of the Land Commissioners. The right hon. Member for Newcastle (Mr. J. Morley) says there is no hardship inflicted on the landlord in the retention of the fifth part of the purchase except that he is prevented from working it. The landlord's fifth and the Guarantee Fund would then have to make good the deficiency equally between them. The question is, ought the landlord who has no control over the tenant to be compelled to make good the whole of the default of the latter? Would it be just to make the seller of a business liable for the default of the purchaser for a period of 18 years? In any business in the world in which 1,000,000 persons were engaged there would always be a large number of cases in which, from incompetence, carelessness, idleness, or bad habits, failures would occur. Whether that is an argument against the Bill or not, at all events it is equally an argument against every conceivable form of land purchase. The present scheme has the merit of providing some species of insurance in cases of failure which may arise from undeserved misfortune. One of the most probable causes of default, it has been said by hon. Gentlemen opposite, is some species of conspiracy. That is the mainstay of the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere). The landlord for 18 years may not have set foot in Ireland. [Ironical cheers from the Irish benches]. Hon. Members cheer that because they think I am referring to absentee landlordism. ["No!"] They could have cheered it for no other reason; but they seem to forget that, by the hypothesis, the landlord will have been bought out and will have no further interest in the locality. A conspiracy in that locality could only have force and effect if backed up by public opinion, and for that the landlord could have no responsibility. These arguments lead to the conclusion in the Bill that the risk should be shared equally by the landlord and the locality. I wholly fail to understand why, if there are two guarantors, they should not equally share the risk. I do not deny that in many parts of Ireland there is no general market for land, but I do not know that the landlord is to blame for that. Such an abnormal system is probably more due to the locality than to the landlord. The state of things with regard to land in Ireland is unprecedented, and some part of the blame for that state of things, as blame I think there must be, should be shared by the locality. I hope the Committee will be of opinion that I have clearly explained the provisions of the Bill, and that the reasons I have given are not unworthy of consideration.

(3.25.) MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): The right hon. Gentleman says that an unprecedented state of things exists in Ireland in regard to land. The unprecedented state of things to which the right hon. Gentleman refers is due to the unsuitable system of land law imposed upon Ireland, and to the abuse by the landlords of the powers intrusted to them. The system you are now trying to reform is, in the first instance, responsible, and, next, the misconduct of the landlords themselves. As to conspiracy, the Government have a very easy and effective means of preventing it. They have only to give instructions to the Land Commissioners to see that the bargains between landlord and tenant are fair, and the desire of the tenant to possess his holding will make conspiracy impossible. No one knows better than the Chief Secretary that there is an intense desire for the possession of land in Ireland. People who have the land have a passionate desire to keep it, and the desire will become still more intensified when the tenant is made the owner. The effect of the proposition contained in the Bill, as compared with the Ashbourne Act, will be that whereas under the Bill a tenant purchasing a holding at 20 years' purchase would have to make default for ten years before the guarantee deposit fund would become exhausted, under the Ashbourne Act the fund will become exhausted in five years. A tenant at £5 a year rental buys a farm for £100. For that £100 he owes the State £4 a year, and he pays the annuity at the rate of £2 half yearly. In that transaction the landlord makes a deposit of £20. If the tenant failed to pay one of the instalments, under the Ashbourne Act, he might be proceeded against by civil process, or £2 might be taken from the guarantee deposit. A failure to pay the half-yearly sums for five years would exhaust the guarantee deposit. Now, however, if the tenant fails to pay you say, for no earthly reason, "There is £2 due, but although we have £20 in the guarantee deposit we will only take £1 and take the other £1 from the local rates contributed by persons who derive no benefit whatever from this transaction." The difference is simply this: Under the Ashbourne Act the landlords' guarantee deposit would be exhausted if the tenant failed to pay in five years, whereas under this Bill the tenant would have to fail to pay for 10 years before the guarantee deposit was exhausted. The right hon. Gentleman opposite said: "We treat the two guarantors alike," meaning first the landlord and, secondly, the locality. But there are other guarantors, and do you treat them alike? There are the landlord and the tenant, nominally, parties to a free contract in which they are the individuals concerned, and you ought to treat them alike. The right hon. Gentleman drew a distinction between the temporary and permanent order of guarantees, but I attach little importance to it. His argument as to the permanent order did not improve his own case, for he said—

"When you sell the holding which you should do before you come on the guarantee deposit, you not only sell the holding which is the guarantee of the tenant corresponding to the guarantee deposit, but you actually realise by the Act the value of the tenant's insurance fund. You compel the tenant for the first five years to pay at the rate of 20 years' purchase of a farm, even though he may have bought at 10 years' purchase. You lodge that insurance money in your funds to lower the amount of the annuity on the farm in future years, and then when you sell the farm the new purchaser buys it, subject to the fact that the annuity paid to the State in future years will be less than it would have been if the tenant had not been obliged to find that insurance money."

Does it not follow, then, that you realise the whole of the value of the insurance money you have taken on the sale; and applying the axiom of the right hon. Gentleman that the guarantors should be treated alike, why do you exhaust the land and cash of the tenant and then take only half the guarantee of the landlord? If you drain out the tenant when he comes to default, the landlord ought also to be drained out. And this is more especially the case when you consider that the Bill is brought in for the benefit of the landlord. ["Oh, oh."] Yes; the object of the Bill is to make saleable that which is unsaleable at present. By incumbrances and rent reductions by the Court, the landlords are not in a solvent condition, and this Bill is the only avenue by which their position can be made tolerable, and for this only way of escape they ought to run the risk with regard to this one-fifth. I say the tenants can better afford to wait for this Bill than the landlords, and if that is so, I hold that the landlords should stand the risk you judged they should in 1885 and 1888. That is one argument for equal treatment for the landlord and the tenant. Then I come to the other aspect of equal treatment as between the landlord and the locality. Why should they be put on a footing of equal responsibility in an affair of this kind? The landlord is a party to the transaction, a willing party and a profiting party. He is the party who has put the funds of the British Empire into his pocket by a transaction which would not have been possible except for this Bill. On every ground, therefore, the landlord should be held responsible for keeping up the guarantee deposit. But as to the locality, that is an unwilling party. ["No, no!"] Who says that the localities are willing to be fined for defaulting tenants?

Mr. MACARTNEY (Antrim, S.): I say that the whole country is in favour of the Bill.

Mr. SEXTON: How has the hon. Gentleman obtained that view of the opinion of the country? Has he taken in a vision the plébiscite which the Chief Secretary is unwilling to give us? I should require some evidence before I took the hon. Gentleman's view as to the opinion of Ireland, and in the meantime I hold myself quite as capable of forming a judgment as to the opinion of Ireland as the hon. Member. The landlord is a profiting party, and the locality is not. The landlord comes into the matter by a contract of his own, and you bring the locality into it by a breach of contract, for by an Imperial contract the money you propose to hypothecate to this purpose is the inalienable property of the people of Ireland. I protest against the theory that there is any parity between the responsibility of the individual who comes into this matter on the strength of a contract that is entered into voluntarily, and the locality that is dragged into it by a breach of contract. I believe that the whole secret of this monstrous proposal of cash and contingent guarantees is to be found in that system. The whole thing is due to your desire to safeguard the deposit of the landlords. I have not heard why the system which has been considered satisfactory and sufficient during the past six years is not satisfactory and sufficient now. If you were willing to make the whole guarantee deposit liable, there would be no reason to resort to this cash and contingent system, and no reason for our opposition to the Bill. What is good security for advances under the Ashbourne Act should be good security under this Bill. If the guarantee deposit is good security for thousands of persons under the Ashbourne Act, it is equally good security for the thousands of persons who will enter into similar transactions under this Bill. The effect of taking only half the guarantee deposit will be a local levy. In reference to the cash fund it will mean an increase of rates, and as to the contingent portion it will mean the dislocation of the Local Government arrangements in Ireland.

There will be sullen and stern resistance to the levy, and this contingent portion of the guarantee will, therefore, prove to be illusory. You will make this levy on three classes of Irish farmers. First, when the guarantee deposit is not sufficient you will levy, or try to levy, on men who have failed to pay their annuities to the State. That is absurd on the face of it. If they have not been able to pay their annuities to the State, they certainly will not be able to pay a special levy. Secondly, you will levy on the men who have paid their annuities, and to say to a man who has paid every penny he owes, "You have paid all you owe, but some other man has not and you must make good his default," is a negation of justice. In the third place, you will levy on the farmers of the country, who have not been able to purchase their holdings at all—and they will be the vast majority. Only one fourth of the farmers of Ireland will be able to buy, either because the landlords are unwilling to sell, or because there is no money to advance. Well, if the man who has bought fails to pay, you go to the other three and say, "You have not been allowed to purchase your holdings; you have to pay the old rents without reduction, nevertheless, because this man who has been allowed to use the credit of the State and secure a reduction is in default, you must make good that default." There is a point at which the public opinion of a country, even of a small country like Ireland, will become too strong even for a strong Government; and I maintain that this point is reached when you make this monstrous claim upon us. We shall hold it to be our duty to offer this unjust proposal the most strenuous resistance in our power.

(4.43.) MR. SHAW LEFEVRE (Bradford, Central): The Chief Secretary has exaggerated and misstated the arguments which I brought forward last night in speaking upon this Amendment. The Chief Secretary represented me as stating that the only cause of default that could be was excessive price. I never said anything of the kind. I was not dealing with the period of 49 years, because the period during which the defalcations are likely to occur is during the time the landlord's one-fifth is demanded on deposit, namely, 15 years.

Mr. Sexton

But I did state that experience of the Ashbourne Acts has shown us that in by far the greater number of cases excessive price is shown to be the cause of the defalcations. That statement I now emphatically affirm. The Chief Secretary maintains that neither experience of the administration of the Acts nor reason justify us in arriving at that conclusion. I will undertake to prove by figures which have been laid before the House in the form of a Return that my contention is indisputable. There are 34 cases of defalcation mentioned, and I venture to say that no one who goes through that list and compares the rents with the valuation and looks at the number of years purchase paid can fail to arrive at any other conclusion than that in the great majority of cases the defalcations were due to the excessive price paid and not to the neglect of the tenants. There were eight cases that I would call attention to especially, where not only have there been defalcations, but in which, when the properties were put up for sale, there was actually no price bid for the holdings. In these cases the aggregate purchase money was £15,800, the previous rental was £816, the valuation was £500, the price paid was 20 years' purchase, the landlord's one-fifth remaining in the hands of the Commission amounted to £3,160, the rent was, therefore, 45 per cent. above the valuation. In a year and a half the tenants were unable to pay, the Land Commissioners put up the holdings for sale, and they fetched nothing in the market. I can only say in these cases the prices paid were evidently excessive and the Land Commissioners should not have consented to the transaction. It is quite evident that in the cases alluded to the Land Commissioners have been deluded and have sanctioned these proposals without having the proper facts before them. I think that it is only fair in such cases that the landlord's one-fifth should bear the whole of the defalcations, and that the localities should not be saddled with the debt.

(3.50.) MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.): There are two parties on this side of the House; the first Party are those led by the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere), who maintain that there should be no risk to the Imperial taxpayer; and the second Party are those led by the hon. Member for West Belfast (Mr. Sexton), who maintain that there should be no risk to the Irish taxpayer. Hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway from Ireland want this £30,000,000 without security at all. Now, I put it, if the Imperial taxpayer is to have no risk, according to the hon. Member for Northampton, and if the Irish taxpayer is to run no risk, according to the hon. Member for West Belfast, how are the £30,000,000 to be had?

MR. J. E. ELLIS (Nottingham, Rushcliffe): Drop the Bill.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL: Exactly. Now I want the attention of hon. Members below the Gangway to that statement. They have been posing as friends of the Bill, but here is the hon. Member for the Rushcliffe Division who, when I put the inquiry to him, says "drop the Bill." Is that what hon. Members below the Gangway want?

MR. SEXTON: Not at all. Our position is well known. We desire the Bill, and will have it on safe conditions, and we are not responsible for the opinions of the hon. Member for the Rushcliffe Division.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL: Well, it is something to have elicited that the hon. Gentleman and those who sit beside him are willing to help hon. Members below the Gangway, although their object is to defeat the Bill, whilst hon. Members below the Gangway will not take that responsibility at present.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE (Edinburgh, Mid Lothian): The hon. Gentleman makes that assertion generally as applicable to Members sitting above the Gangway on this side of the House. For my own part, I must point out that what he says is totally contrary to every declaration made from this Bench and from elsewhere on these Benches.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL: There are so many leaders on this side of the House that I must drop that part of the subject.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: Hear, hear!

MR. T. W. RUSSELL: When the Debate occurred last night the position taken up by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle, and the position taken up by the hon. Member for West Belfast were somewhat different. As far as I can gather, the hon. Member for West Belfast objected to the tenants and landlords not being placed on the same footing as to liability. As far as I can get at the arguments of the right hon. Member for Newcastle, I think he was in a difficulty as to the order in which payments should be made in case of default more than anything else. Now, I never heard it stated clearly, and I want to know why the tenant who purchases and the landlord who sells should be placed in the same position. I have never heard that completely stated yet. What takes place? In the first place, the tenant is not forced to buy. If he buys at all, he buys at a rate which enables an immediate reduction in his rent of at least 20 per cent. What happens in addition to that? The landlord cannot sell unless the Land Commission approves of the terms of the bargain. Let us imagine a case. A tenant agrees to buy on terms advantageous to himself, involving the right to the freehold after 49 years, and, in addition to that, easiness of terms. That sale is agreed to by the landlord, and by the Land Commission on behalf of the State. Now, what is the proposal? The landlord has to leave his guarantee deposit, one-fifth of the purchase money, and, up to the present, under the Ashbourne Act, he has been liable to default to a certain point. The contention is, that he ought to be liable now in the same way. I hold that it is too much to assume, as the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford does, that every default in Ireland must be due to the fact that the terms of the purchase are too high. One would imagine, to hear hon. Members talk in this House, that every Irish tenant was a saint, and every Irish landlord was a scoundrel. That is not the case. There are good landlords and very bad ones; but there are good tenants, and there are also bad tenants; and there is just as much liability of default from want of thrift, want of knowledge of farming, want of sobriety, and want of all the virtues which men require to have in this life, as there is liability to default from the extortion of the landlords. Take a case where the tenant is responsible for such default. Well, the landlord is not responsible; he has sold his land upon terms agreed upon; the transaction has been ratified by the Land Commissioners. Why should he be placed in the position of the man who is responsible for the default, and but for whom the default could never have occurred? I think that hon. Members below the Gangway, though they hate landlordism, should, at all events, try to be fair in dealing with men who are parting with their property at a great sacrifice.

An hon. MEMBER: It is a voluntary act.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL: Yes; it is a voluntary act in the face of the conspiracy in the South and West of Ireland. There is one difficulty. The hon. Member for the Rushcliffe Division has absolutely fallen into the trap again. The difficulty will not be to get the tenant to buy, but to get the landlord to sell. If there is to be any further difficulty placed in the way of landlords these sales in Ulster will become more and more improbable. I think the Attorney General for Ireland, in what he has said, has satisfied the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle as to the order in which these funds are to go to meet default. I will simply content myself by saying that these parties to the transaction are not in the same position. The hon. Member for West Belfast commenced his able speech by saying that it was the British taxpayer, the British Nation, that was responsible for the present condition of things.

MR. SEXTON: The British Government.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL: If the British Nation is responsible for the state of things that throws us back on the taxpayer; but the hon. Member for Northampton will have none of that responsibility, and will not have the British taxpayer involved in it. Therefore the hon. Member for Northampton answers the hon. Member for West Belfast. The hon. Member says the Government will settle all this, by seeing that the burdens are fair—that there will be no conspiracy against the payments if the burdens are fair. Coming from the hon. Member for West Belfast and those below the Gangway, that is equal to saying that if the tenants are allowed to fix the price there would be no difficulty. I say that is not fair. I have heard of seven years' purchase described by hon. Members below the Gangway, and I maintain that that is a very easy way of settling the question, if the Government are able to do it, but there can be no idea of justice in it.

(4.0.) MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): I am in favour of this Amendment, and opposed to the proposal as it stands in the Bill. The Chief Secretary said he had explained the matter according to his legal powers. I think the right hon. Gentleman explained it very clearly and very satisfactorily, as an explanation. What I complain of is, that the arguments he used in favour of his proposal were not as sound and as good as his explanation. Under the Ashbourne Act it was decided that the landlord should put up a fifth, and the Chief Secretary admits that there is an alteration, and also, I think, that the alteration is, as we say, in favour of the landlord. If the alteration were in favour of the tenant we should have gentlemen opposite from Ireland protesting, and naturally Gentleman from Ireland on this side protest that it is in favour of the landlord. That it most unquestionably is, and the onus probandi lies with the Irish Secretary to show why this alteration should be made for the benefit of the landlord, and that I contend he has not done. The Chief Secretary for Ireland said it was a hardship to the landlord to put up this money. But the right hon. Gentleman does not free the landlord from putting up a fifth, though he relieves him of part and parcel of the possibility of losing a portion of that fifth. He says it does not necessarily follow, as my right hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle (Mr. John Morley) suggested, that the price will have been too high. The presumption must be that the price was too high because you have first to sell the interest of the land to some one else. A portion of the money has already been paid, and you only come to the landlord for a fifth or for a tenth, when it is shown by putting the property up to public auction you cannot find one single human being to give a sum which is not considerably less than was given to the landlord. In that case surely it is only fair and reasonable that the landlord should be the first person to pay back a portion of the money. It is proved the landlord has got too much. We have made a mistake and the landlord ought to suffer for it. We have had certain discussion as to what should be done in the case of a strike. The right hon. Gentleman says that the locality ought to share this liability of a strike because it would be the fault of the locality. I cannot see that it would necessarily be the fault of the locality, or that the locality is responsible for it. Take certain of the tenants. These tenants do not pay; you may call it strike or combination—what you like. But they can say, "We cannot pay, and we are not going to pay." Who suffers? The combination may be called into existence by a fall in price of produce. Why then are the grocers and others to pay a portion of this money to release the landlord, when they will themselves be suffering equally with the unfortunate tenant by the fall in the price of produce? We were told by hon. Members opposite that this Bill is not in the interest of the landlord. [A Conservative MEMBER: Hear, hear!] The hon. Gentleman opposite says, "hear, hear!" Does he know that no landlord is obliged to sell by this Bill? If then the landlords do sell in considerable numbers we may assume that they think it to their interest to do so. Are we to suppose that the Irish landlords are philanthropists who are going to sacrifice their interests in order that this Bill may be carried into effect? Most assuredly not. And they will prove by making use of the Bill, by selling under it, that it is entirely to their interest. We give these landlords a great advantage. It is an advantage to say to the landlord: "If you like to sell, you may sell to us for more than you could get in the open market." Under these circumstances, we surely have a perfect right to make our own terms in regard to sale. They are not obliged to accept them, and the condition is a most fair and legitimate one, which was introduced into the Ashbourne Act, and ought to appear in this Bill—that you ought not to come on the locality until you have gone on this one-fifth.

(4.7.) COLONEL SAUNDERSON (Armagh, N.): One circumstance has been manifest to the Committee, and it is this—that however opposed to the Bill hon. Gentlemen opposite of the Radical persuasion may be, yet my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary for Ireland has found a supporter in the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian. We did not before know that that right hon. Gentleman was a supporter of this Bill, but from an interruption by him during the speech of the hon. Member for South Tyrone, we learn that he, at any rate, disclaims any idea of opposing the principles of this Bill. To have secured so great an ally on the opposite side of the House ought, I think, to be a matter of thankfulness to Her Majesty's Government. But the hon. Member for West Belfast challenged one of my hon. Friends as to the popularity of this Bill. The proof of the popularity of this Bill is the action of hon. Members below the Gangway opposite. Very recently they were opposed to the Bill, and in their hearts they hate it still, but they know perfectly well they dare not revisit their constituents in Ireland if they oppose it in this House. Therefore, they have given it a qualified resistance by supporting an Amendment which, if carried, would have destroyed the Bill altogether. With regard to this proposal to increase the liability of the landlord who sells, I would point out that if there is a strike against rents, if a landlord has sold his property, surely the blame cannot be laid on him, but on the locality in which the strike against rents occurs. The House will remember a very interesting circumstance that occurred the other day when my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary was speaking upon this Bill. "Who will fix the price?" was the question asked, and the hon. and learned Member for Longford interrupted and said, "The Local Land League." Well, if the Local Land League is to determine the price, to interfere with the price, and if there is to be a strike against rent, it will be the local Land League or whatever organisation hon. Gentlemen opposite will bring into life in Ireland for a political purpose which will instigate Irish tenants to strike against rent. Therefore, I think it would be a most monstrous thing that a landlord who sells his property, which will have the effect of reducing his income by one-half, should have to carry with him wherever he went the doubt rankling in his mind that at any moment the local Land League or some other Political Organisation might cause a strike against rent, and that because they cause that strike, he, forsooth, who was absolutely opposed to any such thing, would have to bear part of the blame. I look upon that as a most monstrous piece of injustice. The House naturally feels anxious as to whether the Commissioners are likely to advance too much money in buying these Irish estates. I hold in my hand a Return which is interesting from the fact that it bears upon this very question. This shows an estate for sale in County Cork—the estate of H. B. O'Sullivan. In the year 1878 this gentleman refused £27,000 for the estate. The other day he offered it to his tenants for £8,885, and the tenants accepted that offer with thankfulness. The effect of the offer would have been this: The tenants themselves were under a fair rent. I will take one case. His fair rent fixed by the Court was £45. He swore himself in Court that in his own valuation his farm was worth £35. Under the offer of the landlord to sell, the £35 in his case would have been reduced to £23. But the Commissioners refused to sanction the transaction unless the landlord accepted £7,389, which in the case of this farm would have reduced the rent to £16, although he himself had sworn it was worth £35. Is not that a very fair margin? Is it likely that the State would run very much danger by sanctioning purchase at that money. Therefore, I hope the Committee will see, first of all, that it would be most unfair and unjust—

MR. PINKERTON (Galway, N.): Would the hon. and gallant Gentleman give the valuation of that holding?

COLONEL SAUNDERSON: The old rent was £53.

MR. PINKERTON: What is the Government—the Poor Law—valuation?

COLONEL SAUNDERSON: The Government valuation is £24. [Opposition cheers.] Hon. Gentlemen above the Gangway cheer that because they know nothing about it. But hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway know something about it. If the tenant swears in open Court, in trying to get fair rent fixed, that he conceives the value of his farm to be £35 a year, and is willing to pay that rent as fair, and when the Commissioners refuse to sanction the sale unless, practically, the rent is reduced to £16, I say the margin between that figure and £35 is a very fair margin for the security which the State requires. Therefore, I hope the Committee will not sanction the idea that landlords are to be saddled with the whole of this fifth, but that it should be divided on one hand between the landlord who sells and the tenant who buys and on the locality on the other. It is in the interests of the locality when farms are sold not to endanger the county guarantee, and depend upon it that the locality will see that neither the local Land League nor political demagogues will incite the locality to refuse to pay when the loss will fall on their own pockets.

(4.15.) MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: I am very sorry that the hon. and gallant Gentleman drags me into this Debate by the gross misstatement he has made. I do not find fault with the hon. and gallant Gentleman. I know his eloquence is ungovernable, as it is, I am afraid on many occasions, unprofitable. He has claimed me as a supporter of the Bill, and he does that because an hon. Member behind me (Mr. T. W. Russell), perhaps inadvertently, said that the object of those who acted with me was to destroy the Bill. I totally disclaimed the statement that we wished to destroy the Bill. That is the extent of what I have done, and it is that upon which the hon. and gallant Gentleman, in the exercise of the understanding which the Almighty has given him, has represented me as being a supporter of the Bill. My position is a very simple one. I am only sorry to be compelled by the rather violent action of the hon. and gallant Gentleman to occupy the time of the Committee in stating that the aggregate objections to the Bill were such that, although I was desirous to see a Land Purchase Bill passed, they made it my duty to vote against the Second Reading of this Bill. But it is my duty now to endeavour to see whether by Amendments of the Bill it can be rendered such that I shall be enabled to withdraw that opposition, and that clearly is a position quite distinct, as the hon. Member will admit, from the position of one who wishes to destroy the Bill, as it is quite distinct from the position of one who would deserve the glowing description given by the hon. and gallant Gentleman of being a supporter of the Bill. I am obliged to vote for the Amendment which has been proposed, and I do it upon two grounds. I do it because I think the arrangement proposed by the Government is unjust to the ratepayer and unjust to the State. I think it unjust to the ratepayer upon the ground which I will not travel over again. We have heard the admirable statement of my hon. Friend the Member for West Belfast, and I do not think anyone could possibly wish for a clearer exposition. On that ground I think the injustice to the ratepayer is such that I cannot for a moment be a party to inflicting it. But I think the Bill as it stands is also unjust to the State. The security of the rates is, in my opinion, totally unreal and unavailable, and it is unjust to the State to give it a fictitious security instead of a real one. As long as a guarantee by the landlord was available the security was a real one, but if instead of £1 out of that Guarantee Fund he must give 10s., and 10s. out of a supposed—presumed—product of the rates, which I conceive to be based on injustice and impossible in practice, he may then greatly damage the security of the State. Whatever I think of the moral incapacity of this House to pledge Imperial credit, the House having been pleased by a large majority to vote that, my next duty is to see that there is some reality in the guarantee it is proposed to provide. I think the guarantee proposed to be provided on the rates is absolutely without value, because the provision to make it without the consent of the ratepayers, or of any Local Authority, and under circumstances in which those who have not been able to purchase and not receiving the benefits of the Bill are to be made to supply the defaults of those who have been able to purchase, is an arrangement which, when the time comes for giving it practical effect, will be found wholly unavailable for the purpose for which it is intended. I find that I have made a verbal mistake in the course of my remarks. My vote was given against pledging Imperial credit, and not against the Second Reading of the Bill.

(4.22.) MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): The Chief Secretary illustrated his argument by reference to a conspiracy in the locality. Let the Committee observe what the locality is. The locality is a county. One of the so-called conspiracies is that which the hon. Member for Hunts (Mr. Smith-Barry) is supposed to be operating against—a strike against rent on the Ponsonby estate, situated in the County of Cork, at Youghal. But the people in the districts of Castletown and Berehaven, in the County of Cork, are to be made to pay for the misdeeds of people at Youghal, which is as far distant from them as is Galway. That comes of the absurdity of making the county the unit. You do it because your plan under this Bill is to issue a precept to the Grand Jury to make up a local rate, and then the Grand Jury, without even the preliminary of a Presentment Sessions, are bound to strike a rate, and men 100 miles away from the scene of a so-called conspiracy are to make good a default which might be committed by people in a place like Youghal. Yet we are told by gentlemen like the hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Parnell) that we are struggling to defeat this Bill. My hon. Friend the Member for Northampton and other hon. Gentlemen have all assumed that this fifth is to be retained. But have we forgotten the juggle of the Land Department Bill? We have here a Land Department Bill which you have read with acclamation a second time; and Clause 17, Sub-section 2, of that Bill provides that you need not retain a penny of the fifth if you please. Then we have another illustration, not a very candid one, given us by the hon. and gallant Member for North Armagh in the case of the O'Sullivan estate. Now, that is an estate which I happen to know something about. I understand that estate was offered for sale for £8,885 instead of £27,000, which was formerly asked for it. That looks wonderful until you come to the facts. Who are selling the estate? Is it O'Sullivan? No; it is the Munster and Leinster Bank. Because the O'Sullivans were spendthrift, I presume, and chose to put blisters on their estate, the Munster and Leinster Bank sell to the first man they can get, and he will only give £8,000. Accordingly, to trot out to us the O'Sullivan estate as if we knew nothing about the matter is, I should imagine, as though the hon. and gallant Gentleman thought he was talking to an audience of Ulster Orangemen.

COLONEL SAUNDERSON: The hon. and learned Member could not, apparently, have been in the House when I spoke. I stated that the Commissioners refused to sell the estate.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I heard every word of the hon. and gallant Gentleman's speech, and the point he repeats, as a matter of fact, reinforces my argument. If the Commissioners refused to sell at the amount of the Munster and Leinster Bank's mortgage, does not that prove exactly our contention upon the business? Supposing the O'Sullivans were not encumbered at all, is it likely that they would sell for £7,000? What do they do? The Munster and Leinster Bank is not an Orange Lodge. It cannot vote for the Castle. It is a Limited Liability Company. It is not an institution which has at its back the Loyal and Patriotic Union. It has not a newspaper in its interest. It cannot lobby and interview the Chief Secretary in his chambers. The Munster and Leinster Bank must suffer loss. But if, instead of being an institution of a purely financial character, it were a landlord, it would make its complaints to the Purchase Commissioners at the Castle, make the matter known, and endeavour to intimidate them; and when the salaries of these Commissioners, having been taken off the Votes, could no longer be criticised in this House, the British public would then find that this transaction had taken place, and, instead of being refused to be passed at £8,000, it would most likely be passed at £18,000 or £20,000; and then, in 10 or five years' time, you would, perhaps, have a demand made on an estate so valuable as this that any default should be made good not by the landlord's fifth but by the locality. That is the way the argument of the hon. and gallant Gentleman goes. It goes to show the iniquity of the proposals of Her Majesty's Government. The right hon. Gentleman has no argument whatever to offer to the Committee for making half payable by the tenant. The argument of the Chief Secretary in favour of practically abolishing the landlord's fifth and making the ratepayers pay the half of it is absolutely absurd. The towns must pay for this as well as the country. Observe the curious result of the Government trying to escape from their own folly. Under the Bill the exempted towns are Dublin, Cork, Belfast, Londonderry, and Limerick. Cork goes a long way into the country, and Limerick goes into the country also. You exempt these places so that the ratepayers will not kick against the proposal. Both Cork and Limerick contain large areas known as "liberties," which extend miles into the country, and you exempt them from the Bill in order to make your area of charge purely rural. But take boroughs like Newry, business places like Lurgan, and cities like Coleraine. Why should they be called upon to make good any default in a particular locality? In addition to this it is proposed to include the counties of the Cities of Kilkenny, Carrickfergus, Galway, Drogheda, and Waterford in the Bill. What is the meaning of this proposition? Many hon. Members recollect the passing of the Redistribution of Seats Bill. That was the result of a compact between the two Front Benches, and whatever arguments were addressed to the Minister in charge of the Bill he said, "I have agreed about this with Lord Salisbury, and I cannot make any concession." The Chief Secretary is padlocked to this provision because he has agreed with the landlords to make it—

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have not.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I am glad to hear that. Then give up the provision. Did not the landlords in Convention ask for this provision?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I do not know.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I say they did.

COLONEL WARING (Down, N.): I say they did not.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Then they do not want it. It is a free boon in the gift and grace of Her Majesty's Government.

COLONEL WARING: What I said was that the landlords did not ask for it.

That is very different to accepting it gratefully.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I was saying that if the landlords have not asked for this boon the Government are not pinned to it. I suppose the demand was thought by the landlords to be so monstrous that they did not dare to put it forward at their Convention. These gentlemen would ask for the moon if it occurred to them to do so. What demand has been made by the hon. Member for South Hunts (Mr. Smith-Barry). It reminds me of the famous story about Mr. Hut: "Give him Ireland for an estate and he will ask for the Isle of Man for a kitchen garden." The landlords have not thought fit to ask for this provision, and we who have no local authority, and are to have no control, are to be made to smart and to pay when the landlord's fifth is lying there and no demand has been made upon it. I regard this proposition of the Government as the most unwholesome, pernicious, and objectionable of the entire measure.

(4.44.) MR. MAHONY (Meath, N.): The Land Commissioners are not now empowered to see that the amount advanced is a fair price for the interest purchased. Will the Chief Secretary undertake to provide at some later stage that the Land Commissioners shall be compelled to see that there is fair and reasonable security in the land itself for the money advanced?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The duty of the Land Commissioners already is to see that the holding is such as to afford good security for the advance made.

MR. MAHONY: I exclude the tenants' interest; I mean the actual thing that passes in the sale.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: They must do that now.

(4.45.) MR. M. J. KENNY (Tyrone, Mid): Under the Bill the local guarantees have to be exhausted before the landlord's deposit can be touched. It is quite clear the object of the Government is not only to whittle down the landlord's liability to half of the one-fifth, they mean the landlord to get off scot free, and to transfer the liability of the landlord to the locality. I submit that if the Bill is unamended at this point the Courts will hold that they cannot touch the guarantee deposit until the Guarantee Fund, consisting of the two portions specified in Clause 3—that is, the cash portion and the contingent portion—are absolutely exhausted. I ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether he is prepared to insert words insuring that the guarantee deposit will be liable pari passu with the Guarantee Fund so that the landlord's portion and the tenant's portion will be exhausted concurrently?

*(4.46.) THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. MADDEN, Dublin University): I am quite clear that the Land Commission can attach the guarantee deposit as soon as they declare the debt to be irrecoverable.

*(4.48.) MR. KNOX (Cavan, W.): It would be possible to insert words at the end of the sub-section which would meet the point raised. The mistake made in drafting is due to the simple fact that the draftsman forgot that the procedure which was sufficient under the Act of 1885 in respect of the guarantee deposit is not sufficient now. Under the Act of 1885, when the Land Commissioners wanted to apply the guarantee deposit they did so directly, and applied it in the payment to themselves of what was due. Under this Bill they have to carry the guarantee deposit, or such portion as the Government declares shall be used under this provision, to the Land Purchase Account. There is no mandatory provision in the Bill—but I suppose that is a slip in drafting—that at any particular period the guarantee deposit, or any part of it, shall be carried to the Land Purchase Account. There is another point I am desirous of raising. I have no doubt the Chief Secretary and Attorney General for Ireland are aware that in many cases at present the Land Commissioners sanction the sales of smaller holdings only on condition that a larger proportion than one-fifth of the purchase money shall remain as guarantee deposit. They are able, therefore, to sanction the sale of smaller holdings without risk or loss to the taxpayers, which but for that simple expedient could not be carried out at all. The provision will entirely prevent that course of dealing which I think the Government must admit is one that everybody who has a practical interest in the question of land purchase must be in favour of. It will practically shut the small farmers out of the Bill. We saw from the papers that it was said the other day the Bill will give reductions of 30 and 40 per cent. to 150,000 tenants in Ireland. Anyone who takes the trouble to read the Bill must know that no tenant will get more than 20 per cent. reduction for 25 years. We know also, from the experience of the Ashbourne Acts, that it will be many a long year before 150,000 tenants can by any possibility come within the scope of the

THE CHAIRMAN: I fail to see how the hon. Member's remarks are pertinent to the question before the Committee.

MR. KNOX: I am anxious to show that, as the provision now under consideration prevents the Land Commissioners, on any default by the tenant, from taking more than one-half of the sum in default out of the landlord's guarantee deposit, there will be no practical advantage to the State in making the deposit larger. The guarantee deposit, as it is, will be so large in comparison with what may be taken out of it that it is almost impossible for the whole of it to be absorbed within the 18 years. As my hon. Friend the Member for West Belfast has shown, unless the tenant within the 18 years after purchase makes default in 20 half-yearly payments, the whole of the one-fifth guarantee deposit cannot be absorbed; so there will be practically no advantage to the State in making the guarantee deposit larger. The procedure under which advances have been made to smaller tenants will therefore be no longer of any use. I contend that if the provision is carried in its present form it will make impossible the carrying out of sales to tenants in those cases where sales are most required if social peace in Ireland is to be restored, and if the small tenants are to eke out a livelihood on their own land.

(4.54.) MR. WINTERBOTHAM (Gloucester, Cirencester): Before this clause is passed, I wish to utter a protest. I have been hoping the Chief Secretary would say something in reply to the exceedingly able and unanswerable speech of the hon. Gentleman the Member for West Belfast. We English

Members long ago realised that there is not much good in protesting here, and have felt driven to appeal to the English people from English platforms. As to this iniquitous Landlords' Bill we have told the people, and we shall continue to tell them, that this is a Bill mainly to benefit the landlord class of Ireland. It now turns out that, unasked by the landlords, Her Majesty's Government have gone out of their way to make the landlords' position with regard to their share of the risk under the Guarantee Fund 50 per cent. better than it has been under the Ashbourne Act. It is quite evident to a sensible man that the landlord is a willing seller, for if he does not like the price he need not sell. It is quite evident to a man of business that the 20 per cent. which is kept in the Guarantee Fund is not more than the extra price the landlord gets for his land over and above what he would get if the land were put up to public auction and to free competition, and there is no injustice, therefore, in keeping this 20 per cent. as a buffer between the State and the loan which it has advanced. But I do not think enough has been said about the unfairness of putting half the possible loss upon the taxpayers of Ireland. That men who are allowed no voice in the matter, and who receive no benefit under the Bill, should have to pay for any default, is a most monstrous thing. But beyond this, you propose to "capture" the resources of Ireland. What right have you to pledge the resources of each locality for a purpose which will not benefit the general community? I only utter this word of protest. We cannot defeat or alter the measure. You have your majority to vote us down, but in the near future, when your friends the landlords, having pocketed the swag, have gone off, we may be in a position to take care that any loss which accrues shall fall not upon industry nor on vans and wheels, nor upon the poor people of the country, but upon the landlord class, who are the class benefited.

(4.59.) MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camborne): I cannot agree with the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian in the desire to amend this Bill. I hope there will be as little Amendment as possible, in order that the people of this country, who have been befooled into allowing a Tory Government to introduce a Bill of this kind against all their pledges, may realise the blessings of having a Tory Government. There has been a great omission in the course of the Debate. We have not yet heard any reply from the Government to the urgent arguments addressed to the Committee by the hon. Member for West Belfast, and now, Mr. Courtney, when you are on the point of rising to put the question, the Chief Secretary has made himself scarce. Furthermore, we have not yet heard the views of the noble Lord the Member for Rosendale (the Marquess of Hartington) who is jointly responsible for and guilty of the iniquitous fraud, which is now being perpetrated on the constituencies of this country. Then there is that able lawyer the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Bury (Sir Henry James) from whom we have had no expression of opinion upon this clause. I distinctly recollect the time when the noble Lord and his right hon. Colleague had a good deal to say of a rather violent character against the land purchase proposals of 1886, which, as compared with the proposals in this Bill, were as safe as Consols. Now I take it that these Gentlemen share with the Government the responsibility for introducing this measure, and we have a right to know if they have any answer to what has been said with thorough knowledge of the subject by the hon. Member for West Belfast (Mr. Sexton). The Chancellor of the Exchequer has just returned to his place. I do not know whether he was present when my hon. Friend was arguing the question, but as he was posing yesterday as the guardian of the taxpayers of the country, it is desirable that he should offer some reply. It is monstrous that my hon. Friend, having put his case with a lucidity and force that appealed to the intelligence of every hon. Member in the Committee, should have no answer. If my hon. Friend's arguments are unanswerable, then let the Amendment be accepted. I do not appeal to hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway opposite, because they merely answer argument with impatient cries for a Division, and I do not suppose they have given much attention to the Bill or that they understand it. We require a reply, however, from their responsible leaders; but, as this is not forthcoming, it may be that they desire more time for the consideration of the points raised, therefore, to afford them that time, I move that you do now, Sir, report Progress.

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! The hon. Member must be prepared for my declaration that this is trifling with the Committee.*

Question again proposed.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Does not the right hon. Gentleman think that some reply is due to my hon. Friend's speech?

(5.4.) MR. A. J. BALFOUR: No one has more admiration for the powers of eloquence of the hon. Member for West Belfast than I have. He has put the case for the Amendment in an excellent manner. I had previously put the case on behalf of the Government in a speech of some length. I do not know that I have anything to add to what I have said. I am quite content to leave the case as presented by the hon. Member on the one side, and by myself on the other, to the judgment of the Committee.

(5.5.) The Committee divided:—Ayes 205; Noes 158.—(Div. List, No. 145.)

THE CHAIRMAN: The Amendment which stands in the name of the hon. Member for Elgin raises a point which the Committee has already decided.

MR. SEXTON: Cannot an hon. Member move to substitute some other proposition than one-half of the Guarantee deposit?

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member for Cork (Mr. M. Healy) proposes to leave out "one-half," and insert "three-fourths," and I call on him to proceed with that Motion.

*(5.20.) MR. KNOX: In the absence of my hon. Friend (Mr. M. Healy), I beg to move his Amendment. I will not detain the Committee at any length, for, of course, the main part of the principle

* The entry in the Votes is as follows:—

Mr. Conybeare moved, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again;" but the Chairman being of opinion that the Motion was an abuse of the Rules of the House, declined to propose the Question thereupon to the Committee.

has been decided already. We now want, so far as we can, to remove the grossness of the inequality which would exist if the proposal of the Government were carried into effect without any Amendment whatever. I propose on behalf of my hon. Friend to substitute in line 34 "three-quarters" for "one-half." The landlord would bear three-fourths of the loss in case of a default occurring during the first 18 years, and the Local Authority would bear the other fourth. I would ask the Chief Secretary to consider whether this would not be fair. The right hon. Gentleman states that his object is to make equality between the landlord and the Local Authority. Now, we on this side deny that there ought to be this equality between the Local Authority and the landlord, but of course we must take the last Division as having decided something. We take it that the Committee has decided, in spite of our protest, by a majority of Members in favour of the principle of equality between the landlord and the Local Authority in respect to this guarantee. But we contend that the proposal of the Government does not give that equality. The guarantee of the landlord is for 18 years, and that of the Local Authority for the whole term of the purchase annuity. Our proposal is that in a rough way you may arrive at an equality by the omission of "one-half" of the guarantee deposit and making three-fourths of the deposit applicable. In that way during 18 years you would have the landlord's deposit bearing the greater part of the risk in consideration of the fact that after 18 years the landlord would have no risk whatever. I would ask the Chief Secretary if this is not a reasonable proposal that he may accept in the interest of quick progress with the Bill? We all want to get through the Bill as quickly as we can, consistently with our duty to the ratepayers and farmers of Ireland, and I ask the Chief Secretary to carry his principle of equality between the landlord and the Local Authority into effect by the adoption of this Amendment.

Amendment proposed,

In page 2, line 34, to leave out the words "one-half," in order to insert the words "three-fourths,"—(Mr. Kees.)
—instead thereof.

Mr. Kees

Question proposed, "That the words 'one-half' stand part of the Clause."

(5.24.) Mr. A. J. BALFOUR: The hon. Member acknowledges that the Committee decided by the last Division that the Local Authority shall bear its share of any default that may occur, and as I understand it is now suggested that during 18 years the greater part of the burden shall be borne by the landlords on the ground that after that period a landlord will have no liability for loss at all. Now, the hon. Member must recollect that the reason why the guarantee deposit is not required to bear any risk after 18 years is, that after that period, the value of the Guarantee Fund will have so augmented by the number of years' payments of annuities and the amount paid off by the Sinking Fund, that practically there will be no more loss to bear. Therefore, after 18 years we need not trouble ourselves as to the liability of landlord or the tenant, far advanced towards the position of owner. Under the circumstances, I certainly take the view of the Committee, as expressed in the last Division, to cover this point, and I ask the Committee not to expend further time in discussion of a matter which, I think, was exhausted on the last Amendment.

(5.25.) Mr. SEXTON: I think the right hon. Gentleman is in error in supposing that the decision of the Committee on the last Amendment covers this point. What I take the Division to have decided is that a majority of Members are of opinion that the whole of the loss arising from default should not fall on the guarantee deposit. That was the extent of the Division. But it is obvious that, so far from deciding the question of the present Amendment was that decision, that it left altogether open the question as to what proportion of the loss arising from default should be borne between landlords and ratepayers. Now, the proposal of my hon. Friend the Member for Cavan is at once ingenious and just. It proposes to equalise the burden between landlords and the locality, and to do so not by an even liability in years succeeding the passing of the Act, but by so arranging the relative liability during the entire period as to arrive at a rough equation between the parties. My hon. Friend argues that for 18 years the landlord should bear three-fourths of the risk and the locality one-fourth, and after this period of 18 years, and for 31 years more, we are willing that the locality should bear the whole of the burden of risk and the landlords none. That certainly does, in my judgment, afford something like an equation. But the Chief Secretary says that after 18 years there is no substantial danger of default. Well, but how does that bear upon his previous speech of to-day, when he shadowed forth before the Committee as one of the vast dangers coming in the distance, and in recognition of which all these precautions were necessary, the danger of a conspiracy or strike against the payment of these annuities to the State? How does he make out now that this danger disappears at the end of 18 years? Of course, there will be the growth of the feeling of ownership. We say there is no danger of a strike if the bargain is a just one, but he is not in a position to say there is less danger of a strike 18 years hence than now. A strike may occur at any time, according to his argument, under political conditions he indicated. If it be true that there is no danger of a strike at the end of 18 years, why then, provide a local guarantee for the whole of the 49 years? There would be no necessity for considering that question. Here is a suggestion that will undoubtedly ease friction in regard to this Bill. The right hon. Gentleman admits that the only danger worth considering is the danger of a strike against the payment of rent. For individual defaults he admits he has ample and abundant guarantee equal to 2½ years liability. The only real danger is that of a strike, that is the only thing that renders a general guarantee necessary. But he himself uses an argument of great force when he says the interest of the purchasing tenants as owners will be so powerful that the folly of a strike will not be indulged in. Very well, if we accept that conclusion, then the whole case for a local guarantee after 18 years is at an end. If the Chief Secretary will not accept the Amendment of my hon. Friend, will he consider—I do not say that it will be equally satisfactory—will he consider a proposal that at the end of 18 years, when, according to himself, the danger of repudiation will cease, the guarantee shall be no longer exacted? The hon. Gentleman has asked why not make the landlord wholly responsible instead of throwing half the liability on the tenant. Now if I were certain that every act of default in the first 18 years was due to conspiracy, I should refuse to ask the landlord to give any guarantee at all: I should throw the whole liability on the county. But the fact is that the default may in some cases be due to conspiracy, and in other cases to causes over which the tenant has no control, and hence it is I propose to make the landlord a party to the arrangement. I have never pretended that there is any real absolute necessity for this guarantee, but the hon. Gentleman must know enough of public opinion in England to be aware that the British taxpayer would not take my individual opinion, but will require an absolute guarantee. I have provided him with one.

MR. T. M. HEALY: How?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I repeat that I have provided an absolute guarantee. I know we cannot pass this Bill without the assent of Parliament and of this country, and even to omit what I think are superfluous guarantees might lead to the destruction of a Bill which I believe hon. Gentlemen opposite are anxious should be carried.

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! Although the hon. Member made a suggestion to the Chief Secretary touching the cessation of the guarantee, and the right hon. Gentleman has replied to it, it would be out of order to discuss it.

(5.34.) MR. T. M. HEALY: I propose to recall to the Committee the historical aspect of this question and of the circumstances under which this demand is made. The right hon. Gentleman says he believes that the guarantee is not necessary. Does he say that no loss will fall on the taxpayer.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: No serious loss.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Then if it cannot fall on the taxpayer it cannot fall on the landlord, and our demand consequently becomes irresistible. How did this House in former years satisfy the British taxpayer? In the year 1870, under the Bright Clauses, in order to satisfy the British taxpayer you insisted that only one half of the purchase money should be advanced by the State. Under the Act of 1881 you increased that one-half to three-fourths, and under the Ashbourne Acts there was a further advance to the extent of four-fifths, and finally it was arranged to advance the whole sum, but to retain one-fifth. Now the demand for this Bill comes not from the tenant, but from the landlord, and hence it is that the Government propose to throw part of the landlord's liability on the local ratepayer. Hon. Gentlemen opposite deny that the demandant for this Bill is the landlord. Why, the hon. Member for Cork and the whole of the National Members for Ireland voted against the Bill. Four years ago we voted against advancing a second £5,000,000 for operation under the Ashbourne Acts, and therefore, so far as the tenants' Representatives are concerned we have not come imploring the House for this Bill. It is the landlords who have asked for it, and this particular provision is one of the results of the landlords' conventions which have been held for the first time in the history of Ireland. I do not object for one moment to the holding of those conventions. I think they are very desirable, and if we were let alone no doubt an agreement would be easily arrived at between landlord and tenant. These securities the Government are now insisting upon never entered into the head of Mr. Bright, or of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian, or of Lord Ashbourne. They first recommended themselves to the Liberal Unionist mind of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. The Chief Secretary has spoken of the probability of the disappearance of the landlord from Ireland. My suggestion is that if the Irish landlord remains at home he can act as a model for the general community, and by his wealth, education, and intelligence—which we know every member of the class possesses so large a share—set an example of rectitude. He can be as a shining candle in his particular community. Surely it would be a graceful act on the part of the landlords to say that they will not leave the burden of this particular plaster on the community. If they intend to go let them clear out bag and baggage. Hon. Friends near me are always growling that the interests of the British taxpayer are suffering under this Bill. Why, Sir, the case of the Irish is far worse. They are Imperial taxpayers as well as English; but, although in the case of Englishmen only the Imperial taxes are affected, in the case of Irishmen their local as well as their Imperial taxes will suffer. I think the Government would be well advised to give in on this matter. May I point out that the vote, if they persist in their present attitude, is a foregone conclusion, as they rely on the support of frequenters of the Smoking Room, who go into the Lobbies without listening to a single argument.

(5.45.) MR. LABOUCHERE: I rise to point out how the right hon. Gentleman is trifling with this House and with the country. On the last clause the right hon. Gentleman urged many, as he considered, excellent reasons to prove the beauty of his scheme of guarantees; yet a few minutes ago he got up and practically threw over the whole of those guarantees. He said he did not care in the least for them—he did not believe in them, and that they were intended simply to throw dust in the eyes of the British elector.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: No, Sir.

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! I have already intimated that this is not relevant to the Amendment.

MR. LABOUCHERE: I am not thinking of going into arguments; I was only accentuating what the right hon. Gentleman said.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman will allow me to correct him. I did not say I disbelieved in the securities. I said that, after all, they were only an additional, and, perhaps, a superfluous guarantee.

MR. LABOUCHERE: In regard to this specific Amendment, I, for my part, believe that any proposal to increase the liability of the landlord as against the ratepayer will fail. I do not agree with my hon. Friend in thinking that after 18 years, there will be no chance of a strike against the annual payments. We know perfectly well that produce has fallen enormously of late years, and we do not know what may occur in the future.

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order!

MR. LABOUCHERE: Well, Sir, as you rule this is not relevant, I am afraid

I can only say I must vote for the Amendment.

Ayes 215; Noes 154.—(Div. List, No. 146.)

*(6.2.) MR. KNOX: I beg to move at the end of Sub-section 3 to insert the words—

“And such one-half shall be carried to the Land Purchase Account out of the guarantee deposit immediately on any sum due to the Land Commission in respect of any advance secured by guarantee deposit having been declared an irrecoverable debt.”

This Amendment will remove the obscurity occasioned by the defective drafting of the clause.

(6.3.) MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I think that the effect of the words is already covered; but there is no objection to inserting the Amendment.

Question, “That those words be there inserted,” put, and agreed to.

(6.3.) MR. M. J. KENNY: I beg to move an Amendment, to be inserted after the words last added, to the effect that the landlord's liability for the debt shall be extended over the whole period of 49 years, instead of over the 18 years as at present provided. I move this Amendment having regard to the fact that the landlord's liability has already been reduced. Under the Bill, the Sinking Fund Account payable by the purchaser releases the guarantee deposit absolutely. The original vendor then ceases to be liable to the mortgagee or the taxpayer. In the meantime, the tenant not only continues liable himself, through the liability of his holding to be put up to auction, and his liability to be proceeded against in the Law Courts for the recovery of debt, but in addition to that the local guarantee fund named in Section 3 continues to be liable for the debt. I want to know why it is that the landlord, the original vendor, is to be released from all liability at the end of 18 years, whilst the tenant remains liable until all the instalments are paid up? In this, the liability of the landlord compared with what was fixed upon in the Ashbourne Act, is reduced by one-half. Seeing, therefore, that he gets so much, I think the taxpayer should get something, and that for this purpose we should require the landlords' liability to continue for a longer period. Of course, there would always be the liability to redemption. By a rule of the Land Commission the landlords' deposit has been made assignable as an asset, and as a matter of fact, in some cases under the Ashbourne Act, the one-fifth has been assigned to creditors, although it might be ultimately required to meet default on the part of the purchaser. The landlord then can suffer no inconvenience through the deposit having to remain longer available for the purposes of this Bill, especially when you bear in mind that he enjoys the luxury of receiving 3 per cent. for his money. I can see no reason why the landlord should be relieved of all liability at the end of 18 years, whilst the Local Guarantee Funds continue liable till the expiration of the 49 years. If the right hon. Gentleman will explain his inconsistency in this matter, I shall be glad to hear him, but at present I protest against the proposal in the Bill, and the further proposal in the Land Department Bill, the object of which is to relieve landlords of their liability.

Amendment proposed.

In page 2, line 36 after the word “account,” to insert the words “And, in the case of any advance under this Act, such guarantee deposit shall not be repaid to the depositor or otherwise released until all re-payments under the purchase annuity shall have been fully completed and satisfied.”—(Mr. Matthew Kenny.)

Question proposed, “That those words be there inserted.”

(6.10.) MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I think there is no reason, either on the analogy of the Ashbourne Act, or derivable from any past experience in land purchase, for extending the period during which the landlord should be tied to the holding he has sold. The hon. Member for West Belfast has told us that there will be no practical danger of default on the part of the tenant when the security has been increased by the one-fifth, as it must be before the landlord can be relieved of the guarantee deposit. And I would point out that at the end of 18 years the individual tenant will have become so much of an owner that there will be no danger of casual default. There can be no question that the holding will supply a sufficient asset to meet the loans made upon it, when its value has been increased in the manner pointed out.

(6.12.) MR. E. ROBERTSON (Dundee): I regard the Chief Secretary's answer as unsatisfactory. By the existing law the guarantee deposit is subject to a charge on account of the whole of the recoverable debt, but by the change just made only half the guarantee deposit will be subject to that charge. My hon. Friend proposes that in consideration of that reduction in the extent of the liability there should be an increase of time during which the Guarantee Fund should remain. So far as that goes I think there is a prima facie reasonableness in what he proposes. I would point out that the right hon. Gentleman seems to have forgotten the arguments which he used in introducing his recent Amendment. Then the right hon. Gentleman stated that the guarantee deposit was to be reduced by one-half because two guarantors instead of one had been provided. But if there is to be equality in the contributions of the guarantors, there ought also to be equality in the period of liability.

(6.15.) MR. SEXTON: A guarantee, if it is a guarantee at all, ought to continue as long as the debt continues. Its true nature is defeated by providing that after the liability has been partly discharged the guarantee is to be partly withdrawn. The right hon. Gentleman has said that there will be no danger of casual default after 18 years, as the individual tenant will have become so much of an owner that he would not part with his holding unless absolutely compelled by stress of circumstances. Well, if there is no danger of the guarantee deposit being called upon, what can be the harm of accepting this Amendment? Why should the locality continue the guarantee? The right hon. Gentleman replies, because without that guarantee the British taxpayer will not be satisfied. But surely it should be as easy to convince the British taxpayer as it is to convince this House. Therefore, I ask him to place the two parties on an equal footing. If the British taxpayer is so dense as to think that an elaborate and irritating guarantee is necessary where no danger exists, then let him require the guarantee of the landlord to extend over the whole period of the transaction in a similar manner.

(6.17.) MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: I cannot agree altogether with the proposition that we have reduced the landlord's liability from one-fifth to one-tenth, for there may be cases in which the whole amount will be taken. The effect of extending the liability of the landlord in the manner suggested would be to take the one-fifth deposit guarantee. I wish to take this opportunity of putting a question to the Chief Secretary—namely, whether the interest to be paid to the landlord in respect of the one-fifth will remain 3 per cent. during the whole period, or will be reduced to $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. If it is to remain at 3 per cent. while the interest on Consols is $2\frac{1}{2}$, there will be a loss to the State of £15,000 a year, and I want to know whether that loss will fall on the Guarantee Fund or on the ratepayers? In 12 years there will be a reduction in the interest on Consols which will then stand at $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., so that the loss then will be not £15,000 a year, but £30,000. That, I think, is an important point.

*(6.20.) MR. KNOX: I beg, very shortly, to support the Amendment of my hon. Friend. I cannot understand on what principle the Chief Secretary is proceeding. He told us he wanted to establish an equality between the landlord and the Local Authority, and though equality is very often not fairness still it has a sound of fairness, and hon. Members opposite, presumably, voted for the principle of equality. My hon. Friend now proposes to apply that principle here. He proposes that just as the guarantee of a Local Authority continues during the whole period of the purchaser's annuity, so should the guarantee of the landlord. There could be nothing more equal. I do not say there could be nothing more fair. It would have been more fair if the landlord's liability had been made to stand as it does under the Ashbourne Act; but if there is to be a change, surely nothing could be more fair than the proposal of my hon. Friend. The right hon. Gentleman opposite has said that experience of the Ashbourne Act shows that there is no need for a longer guarantee than 18 years. That is, to say the least of it, counting the chickens of the Government before they are hatched. We have not yet had 18 years' experience of the Ashbourne Acts, but there have been sales and purchases of glebe lands more than 18 years ago, and it would be well that the Government should look to the case of these purchasers who have found such difficulty in paying their instalments, and not to that of the men who have bought under the Ashbourne Acts. I think it much more likely that the risk would be apparent after 18 years than before. After 18 years there might be such a fall in prices that the tenant would not be able to pay, for though an astute farmer might very accurately forecast the course of events for 18 years, he would have to be a very astute man indeed to forecast them for 49 years. Such a farmer might be accurate in his calculations in regard to the first 18 years; but at some subsequent period, owing to unforeseen circumstances, he might find himself in such a position that it would be impossible for him to pay his instalments. It has been said that the only risk of default is that there may be a general conspiracy. But I undertake to say that no public man in Ireland would be able to bring about a default except as the consequence of a great fall in prices, and that is more likely to occur after the 18 years are up than before. Therefore, I say that the landlord's guarantee should remain after the 18 years. The Chief Secretary knows that the glebe purchasers have in many cases had to be relieved of their bargains. In many cases they would have been bankrupt, if it had not been for the slight measure of relief—I think an insufficient measure, but still, a measure of relief—which was given to them. All experience shows that it is only after a considerable number of years that the real risks will become apparent, therefore, we ask that the landlord shall leave his guarantee deposit with the State so that he should be ready to meet these risks. The hon. Member for West-Belfast has shown that it is impossible for the whole of the landlords' guarantee deposit to be appropriated within the 18 years. If there is any use at all in having this one-fifth guarantee, it ought to be left for a longer period than 18 years. I beg, therefore, to support the Amendment.

(6.26.) MR. LABOUCHERE: The fallacy that underlies the argument of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary, has been abundantly disclosed in the observations of the hon. Member for Cavan. The right hon. Gentleman seems to consider that past, present, and future are entirely in his hands to deal with as he likes. The basis of the right hon. Gentleman's argument is that in 18 years one-fifth of the purchase price will be paid, and consequently that no owner will be willing to give up his property because he will lose by doing so, as the property will be worth more than four-fifths of its present value. But suppose the Bill had been brought in 18 years ago. Land has depreciated more than one-fifth both in England and Ireland during that period, and why what has occurred during the past 18 years should not occur again during the next 18 years I cannot understand. We only have the assurance of the right hon. Gentleman, as though he were a species of divinity, and could impress his own whim and wishes on the future. It is possible that land will fall in value in the future; but we are told that in 18 years' time we may safely relieve the landlords from their obligation, because we shall have sufficient guarantee in the case of a fall in value in the Local Authority. But while I wish to protect the British taxpayer as much as possible, I object to any Government taking property that does not belong to them and giving it as a guarantee. That is what the Government does when it takes the rates of the localities, and calmly tells the British taxpayer that without the consent of those localities, those rates are to be rendered liable for an advance made by the Government. For my own part, I shall be glad to sweep away every species of obligation that is thrown upon the rates, because I do not see that any one has the right to pledge the rates, unless it is the locality itself.

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order!

MR. LABOUCHERE: I am sorry if I am wandering from the point, but the Chief Secretary introduces so many matters into these Debates, that one becomes irrelevant in trying to correct him. I hope he will keep in order and will not make these reckless statements for the future. I am prepared to release the ratepayer from any species of liability with regard to this.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: Will the Chief Secretary answer my question?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I would refer the right hon. Gentleman to the last sub-section of Clause 7.

Ayes 135; Noes 218. — (Div. List, No. 147.)

(6.47.) MR. SEXTON: Sub-section 4, at which we have now arrived, provides for moneys being taken for default in payment of the annuities, and for other purposes, from the Sinking Fund. Ordinarily, only the Guarantee Fund will be used. But, suppose you get £70 on a farm, and you have a deferred annuity of £10, you cannot come upon the Guarantee Fund, and such a payment, when made, would come under the sub-section. I propose in page 2, line 39, after the words, "or holding," to insert the words, "or from the guaranteed deposit."

Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 39, after the words "or holding," to insert the words "or from the guaranteed deposit."—(Mr. Sexton.)

(6.48.) MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I conceive the Guarantee Fund would be liable to the full amount of any deficiency that may arise, subject, of course, to its being shared by the Local Authority.

*(6.49.) MR. KNOX: I venture to think this would meet the case. Suppose you had a holding subject to an annuity of £4, and a few years after the agreement the tenant goes into default. The Land Commission could then take possession, and try to sell, subject to the annuity of £4. If they find themselves unable to do so, they will try to realise the property in the best way they can. The best course would be to sell the holding subject to a reduced annuity. There will be a good deal of loss which, though it will become apparent, will not actually accrue until the period of 18 years has elapsed; and the precise assurance I wish to get from the Government is whether the landlords, as much as the Local Authority, will bear the loss during the whole period of 49 years?

Mr. Labouchere

LONDON COUNTY COUNCIL—PROPOSED NEW STANDING ORDERS.

*(12.25.) THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. RITCHIE, Tower Hamlets, St. George's), in rising to move certain proposed New Standing Orders relating to Bills introduced by the London County Council, said: I do not think it necessary to enter at any length into the circumstances which have led to the introduction of an annual Money Bill dealing with the finance of London. It is sufficient for me to say that for many years past it has been a duty which has been undertaken by the Government; but there has been a growing dissatisfaction in all quarters of the House with the existing practice, and one which has found expression on more than one occasion. The objection may be stated in a very few words. Hitherto it has been impossible to introduce a Bill at a period of the Session when a proper discussion could take place on the Second Reading, and there is this additional objection, that, so far as the details are concerned, no one in the House could give a satisfactory explanation in Committee, with the result that there has been no real examination at all. It is an entire misapprehension to suppose that the Government have any wish to take upon themselves a controlling influence. Undoubtedly there is a certain amount of responsibility, but the Government do not think that they are under any obligation or duty to assume that responsibility. As a matter of fact, there has never been any real examination as to the amounts inserted in the annual Money Bill, and the present proposal is that the disability which prevents the London County Council from introducing this Bill should be removed. The effect of the proposal is to require that the Bill, so far as the principles involved in it and the general system of finance of the London County Council are concerned, shall be introduced at a time of the day and at a period of the Session when Members, who are desirous of expressing their views, shall have an opportunity of doing so. Like every other Local Body in the country, the London County Council, when promoting a Bill in Parliament, will have power to insert in the Bill the finance that will be necessary for carrying out the purposes of the Bill, and they will go before a Select Committee in the same way as other Municipal Bodies promoting special Bills for special works. With regard to the general Money Bill, the Council will, so far as they are able, produce before a Committee the estimates and such plans and details as are desirable, and in every case the power to raise the money will be conferred by a Committee. So far as that point is concerned, there will be no further supervision on the part of a Government Department. It is possible that in some instances the powers conferred may not be exercised at once, and that it may be desirable to hold them over until a later period, and in that case the Council will be in the same position as the promoters of any other Private Bill. In the event of the money asked for being insufficient the Local Government Board will, as, in the case of other Local Authorities, decide by a Provisional Order whether extended powers shall be conferred. The London County Council are under some apprehension that they may be placed in a difficulty in regard to the money they may require to raise under the sanction of the Local Government Board. I think they very much exaggerate the difficulty, and that it is not likely to arise. So far as the expenditure is paid out of the rates of London, the Local Government Board will have no power whatever; they will only come in when it is proposed to raise money by borrowing. The Council say that it will be inconvenient to come to the Local Government Board constantly in regard to small sums of money which they may desire to spend. Now, I do not think that such a course would be convenient either to them or to the Local Government Board; and, therefore, it is proposed that the Council may put in an estimate three months ahead of the amount they are likely to require; and when the necessity arises, I do not think the slightest impediment will be placed in their way if they desire to borrow money. The finance of a great city such as London is a most important matter. It is more the finance of a province than of a town, and I do not think the House of Commons would willingly part with the power of reviewing the finance of London once, at any rate, in the year. It is further proposed that when the County Council obtain power to raise money for the prosecution of a great work they shall specify in their annual financial statement the amount they propose to raise within the year, although that is not an obligation imposed upon other Local Authorities. But having regard to the obligations and liabilities of a great city such as London, and the amount of money which the Council are required to raise annually, it is quite clear that their annual statement would not be complete unless all the amounts proposed to be raised in the course of the year are fully set out. We do not propose that the Committee to which their Bill shall be referred shall have power to deal with those sums, which may have been already sanctioned by the House of Commons, unless there is a special Instruction from the House itself, and the Council will, therefore, be sufficiently safeguarded in that respect. I may add that this alteration of the Standing Orders is a matter which has been fully discussed by the Chairmen of Committees, of both Houses, and that it meets with their entire approval.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That all Bills promoted by the London County Council, containing power to raise money, shall be introduced as Public Bills; but after being read a second time by the House shall be referred to a Select Committee to be nominated by the Committee of Selection in like manner as Private Bills;

But this Order shall not apply to a Bill promoted by the London County Council for the borrowing of money, which complies with the following conditions:

- (1.) If it authorises the borrowing and expenditure for the purposes mentioned in the Bill of the sum shown by the estimates recited in the preamble to be required for each such purpose, that purpose being the execution of a power conferred or extended either by the Bill, or by some public, local, or personal Act;

Provided that the Bill may authorise the borrowing and expenditure for any purpose not mentioned in the Bill or for any purpose for which estimates are not recited in the preamble, if it fixes a maximum aggregate sum to be so borrowed, and requires every such borrowing to be sanctioned by the Local Government Board;

Mr. Ritchie

- (2.) If it is so framed as not to authorise the borrowing and expenditure of any money after the financial period, that is to say, the period ending on the 30th day of September next after the expiration of the then current financial year of the Council;

- (3.) If it is so framed as to provide for the money borrowed being repaid, whether by the creation of a sinking fund, or the redemption of stock, or otherwise, within such period not exceeding sixty years, as the Committee on the Bill, or if the borrowing is sanctioned by the Local Government Board, that Board may consider proper, having regard to the objects for which the money is to be borrowed;

- (4.) If in the case of any Bill conferring or extending any power involving the expenditure of money after the financial period, the recited estimates show the total amount of money required for the execution of the power as well as the particular amount to be borrowed and expended during the financial period."—
(Mr. Ritchie)

* (12.35.) SIR J. LUBBOCK (London University): I have seen a statement that this Standing Order has been brought forward to-day at the request of the County Council of London. No doubt it was postponed until to-day at the request of the Council, not because they were anxious that it should be brought forward to-day, but simply because it had been fixed for a day on which the Council themselves met. At the present moment they would much prefer that it should be dropped altogether. In rising to move my Amendment I am placed at a considerable disadvantage. If this were an Act of Parliament I could move that the consideration of the matter should be postponed. Again, if this had been the clause of a Bill, it would have been open for me to move Amendments; and if I had been unable to carry such Amendments I should have been able, at the close of the discussion, to move the omission of the clause altogether. So far as the present Motion is concerned, I imagine that I should be out of order in moving that the consideration of these Standing Orders be postponed for this Session, and, therefore, the Council are at this disadvantage: that they are unable to place on the Paper an Amendment which will really carry out the object they have in view. I propose, therefore, to move the omission of the first four lines of Standing Order CXCIV., not that I have any objection to those four lines, but simply as a mode of taking the sense of the House on the subject as a whole. Her Majesty's Government and the House have always objected, and I think reasonably, to any alteration of a Public Act by a Private Act, and still more ought this to be the case when it is a question of alteration by a Standing Order. In the first place, the London County Council will be placed in this difficulty: we are to remain under the Public Act, by which our proceedings are still to be regulated, as far as the other House of Parliament is concerned, but we shall be under the Standing Order as far as the proceedings in this House are concerned. In addition to this, our objections to the Standing Order are two-fold. In the first place, if the obligation to introduce an annual Bill is to be imposed on London, we think it only reasonable to ask the Government to continue to introduce the London County Council Money Bill in the future as they have done in the past. Secondly, we desire to continue our present relations with the Treasury. My right hon. Friend says it is desirable that there should be more control over the finances of the Council than there has been in the past; but I submit that if it is to rest with us to introduce a Money Bill instead of the Treasury, there will, in point of fact, be less control over Metropolitan finance than it has now. It must not be forgotten that at this moment there is this safeguard: that the Money Bill is fully examined by the officials of the Treasury. My right hon. Friend intimated that the examination by the Treasury is very perfunctory and unsatisfactory. We do not think so. I regret that the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the Financial Secretary to the Treasury are not present; but I do not think if they were that they would refuse to fulfil the duties imposed on them. But, at any rate, it will be certainly done away with by this proposal. Therefore, as far as the London County Council finance is concerned, the introduction of a Money Bill by the Government is a security which these Standing Orders will take away. Of course the question may be asked, Why should the Government introduce a Money Bill for the London County Council when they do not undertake the same duty for other Municipalities? My right hon. Friend gave the answer himself, because he said that the financial dealings of London are on a much greater scale. That has always been the feeling of the House. Both the Metropolitan Board of Works and the London County Council have been told, "Your financial transactions are on so large a scale that we impose on you obligations which are not imposed on any other Municipality, so that Parliament may have an opportunity of examining your finances annually." Surely, then, that is a reason why the Government themselves should undertake the bringing in of a Bill, because a Private Member, introducing such a Bill, would be under a very great disadvantage. I have the advantage of being assisted by colleagues in the Council who are seated on both sides of the House. But it is possible that hereafter the Chairman and Members of the Council may find their duties of so onerous a nature as to be incompatible with the retention of a seat in this House. I need scarcely say that the Council would be placed at a great disadvantage if they were without representation in this House, and yet were required to bring forward annually a Money Bill. Then, again, there is the question of expense. If the House imposes on us the duty of bringing in a Bill every year, it is obvious that it must be brought in as a Private Bill. If that is so, I think we ought to be relieved of the payment of fees. The Bill would not be introduced of our own motion, but as a duty imposed on us by Parliament, and we may, therefore, fairly ask to be relieved from the payment of fees. That, however, is, a small part of the additional expense which may be thrown on us. Under this Standing Order we shall have imposed on us not only the fees, but the duty of producing witnesses and employing counsel. I know that, my right hon. Friend does not wish to impose on us expenditure of that kind, but it certainly will happen that there will occasionally be an Instruction from the House, which will necessitate our doing so. Let me take the case of the Blackwall Tunnel. Liverpool or Manchester when they had once obtained power to make a tunnel would be under no obligation to come to Parliament again. But the London County Council have to come to Parliament every year, and what the result may be it is impossible to foretell. We may have incurred heavy expense, and then Parliament may change its mind. This is no imaginary case. Last year we introduced a Bill dealing with over-head wires; and because we adopted a clause which had been recommended by two Committees of the House the measure was thrown out. Again, with all respect to the Local Government Board, we propose, so far as our finances are concerned, to remain in relation with the Treasury. We believe that it has a favourable influence on the price of our Stock. I do not mean to say that this alteration in the policy of the Government will materially affect the value of Metropolitan Stock; but, at the same time, I think there is some advantage in the knowledge the public possess, that our Money Bills are examined and introduced by the Treasury. That is an advantage which will be taken away from us by the acceptance of this Standing Order. We think that if time were given we should be able to come to satisfactory terms with Her Majesty's Government. The proposal of the right hon. Gentleman deals with a number of very intricate questions, and surely it is not unreasonable that we should ask for a little more time for consideration. The Standing Order says—

"Provided that the Bill may authorise the borrowing and expenditure for any purpose not mentioned in the Bill or for any purpose for which estimates are not recited in the preamble, if it fixes a maximum aggregate sum to be so borrowed, and requires every such borrowing to be sanctioned by the Local Government Board."

I have no doubt that this is capable of explanation; but, at the first blush, it is not easy to understand. Standing Order CXIV. (b) says—

"A Bill complying with the conditions specified in Standing Order CXIV., if it contains no powers or provisions except in relation to the borrowing and expenditure of money for specific and general purposes and consequential thereupon, or in relation to the Consolidated Loans Fund or to borrowing by the council, shall be subject to the following requirement, that is to say:—

The petition for the Bill, with the declaration and printed copy of the Bill annexed, shall be deposited in the Private Bill Office on or before the 14th day of April, or the first day on which the House shall re-assemble after the Easter Recess, whichever shall be the later, instead of the 21st day of December in the previous year."

Sir J. Lubbock

That, of course, is impossible this year, seeing that we have already reached the 22nd of April. There is a considerable difference of opinion among my colleagues and those who are best able to judge as to what the Local Government Board would feel to be their duty under this Standing Order. The matter was brought before the Council last week; and a resolution was unanimously passed, not only with the support of Lord Lingen, Sir Thomas Farrar, my hon. Friend the Member for St. Pancras (Mr. H. Lawson), and others of great experience, but also with the support of the Conservative members of the Council, asking the Government to give further time for the consideration of the question, so that a satisfactory solution may, if possible, be arrived at. What, let me ask, would be the practical inconvenience of allowing matters to remain as they are for another year? My right hon. Friend has made no complaint of the finance of the London County Council. It can easily be shown that they are even more strict in regard to borrowing and the payment of loans than their predecessors, and I hope they will continue to be so. No complaint, however, is made, and no inconvenience has been alleged to result from the present system. The right hon. Gentleman says that this change has been pressed on him by hon. Members in this House. Where are they? Where is my right hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton (Mr. H. H. Fowler), who is said to be strongly in favour of the change? I cannot think that he would have been absent if he felt so strongly in the matter. For my own part, I think the Government would meet the views of the House generally if they would consent to postpone the matter for another year. I appeal to my right hon. Friend not to resist so unanimous, and I must add so reasonable, a request on behalf of the London County Council. I beg to move the omission of the first four lines of the Standing Order.

*MR. SPEAKER: The right hon. Gentleman has referred to a representation which he made to me in regard to the Amendment he desired to move. I understand the right hon. Gentleman to say that he could not move the postponement of the consideration of the Standing Order because I had ruled that such a course would be out of order. What I pointed out was that an Amendment to omit the first four lines of the Standing Order would be sufficient, and that an issue might be fairly raised upon such an Amendment, whereas a Motion for Adjournment must confine the Debate to the Question of Adjournment. I did not mean to say that the postponement of the consideration of the Standing Order could not be moved, or that at any time the Motion could not be made for the Adjournment of the Debate.

*SIR J. LUBBOCK: What I understood you to say, Sir, was that if I moved the Adjournment of the Debate, I should only be able to give reasons in support of that Motion, without being able to enter into the merits of the question.

*MR. SPEAKER: That was so.

*SIR J. LUBBOCK: Then I will move to omit the first four lines.

*(12.57.) MR. H. LAWSON (St. Pancras, W.): I am sorry to find that the right hon. Gentleman opposite has not been able to come to some arrangement with a man so eminently reasonable as my right hon. Friend the Member for the University of London (Sir J. Lubbock). The Standing Order now before the House is merely a measure for the aggrandisement of the Local Government Board. It gives to the right hon. Gentleman the power of going into an area of Local Government which has hitherto been beyond his control. We all know that he is a man of conspicuous ability, and that he has administered his Department most admirably; but I do not think he can have considered the immense amount of labour which would be forced upon him and the Department by the new arrangement he proposes to make. He says it is not intended that the Local Government Board should go minutely into every item of expenditure; but the Standing Order provides that the Board is to make a Report to a Committee which is to sit upstairs to examine every Bill, and what will that Report be worth if the right hon. Gentleman does not go into these matters one by one? I fancy that the right hon. Gentleman will find that it will be necessary to have a good many interviews with the Chairman and Deputy Chairman of the London County Council and the Chairman of the Finance Committee—probably many more than he contemplates.

If the supervision of the Local Government Board is to be a reality, it will be as necessary to go into all the items of expenditure as is now the case in regard to the proposals of provincial towns. There is another curious point in connection with this new Standing Order which, I think, shows that sufficient consideration has not been bestowed upon it. The right hon. Gentleman asks the London County Council to do what at present no locality has power to do, namely, to introduce a Bill under a Standing Order. I believe that it is necessary that every Bill introduced by the County Council should show a clause for the improvement of the Metropolis, and therefore this is necessary, under statutory provisions, before it can go to a Committee upstairs. As the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Ritchie) very well knows, in the Debate on the Local Government Bill of 1888, he refused to give any general power of promoting or introducing Bills to the London County Council, or to any other County Council. I should like him, therefore, to explain how he proposes that the London County Council shall get out of the difficulty of being forced to introduce a Bill the expenses of which they have no power to defray. He says the question of fees is unimportant. I do not know whether he is aware that one provision in this Standing Order is likely to inflict upon us very large expenses by way of fees in both Houses. The Bills are only to authorise work for 12 months, and the agent says that the Council will be liable for the payment of House fees in both Houses, and that in this respect it will be placed at a disadvantage as compared with Municipal Corporations. It seems to me an unfair thing to force this expenditure on the Council at a time when the ratepayers are labouring under such heavy burdens. It is also rather a strange thing to vary a Public Act, approved by both Houses, by a Standing Order in the way now proposed. The right hon. Gentleman says the Government will be relieved from the responsibility of defending measures in the drafting of which they have had no hand. The right hon. Gentleman knows that every Bill introduced by the London County Council has been the subject of public discussion in this House. I should like to ask whether it will fall on the Financial Secretary to have to defend the Council's Money Bills in the absence of members of the Council, or will the right hon. Gentleman have to do so?

*MR. RITCHIE: Certainly not.

*MR. LAWSON: Then I should like to know who will defend the Bills under such circumstances. The details are likely to be just as much discussed whether the Bills are introduced as private or as public measures. The London County Council are quite willing to be placed on an equality with the Corporations of towns; but the right hon. Gentleman proposes nothing of the kind, as that would involve the abolition of a Money Bill altogether. The right hon. Gentleman says the circumstances are vitally different. I say that, as we are forced to present our Budget to Parliament, it should not be made additionally expensive by forcing us to defend our proposals year by year against, say, the City Corporation or other Local Bodies.

(1.4.) MR. J. STUART (Shoreditch, Hoxton): I am very much surprised that no Member representing the Treasury should have been present to take part in this Debate. There can be no doubt that the few words thrown out by the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board (Mr. Ritchie) were in some degree a hint that the Treasury had performed its duties in what must be styled a perfunctory manner. I would very strongly urge upon the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board and the Government the postponement of this question for a little time longer. The County Council has unanimously expressed that view; and when it is remembered that there are in the County Council Members who sit on that side of the House, as well as on this side, I think it is a matter of importance that the Representatives of what the right hon. Gentleman has himself called a province rather than a city should have some attention paid to their views. This question has been a very short time before the London County Council and before the Members of this House. The Amendments proposed by the Local Government Board are of a highly technical character, and it is impossible for anyone who is not versed in the technicalities of Standing Orders relating to Money Bills to understand their meaning. I would most strongly urge the Government to let this matter stand over till next year. No very serious difficulty is likely to arise in the meantime. There is no matter of great conflict respecting the borrowing powers of the London County Council or the expenditure of borrowed money, and if the question is postponed no one will suffer. If the proposals of the right hon. Gentleman are pushed to a Division to-day, a number of Members will come in when the Division bells ring and vote as the Whips tell them, without hearing the arguments we bring forward. This is one of the, perhaps, necessary misfortunes of considering a question of this kind at the time of Private Business. The County Council is not unwilling to have this matter considered, and desires that its borrowing proposals should be well ventilated in this House and before any Committee of this House. If there is any alteration of procedure which would secure the more efficient examination of the proposals of the Council, we are perfectly prepared to give our support to the carrying out of such a change. But it will be observed that in the changes proposed by the right hon. Gentleman there are not only alterations with respect to the power of consideration by this House of the borrowing powers of the London County Council, but there are also very considerable changes in the manner in which those borrowing powers are to be considered departmentally. It is proposed to substitute a minute control of details for a control of general amounts. There will be such an inquiry by the Local Government Board as will amount to the placing of the judgment of the Local Government Board in respect of the details of the sums borrowed between the County Council and the ratepayers.

*MR. RITCHIE: I say that that is the case with regard to every Corporation in the Kingdom.

MR. J. STUART: Yes; but the right hon. Gentleman is ignoring the fact that we have to come annually before the House of Commons in this matter, whilst the other Local Authorities have not; and he is also ignoring the fact that he drew this distinction himself between London and the rest of the country, that London is a province and the Representatives of London in the County Council may be safely trusted to look after details in the interests of the ratepayers. If the right hon. Gentleman founds his argument on this, that he wishes to treat the London County Council precisely in the same manner as Municipal Bodies in the country, let him give the London County Council the powers they are entitled to. We have over and over again protested that we have not got the powers which the smallest Urban Sanitary Authority possesses. As to the supervision of the Local Government Board, I want to know what more supervision they want than they have at present. They can have a complete audit of our accounts, and it is in the power of their Auditor to bring under the notice of the Local Government Board that items have been erroneously charged to capital which ought to have been put in the annual accounts. They have, in fact, as complete a supervision as can be required over the dealings of the County Council with its borrowed money. I can see nothing in the right hon. Gentleman's present proposals which is for the advantage of the public, or of the ratepayers, or of the County Council. It seems to me that if these proposals are adopted the hands of the County Council will be fettered, its responsibility will be diminished, and its good action probably interfered with, whilst the Local Government Board will be overloaded with a multitude of details over which it can exercise no supervision. Does the right hon. Gentleman know that last year there were over 200 cases of borrowing in the County Council for different purposes, besides various cases of re-lending? These are things which the County Council is the fittest body to consider; and if the Local Government Board have to consider them, it will mean getting a new staff of officers, who will be irresponsible to the ratepayers of London. This is a concession to I know not whom. The right hon. Gentleman says it has been represented that more supervision is needed over the borrowing powers of the County Council—

*MR. RITCHIE: No; what I said was that it was the opinion in many quarters of the House that the mode in which the London Finance Bill was introduced and the general arrangements with regard to London finance did not carry with them a fitting opportunity for review or proper criticism.

MR. J. STUART: If those views have been expressed, all I say is that the London County Council has no objection to the criticism, but that a series of Standing Orders embodying such vital changes as those proffered to-day by the right hon. Gentleman go far beyond the necessities of the case, and introduce entanglements and difficulties which we have endeavoured to some extent to expose, but which it would require a minute examination in Committee to bring out to the full extent. In view of the immense importance of the case, I beg the right hon. Gentleman not to force the House to vote in ignorance on this matter, but to postpone the whole subject until next year.

(1.21.) MR. COURTNEY (Cornwall, Bodmin): The right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of London has approached this question in anything but a combative spirit. He recognised the many difficulties involved in it and the necessity to some extent of taking action, and he gave expression also to the vague feeling of distrust felt, I think, by many of his colleagues on the London County Council with respect to the proposed change. He pleaded for some more time for the consideration of the changes that are about to be made. I think he was ready to submit to the House the question whether any change at all was desirable. The Metropolitan Board of Works and the London County Council had, in his opinion, gone on very satisfactorily with the Treasury in charge of their Money Bills. I do not know what the present Members of the Treasury may say. I was in the Department for some time myself, and I know that then the feeling of the officials and the persons responsible there was one of extreme dislike to the labours thrown upon them in connection with London finance. We were made responsible, after a very unsatisfactory examination, for the conduct of the Bills in this House. It was always felt, therefore, that some change should be made, and I certainly approve the proposed transfer of the Bills of the Council, referring to the raising of particular sums of money for particular works, from the Treasury to the Local Government Board. Such questions come rather within the province of the Local Government Board than within that of the Treasury, and the Local Government Board are better able to deal with them. I do not think there is any force in the objection that the stability of Metropolitan Stock will be affected by the change. The right hon. Gentleman then urged that if these proposals were carried, Bills of the London County Council would cease to be Government Bills, but I think there is not much force in this objection. The fact is that the Government Bill is an anomaly. No other municipality in the country has its Bills brought in by the Government, and it is certainly anomalous that the Government should be in any way responsible for the Bills promoted by the London County Council. It may be said that there may be times when the London County Council may not be represented in this House, and when its chairman may not be a Member. I think it extremely improbable that it will ever be the case that no responsible member of the London County Council will be a Member of this House. But, after all, the same thing would apply to Liverpool and Manchester, the different divisions of which are always represented in this House.

*SIR J. LUBBOCK: May I point out that no obligation is imposed on Liverpool and Manchester to introduce an annual Bill.

MR. COURTNEY: Well, it is urged that the annual introduction of their Bill to Parliament will subject the Council to a responsibility and an inconvenience which are not imposed on other County Councils, and that in other cases the Councils have the control of works undertaken by them, after those works are once authorised, whereas opportunity would be annually given to Members of this House to raise the whole question of such works again and again. But it must be borne in mind on this point that an express Instruction must be obtained from the House before such a course can be taken, and I think it extremely improbable that such an Instruction will be granted. Then we come to the question—no doubt a grave question—that at present the London County Council is almost unanimously against going on with these proposals. I do not think it would be very easy for the Government to make any considerable change against the unanimous wish of the County Council. It must be remembered that the County Council is a new body, taking over the functions of the Metropolitan Board of Works. The London County Council has been regarded in certain quarters with a vague jealousy that has been returned by the County Council, which, because new, is perhaps a little super-sensitive to criticism. With the view to that body giving further consideration to the proposal, I propose a postponement, but I do not regard as reasonable the demand for a postponement of 12 months, and I suggest that a postponement of six weeks or two months may serve to bring both the Government and the County Council to an agreement in an amicable way.

*(1.35.) MR. RITCHIE: The views of the Chairman of Ways and Means are always entitled to receive careful consideration. I am sorry that the County Council has taken up such a position with reference to this question, and I do not think that there is any real ground for some of the arguments which have been used by several of the previous speakers. I have taken the greatest trouble to reconcile the conflicting views of certain officials of the London County Council and the views entertained by Her Majesty's Government. When this Standing Order was put on the Paper it was placed there by me in the belief that it had received the sanction and approval of those official members of the London County Council with whom I had been in personal communication. In those circumstances I believed that the proposed Standing Order met the views of those gentlemen. I cannot concur with the Chairman of Ways and Means in what I believe will be the result of postponement, because I think it is evident that the views expressed with reference to this matter are not so much a question of degree as of principle. The views expressed by Members of the London County Council are against any change whatever, and it is not seen why the annual Bill should not be taken charge of by the Government. That is a responsibility, however, which the Government decline to take. We will not undertake to fulfil a duty which it is not possible for us adequately to discharge, and whatever may be the result, supposing a postponement be agreed to, the London County Council must understand that the Government cannot be responsible for bringing forward or for defending proposals of this nature, any more than they can assent to attend to the finances of Birmingham, Liverpool, and other large cities. I can quote from a Treasury Minute to show that their function is not close criticism of financial proposals, but only to secure that the House of Commons has possession of full information about the financial position. Hon. Members appear to think that because the members of the London County Council are elected on a liberal franchise they ought to be placed above criticism in the matter of finance. It is also said that the ratepayers are the persons who have to express their views on the point, and that there is no reason why the Local Government Board should come between them. But the Local Government Board comes between the elective body and their finance in every other town in the Kingdom. It is not the ratepayers of the present time that require to be guarded; it is the ratepayers of the future that require to be protected. The ratepayers of the present day are not perhaps the best tribunal to decide as to how much of the cost of works should be borne by the present body of ratepayers and how much by the future; and this is one of the main reasons why close criticism is insisted upon by the House of Commons. The course which the Government propose to pursue is to postpone the further consideration of this matter. I will not at present pretend to fix a day for the resumption of the discussion, but I propose to put it down for an early day in the hope that we may be able to fix some reasonable date on which the question may be again taken up and a decision come to. I move the adjournment of the Debate.

*(1.40.) EARL COMPTON (York, W.R., Barnsley): On behalf of the London County Council, I thank the right hon. Gentleman for suggesting the postponement of this Debate. I do not agree with the Chairman of Committees that the London County Council is unduly susceptible; on the contrary, they are not averse to any changes, but they have only had a short time to consider the present proposal, and they have good reasons for objecting to the form of that proposal.

*(1.43.) THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster): The best possible course to take under the circumstances will be that both the Amendment and the Motion itself should be withdrawn; the consideration of the Standing Orders could then be put down for a future day. It will be all the more convenient if the House is able to consider the question in the light of the present Debate, but if it were merely an adjournment of the Debate the right hon. Gentlemen the President of the County Council and the President of the Local Government Board would not be able to speak. I beg to ask leave to withdraw the Motion.

SIR J. LUBBOCK: I am quite ready to withdraw my Amendment, and accept the suggestion of the right hon. Gentleman.

MR. SPEAKER: The Amendment has not been put, and therefore the House is in no difficulty about its withdrawal.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

STANDING COMMITTEES (CHAIRMEN'S PANEL).

Mr. Osborne Morgan reported from the Chairmen's Panel: That they had appointed Mr. Salt to act as Chairman of the Standing Committee on Law, and Courts of Justice, and Legal Procedure in the place of Mr. Campbell Bannerman.

Report to lie upon the Table.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

PLACES OF WORSHIP ENFRANCHISEMENT BILL.—(No. 8.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

(1.50.) MR. S. T. EVANS (Glamorgan, Mid): In moving the Second Reading of this Bill, it will not be necessary to detain the House at any great length in explaining it. All the members of a very strong Committee in 1889 joined in recommending the principle of the Bill, which does not propose to transfer any part of the property of one private owner to another private owner, but only to enable the trustees of religious bodies, on paying fair compensation, to become the owners of their places of worship. The Bill is not limited to any sect; it applies to all denominations, including the Church of England. I believe the Church of England take care not to erect any churches or chapels on ground that is not freehold, but it is impossible for Nonconformists in many places to acquire freeholds at all. It is beyond doubt that the places of worship of Nonconformists have in many parts of the country been erected on very short leases. On Lord Penrhyn's estate 20 chapels have been built at a cost of £45,000 upon a 30 years' lease. Is it reasonable that on the expiry of such a lease the landlord should be able either to take away the buildings entirely or to raise the rent and impose any conditions he wishes upon the worshippers? The details of the Bill are as simple as the principle, and if the House should accept the principle I hope we shall not have any minute discussion of the details on this occasion, because after the Second Reading the Bill may be referred to a Select Committee or to the Standing Committee on Law. The first thing to be done if the Bill become law is to give notice to the immediate owner that the trustees are desirous of purchasing the fee simple, and require him to say what other persons are beneficially interested. Within 21 days after the service of such notice the lessor or owner has to furnish the particulars required and to state the amount of the purchase money he claims. If there should be any difficulty in agreeing as to that sum, it is proposed that the County Court of the district, which has already the machinery for the purpose, shall say what the amount of compensation should be. Then it will be in the power of the trustees to pay the money into Court, and the trustees will be entitled to receive from the Judge a certificate which would convey the fee simple to them. It has been made abundantly manifest to the Town Holdings Committee that there is a widespread desire for some such measure as this. The Committee affirm that it is most desirable that all religious bodies should be able to obtain a secure tenure of their places of worship and schools. The unanimous recommendation of the Committee was in that sense. I have not heard what course the Government propose to adopt with reference to this Bill, but I hope that after the unanimous recommendation of a Committee, the majority of whose Members belonged to the Tory Party, they will on this question allow their supporters a free hand. The Bill does not propose to inflict injury on any one. Let us inquire for a moment into the position of the landlord. A chapel or school is built upon his land: he gets the ground rent. What good would it be to him to recover possession of the land? He would have to demolish the building which had cost £2,000, £3,000, or even £5,000, because it could not be used for other purposes. I do not think that any religious body would take over a building which another sect had been obliged by the action of the landlord to surrender. Therefore, I do not think the landlord would desire to re-take possession of his land. I hold that the law ought not to enable him to do so. After all, it is to the advantage of the landlord to have a place for religious worship built upon his property. It does not deteriorate from the respectability of the locality, it tends instead to promote good conduct on the part of the people. I say, therefore, that as the Bill inflicts injury on no one, and will remove a great practical disability under which religious bodies are now suffering, I hope the House will read the Bill a second time. It will, perhaps, be said that there have been very few cases of landlords who have taken advantage of their right to resume possession of the land. This I do not admit, but, even if it were true, there would be a case for this Bill, because religious bodies naturally desire to have an absolutely secure tenure, and to become absolute possessors of places which to them are sacred and full of touching recollections. I trust that the Government, even if they oppose the Bill themselves, will not influence their supporters against it.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
"That the Bill be now read a second time."

(2.5.) MR. H. BYRON REED (Bradford, E.): The hon. Gentleman who moved the Second Reading of this Bill urged that it would do away with a great injustice. In that I differ from him. I think I shall be able to show that the Bill is a bad Bill; bad in theory, bad in principle, bad in its inevitable effect, and bad in the machinery by which it proposes to work. In the first instance I should like to point out that the principle of the Bill, so far as it has any principle at all, is really an application to this House for State establishment and endowment of Nonconformist Bodies, and hon. Gentlemen will find some little difficulty in reconciling that position with the attitude which Nonconformists usually adopt. Whatever their intentions may be, this is simply an application to this House for the adoption of a measure which, if it becomes law, will give by force of Statute Law peculiar privileges and prerogatives to Nonconformist Bodies. If the matter ended here I, perhaps, as a strong advocate of the union of Church and State, would find no objection to the measure; indeed, I should be able to show that the Nonconformists are already in a legal sense established. But the Bill does a great deal more than affirm that principle. It brings very considerable hardship and disability to bear upon persons who are directly concerned in its provisions. I may just point out in passing that it is a somewhat singular circumstance that Nonconformists should apply for statutory powers for the acquisition of sites for edifices just at the time when the National Church of the Kingdom is asking this House to take from it the peculiar privileges which it at present possesses in that respect. There is a Bill now before the House which proposes to repeal those clauses of the Church Building Acts which give compulsory power to the Church of England to acquire sites for church building purposes. The Bill has been introduced in past Sessions, but it has never passed a Second Reading in consequence of the opposition of hon. Members opposite. The reason why from this side of the House the Bill is brought forward is because it has been proved and shown in Parliamentary Returns that in only one case, since the Church was given the power, has it found necessary to exercise it. Thus, while Churchmen are asking the State to take this special power away because they do not want it, hon. Gentlemen opposite, who are in close alliance with the Liberation Society, who profess a desire to see the absolute independence of religion from State patronage, and who teach that the State has no concern with religion, are demanding special privileges for their own denominations. I should like next to point out that the Bill of the hon. Member for Glamorganshire contains no definition of the words "religious body," words that occur in it several times. Nor does it propose any limitation of the measure to religious purposes. I wish that hon. Members opposite would favour the House with a definition of the words "religious body." Other bodies besides what I may term the orthodox Nonconformist religious assemblies might fairly claim to be religious bodies, and to come under the provisions of the Bill.

MR. S. T. EVANS: The phrase "religious body" has been used over and over again in Acts of Parliament; it is perfectly understood, and a definition is therefore unnecessary.

MR. H. BYRON REED: Hon. Gentlemen opposite may understand it, and the meaning may be generally understood in regard to ordinary matters. But this Bill marks what is a new departure. When the House is asked to pass a measure endowing Nonconformity at the expense of landowners, it has a right to know precisely what kind of Nonconformity the framers of the Bill contemplated. My next objection to the measure is that it contains no limitation of the uses to which the buildings to be acquired can be put. It will be possible for a religious denomination, after it has acquired possession of the site of a chapel, to sell it for the erection of secular buildings, or to sell the chapel itself. I could point to a number of cases, one of them not very far from the precincts of this House, in which Nonconformist places of worship have been thus sold. And why? Because the neighbourhoods in which they have been situated have become too poor to maintain them under the voluntary system, and they have been obliged to move to fresh fields and pastures new. Again, there is no provision in the Bill for the reversion of the land to the original owner in cases of that kind. I hold that the precedent set in the Elementary Education Act of 1870 in this respect ought to have been followed. That Act, whilst granting compulsory powers for the acquisition of sites for schools, provided for the reversion of the property to the original owner if a school building should cease to be used for the purpose for which it was erected. It is true that the Report of the Town Holdings Committee was in the direction stated by the hon. Member, but I think he is mistaken in saying that it was a unanimous Report. On that particular point I think there was a minority of two-fifths.

MR. J. ROWLANDS (Finsbury, E.): No, no; refer to the Report.

MR. H. BYRON REED: Of course I accept the correction. In the next place, I should like to point out that the Bill provides not merely for taking property held under lease, but property held under annual tenancies. What might happen under Clause 2 is this. The Salvation Army might hold its peculiar services in a hall held under an annual tenancy. This hall might be used at considerable profit for concerts, entertainments, and other week-day meetings, but under this Bill the Salvation Army would have a right to acquire it.

COLONEL NOLAN (Galway, N.): Nothing of the sort.

MR. H. BYRON REED: I am aware that I am taking an extreme case, but when this House is asked to strike a serious blow at the foundations on which the ownership of land and buildings is based, I think we are entitled to take extreme cases. I say the Salvation Army would be entitled in such a case, if this Bill became law, to serve a notice on a body or individual from whom they hired the hall, with a view to its compulsory purchase. Anything more subversive of the first principles of bargain between man and man I cannot conceive. In the next place, I hold that the tribunal which the hon. Gentleman by his Bill will bring into requisition for its working is a totally unfit tribunal. County Courts were never intended to discharge the duties which this Bill proposes to place upon them. I maintain that the tendency of legislation of past years has been wrong in putting extra work on these Courts. Their original purpose was to give a cheap, ready, and speedy tribunal for the settlement locally of unimportant cases; the Judge was to be a poor man's Judge, and it was never intended he should become a minor Judge of the High Court, or that cases should be put upon him which involved vast interests, such as might arise under this Bill. Finally, I should like to point out a possible effect of this Bill, which the hon. Member probably has not contemplated. I believe if this Bill becomes law, or if there is a prospect of its speedily becoming law, the owners of buildings who have the power to eject Nonconformist Bodies, may be trusted to put that power into operation; and in the future owners of buildings would be more than ever chary of entering into bargains for tenancies with Nonconformist Bodies; and, therefore, so far from promoting the object which the hon. Member has in view, this Bill would, in the long run, cause greater difficulties than have ever been experienced in obtaining sites for Nonconformist places of worship. On all these grounds—the absolute absence of definition of religious bodies, the confiscatory nature of the proposals, the unfair burdens cast on the County Courts, and the hopeless intricacy in which the provisions of the Bill are involved, I beg to move that this Bill be read a second time this day six months.

(2.21.) MR. TOMLINSON (Preston): I beg to second the Amendment.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question, to add the words "upon this day six months."—(Mr. Byron Reed.)

(2.40.) COLONEL NOLAN: I shall not notice, at any great length, the remarks of the hon. Member for Bradford (Mr. Byron Reed) because he seems to be rather jealous lest Nonconformists or Catholics or any other body should get the same privileges as are now enjoyed by the Church of England. [An hon. Member: No!] It was given in evidence before the Select Committee, of which I was a Member, that the power of enfranchisement was enjoyed by the Church of England. The hon. Member gave as an instance of what might occur under this Bill, the case of a music hall, the freehold of which might, he said, be compulsorily purchased because an occasional Salvation Army service was held there. I think that is a very bad case. Of course, if the Salvation Army conducts a religious service regularly in a building it ought to come under this Bill; but I think the promoters of the Bill would consent to have it made perfectly clear that any place which was only used occasionally for religious services would not be included in the provisions of the measure. In my opinion, a Bill of this kind is very much wanted. As far as the English case is concerned, I am only entitled to speak of it inasmuch as I was for a long time a Member of the Town Holdings Committee—a Committee which will, I think, have had the honour of examining more witnesses, costing more money to the country, and producing a larger number of Blue Books than any other body of the kind that has sat in this House. We have made several Reports. One of them was to the effect that the enfranchisement of the church and chapel buildings was very much needed, and specific mention was made of Wales, of Devonport, and of Sheffield. Sheffield is not very far from Bradford, and I think the hon. Member for Bradford ought not to have tried to prevent the Nonconformists of Sheffield obtaining this privilege. I have, however, risen chiefly because we have such a very strong case in Ireland on this subject. I am aware that at present Ireland is omitted from the Bill. The omission is a most unfortunate mistake, because I think that Irish Members have themselves had the honour of initiating Bills on this subject. I think the only faults to be found with the present measure are that no Irish Member's name is on the back of it, and that it does not extend to Ireland. However, even if the Bill cannot be made to apply to Ireland, it is important, from our point of view, that it should be passed, as we shall be able to quote it as a precedent. To show how important it is that the Bill should be extended to Ireland, I may say that evidence was given before the Town Holdings Committee to the effect that a Cathedral, which was said to have cost £30,000, but which I always understood had cost £60,000 or £70,000, was built on a plot of ground without any title except a lease. Fortunately, the owner of the land and his family were very good landlords; but for want of a title the whole thing has got into such a state of chaos that nobody likes to pay any rent in case it should go to the wrong person. It is very easy to understand how cases of this kind arise. It is extremely expensive, and used to be still more so, to get a bit of freehold land. The collateral descendant of the very same landlord who let the land for the Cathedral sold some land for a cemetery about 8 or 10 years ago, and a witness before the Committee said that no less than £300 went in law costs over the purchase of that piece of ground. Many a plot of leasehold land has been acquired for religious purposes because the clergyman was very glad to get a piece of land at all, and did not trouble to look into the title. A great many of the chapels in Ireland are built either on leasehold land or on land without any title at all. I would ask the House what is the use of letting a Town Holdings Committee sit for five years in succession if you are not going to take any notice of its Reports? On this point the Report of the Committee was, I believe, perfectly unanimous. [An hon. MEMBER: No!] Well, I do not know any Member of the Committee who differed from the Report or divided against it. I see one hon. Member opposite who was on the Committee, and I notice that he does not contradict me. In my opinion it will injure the Established Church very much if the present state of things is allowed to continue. The hon. Member for Bradford says the Church of England has not the privilege of enfranchisement.

MR. H. BYRON REED: I did not say we had not the right; I said we were willing to relinquish it.

COLONEL NOLAN: It must be borne in mind that whilst the buildings of the Church of England are almost universally on freehold land, the same cannot be said of the chapels of Nonconformists and Catholics. I know that in old times it was almost impossible to get a bit of freehold land for the purpose of building a Catholic chapel. In Ireland, the Church of England has inherited several plots of land in almost every parish; but the Catholics are not able to get freehold land, and the tenure of their places of worship is, therefore, subject to the whim of a capricious landlord, although I quite admit that it is very unlikely that they would be turned out of their chapels.

(257.) MR. RENTOUL (Down, E.): I wish to say a word in favour of this Bill, and I think the best course I can adopt is to acquaint the House with the position of a Nonconformist chapel with which I am myself acquainted. When it was built 30 years ago, in a populous district in Woolwich, the people could not get a site except in a back street, and upon the condition that they paid £13 a year for land that was worth about

£1 a year, and that at the end of 90 years the chapel should be handed over to the landlord in the highest state of repair it had been in during any period of its existence. The people had to lay out £2,000 in obtaining a foundation, and they then built their church at a cost of £8,000. They have since spent a large amount of money — perhaps foolishly — in putting stained glass windows and so on into the church. At the end of 60 years the building must be handed over to the landlord. He, and his predecessors, will have received for 90 years a rent much in excess of what he could have got from anybody else, and at the end of the period he will obtain a property worth £10,000. I just mention these circumstances, because this is the only church of which I have been a member in this country, and I think the facts will have some weight with the House. I am afraid it may be thought that Members on this side of the House generally are against this Bill. As a Nonconformist I support it, because I think it would be utterly unfair that Members on this side, who sometimes make use on platforms of the fact that we are Nonconformists, should appear to turn their backs on anything Nonconformist when it comes into this House. There has come into my hands a very extraordinary document which is supposed to contain in short form everything that can possibly be said against this Bill. The first three or four paragraphs seem to me extremely foolish and hardly worthy of any notice at all. The first paragraph refers to the immorality of religious bodies having entered into an agreement to give up possession at the end of a certain period of time, trying to get an Act of Parliament passed to get rid of their obligation, and deprecates the breaking of stipulations of a lease entered into. But would not a similar objection apply to three-fourths of the Bills brought before this House for remedial legislation? Another objection, and this was urged by the hon. Member for Bradford, is that the County Court should be made the tribunal in the case. To this I say I would not insist upon the County Court if a better tribunal could be suggested. I do not know that it is the best tribunal that could be selected for this purpose, but that is not a matter essential to the Bill at all. There is, I admit, very great force in what the hon. Member for Bradford said as to the looseness of definition in the phrase "religious body," and I am afraid the answer of the hon. Member for Glamorgan, when he says the same expression is used in other Acts, hardly gets over the difficulty. I know difficulties will arise from the want of a more precise definition. But I suppose this is a point that can be met in Committee. Then it has been urged by speakers against the Bill that the measure is promoted in a short-sighted spirit, because owners of property who have hitherto acted generously in the leases they have granted to religious bodies will hesitate in future, owing to the consequences their generosity may involve under this Bill. That, I admit, is a difficulty as it stands, but I think it can be met by giving compulsory powers to religious bodies under sanction of a Public Authority. The hon. Member for Bradford says that the supporters of the Bill are illogical inasmuch as they, being opposed to religious establishment, by this Bill recognise religious establishment. But is it not equally illogical that the hon. Member for Bradford, being in favour of religious establishment, should oppose the Bill? But I have heard one remark from an hon. Member on this side which indicates, I think, what will have more weight than any other argument, that is that this is the thin end of the wedge for a great many Radical changes — towards leasehold enfranchisement, for example. Now, many of us here are distinctly opposed to leasehold enfranchisement, but I do not think that anything that concerns a religious body can be the thin end of the wedge in regard to secular contracts. Places for religious worship are surrounded by conditions totally different to those which apply to buildings for secular purposes. I do not think if the Church of England were a secular body any man would be found to advocate the Establishment, and those of us who do not belong to the Church of England and who support it, do not do so on the ground that it is a corporation or society, but simply as a religious body. To religious bodies this Bill will be extremely beneficial, and I hope it will receive a considerable amount of support from this side of the House.

(3.5.) Mr. AMBROSE (Middlesex, Harrow): I am rather sorry that the religious element should have been introduced into this discussion, but still in the view I take I am not influenced by any considerations of the kind, and certainly not by any feeling of hostility towards Nonconformist or other religious bodies. I am prepared to accept, though not to the fullest extent, the statement that there are at times difficulties met with in securing sites for the erection of places of public worship for Dissenting Bodies. Let that be conceded, though I do not think the difficulties exist to the extent stated, and I have had some experience in relation to such matters. But accepting the statement, what is the remedy? Is it necessary to come to the House with a Bill like this which is to place the property of owners at the mercy of those who want that property without any check whatever? If there be difficulties such as have been described, why does not the hon. and learned Gentleman introduce a Bill vesting in some Local Authority, say, the Local Government Board, acting by officials trained to dealing with such matters, the power to acquire land for the purpose? I refer to the Local Government Board for the officials of the Board have given satisfaction in all parts of the country where their intervention has been invoked. Why not bring in a Bill laying down certain lines upon which sites may be acquired for places of public worship wherever you have landlords acting obstructively and unnaturally, as they are represented to act sometimes? No doubt there are cases where a landlord may act in "a dog in the manger" manner, or he may desire to develop his property in some other, and as he thinks, a better way. But if there are other places where a building for purposes of public worship may be erected, why compel this one man to dispose of his land? If a landlord acts unreasonably let the case come before the officials of the Board, and let the Board proceed to act on the compulsory powers and on the lines Parliament may lay down for the purpose, and to govern such cases. But in this case you establish a power of private interference with private rights. I am not here to deny the right of Parliament to interfere, but I do deny the right of Parliament to interfere with private rights except on grounds of public interest. The hon. Member who introduced the Bill and those who have followed him have said that the Bill comes before us in the light of a recommendation of the Town Holdings Committee. Now I have the greatest respect for the legal acumen of the hon. Member for Glamorgan, but with great respect I think he is mistaken on this point.

*MR. LAWSON (St. Pancras, W.): The principle is recommended.

MR. AMBROSE: What was the recommendation of the Committee on Town Holdings? The Committee think that it is most desirable on public grounds that all Public Bodies should be enabled to obtain and secure the tenancy of places of worship and schools, and they consider that freeholders who have granted land for such purchases should agree to it being so held in perpetuity on receiving the full value of their interest.

COLONEL NOLAN: It was another Report I referred to containing a stronger recommendation — that the leasehold ought to be enfranchised.

MR. AMBROSE: I have looked through the Report, and this, I think, is the only one dealing with the question. They Report that they have taken certain evidence and they reserve further questions. Let me point out what this recommendation involves. They consider that a freeholder having granted land for such a purpose, there is good reason for it being so held in perpetuity. That involves simply the case of the freeholder who has granted, and the trustees on the other hand of the chapel or school. The freeholder has granted the land for the purpose of chapel or school, and anybody will readily understand and quite appreciate that when a freeholder has granted a plot of land for a chapel, that he would naturally suppose that the trustees would want it in perpetuity, that it having been appropriated to purposes of public worship there would be a sort of consecration about it, that it would be sacred in the eyes of those who worship there. Although I do not go the whole length of accepting the view of the Committee, I appreciate that this is a totally different case from the ordinary claim for enfranchisement, and the landlord must have had in view that the land was expected in all probability to be held in perpetuity. Further, the capital laid out upon it ought to be taken into consideration by every landlord, in giving some sort of equitable consideration to those who have taken the site. We may presume that when a landlord grants a lease to trustees, and they expend this capital, that at the end of 40 or 50 years it is understood that their right will not be materially interfered with. But is this in the Bill? The Bill does not require that the freeholder shall have granted a lease for the purpose of building a chapel upon the land; it does not require that any religious community shall have spent a farthing upon the erection of a building. It interferes with the deferred interests of the landlord; it interferes with the rights of the reversioner which may come into operation in the course of two or three years from the granting of the lease. Now what is the Bill?

"From and after the passing of this Act, the trustees of a religious body shall have the right to acquire the fee simple of or freehold or other reversion expectant upon the determination of any lease or term under or for which a place of religious worship is held by or for such religious body."

That is to say any religious body who have got possession of a building which they use for purposes of religious worship may claim it suddenly in the terms of the Bill and oust the owner. Why, the freeholder who is thus to be denuded of his right, may have had no voice in the letting of the building, it may be held under a sub-lease for a short term or even under a tenancy from year to year; and is a religious body, who may happen to have got possession of any building, and who use it for purposes of religious worship, to come under the provisions of this Bill, and demand that the freeholder shall sell his reversion? Now it is asked what object can a freeholder have in wishing to get possession of a chapel? Well, many of the leases under which trustees have possession may have been granted for a short time, merely because the freeholder has the residue of a term on his hands, and knowing at the end of 10 years or so the building will have to be pulled down he may have other building schemes in view, he may want the site for a public institution or a hotel—I do not mean simply a place for the sale of drink, I mean for the hotel accommodation necessary in every community. He may want it for a hospital, a market place, or for any other public purpose, but the existence of this right will prevent the freeholder from using the site for a purpose that he may have had in contemplation for many years. If this enfranchisement scheme is brought into operation it may defeat the entire plan for the development of property of which the site of the chapel may form a small part. Of course, there may be cases in which a right of this kind may be necessary. Granted that members of a religious community should be able to have a place to worship in. I presume that if any right of the kind is conferred there must be proper compensation for the owner. But the hon. Members seem to ignore the extreme difficulties incident to the acquisition of reversionary rights. Hon. Members have not quite correctly expressed the opinion of the Committee on leasehold enfranchisement.

MR. LAWSON:* They have recommended this particular form.

MR. AMBROSE: They have drawn attention to the advantages and disadvantages. But I pass from that, which is not the question now. They have expressed a general, though not a strong disapprobation; their opinion is not in favour of leasehold enfranchisement. But they were dealing with the simple case of a lease granted by the freeholder. But this Bill will disturb all sorts of interests. Take the case of Trustees who have got a chapel on a part of a larger property. They may hold it from a leaseholder who derives £50 from that and £100 from another portion, and who pays £100 to the superior ground landlord. There are almost endless ramifications existing in the division of interests as a matter of every-day life, and you cannot insert such a principle as this in the Bill without causing the greatest amount of disturbance of the interests of all concerned. "Wherever leasehold enfranchisement," say the Committee, "is resorted to, it should be in the form of awarding full compensation and the payment of all costs." Now, this Bill professes to deal with the question of compensation; but the proposal is that the whole of the money shall be paid into the County Court, and then, instead of following the procedure under the Lands Clauses Act, whereby the interest of everybody is guarded, the various interests are to fight it out among themselves as to the proportion in which the money is to be divided, and not only so, but they are to do it at their own cost, for by the terms of the Bill it is provided that when the sum to be paid is settled by the Court, that sum is to be paid into the Court, and the Trustees have nothing more to do with the matter; but the Court makes an order for division as it thinks proper. — Trustees buy a chapel, and the compensation is assessed at £2,000. The immediate landlord is entitled to some portion of this, but he has a superior landlord, and his interest is affected by mortgages and settlements. I can assure hon. Gentlemen I am not drawing on my imagination; it is a matter of every-day life to find mortgages and settlements overriding ground rents, and these things are conditions attaching to every title. But the provisions of the Bill leave it for all these persons—the first landlord, the second landlord, the third landlord may be, the ultimate reversioner of the fee-simple—every claimant to compensation—to fight out the matter in the Court at his own cost.

MR. S. T. EVANS: Will the hon. and learned Gentleman allow me to say he is mistaken? If he will turn to Clause 5 he will see that the Court is to settle the amount of purchase money to be paid for the purchase of the respective interests of the persons beneficially interested. It is not payment in a lump sum.

MR. AMBROSE: Shall settle the amount of compensation for the respective interests; and then the Bill goes on to say that the amount shall be paid into Court, and the Court shall divide it between the parties according to their respective claims. That is a totally different provision to that found in the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act. There you have proper provision for every interest. There is no payment into Court at all unless there is a difficulty about the title. Wherever a man makes out his title his interest is secured. But here the whole amount is to be paid by a lump sum into Court. It is quite true there is the word "respective" which escaped my attention, but that does not alter my view. The Bill provides that the amount is to be paid in a lump sum, and then the parties have to determine at their own cost the proportions to which they are entitled. I have no hesitation in saying that in nine cases out of ten, by the time the apportionment is determined, there will be nothing left to divide. I ask hon. Gentlemen what is the necessity for this? It may very well be that there is a chapel next door; there may be a site within a few hundred yards available at a reasonable price; yet, according to the Bill, the Trustees will be entitled to proceed compulsorily to the enfranchisement of a particular site. How can such a proceeding on the part of Trustees be justified? Although adjoining, or in the immediate vicinity, there may be a vacant site available, are the Trustees still to have full liberty to compulsorily acquire the property of another person? Surely such a proposition is absurd and inequitable, and cannot be justified. Even though there may be here and there a case of hardship, are Trustees, having entered into a contract to give up possession at the end of a certain term, to be allowed to repudiate that part of their contract? I cannot see how a Religious Body—Church of England, Catholic, or Dissenting—can justify the repudiation of an agreement unless there is some real wrong in the matter which is pointed out. It seems to me that there can be only one justification for a Bill of this kind, namely, that which is presented by Railway Companies and others who come to take land compulsorily—the necessity of the case. Granted that they are necessary, then I will give you all the powers you require. Show the necessity. But I object to your being the judges in your own cause. If the London and North Western Railway Company wanted powers to take land, I should object to their being the judges of the necessities of the case. I would rather that they should go before a Committee of the House of Commons, or some official of the Local Government Board, who, acting on definite rules, would say whether or not a case of necessity has arisen. Then, when you have got that system, you want the means of securing due compensation. This Bill ignores that altogether. It is idle to contend that the County Court Judge is a proper tribunal to assess compensation in cases of this kind. The County Court Judge has already enough work to do without having business of this kind thrust upon him. Moreover, the valuation of lands and premises is not to be carried out by rule of thumb, upon the evidence of a set of sworn valuers, a gang of men who would be brought forward for the purpose of running down the value of land in favour of those who sought to acquire it. The County Court Judge, as a matter of fact, would do what I have been told is often done by valuers who have not shown the largest amount of zeal and activity, that is to say, would sum up the total of the valuations and then strike a mean between them. The true secret of our liberty is the protection afforded by our Constitution to private rights. We value men's private rights, and we only sacrifice them when it is necessary to do so for the public good. But this Bill proceeds on wrong lines altogether, and I shall vote against it.

*(3.35.) MR. H. LAWSON: I think the House will understand from the support given to the Bill from all quarters that this is not a Welsh question alone, and that its defence will not necessarily be conducted in the Welsh dialect. An attack was made upon it, first of all, by the hon. Member for Bradford (Mr. Byron Reed), to whom the mention of a place of worship is like the waving of a red rag before a bull, and excites in him all the passions of the odium theologicum. The hon. Member immediately proceeded to drag in the Liberation Society, which has no more to do with this Bill than he has himself. He feels obliged to drag that body into every Debate in which he takes part, like King Charles's head in Dickens's novel. We do not wish to deal with the question as depending on the establishment or disestablishment of the Church. That is foreign to the Bill; and if the hon. Member could only be induced to realise that, it might be possible to persuade him to vote in the same Lobby with us. As a matter of fact, the Church of England enjoys far larger powers of compulsion in this matter than my hon. Friend proposes in the Bill. By the Act of 1818, for promoting the building of additional churches, supposing the Commissioners under the Act think "it proper and expedient" that any church should be built or any existing building enlarged, they have power to acquire whatever land is required. I could understand some objection being taken to the powers conferred by that Bill; but if we believe in the maxim that "equity loveth equality," I cannot see that, when the Church of England enjoys such powers, we should not give to the Nonconformists the right not of acquiring, but of retaining, their property.

MR. H. BYRON REED: I pointed out that the powers held by the Church are practically never used, and that a Bill has been proposed to repeal them.

*MR. H. LAWSON: He said that a Bill had been brought forward to repeal them by some hon. Member. But that Member is not the Archbishop of Canterbury, and I do not know by whose authority he acts, nor, in fact, who he is. The hon. Member's statement proves nothing to us except that it reveals a latent suspicion that the powers of the Church must soon be extended to other bodies also. The hon. and learned Member who preceded me in the Debate has not contributed much to the elucidation of the question. He had not the advantage of sitting on the Committee for some six years as we had; and though he has glanced at the Report, he has not taken the trouble to understand the recommendations which were supported by every Conservative and Unionist Member on the Committee, and which are in the direction of my hon. Friend's Bill. I would point out to the hon. and learned Member that there is not a word in the recommendations about a term of 30 or 40 years being the period of the original grant. Their recommendation is that in all places all Religious Bodies should have power to acquire their buildings and schools.

MR. AMBROSE: The land must have been let by the landlord for the purpose of religious buildings.

*MR. LAWSON: The hon. Member said something about 30 years. The Committee were opposed to the Leasehold Enfranchisement Bill, but they supported the principle that the localities should be empowered to acquire estates, and then sell them in severalty to the various occupiers. That is not pertinent to this Bill, but I give this as an illustration to show that the hon. and learned Member is mistaken as to the meaning of the recommendations of the Committee. We took evidence for several years on the question of the tenure of chapels, and there was not a single case brought before us where there were any intermediate leases. In every case in Wales and the country districts in England, and even in London, there was a direct lease given by the owner of the land for the erection of the chapel, and the only persons affected, therefore, would be those holding the immediate leases. That disposes of some of the objections the hon. and learned Member raises.

*MR. LAWSON: They have been read already. The Committee say, however, that they think it desirable on public grounds that all Religious Bodies should be able to obtain secure tenure of sites for places of worship and schools, and that freeholders who have granted land for that purpose have no good reason to object to this arrangement, his interests being secured by payment of fair compensation. We do not propose to do away with that compensation. On that Committee there were, of course, a majority of supporters of the Government. We had such men on it as Lord Radnor, the hon. Member for Essex, the hon. Member for the Kingston Division of Surrey, and all the "Church and State men"—as the hon. Member for Bradford would call them—voting for, or rather not voting against, this proposal, which was moved by the Chairman, and carried unanimously. Who, I ask, are the best people to judge of the necessities of Nonconformist Bodies? Those who belong to the Church of England, like the hon. Member for Bradford, and who have simply formed an opinion of the Bill from a hasty perusal of a Blue Book in the Library this morning, or the Members of the Committee, say the necessity for this Bill is clearly shown by the evidence submitted to the Town Holdings Committee. That Committee heard a great deal of evidence from different bodies in Wales, and particularly from Festiniog, and it appeared that the members of Nonconformist chapels there desire nothing more than to be able to obtain a secure position for their places of worship and to be exempt from the chance of a refusal to renew the lease of their chapels to which they are attached by every sort of memory and association. Evidence was given from Sheffield in one case to show that when the lease of a Wesleyan Chapel in a densely-populated district fell in, the ground rent, which had been £8 16s., was raised by the Duke of Norfolk to £100, the surrender of a 14 years' lease, which was equivalent to a premium of £1,500. I do not mention that to the detriment of the Duke of Norfolk, but to show that at the termination of the lease the lessees frequently find that the landowner asks an absolute rack-rental at a commercial figure, just as if the chapel were a warehouse or public house, or any other place devoted to purposes of trade. It is obvious that a congregation consisting of working men are utterly unable to pay the same rent that might be paid for a building out of which large profits have been earned, derived from advantages of situation. Does the hon. and learned Gentleman opposite think that in his own Division a congregation who had been worshipping in a particular spot would think they met with just and equitable treatment if they had to surrender their building in order to enable a public house or an hotel to be erected instead? Hotels are, no doubt, very useful buildings, but they need not take the place of chapels any more than they need take the place of churches. Why, I ask, should the Nonconformists be denied that privilege which is given to the Church of England? I have a Return of leasehold Congregational chapels in London, and from that it appears that within a few years 48 chapels in London have ceased to exist, the land on which they stood having been devoted to trading and other purposes. The leases were determined because the terms of renewal could not be met. Many of these were historical temples of various sects. As many more are now in the same precarious condition. In one case a lease will shortly expire, the ground rent reserved by which is £100. That is to be raised to £500; and as that cannot be found, a chapel which originally cost £18,000 will be lost. There is much bitterness and soreness of spirit engendered by the present hardships, and I hope the House by reading this Bill a second time will do their best to remove what is really an inequality and an injustice, and, what is equally important, will remove that cause of inequality and injustice which works so much evil.

(3.55.) THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. MATTHEWS, Birmingham, E.): I have personally very great sympathy with many of the sentiments expressed by the supporters of the Bill. I do not myself belong to the Church of England. On the contrary, I belong to a Religious Body which, I suppose, has been more unpopular than any other in England. The difficulty that body has experienced in obtaining sites for places of worship has been extraordinary. We have been obliged to take refuge in mews, being unable to get into the public streets; therefore, my personal sympathies are with those who favour some legislative means of acquiring sites in cases in which they cannot otherwise be obtained. But, nevertheless, looking at the matter as a lawyer and a legislator, it seems to me that the only principle on which this Bill can be defended has been completely passed over. I have heard no attempt made to justify the general principle of applying the machinery of compulsion to the acquisition of sites for places of public worship. The House of Commons has always been extremely jealous of taking away any man's property by compulsion unless at least two leading conditions are fulfilled, namely, first, that the object is one of obvious and clear public utility; and, secondly, that the machinery of compulsion is the necessary machinery to carry out the object. I hope no one will think that I do not regard religious objects as matters of a most useful character; but the question whether a religious object is one of public utility must depend upon the extent of the Religious Body with which you have to deal. In England, for instance, the Roman Catholics can make no pretensions of that sort, because they are only a small and disregarded body; but in Ireland the case with them is different, as the great majority of the people belong to the Roman Catholic Church. In Ireland the erection of Roman Catholic churches may be regarded as an object of public utility, but in that country—and I hope I shall offend no one when I say it—the antagonism between the Roman Catholic Church and the former Established Church is as deep and bitter as in any other country in the world. I am not imputing blame to anyone, but merely recognising the fact. Still, the antagonism of the landowners to the popular religion in Ireland has not prevented the erection of churches, so that even where public utility is established in a matter of this sort, I do not think it can be shown that it is a matter of public necessity. It is clear that the operations of voluntary purchase have been sufficient in Ireland. As to the evidence given before the Town Holdings Committee with regard to Lord Penrhyn's property at Festiniog, the only reason why chapel sites were not conveyed in fee was that there were restrictive covenants in Lord Penrhyn's settlement which prevented his doing so. For some mysterious reason this Bill ignores altogether the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act and other carefully-prepared provisions, and seeks to imp the whole thing into the hands of the County Court Judges; but no County Court Judge could go behind Lord Penrhyn's settlement. I quite agree that the sentimental feeling which underlies this idea is a most respectable one, and one which will have the sympathy of every man; but I am not prepared to concede that even the weight given to religious sentiment is sufficient, without the condition of public necessity which the House of Commons ought to require to be established, to justify embarking in legislation which will compulsorily deprive a man of his property. The comparison which has been made between the Church of England and Nonconformists is not a proper one. The theory of legislation in this country in the past has been that the Church of England embraces the great majority of the public, and that, therefore, to give compulsory powers to the Church of England is to supply a public want. Take, again, the past legislation in regard to schools. School Boards have been established in this country, and accordingly compulsory powers of purchase have been extended to them. When you come to the managers of elementary schools, who do not represent the population of that locality, you do not give the power of acquiring a site otherwise than by agreement. That is the distinction between the two. It is not very perfectly carried out; but that is the idea, that in order to vest anybody with the compulsory power of purchasing private property, you must make out that it represents the general public and not simply a section of the public, however interested and deserving of sympathy that section may be. That has been the principle which has pervaded our legislation. The necessity of relaxing that principle in the case of a railway arose from the fact that they dealt with a number of owners, and the dissent of any one might paralyse the whole scheme unless they had compulsory power. Therefore, I repeat, upon the general principle, that this is a case in which, whether compulsory powers ought to be granted or not, it seems to me the promoters of the Bill have not made out their case. Speaking for myself, and not on behalf of the Government, while I most sincerely sympathise with those Religious Bodies who are seeking to obtain a resting place for their feet in which they may worship after their own fashion, I feel that the interests of property are so affected that I must vote against the proposal in the present Bill. Speaking with the greatest possible respect for the hon. Member who introduced this particular legislation, I must say that anything more crude and unsatisfactory I have not seen, and I hope the hon. Member will take it back and re-consider it. The recommendation of the Town Holdings Committee is not what this Bill proposes. It is that when the freeholder has granted a lease for the erection of a place of worship there should then be power to convert that into a freehold. The Bill has not been limited to that. There is included in the Bill not only places of worship, but ministers' houses. I do not know if the representative of the Office of Works is present; but if a Dissenting minister takes a lease for a year of a villa in Regent's Park he may under this Bill go to the Office of Works and purchase it compulsorily. That is the way the Bill would work insidiously, and with several arms, because the art is all in the Definition Clause and in the unconsidered trifles of the Bill.

MR. S. T. EVANS: These words go together, and they are words which are constantly used in deeds and other documents—

“Places of worship or premises shall include any church, chapel, meeting house, manse, minister's house, held or enjoyed therewith.”

MR. MATTHEWS: I do not see the use of putting in all that verbiage. The hon. Member has drawn his Bill so loosely that he does not know what he has done. He has not said that the chapel or meeting house is to be held under the same lessor as the minister's house, but that they are to be enjoyed together. Therefore, I repeat that there may be a meeting house in Albany Street, the minister of which might hold a pleasant villa on Crown land in Regent's Park, and might enfranchise the whole on application to the County Court Judge of the district. A man lets a house to Mr. Jones. He does not know Mr. Jones; but it turns out that Mr. Jones is preaching in some chapel hard by, and thereupon the house becomes liable to enfranchisement. That is the clear effect of this Bill, and it is disrespectful to the House of Commons to ask it to consider so ill-drawn, so ill-considered, and so ill-defined a Bill as this. And, as if that were not sufficient, the Bill is retrospective, and is to affect all existing leases. The more one reads it, the more it appears full of pitfalls. It is not necessary that the lease, however short, should be in the freeholder. It may be in an intermediate owner. London is full of houses which are held upon building leases by leaseholders, and yet, under the circumstances I have mentioned, the freeholder is to have his house taken from him, although he has no knowledge of the fact. I do not know whether the hon. Member meant that. It is perfectly clear that even on the principles of the Town Holdings Committee nobody should be dispossessed who has not assented to the occupation. The hon. Member for Mid Glamorgan (Mr. S. T. Evans) knows as well as anybody the difficulties with respect to titles. There may be retrospective covenants of all kinds that bind the hands of occupiers. How are these difficulties to be met? The hon. Member, instead of taking the Lands Clauses Act, which deals with all these difficulties, selects the County Court Judge as the assessor of the value of the property. However learned lawyers the County Court Judges may be, I can hardly imagine anybody to whom I should be more unwilling to entrust the valuation of my property.

MR. S. T. EVANS: The Government made the Judge of the County Court the assessor under the Tithe Act.

MR. MATTHEWS: The County Court Judge was not made the assessor in any sense of the value of the property under the Tithe Act. He takes that from the Tithe Assessment Return, and what he has to do is to decide whether it is due or is paid. It has been denied in this Debate that places of worship ceased to be used for that purpose, but I have heard frequently of Nonconformist chapels being devoted to other purposes. Yet this Bill does not provide, as it ought to do, that the vendor who had sold under compulsion should have a right of pre-emption. Again, there is no hint in the Bill as to who is to pay the costs of litigation, but all the parties are to fight their own battle at their own expense. All these things detract from the usefulness of the Bill, which cannot be amended without being re-drafted. I shall, therefore, feel obliged to oppose the Second Reading.

*(4.20.) MR. G. OSBORNE MORGAN (Denbighshire, E.): I really am sorry for the right hon. Gentleman, as I am for any man who is obliged to say one thing while he thinks another. I think his impulses or natural instincts are preferable to the more laboured conclusion at which he has arrived "as a lawyer and a legislator." The case for the Bill is not quite the case of compulsory purchase of land. What the Bill provides is that when a lessor has already devoted land to religious purposes he should not be at liberty to withdraw it from those purposes. The Home Secretary said that before giving compulsory powers to anybody you must establish two things. First you must establish public utility, and, secondly, public necessity. I tried to understand what he meant by the test of public utility. As I understood him, if applied to England, it would probably involve the denial of a site for a Nonconformist chapel on the ground that the majority of the people belong to the Established Church, but that a different rule would apply to Ireland, because the great majority of the population are Roman Catholics. But has the right hon. Gentleman never heard of Wales? The case of Wales is peculiar, and it is one which is exactly met by this Bill. I am so satisfied that the Bill possesses the general approval of the Principality that I shall be very much surprised if any single Member for Wales goes into the Lobby against it. The case of Wales is peculiar for this reason, that the great majority of the people are Nonconformists, and nearly all the landlords in whom, of course, the powers of granting land for religious purposes are vested, are nearly all Churchmen. I could give the right hon. Gentleman many instances that would show the necessity for this Bill in Wales. With regard to the Report of the Town Holdings Committee respecting the Penrhyn estate, no doubt Lord Penrhyn was prevented, by the terms of his settlement, from giving grants of this kind in perpetuity. But we want to give him the power to do that which, I think, every landlord in Wales is, in simple justice, bound to do. I think the right hon. Gentleman was exceedingly hard on my hon. and learned Friend with regard to the drafting of the Bill. I do not think his comments were by any means justified. The right hon. Gentleman said the County Court was not the proper tribunal in a matter of this kind, but I would ask why was the County Court selected as the tribunal to which proceedings under the Tithe Rent Charge Act were to be taken? If the right hon. Gentleman looks again at the Bill he will see that it does not provide for the acquisition of a minister's house in the circumstances he assumed, because the words are "appertaining to the Church or held in connection therewith." If this Bill had been a purely Nonconformist Bill the hon. Gentleman who moved its rejection would naturally oppose it. But he is wrong in saying the Bill gives Nonconformists any exclusive privileges. It does nothing of the kind. The Bill applies to every religious body, and surely the hon. Member will not deny that the Church of England is a religious body. Going further, I assure the hon. Gentleman that this Bill is really wanted not only in the interest of Nonconformists but in the interest of the Church of England itself. I will give a case in point. Some years ago I had sittings at a chapel-of-ease in the West of London. The lease of that chapel came to an end, and the landlord refused to renew on the ground that the doctrines of the eloquent minister who occupied the pulpit were not orthodox. The result of the refusal to renew was that the whole congregation was scattered, and I lost the opportunity of listening to one of the most eloquent preachers it has ever been my fortune to hear. I thought, and still think, that was a very hard case. The hon. Gentleman objected to the use of the words "religious bodies."

MR. H. BYRON REED: I did not object to that term, but to the absence of a definition of it by the hon. Member opposite (Mr. S. T. Evans).

*MR. G. OSBORNE MORGAN: The words "religious bodies" have constantly been used in Acts of Parliament, without any definition at all. The term has what I may call a statutory definition assigned to it. Moreover, the definition is not necessary in this Bill, because in every case the lessor has already, by granting the lease to them, recognised the lessees as the representatives of a particular religious body. It does not lie in the mouth of the hon. Gentleman to complain that he does not know what that religious body is. Then the hon. Gentleman went on to complain that County Courts were overworked. I very much doubt if that is the case. But what is the meaning in that case of throwing upon them the enormous burden which the Tithe Act entails? If this Bill scourges them with rods, the Tithe Act scourges them with scorpions. The burden thrown upon them by this Bill will not be a hundredth part of that thrown upon them by the Tithes Act. If it were conceivable that landlords will be deterred from granting leases, while I do not think many will follow that principle, I hope if they do, that it will be done just before a General Election; for if anything could make a man justly unpopular it would be an action of that kind. The Home Secretary asked what was the necessity for this Bill. My answer to that is the evidence taken before the Select Committee. The hon. Gentleman the Member for Harrow asserted that the Town Holdings Committee were not unanimous in approving the principle of the Bill. I do not agree with him.

MR. AMBROSE: What I said was that they were not in favour of the general principle. They reported against it as far as they could.

*MR. G. OSBORNE MORGAN: We have nothing to do with the general principle now. What I asserted was, first, that on this particular question the Committee were unanimous, and, secondly, that the Report was conclusive. This Bill is founded on the recommendations of that Committee on which there was a majority of Conservative Members. I support it not only in the interests of my constituents, with whom this is a burning question, but also on the general principles of justice, and I contend that hon. Members who oppose it in the interests of the Church of England will prove themselves the worst friends of that Church.

(4.33.) COLONEL HUGHES (Woolwich): It has been said by several hon. Members that while they sympathise with the object aimed at in the Bill, there is so much fault to be found with the details of the measure that they cannot support the Motion for the Second Reading. I do not think that that is a good reason. I admit that many of the provisions of the Bill require considerable Amendment, but it is only a few. After all, it is only by means of expert assistance that a Bill can be drafted satisfactorily. I say that if hon. Members sympathise with its object they ought to vote for it, leaving the improvements in detail to be made in Committee. The principle is to enable Nonconformist and other religious bodies who hold leasehold places of worship to acquire the freehold. I do not think that the Bill goes beyond that; but I should desire to see some controlling authority instituted in order to secure that places are not taken on short terms with a view to the freehold being afterwards acquired compulsorily. There can be no doubt that hardship is suffered by the Nonconformist and other religious bodies, and I could quote a case which occurred in my own parish. In that place when there were 300 or 400 houses the Church of England kept aloof, so the Wesleyans came forward. They were unable to get a freehold site, and had to be content with a leasehold, and to pay a ground rent. Under the circumstances they only felt justified in putting up a temporary iron building, but immediately it was seen that they were prospering, the Church of England came in and soon got a freehold on reasonable terms, and not by compulsion, simply because they had an Act of Parliament at their back; why should this difference of treatment prevail? I contend that if as a question of public utility and benefit, places of worship should be encouraged, then the privileges hitherto enjoyed by the Church of England should be extended to other bodies, to the extent, at least, of enabling them to obtain freehold habitations for all properly-conducted religious establishments. It has been suggested that places used temporarily for purposes of religious work would come under the operation of this Bill. I hope not. For instance the Volunteer drill hall, in my own particular locality, is used on Sundays for religious services, and of course it is not intended that persons so using it should be able to acquire the freehold, that would be absurd. I recognise what is intended by the Bill and although there may be many mistakes in the drafting I shall support it because of the principle which it embodies. I hold we ought to encourage religious effort in every direction. We ought where we can to give these bodies a permanent habitation and home. There are many chapels which, when they get out of debt, will become the property of the landlord by reason of the expiry of the lease, and then they will have to be bought over again. That is not as it should be, and, therefore, I support the Bill, knowing that it may be amended, where necessary, in Committee.

(4.40.) MR. A. ELLIOT (Roxburgh): I should like to point out that the Bill not only deals with existing, but with future leases, and the effect of it in the case of future leases will be to hinder the landlord from granting the use of land for a temporary purpose. At present the landlord can, if it suits him, let to trustees of religious denominations; but if the Bill becomes law he will be unable to do so without protecting himself by the clauses of his lease, or the tenants will a few years later take him before the County Court Judge in order to compel him to part with the fee simple. The promoters of the Bill argue that its object is to facilitate the acquisition of land by religious denominations; but do they think that the measure will operate in that direction? I think, on the contrary, that it would throw a difficulty in the way of landlords using their land in the direction contemplated; it will cause the landlord to see that it will be to his own interest to keep the land under his own control. I agree with the hon. Member who last spoke, that all religious denominations should be treated on the same footing, and I see no reason why the privileges enjoyed by the Church of England should not be extended to other religious bodies. With regard to existing leases I have been astonished by the language of some hon. Members on the subject of the religious and sacred character which property acquires. I should like to ask whether it can be reasonably maintained that those who bargain for the use of land, say for 10 years, can claim to have a better right than other people to the land after the expiration of that period because they have used it for sacred purposes? To uphold such a doctrine is contrary to common sense. They have bargained for the use of the land for a certain term; they have obtained possession of it under specified conditions; and they are bound to return it to the owner at the end of that period. It is an entire misreading of the religious aspect of the case to suppose that because land has been used for particular purposes the tenants possess greater rights than they would under ordinary circumstances. We are told it would be terrible sacrilege if at the end of the tenancy the land were used for secular purposes. But the Bill does not contemplate following the land after it has once got into the hands of the trustees of a religious body, and so it may happen that after once land has been purchased for the purpose of erecting a chapel on it the site may become much more valuable, and the trustees might be induced to sell it at a large profit, and to re-erect their place of worship on a less expensive site. They would, in fact, only be acting as rational men in doing so, especially if by doing so they could secure a more commodious and convenient chapel. It is not merely a question of the uses to which the land may be put. I fully admit that if there are great difficulties in acquiring land in Wales as sites for buildings for religious purposes, compulsory powers ought to be given. I would not allow the Established Church to remain in possession of a privilege of that kind, which is denied to other denominations; but I object to the Bill because it is a bad Bill, and it is thoroughly inequitable to come between two persons who have made a bargain on certain terms and say that they should vary those terms. I say that this Bill will inevitably defeat its own object, and prevent religious denominations enjoying what is an extreme convenience to them—the temporary occupation of land.

*(4.46.) SIR H. VIVIAN (Swansea, District): It is refreshing to hear a Bill of this nature supported by hon. Gentlemen opposite; but it is the very opposite to hear it opposed from these Benches. The hon. Member for Roxburghshire appears to be oppressed by the idea that these chapels are built for temporary purposes. I see nothing in the Bill to warrant the assumption that its object is to enable land to be acquired for temporary purposes.

MR. A. ELLIOT: The Bill deals not with the building of chapels, but the acquiring of land by trustees of religious bodies for temporary purposes.

*SIR H. VIVIAN: Surely the hon. Member can draw a distinction between land taken for temporary purposes or for the purpose of erecting a permanent chapel. A temporary chapel is a most exceptional thing. I know a vast number of chapels, and I do not remember a single instance of building a chapel for temporary purposes. It is true that both the Church of England and the Nonconformists do at times put up temporary structures; but in 99 cases out of 100 they are replaced by substantial buildings. Therefore, it is no argument at all to say the land may be required for temporary purposes only. The hon. Member talks of a bargain being a bargain, but the question is whether those who make the bargain are precisely in the same position. The landowner says that he will not part with the freehold of the land, and will only give a lease for a term of years, and the Nonconformist has to consider whether he will submit to the hard terms of the landowner or forego his good work. Therefore, I do not consider that the argument that a bargain is a bargain has any validity. The object of this Bill is to give the right of acquiring freehold sites for buildings for religious purposes to those who cannot otherwise acquire them. There are very large properties in my district, one 11 miles in extent, and if the landowner had set himself against giving any site for Nonconformist places of worship the large population on that property would have been in a very unfortunate position. What this Bill seeks is to do away with an injustice of that kind and to enable those who are desirous of spending their money in erecting places of public worship to have the power to acquire a freehold. I very much regret that the Home Secretary has followed the example of the hon. and gallant Member for Galway, of whose conduct he himself complained, and has left his seat, because I want to reply to some of the right hon. Gentleman's arguments. The right hon. Gentleman said that there was no justification for compulsory rights of purchase. Has it occurred to him that his speech showed that there is an absolute necessity for it. The right hon. Gentleman told the House of the terrible difficulty which the denomination to which he belongs has had in obtaining sites. Surely in such circumstances the right hon. Gentleman ought not to have argued that there is no justification for a Bill of this nature, and ought to be found in the same Lobby as the hon. Member for Glamorganshire. The right hon. Gentleman appeared to think that wherever land is taken by compulsory purchase it ought to be established that there is a necessity for taking it for some purpose of public utility. Well, is there any purpose of public utility greater than that of creating places of public worship? I say that the highest function we can perform is to create these places of worship. In my own district our population is increasing enormously. During the time I have had the honour of representing a constituency in Glamorganshire it has more than doubled. When I first represented the constituency the population was something like 300,000; I shall be very much surprised if it will not be found at this Census to be over 600,000. The power of church extension is excessively limited, and unless the people have the power of building their own places of worship the population will be irreligious, whereas in Wales we have one of the most religious populations in the world. That is entirely due to the efforts of the Nonconformists. It is necessary that they should have chapels, and is there any greater object of public utility than the building of places of worship? Therefore, if it is insisted that before you grant Parliamentary powers the question of public utility must be established, I think condition precedent can be easily proved. The right hon. Gentleman appeared to think that this was to some extent a question of the "extensiveness," as he called it, of a religious body. I do not agree with him; but may I point out that no religious body is likely to want to build a chapel unless it is really required. What limit of numbers could he possibly fix? The right hon. Gentleman also referred to the case of Ireland, and, comparing the Roman Catholic with the Protestant Church, said that no such Bill as this had ever been deemed necessary for that country. But it is no argument that because Ireland has been contented with the position of matters in that respect, and has felt no grievance therefrom, the powers we ask for should not be granted to the rest of the United Kingdom. The right hon. Gentleman next complained of the proposal to refer the question to the County Court, because he said no County Court had the power of tearing up a title. But what the promoters of the Bill desire is to grant some Court the power to give a title for the purposes of this measure. If Lord Penrhyn's settlements will not allow him to grant freehold sites for public worship he ought to have that power. It should be borne in mind that land is a fixed quantity, that population is continually increasing, and that it may lie in the power of one man to deny to those who desire them sites for places of worship. The right hon. Gentleman said the County Court ought not to be called upon to deal with questions of this kind. Well, I would suggest that in cases of dispute the matter might be referred to the County Councils for investigation, just as questions connected with land required for the construction of railways are inquired into by Select Committees of this House. The acquisition of a site must be a purely local question, and why should it not be referred to the local tribunal consisting of the representatives of the people? The right hon. Gentleman complained that the Bill was ill-drawn. He said that it was so ill-drawn as to be disrespectful to the House of Commons. I am bound to say I think that that is very strong language. But the right hon. Gentleman, although his Parliamentary experience has not been a long one, must perfectly well know the distinction between a Second

Sir H. Vivian

Reading Debate and discussions in Committee. The greater portion of his speech was devoted to criticising small details, which, by a few words could easily be set right in Committee. I trust that the House, rising above all small Party considerations and prejudices in favour of the Established Church, will read the Bill a second time.

*(5.5.) MR. BARTLEY (Islington, N.): I wish to say a few words on this Bill. I was a Member of the Town Holdings Committee, and although I did not adopt the whole of the Report, I did approve of the particular clause which dealt with this subject, and I shall therefore vote for the Second Reading of this Bill. I am not a lawyer and cannot therefore say whether this Bill is properly drawn; but if it is not it can, no doubt, be amended in Committee. I take it that the principle of the Bill is that bond fide Dissenting Bodies shall have a right to purchase the freehold of the sites on which their chapels are built—I as a strong churchman support that. I object to the Church of England having powers in this respect if they are refused to Nonconformists; and as I do not like the idea of a Church of England being on a leasehold tenure, I understand a Nonconformist having the same sentiment. I believe that measures of this kind tend to implant religion more firmly on the land, and to remove jealousies. We want religion developed, and although we cannot all agree on one particular principle; it is only fair that one law should apply to the whole community. While supporting the Second Reading of this Bill, I do not pledge myself to the details.

*(5.8.) MR. STANLEY LEIGHTON (Shropshire, Oswestry): I regret to hear that the hon. Member who has just spoken intends to give his support to the Second Reading of this Bill, because I shall show that it is not drawn on the lines of the recommendation of the Select Committee. The hon. Member who in a very able speech moved the rejection of the Bill discussed the Report of the Select Committee on Town Holdings, and was contradicted in his assertions by the hon. Member for St. Pancras. Turning to the Report itself, I find that the Member for Bradford was right, and the Member for St. Pancras was wrong. The Committee contemplated that the land acquired for religious purposes should not be converted to other uses, but this Bill contains no provision against such conversion. The framers of the Bill have overlooked the word "so" in the Report of the Committee. The Committee recommend on public grounds that all religious bodies should be enabled to secure the freehold of the land on which their places of worship are built with a view to the land continuing to be so used. Therefore it was intended that land originally leased for religious purposes should, if the freehold is acquired compulsorily, continue to be so used, but this Bill does not in any way secure that. When the matter was under discussion before the Committee an Amendment was proposed securing to the original owner the right of repurchase in the event of the land ceasing to be used for religious purposes. I observe the established denominations of this Kingdom are asking for more endowment and more establishment. The fact should not be overlooked. They are already privileged, acknowledged, established. They desire more State privileges. I do not wish to oppose their wishes, but it should be remembered that there is nothing of a permanent nature in a great number of the religious bodies that spring up. They often only last for a few years. These different sects are constantly changing their local habitation, and if this Bill were to become law it might create inconvenience. For instance, a friend of mine owns land upon which a Wesleyan chapel has been erected under a lease granted by his predecessor. The lease was put up to auction; the intending purchaser desired to use it as a beer-shop! If this Bill were to become law similar cases would often arise. The hon. Member for St. Pancras said there were no less than 48 religious bodies who have moved their sites within a very short time in the Metropolis alone. They are always moving from one site to another. Supporters of the Bill ought to define what they mean by religious bodies.

*MR. LAWSON: The sects were driven from their chapels. The chapels were either pulled down or put to other purposes.

*MR. STANLEY LEIGHTON: What security is there under this Bill that they would not be pulled down, and the land on which they are built put to other purposes? It would be well if the hon. Member would turn his attention to a definition of religious denominations. No definition has been attempted. In Whittaker I see there are the Glory Band, the Nazarenes, the Secularists, the Church of Progress, the Deith-Hainediesh-Misnah Society amongst 250 others. Are they all religious societies which would come under this Bill? Where are we to draw the line? Any Member of this House may start a religious society in order to acquire the freehold of his present leasehold estate. Therefore, although I am quite prepared to support security of tenure to religious bodies, I am not prepared to support the Bill.

*(5.19.) MR. H. H. FOWLER (Wolverhampton, E.): The hon. Member (Mr. Leighton) in the early part of his speech expressed himself in favour of the principle of the Bill, only taking exception to the details. But in the latter part of his speech the old leaven of animosity against Nonconformity could not help breaking out, and it broke out in the form to which we are accustomed. The hon. Member attempted to throw ridicule on his fellow-citizens, who, I think have the cause of religion just as much at heart as the hon. Gentleman. I exceedingly regret the Home Secretary who was put up to represent the Government this afternoon is not present. The right hon. Gentleman took exception to the principle of the Bill, and also to the details. I give up the details at once. I think they want re-consideration and amendment; but it is a perfectly new doctrine that you are to vote against the principle of a Bill on the Second Reading, because you do not approve of the details by which that principle is established. The hon. Member for Roxburghshire (Mr. A. Elliot) said that some Nonconformist Bodies are in the habit of taking land and using it for a place of worship for 5 or 10 years only. The Bill is not intended to meet such a case. What it is intended to meet is a case where Nonconformists have taken a lease of a piece of land, have, upon the strength of that lease made a large expenditure of money raised by voluntary subscription. We say, that at the expiration of the lease the body should not be dispossessed from their place of worship. There is no proposal in the Bill for confiscation; there is no proposal to take from the landlord one atom of the property that belongs to him. On the contrary, there is a provision that the landlord shall be paid to the last penny the full value of the land. The Home Secretary is opposed to the principle. He had a number of eggs to dance over, and he danced over them with his accustomed dexterity. That blessed word compulsion is not a word that is in favour on the other side of the House. But there is legislation on the Statute Book which the hon. Member for Wigan (Mr. F. S. Powell) is exceedingly anxious to get off the Statute Book. There is legislation giving the Church of England compulsory powers to buy land for the purpose of churches, burial grounds, and parsonages with ten acres of ground in addition. The supporters of this Bill want Nonconformists to be placed on the same level. The Home Secretary, however, appears to argue that though it is desirable to give compulsory powers for the acquirement of land for churches, it is not desirable to grant similar powers for chapels. The other day the centenary of John Wesley's death was celebrated in the chapel he built on leasehold ground in the City Road. The Wesleyans had to pay to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners £10,000 on the expiration of the lease. Suppose the Ecclesiastical Commissioners had said, "We will not grant you a renewal of the lease, no matter what the associations of the chapel are to you." According to the Home Secretary that would be a legitimate exercise of the rights of property. There are rights of property which ought to be interfered with, and which hon. Gentlemen opposite, when they go to their constituents will advocate being interfered with. I do not pledge myself to the details of the Bill, but I am going into the Lobby with my hon. Friend (Mr. S. T. Evans).

*(5.26.) MR. F. S. POWELL (Wigan): It is an entire mistake to suppose that the Church of England has, for any practical purposes, the power to acquire land compulsorily. In the early part of this century the House granted a large sum of money for the building of churches, and very naturally accompanied the grant with compulsory power to purchase. But the power has only been exercised on one occasion, and that was in 1820. So cumbrous is the procedure, and so difficult is the Act to work, that the power is not a real operative power, and will, I trust, soon be abolished.

(5.28.) MR. HENEAGE (Great Grimsby): I heartily support the Bill, because I believe its principle to be perfectly fair and equitable, though I agree with the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton that the details will have to be very fully considered in Committee.

MR. LEES KNOWLES (Salford, W.): May I ask whether the promoters of the Bill would be prepared to insert in Committee a clause giving a right of pre-emption in cases where the building ceases to be used for religious purposes?

MR. S. T. EVANS: Certainly.

THE PORTUGUESE AGGRESSION ON THE PUNGWÉ.

QUESTION—OBSERVATIONS.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: My Lords, I desire to ask the noble Marquess at the head of the Government a question, of which I have given him private notice. It is, whether the noble Marquess is in a position to give any information to the House as to the reported seizure of British vessels by the Portuguese on the Pungwé, and the imprisonment of British subjects, and as to any steps which the Government may have thought proper to take in the matter?

THE PRIME MINISTER AND SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (The Marquess of SALISBURY):

As is always the case on these occasions there is a considerable difference in the reports of details, as they come from the English or the Portuguese side; but I am afraid there is no doubt that a most unjustifiable attack has been made upon a British expedition under Sir John Willoughby. The precise amount of force used, or of indignity that has been inflicted upon them I am not yet in a position to state, but there is no doubt that the members of that expedition have been treated in a manner which is not consistent with the engagements which Portugal has entered into, and of which we have very grave right to complain. We did at once complain, and urged upon Portugal the necessity of complying without delay with that promise contained in the modus vivendi which bound her to give permission and facilities for passing over the Pungwé and the land ways that lead from it to the interior. I was glad to receive from the Minister of Portugal yesterday an intimation from his Government that they had sent orders to remove every obstacle to the passage of peaceable travellers up the waters of the Pungwé, and from thence into the interior, so that if that undertaking is fulfilled we shall have, as regards the future, nothing in that respect to complain of. But the demeanour of the Portuguese officials on the East Coast of Africa has on more than one occasion corresponded so little with the assurances we had received from Lisbon that we have thought it desirable to request that three of Her Majesty's vessels should proceed to the Pungwé as speedily as possible. They will not be large vessels, but they will be adequate for the purpose. I should say that the Portuguese Minister also proposed that we should place a Consular Agent of some kind at the mouth of the Pungwé, in order to see that our requirements in respect of the modus vivendi were complied with, and to furnish authentic information. It is a measure which undoubtedly ought to have been taken at a considerably earlier period during the currency of the modus vivendi, which has now only three or four weeks to run, but that suggestion appears to me to be reasonable, and I have hopes that we may be able to do so, at all events intermediately and provisionally, by detaching some naval officer for the purpose. I would not speak too exactly as to the precise steps which will be taken; but there is every probability that the Portuguese and English Governments will be agreed upon that measure. I hope, therefore, that for the future there will be no further reason to complain with respect to the passage of the Pungwé. Questions which may further arise as to any reparation that may be properly required, I should prefer to reserve until we have a full and detailed account of the real events in the Despatches.

NEWFOUNDLAND FISHERIES BILL.

(No. 76.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

THE EARL OF DUNRAVEN: My Lords, before the Motion for the Second Reading of this Bill is made, I wish to present a Petition from the Legislature of Newfoundland praying to be heard against the Bill by one of the hon. Members of the delegation who have been intrusted with the Petition. With your Lordships' permission I will read the Petition:—

"We, the Legislative Council of the House of Assembly of Newfoundland, beg leave to approach your honourable Parliament and to appeal for your protection and support under circumstances which have filled the minds of all classes of this country with profound anxiety and dismay.

"Your honourable House may be aware that the old-time difficulties, consequent upon the Treaties of Great Britain and France on the subject of the Newfoundland Fisheries, have of late years assumed an unaccustomed gravity producing a painful and ceaseless agitation among our people.

"Two delegates have proceeded from this country during the last year to represent to Her Majesty's Government the exorbitant claims of the French under the alleged sanction of the Treaties referred to, and, further, to point out the injustice wrought upon the natives of Newfoundland. Their efforts for redress have been so far unsuccessful, and we are now confronted with a new evil essentially more intolerable than any of those with which experience has rendered us so familiar. We refer to the proposal of Her Majesty's Government by the Bill now before your honourable Parliament to re-enact the Act of George IV., cap. 51, for the better conduct of Treaties between Great Britain and France respecting the Newfoundland fisheries, which Act expired in 1834.

"This Act embodied provisions of an arbitrary and oppressive character, wholly repugnant to those principles of liberty and justice which are held to be the basis of modern British legislation. They conferred upon the officers of Her Majesty's ships the duties of a protective service and intrusted them with the settlement of Treaty disputes, with powers of summary adjudication independent of all those restrictions and safeguards which British law has devised for the defence of the inherent rights of British subjects. These powers extended to the most severe penal inflictions, and were beyond all appeal, and when it is remembered that they were exercised by persons unacquainted with legal procedure, whose peculiar training and habits of thought and action were dictated by an unquestioning submission to decrees, it must be manifest that extreme hardship and injustice were the frequent inevitable results.

"It may be alleged that while the Act in question was yet upon the Statute Book it had been allowed to lapse into comparative desuetude, so incompatible with modern civilization would have been the application of this barbarous law. Unhappily, the record of the years 1877, 1888, and 1889 gives instances of its enforcement, under assumed authority, with disastrous consequences to the property and industry of some of Her Majesty's subjects engaged in the fisheries of Newfoundland. We submit that this law cannot possibly be rendered applicable to the circumstances which it is designed to meet. All the social and general conditions of Newfoundland, particularly of those parts of the coast affected by International Treaties, have undergone a radical and complete change in the many years that have elapsed since the law was under consideration. There was then no resident population in those localities, which have been long since settled in considerable numbers; while trade from various sources of employment has become developed and yields its contributions to the Customs revenue.

"Several years ago Her Majesty's Government confirmed the occupation of the coasts by acceding to the desire of the residents for representation in the House of Assembly and for the appointment of Magistrates and police. They are periodically visited by the Supreme Court of Circuit; they have regular communication with the rest of the country and with Canada by mail and passenger steamers. In a word, they have all the ordinary institutions of civil life. The permanence of their position being thus conclusively assured and recognised, it can hardly be necessary to point out with what cruel severity and with what destructive effect the proposed law will operate upon the trade and industries and upon every other appreciable interest of this section.

"The loyal inhabitants of this whole dependency of the British Crown would, therefore, most earnestly implore your honourable House, by all its honoured and revered traditions, to desist from inflicting upon the people of this country the calamity of such an enactment as that now under contemplation.

"We would remind your honourable House that Her Majesty's Government and France lately agreed upon arbitration respecting the Newfoundland fisheries, each tribunal proposing to deal with one question only—the recent question of the lobster fishery. This partial proceeding has been decided upon, not only without reference to the Newfoundland Government, but against their emphatic protest. We on the part of the colony, beg to present an equally emphatic protest against the course adopted in direct violation of the principles of that constitutional form of government which it is our privilege to possess.

"We would, in conclusion, respectfully invoke the aid of your honourable House for the protection of the Treaty rights of Newfoundland against the demand of the French for exclusive fishery, including lobster fishing, on those portions of the coast where they hold acknowledged privileges. The rights of British subjects have on several occasions been declared and the pretensions of the French disallowed by some of the ablest statesmen of Great Britain, notably Lord Palmerston, and only last year by the Marquess of Salisbury. We feel that your honourable House will recognise the justice of our prayer, and that the definitions of those high authorities shall not continue to be mere theoretic pronouncements which France is permitted to contravene; but that they shall be carried out in their true significance to their full practical effect.

"We beg to inform your honourable House that we have appointed the Hon. Sir William Whiteway, Augustus W. Harvey, Moses Monroe, George H. Emerson, and Alfred B. Morine a delegation to present this remonstrance; and we pray that they may be heard at the Bar of your honourable House."

My Lords, having presented the Petition, I rise now, with your Lordships' permission, to move that the prayer of the Petition be complied with. I shall not, in justification of my Motion, say anything which could possibly prejudice the case, nor in any way go into the merits of the case; but I wish to point out that if your Lordships are pleased to accede to my Motion, you will be amply borne out by precedents. In 1838 Mr. Roebuck was heard at the Bar of this House against a Bill dealing with Lower Canada. In 1839 a representative was heard against a Bill affecting Jamaica; and in 1842 the House of Assembly of Newfoundland was heard by counsel at the Bar of this House against a Newfoundland Bill. In all those cases the Petition to be heard was granted, and I venture to think that in no instance was the case so strong as that involved in the Petition which is on the Table of your Lordships' House. In the case of Jamaica the difficulty arose out of extraordinary circumstances connected with the emancipation of the slaves; in the other two cases I have mentioned the machinery of partial self-government had come to a complete deadlock. But in the present case, the Colony of Newfoundland possesses full legislative powers and the full machinery of government. In all other and ordinary respects the machinery works perfectly smoothly, but in this one particular they protested most vigorously against legislation on the part of the Imperial Government on the matter set forth in this Petition. The Petition sets forth—whether rightly or wrongly of course I express no opinion whatever—that in the view of the petitioners the legislation involved in the Bill before your Lordships' House is subversive of their constitutional rights, is incompatible with the principles of liberty and justice, and would inflict great and grievous hardship upon numbers of our fellow-subjects and fellow-countrymen in Newfoundland. That in itself is a very weighty matter. I cannot conceive any allegations of a more weighty and more important kind than those embodied in this Petition, and if anything can add additional weight to them it is added in regarding the source from which the Petition springs. In all the precedents I have mentioned, the colonies, although enjoying Representative Institutions, were more or less directly administered by the Colonial Office, and were, therefore, more or less directly under the control of the Government here. But in this case the colony enjoys full legislative powers, and is in possession of all the responsibilities of responsible government. I do not mean to say that in the other cases the position of the colonies concerned was any reason whatever why their grievances should not have been heard; but the case here is different, and I submit that a Petition of this kind coming from a colony of the status of Newfoundland, therefore, requires, if possible, our greater attention. The Petition has been intrusted to a very influential deputation, representing all shades of political opinion in the colony, comprising the present Prime Minister, the Leader of the Opposition, the Speaker of the House of Assembly, and other prominent Members of the Legislature; and, with these facts before us, I do not think it is in the least necessary for me to enlarge upon the desirability of granting the prayer of the Petition. I feel confident that on account of the colony your Lordships will be glad that its people should have every opportunity of expressing their opinions on a matter about which they feel so very deeply. And I think also on account of this House, your Lordships, whatever action you may take in a matter involving such complicated and difficult questions, your Lordships would wish that the House should be put in possession of all the facts and all the arguments in the case. My Lords, I beg to move that the prayer of the Petition be complied with, and that Sir William Whiteway, Prime Minister and Attorney General of the colony, be now heard at the Bar.

Petition ordered to lie on the Table.

Moved, That Sir William Vallance Whiteway, K.C.M.G., one of the delegates, be heard at the Bar in compliance with the prayer of the said Petition (The Lord Kenry [E. Dunraven and Mount-Earl.])

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Lord KNUTSFORD): My

Lords, I do not propose on this occasion to make—nor do I think your Lordships would desire that I should do so—any remarks in reply to the speech of the noble Earl. I have only to say, on behalf of Her Majesty's Government, that we have readily assented to this Motion, the decision whether it should be granted or not resting with the House.

On Question, agreed to.

The delegates called in.

Sir WILLIAM V. WHITEWAY: May it please your Lordships,—On behalf of the Legislature of Newfoundland, I beg to express deep gratitude for the great privilege which has been conceded to its delegates by your Lordships in permitting us to appear at the Bar of this most noble and august Assembly to express the Legislature's objections to the Bill entitled—

"An Act to revise certain sections of an Act of the fifth year of the reign of George IV., chapter 51, for the purpose of carrying into effect engagements with France respecting fisheries of Newfoundland."

I shall endeavour, my Lords, to express those objections as concisely as possible. It will not be necessary to tire your Lordships by reading those portions of the Treaties and Declarations which refer to Newfoundland, with all of which you are already familiar; and I will therefore content myself with saying that the 13th Article of the Treaty of Utrecht (1713) was revived by the 5th Article of the Treaty of Paris (1763), and that the Treaty of Versailles (1783) again restored the fishery rights of the French to their position under the Treaty of Utrecht. The Treaty of Paris (1814) restored matters to the status they were in in 1792, under the Treaty of Versailles, and in 1815 the third Treaty of Paris confirmed the Treaty made in the previous year. Your Lordships' attention is particularly drawn to the 6th Article of the Treaty of Paris (1763), to the 4th Article of the Treaty of Versailles (1783), and to the Declarations which accompanied the latter Treaty. With your Lordships' permission I will proceed to give a concise history of the legislation upon this subject. A brief history of the legislation in connection with the Treaties and Declarations will be found, I submit, instructive and significant when the arguments which I shall venture to adduce presently come to be considered. It is a remarkable fact that for 75 years—from 1713 to 1788—no legislation seems to have taken place with reference to the execution of the Treaties of Utrecht, Paris, or Versailles. The first Act upon the subject was passed in July, 1788, five years after the Treaty of Versailles was signed. It first set forth the engagements made by the Treaties and Declarations accompanying the Treaty of Versailles, and then enacted as follows:—

"Section I.—It shall and may be lawful for His Majesty, his heirs and successors, by advice of Council, from time to time to give such orders and instructions to the Governor of Newfoundland, or to any officer or officers on that station, as he or they shall deem proper and necessary to fulfil the purposes of the definitive Treaty and Declaration aforesaid; and, if it shall be necessary to that end, to give orders and instructions to the Governor, or other officer or officers aforesaid, to remove or cause to be removed any stages, flakes, train vats, or other works whatever, for the purpose of carrying on fishery, erected by His Majesty's subjects on that part of the coast of Newfoundland which lies between Cape St. John passing to the north, and descending by the western coast of the said island to the place called Cape Rage, and also all ships, vessels, and boats belonging to His Majesty's subjects which shall be found within the limits aforesaid; and also, in case of refusal to depart from within the limits aforesaid, to compel any of His Majesty's subjects to depart from thence, any law, custom, or usage to the contrary notwithstanding.

"Section II.—And be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, that if any person or persons shall refuse, upon requisition made by the Governor, or any officer or officers acting under him, in pursuance of His Majesty's orders or instructions as aforesaid, to depart from within the limits aforesaid, or otherwise to conform to such requisition and directions as such Governor or other officer as aforesaid shall make or give for the purposes aforesaid, every such person or persons so refusing, or otherwise offending against the same, shall forfeit the sum of £200, to be recovered in the Court of Session or Court of Vice Admiralty in the said island of Newfoundland, or by bill, plaint, or information in any of His Majesty's Courts of Record at Westminster; one moiety of such penalty to belong to His Majesty, his heirs and successors, and the other moiety to such person or persons as shall sue or prosecute for the same; provided always that every such suit or prosecution, if the same is commenced in Newfoundland, shall be commenced within three months, and if commenced in any of His Majesty's Courts of Record at Westminster, within 12 months, from the time of the commission of such offence."

Now, my Lords, war terminated the Treaty of Versailles; and though the Treaty of Paris (1814) restored to France

"the colonies, fisheries, and factories of every kind which were possessed by France on the 1st of January, 1792, it does not appear to have been considered that this Treaty revived the Act above quoted, for in 1824 an Act entitled

"An Act to repeal several laws relating to the fisheries carried on upon the banks and shores of Newfoundland, and to make provision for the better conduct of the fisheries for five years, and from thence to the end of the then next Session of Parliament," contained two sections, 12 and 13, which were almost literally the same as those which I have just read; and these two sections it is proposed to re-enact by the Bill now before your Lordships. An Act was passed in 1829 to continue the Act 5 George IV., chapter 51, which I have last referred to, until the 31st of December, 1832; and in 1832 the Act 5 George IV., chapter 51, was further extended until 1834, "and no longer." Here I beg to draw your Lordships' particular attention to the fact that that Act which I have just mentioned, the continuing Act enacted that the Act so prolonged should continue until a certain time "and no longer." In 1832 a Legislature was granted to Newfoundland, its first Assembly taking place in 1833; and Parliament did not in 1834 further continue in force the law enacted in 1824, leaving to the Legislature of the colony the task of passing laws and enforcing regulations to carry out the Treaties and Declarations. The Legislature of the colony did not, however, assume this duty, nor does it appear by the records that its attention was ever called to the matter. The fact remains, however, that in 1834 the last Act of Parliament in this connection expired by virtue of one of its own provisions, and that from that year until the present time no legal authority has existed for the enforcement of Her Majesty's instructions to naval Commanders upon the coast of Newfoundland. It is now proposed to re-enact the provisions of the Act 5 George IV., chapter 51, and to give them an application in a manner never before suggested. The Act now before your Lordships' House contains the following clauses:—

"1.—(1) The enactments set out in the schedule to this Act shall be revived and have full effect, and the Treaty or Treaties therein named shall include not only the Newfoundland fishery engagements, but also any temporary arrangement made with France either before or after the passing of this Act for adjusting the differences arising out of those engagements.

"(2) If any permanent arrangement is made between the United Kingdom and France with respect to the differences which have arisen upon the Newfoundland fishery engagements, it shall be lawful for Her Majesty, by Order in Council, to direct that the enactments hereby revived shall apply, and the same apply accordingly, as if such permanent arrangement were a Treaty mentioned in the said enactments.

"(3) Provided that before such Order is made the draft thereof shall have been communicated to the Government of Newfoundland, and lain on the Table of both Houses Parliament for not less than one month.

"2.—Where Her Majesty the Queen in Council is satisfied that, by any law made before or after the passing of this Act by the Legislature of Newfoundland, sufficient provision is made for carrying into effect, under Her Majesty's orders and instructions, the Newfoundland fishery engagements, or any such arrangement as above in this Act mentioned, it shall be lawful for Her Majesty in Council to suspend the operation of this Act, or any part thereof, so long as such law continues in force, and no longer, and to direct that such law or any part thereof shall have effect with or without modifications and alterations as if it were part of this Act, and any Order in Council so made shall have full effect."

Now, my Lords, having thus briefly stated the provisions of the Treaties and Declarations, and the history of the legislation connected with this subject, I will proceed to state our objections to this Bill, and we humbly beg to solicit your in rejecting the Convention, to call attention to a very significant fact. Sir George William Des Voeux, now Governor of Hong Kong, was sent to Newfoundland to induce the Legislature to adopt the Convention. Within a few months of his arrival he expressed his views on the subject, in a Despatch to the Colonial Office, in the following forcible language:—

“Now that I fully comprehend the present position of the colony, it is to me no longer a matter of wonder that the Legislature has hitherto failed to ratify the proposed ‘arrangement’ with France; indeed, I can scarcely conceive it possible that this arrangement will ever be accepted so long as the bait clause remains in it, and no security is taken that the export bounties will not be maintained in their present footing. For though all the other Articles have the appearance of concession on the part of the French, and some are no doubt substantial concessions, they are all immeasurably outweighed by the single concession required on the part of this colony. For if there were granted to the French an inalienable right to procure bait here, the future, not only of the coast where they already have fishing rights, but of the whole colony, would practically be placed within the control of their Government.”

I think, my Lords, we cannot find more conclusive evidence of the wisdom of the Legislature of Newfoundland in rejecting the proposed arrangement of 1884-5 than is contained in this Despatch of Sir George William Des Voeux, who went there, intending to urge that the arrangement be accepted, and then, having been converted to the views of the colony, addressed the Home Office in such strong terms. Secondly, my Lords, we object to this Act because it is modelled after an Act passed at a period when the colony had no Legislature of its own, and when there was but a small population upon the coast directly affected, whereas the colony has had a Legislature for over half a century, and the Treaty shore is now settled from end to end. The colony was granted a Legislature in 1832, and settlement upon the Treaty shore has been permitted by the British Government for many years past. With their consent grants of land, subject to French Treaty rights, have been given, and the land has been settled upon and improved; with their consent, representation in the Legislature has been granted to the settlers, Magistrates and Customs officers have been appointed upon the coast, telegraphic, steam, and mail communication have been established, taxes are collected, and public money expended. In face of this great alteration in the whole condition of affairs, it should be impossible to re-enact a law first made over a century ago, and which would make it possible for naval officers to render valueless every iota of property on the land or in the waters of the Treaty shore—the property, not alone of the thousands who dwell there, but also of the other thousands who annually visit and fish there—for no provision of any kind is made in the proposed Act for compensating persons whose property may be in any way affected; and under this Bill power would be vested in the Governor of Newfoundland, or any officer on the station, on his mere volition arbitrarily to remove a British subject and his property from the Treaty coast, and to leave him absolutely divested of any redress or compensation whatever. In the face of these facts, we submit it would be a terrible injustice to British subjects to give the power to naval officers which is contemplated and given by this Bill. Should this Bill become law, it must necessarily have the effect of preventing capital from being invested for the development of the minerals, of agricultural and lumbering resources, on one-half of the island of Newfoundland. This part must ever remain a wilderness, for with the possibility of establishments being removed at any moment, on the mere volition of one man, surely persons will not be found to risk their capital in so uncertain and precarious a venture. If this Bill becomes law, and British people can be removed from British soil at the will of a naval officer, we humbly submit that, so far as this part of the island is concerned, the sovereignty of the island is a mere myth, a name without value, whilst the possession of an easement by the French to catch and dry fish on the strand vests in them all that is of value. Thirdly, my Lords, we object to the Act now before your Lordships’ House, because it is to be used to enforce Regulations to carry out Treaties, the interpretation of which is disputed, and which Regulations have hitherto been framed in a manner making them oppressive and unjust to British subjects. British statesmen have declared that under the Treaties the French have only a right to fish in the waters along the Treaty shore in common with British subjects. But, acting under Regulations and Orders similar to those which this Act seeks to legalise, British naval officers have prevented our fishermen from exercising common rights with the French, have driven our boats out of the harbours of shelter along the shore, and have otherwise acted as though British subjects had no rights at all upon the Treaty shore, which were not inferior to those possessed by the French. Thus British statesmen have practically invited our people to do those acts for which British officers have punished them, and thus it will be in the future until the meaning of the Treaties is definitely decided. We ought not to be subjected to burdens at once odious and uncertain. Fourthly, my Lords, we object to this Bill because, utterly ignoring the Municipal Courts of the island, it commits the enforcement of the Treaties and Regulations to the care and supreme control of naval officers not learned in the law, unskilled in legal procedure, and not trained in a manner qualifying them to adjudicate upon abstruse questions affecting, it may be, the peace of the Empire on the one hand, and the rights of individuals upon the other. The sovereignty of the island of Newfoundland is in Her Majesty, and the right of fishing and drying fish on the coast was conceded to the French merely as an easement. To the enjoyment of this easement they are entitled, and for any interruption or injury they may allege to have sustained, appeal for redress should be made by them to the judicial tribunals of Her Majesty the Sovereign of the soil in the first place. We therefore most earnestly urge that Her Majesty's ordinary Courts of Justice in Newfoundland are the tribunals which should adjudicate upon questions arising between British and French fishermen. From any Judgment in such Courts a final appeal would lie to Her Majesty and the Privy Council. In no case should naval officers be permitted to try causes arising as aforesaid, since Courts of Justice already exist in the colony for the purpose; and if it be deemed impossible for the ordinary Courts to enforce the law in such a manner as to adequately insure justice to the French, then we ask that special Courts should, as they could of course, be established. Fifthly, we object to this Bill because it is intended to aid in the enforcement of a modus vivendi—(a) both made and renewed without the colony's consent; (b) renewed after a positive pledge that it was "for one year only;" (c) renewed without providing for the operation of factories erected, completed, or made ready for operation in consequence of the pledge that the original modus vivendi was for "one year only;" (d) renewed without providing for the compensation of those who relied upon this pledge. Sixthly, we object to the Bill because it provides for the enforcement of the award of an Arbitration Commission definitely empowered to deal with one issue only, and that an issue against the separate submission, of which the colony has again and again protested. The colony is ready and willing to submit to unconditional arbitration all the questions arising under the Treaties and Declarations, asking only that no single question shall be decided until a decision has been arrived at as to all other points at issue, and that the award shall then be enforceable as a whole. According to the terms of the agreement for arbitration recently entered into, no questions can be submitted except those which affect the fishery upon the French Treaty shore, and these only as they may be agreed upon from time to time. This totally excludes from the purview of this arbitration one most important question which the colony desires to have decided—that, namely, which refers to the French occupation and use of the Islands of St. Pierre and Miquelon—and makes it possible for either of the high contracting parties to withhold any of those questions affecting even the fisheries themselves which such party may deem it inexpedient in its own interests to have decided. Either party, at any time after the settlement of the lobster question, or whenever dissatisfied with a decision upon any particular point, may withdraw from further arbitration; and such a result may occur at a time most embarrassing to the other side. While, therefore, the colony perceives that under the present arrangement it will be impossible to have all questions decided, it has no assurance that upon certain issues adverse decisions may not be arrived at with no compensating advantages from decisions in its favour upon other points. While, therefore, it would welcome arbitration upon every question at issue, it deprecates in the most earnest manner a piecemeal settlement. My

While, therefore, it would welcome arbitration upon every question at issue, it deprecates in the most earnest manner a piecemeal settlement. My Lords, it has been publicly stated by the right hon. the First Lord of the Treasury that the terms of the arbitration agreement were made known to the Government of the colony before they were finally agreed to. This, we regret to say, is not the case. On the 7th of March last, the right hon. the Secretary of State for the Colonies informed the Governor that arbitration would shortly take place on the lobster fishery question; and the Governor of the colony promptly telegraphed a protest against any arbitration which did not include all the questions arising under the Treaties and Declarations. Seven days afterwards—on the 16th of March last, that is—the right hon. Secretary of State telegraphed that an agreement for arbitration had been signed five days before, and then first made known its terms. Seventhly, my Lords, we object to this Bill because, while it permits the removal of property from the Treaty coasts, it makes no provision for the compensation of those who may suffer loss thereby, and thus makes the title to property extremely precarious. The effect which this Bill will have in retarding the development of the colony's resources has been already dwelt upon, but we cannot too strongly urge the duty of protecting private rights, and if the settlers upon the French Treaty coasts are to be liable at all times to removal by naval officers they ought at least to be assured of compensation. If the few are to be sacrificed for the good of the many, surely the many should compensate them, and to this compensation they should, we submit, be entitled by the terms of any Bill which may be enacted by Parliament. We are not unaware or unappreciative of the difficulties with which Her Majesty's Government have to grapple, and we are sincerely desirous of aiding in their solution. Actuated with this spirit, we have approached the Government with proposals calculated, we sincerely believe, to give all necessary power to execute the Treaties, Declarations, and Agreements with France according to their true intent and meaning. Those proposals are as follows:—First, (a) The Newfoundland Legislature to pass immediately an Act authorising the execution for this year of the modus vivendi, the award of the Arbitration Commission regarding the lobster question, and the Treaties and Declarations under instructions from Her Majesty in Council; (b) the further progress of the Bill now before Parliament to be deferred until the passing of the above Act, and the Bill then to be withdrawn; (c) the terms of an Act to empower Courts and provide for regulations to enforce the Treaties and Declarations to be discussed and arranged with the delegates now in this city as rapidly as possible, and to be enacted by the Legislature of the colony as soon as agreed upon. Secondly, (a) The present arbitration agreement not to be allowed to operate further than the lobster question without the prior consent of the colony, and in this case the colony to be represented upon the Arbitration Commission; (b) the colony desires an agreement for an unconditional arbitration on all points that either party can raise under the Treaties and Declarations; and if this be arranged between Great Britain and France, Newfoundland will ask to be represented upon such arbitration, and will pass an Act to carry out the award. We regret that up to the present moment these propositions have not been accepted, nor has any hope been held out that they will be. The temporary legislation which we have proposed to procure the enactment of would be immediately adopted by the Legislature of the colony, and present needs thereby amply met. I may here observe, my Lords, that we represent before you to-night all shades of political opinions in the island of Newfoundland, and therefore our promise to do this may be relied upon as though the Act were passed. The details of a permanent and thoroughly satisfactory measure would be arranged and enacted without delay by the Legislature of the colony. The adoption of our proposals would at once cause excitement to subside and would induce peace under conditions which make coercion by warships extremely difficult, if not impossible. If the Bill now before your Lordships becomes law, its provisions will have to be enforced upon a resentful people; but if our propositions are adopted, every good object which the present Bill can have in view will be easily and pleasantly attained, and without injury to the proper pride of a people who, though few in number, are as much entitled to consideration as the inhabitants of the proudest portion of the British Empire. No good, my Lords, can possibly come from coercing, or threatening to coerce, a people willing to do their whole duty; and to enact the Bill now before your Lordships, in face of the propositions made by us, would, we submit, be a needless indignity to a loyal people. In humbly praying that the Bill now before your Lordships may not be read a second time, we feel confident that we are consulting the best interests of Newfoundland and of the Empire. Its enactment will leave a rankling wound in the hearts of the colonists and establish a precedent that must ever give a feeling of insecurity to every self-governing colony. In offering, on behalf of the Colonial Legislature, to enact laws adequately providing for the honourable fulfilment of obligations of an exceedingly odious kind, we are animated by a spirit of patriotism and devotion to the Empire, and we must respectfully submit that persistence in the passage of the present Bill would, under the circumstances, be but a poor return for that faith in Parliament which animated the Legislature when sending us to the Bar of this House. My Lords, in conclusion, I may add that the time at our disposal has not enabled us to prepare such a full and complete statement of our case as we wished to lay before you, and we had hoped that the time for making this statement would have been extended; but we have to express our gratitude for the patient hearing which you have afforded us, and we are confident that the defects in our case will be supplied by your Lordships, as we are aware of the deep interest which you take in, and your knowledge of, the subject under consideration. We, therefore, leave the matter in your Lordships' hands in perfect confidence that you will mete out to the colony we represent that justice which is traditional of this most noble House.

LORD KNUTSFORD: My Lords, I think I shall be meeting the wishes of your Lordships if I propose to take the Second Reading of the Bill on Monday next, so that full time may be given to consider the very able speech which we have just heard. Before proposing the Adjournment, I beg to move, as a matter of form, the Second Reading of the Bill.

LORD HERSCHELL: As the Question has been put, I should have thought it would be better to do nothing further now.

LORD KNUTSFORD: That is what I proposed; but I was informed I was out of order. If it is not out of order I will move the Adjournment of the Debate.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: It would be rather odd to move the adjournment of a Debate which does not exist; but you can proceed in either one of two ways—either adjourn the further consideration until Monday, or move the Second Reading, and then move the Adjournment. It does not seem to me to matter a straw which way it is. Time is of importance.

LORD KNUTSFORD: My Lords, I have been furnished with a precedent, which says "That the further consideration and Second Reading of the said Bill be put off until Monday next"—curiously, the same day as in the present case. I would therefore move, my Lords, in that form.

Second Reading adjourned to Monday next.

BETTING BY INFANTS BILL [H.L.]
(No. 34.)

BORROWING (INFANTS) BILL [H.L.]
(No. 44.)

Order of the Day for the House to be put into Committee on the Betting by Infants Bill [H.L.] read.

Moved that the said Bill and the Borrowing (Infants) Bill [H.L.] be considered by the same Committee, and that it be an Instruction to the Committee that they have power to consolidate the said Bills into one Bill if they think fit (The Lord Herschell); agreed to: House in Committee on the said two Bills (according to order).

LORD HERSCHELL: I may state that the Amendments as now drawn are simply for the purpose of carrying out the consolidation of the two Bills. I have not made any further alteration, thinking it better to do anything of that kind in Committee after they have been consolidated.

Amendments made; and Bills consolidated into one Bill under the title of "An Act to render penal the inciting Infants to betting or wagering or to borrowing money (Betting and Loans (Infants) Bill [H.L.])."

The said Bill re-committed to the Standing Committee; and to be printed as amended. (No. 101.)

PUBLIC BODIES (PROVISIONAL ORDERS) BILL.—(No. 74.)

Read 3^a (according to order), and passed.

CHARITIES RECOVERY BILL.—(No. 84.)

TAXES (REGULATION OF REMUNERATION) BILL.—(No. 93.)

Read 2^a (according to order), and committed to a Committee of the Whole House To-morrow.

House adjourned at a quarter before Six o'clock, till To-morrow, a quarter past Ten o'clock.

QUESTIONS.

THE CHIEF COMMISSIONERSHIP OF ASSAM.

MR. H. GLADSTONE (Leeds, W.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India for the names of the gentlemen who have held the post of Chief Commissioner of Assam since January, 1886, and for the dates of their appointment?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Sir J. GORST, Chatham): The names of the gentlemen who have held the post of Chief Commissioner for Assam since January, 1886, are Mr. Ward, who was appointed on the 27th of February, 1885; Mr. Fitzpatrick, 31st of October, 1887; Mr. Westland, 16th of July, 1889; and Mr. Quinton, 22nd of October, 1889.

SALE OF OPIUM IN BURMA.

MR. BRYCE (Aberdeen, S.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether any correspondence on the subject of the sale of opium in Burma and of granting licences for the sale thereof has passed between the India Office and the Government of India since the correspondence (closing with a telegram, dated 16th August, 1888) which was presented to Parliament in 1888; and whether, if such correspondence has passed, there will be any objection to presenting it to Parliament?

SIR J. GORST: No, Sir; there has been no correspondence on the subject since the telegram of the 16th of August, 1888.

POPPY CULTIVATION IN BENGAL.

MR. MACLEAN (Oldham): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether the India Office has any evidence to show that the recent reduction in the area of poppy cultivation in Bengal is due to the intention of the Government of India to do away with the Opium Revenue little by little, and not to the commercial necessity for reducing production in order to keep up the price in face of the increasing competition of opium grown in China; and whether the policy of the Government of India with regard to this source of revenue is correctly expressed by Sir David Barbour, the Indian Finance Minister, who, in introducing his Budget for the year 1891-2, said—

"The Opium Revenue has no doubt fallen largely, and at this moment there are no indications of a recovery. On the other hand, the fall up to date has been discounted, and provision made to meet the consequent loss of revenue. As the fall has been so great we may fairly hope that for the present we have seen the worst?"

*SIR J. GORST: The reason given for the reduction of the area of poppy cultivation in Bengal is that the reserve stock of opium had become unduly large. The statements of Sir D. Barbour, no doubt, do correctly express the policy of the Government of India.

SIR G. CAMPBELL (Kirkcaldy, &c.): Will the right hon. Gentleman say whether the cultivation of opium has been stopped altogether in certain districts where it was least profitable?

*SIR J. GORST: I must ask the hon. Gentleman to give me notice of that question.

MANIPUR.

MR. SCHWANN (Manchester, N.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether he has now obtained any official reply as to the truth or falsehood of the rumours which have appeared in the Press, that the Indian troops killed Manipuri women and children in the affair at Manipur, so that, in case the rumour be proved false, it may be categorically denied?

*SIR J. GORST: In reply to the inquiry made by the Secretary of State the following telegram has been received from the Viceroy, which I will read to the House. It is dated April 21st, 1891—

"Foreign. Yours, yesterday. Regent asserts that several boys and women were killed at the time of the attack upon the Senapati's house. He does not say that they were related to him." Maxwell, Deputy Commissioner, observes on this: 'The atrocities named are altogether false, as I have made careful inquiries.' Gurdon, Assistant Commissioner, reports: 'That women and children were killed, &c., is absolutely false.' The officer commanding at Silchar telegraphed on the 10th: 'The officers state that no cruelty of any kind was practised by us, nor was it possible.' This refers to Boileau, and apparently to all other officers who retired with him to Silchar. Regent's statements will be further investigated on the spot."

COLONEL NOLAN (Galway, N.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India if his attention has been called to a paragraph in the Times, of the 22nd, stating that villages had been burned at Manipur; whether this statement is correct; and, if so, how many villages have been burned; whether these villages have been burned as a punishment or from military contingencies; and, further, if as a punishment, whether as a punishment for simple resistance or for some specific act of treachery committed by the village burned; and if the villages have been burned owing to military contingencies, would he state the nature of such contingencies, giving such data as would enable a comparison to be instituted with similar unavoidable accidents in European warfare?

SIR J. GORST: In consequence of the question of the hon. and gallant Member, my noble Friend the Secretary of State has carefully perused the Times of the 22nd inst.; but he has been unable to find any confirmation of the report that villages have been burned at Manipur.

COLONEL NOLAN: The words "at Manipur" in the question should be "in Manipur." It is a misprint.

SIR J. GORST: Neither at Manipur nor in Manipur have any villages been burned.

MR. WEBSTER (St. Pancras, E.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether he has yet received information as to the alleged statement that the troops employed in the Manipur Expedition were at the time of the recent disaster without an adequate or suitable supply of reserve ammunition to fit their rifles; and whether, if he has no knowledge as yet on the subject, he will telegraph to India for such information?

SIR J. GORST: I find from telegrams which have been received from the Government of India that this matter is now the subject of investigation in India; and I am afraid that I cannot give a satisfactory answer to my hon. Friend until a full Report of the result of the investigation has been received.

MR. KING (Hull, Central): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether, in view of the exceptional nature of the circumstances attending the Manipur disaster, care will be taken in any arrangements to be made with the Government of Manipur to secure that adequate compensation shall be exacted for the widows and relations of those who were massacred?

*THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster): In answer to the question of my hon. Friend, I have to tell him that the Secretary of State for India considers it premature to state at present what terms will be exacted from the Manipurees.

THE COMMERCE OF THE COLONIES AND INDIA.

MR. HOWARD VINCENT (Sheffield, Central): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies if there is any commercial department in the Colonial Office, as in the Foreign Office, engaged in actively collating commercial information concerning all British Possessions and making it known to the mercantile community in the United Kingdom and throughout the Empire to the advantage of mutual trade; and if he can state the total amount of the volume of trade in 1889 between the Mother Country and British Colonies and Dependencies (including India), and between the Colonies and Dependencies (including India) themselves?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Baron H. de WORMS, Liverpool, East Toxteth): There is no such commercial department in the Colonial Office; the duty is undertaken by the statistical department of the Board of Trade, which is furnished with all the materials for the purpose. The results are published annually by the Board of Trade, and are laid before Parliament in the Colonial Statistical Abstract, which is on sale to the public. The Colonial Office also annually lays before Parliament separate Reports from each colony; and, under arrangement with the Board of Trade that Department publishes monthly in the Board of Trade Journal the latest commercial information from the colonies, which Colonial Governments have been specially invited to furnish. These documents are distributed to the colonies, and are also on sale to the public. It appears from the Statistical Abstract that in 1889 the total value of imports (including bullion and specie) into India and the colonies from the United Kingdom, as far as could be ascertained, was £122,092,063, and the total value of exports from India and the colonies into the United Kingdom was £86,934,323. The volume of trade as between the colonies and dependencies could not be stated without lengthened research. As regards Indian trade, the special Statement presented to Parliament every five years gives the required information. The Statement for 1889-90 will shortly be in the hands of hon. Members.

TECHNICAL INSTRUCTION.

MR. H. BYRON REED (Bradford, E.): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether his attention has been called to the fact that a sum of nearly £4,000, arising out of the Local Taxation Act surplus, has been handed over to the Bradford Town Council for purposes of technical instruction; whether the Bradford Church Institute, in common with other institutions in the town providing technical instruction, and having schools of art and science classes in connection with the Science and Art Department, South Kensington, made application for a share of this grant; whether he is aware that the said science and art classes of the Bradford Church Institute have been established for 17 years, and are the second oldest of the kind in that town, are conducted on absolutely non-sectarian lines, and are open to and attended by students of all religious denominations; and whether, in view of the fact that, notwithstanding these circumstances, the Bradford Town Council has declined to apportion to the Church Institute any share of the funds placed at their disposal, he can apply or suggest any remedy for this?

THE VICE PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Sir W. HART DYKE, Kent, Dartford): Perhaps the hon. Member will allow me to reply to the question. The facts of the case have been correctly stated by my hon. Friend, and, in reply to an inquiry from a member of the Bradford County Council, the Science and Art Department have expressed their opinion that the school in question comes within the purview of Sub-section 1 (1) (d) of the Technical Instruction Act, 1889, and is qualified for the receipt of aid from the rates. If, therefore, the managers of the school feel aggrieved at the decision of the Council, it is for them to appeal to the Science and Art Department, under the subsequent sub-section of the Act, which provides that such points are to be determined by that Department.

BUTESHIRE COUNTY COUNCIL.

DR. CAMERON (Glasgow, College): I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether his attention has been called to the fact that the Buteshire County Council has resolved to appoint a County Medical Officer, who shall also act as District Medical Officer for Bute and Cumbræ or for Arran at a salary of £60 per annum, with liberty to carry on private practice; whether the Board of Supervision, as reported, had intimated to the County Council that "they had very reluctantly resolved not to oppose the scheme;" and whether any other proposals for the appointment of County Medical Officers at equally low salaries, and with liberty to engage in practice, have been sanctioned by the Board of Supervision; and, if not, on what grounds an exception was made in the case of Buteshire?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. P. B. Robertson, Bute): Under the regulations made by the Secretary for Scotland, the rule has been that a County Medical Officer should not be allowed to engage in private practice; but it was recognised that in some of the insular and smaller counties an exception might possibly have to be made. This has been found necessary in the cases of Bute, Orkney and Zetland, in all of which the salary does not exceed £60, and the holders of the appointments are permitted to retain their private practice. In those cases the Board are of opinion that the circumstances are exceptional, and that the rule could not be enforced without imposing an undue burden upon the ratepayers.

CROFTERS.

MR. LYELL (Orkney and Shetland): I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether he is aware that the Crofters' Commission have determined that sub-tenants, holding from a principal tenant or tacksman of a large farm or estate, are crofters within the meaning of "The Crofters' Holdings (Scotland) Act, 1886," and have entertained their applications, and fixed fair rents thereunder; whether he is aware that the First Division of the Court of Session, upon 19th March last, in the case of Robert Stewart Livingstone against Miss Mary Stewart Beattie, decided that sub-tenants are not crofters within the meaning of the said Act; whether he is aware that certain of these sub-tenants, who have been declared to be crofters, have been threatened with actions of reduction of the interlocutors of the Commission finding them to be crofters, and that all such sub-tenants who have been so declared to be crofters are exposed to such actions at the instance of their landlords; and whether the Government is prepared to take steps, with a view to the protection of said sub-tenant crofters, by amendment of the said Act, or otherwise; and, if so, in what manner?

MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: It is the case that the Crofters' Commission have determined in certain cases that sub-tenants are crofters within the meaning of the Crofters' Act, and have fixed fair rents. It is also the fact that the First Division of the Court of Session have decided that sub-tenants are not crofters in the sense of the Act. It was pointed out by the learned Judges that those persons are brought upon the estate, not by the landlord, but by the agricultural tenant, and accordingly that it is not surprising that the Act contains no provisions applicable to sub-tenants. I am not aware that actions have been threatened against those sub-tenants who have been dealt with as crofters by the Commissioners. The Government do not contemplate legislation on the subject.

MR. H. M. STANLEY AND THE CONGO FREE STATE.

MR. SCHWANN: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether he has any information as to Mr. H. M. Stanley having accepted an official position in the service of the Congo Free State; and, if so, what is that position, and what will be his powers; whether he has any information as to the effect that British and other European traders on the Lower Congo are migrating to the left bank of the river, to avoid the high duties and personal taxes now levied by the Congo State; is he aware that the villages on the road from Matadi to Stanley Pool have, within recent years, become deserted, through a variety of exactions and excesses committed on the villagers; whether, in view of the fact that the British Consul, who is entrusted with the protection of our traders on the Lower Congo, is located at the Cameroons (some 400 miles, approximately, distant from the mouth of the Congo), and inefficient for the purpose, Her Majesty's Government will consider the advisability of appointing a representative on the Lower Congo; what are to be the functions of the "International Commission," as laid down by the Berlin Conference; can he explain why it has not yet been appointed; and when will it be called into existence?

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Sir J. FERGUSSON, Manchester, N.E.): (1.) We have no such information. (2.) We have heard reports that traders have moved to the left bank, but we have not heard of the transfer of British traders. (3.) We are not aware that the statement is in accordance with facts. (4.) Mr. Annesley has been detained on temporary service in the Oil Rivers, but he will shortly be relieved, and will be free to proceed to the Congo District. (5, 6, and 7.) The functions of the International Commission would be to supervise the application of the Treaty to the parts of the river over which no sovereignty or protectorate has been assumed. It is to be presumed that the delay in its appointment has been owing to the fact that the attention of the Powers has been turned recently rather to other parts of Africa. The requisite appointment of delegates by at least five Powers has not been made, nor is it known when it will be made.

LONDON (CITY) TRIAL OF CIVIL CAUSES BILL.

MR. DARLING (Deptford): I beg to ask the First Commissioner of Works whether the Bill to legalise the holding of Assizes in the City of London is necessitated by reason of there being too few Courts in the Royal Courts of Justice for the Judges of the Queen's Bench Division; whether it is proposed to add to the number of Courts by building others at the Royal Courts of Justice; and whether each Judge has a private room, and also the use of certain rooms common to the other Judges?

Mr. Schwann

THE FIRST COMMISSIONER OF WORKS (Mr. PLUNKET, Dublin University): The Bill referred to in the question of my hon. and learned Friend was introduced partly because of there being too few Courts in the Royal Courts of Justice. No decision has at present been arrived at as to building others. It is true that each Judge has a private room, except the junior Judge (Mr. Justice Collins), who has the temporary use of the Lord Chancellor's room. There is, in addition to the private rooms, one common room for the Judges' meetings. It is also used as a luncheon room by the Judges.

HOURS OF WORK OF RAILWAY SERVANTS.

MR. CHANNING (Northampton, E.): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether the Board of Trade have now ordered the Return of instances in which railway servants have worked for more than 10 hours in any one day during the month of November, 1890, and of the number of instances in which railway servants, after working over 10 hours in any one day, have been called upon to resume duty without having rested eight hours?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Sir M. HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.): Yes, Sir. In consequence of the opinion which I found to prevail among the Committee upstairs, I have called for such a Return for the month of December last.

THE BURIALS ACT.

MR. S. T. EVANS (Glamorgan, Mid): I had intended to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he is aware of the following incidents, which have occurred during the current month in Llangeinor, Glamorganshire, namely, that in a burial in the parish church of Llangeinor, in respect of which notice had been given under "The Burials Act, 1880," the parent desired that his deceased child should be interred in the same grave as a former deceased child of his; that when the funeral proceeded to the churchyard on the 8th April, it was found that the wrong grave had been opened, and that consequently the body lay in an uncovered grave over the night; that next day two more graves were opened, and that extra fees were demanded for the burial; that when, only six days later, another child of the same parent died, the church authorities refused to open the grave for the burial of this child till such extra fees demanded on the previous burial had been paid, and that the parent was thus compelled to pay them; whether the levying of such extra fees was legal, and why the wrong graves were opened; and whether he will make recommendations which may tend to put an end to the difficulties placed in the way of persons who avail themselves of the Act? At the request of the right hon. Gentleman, I beg to postpone the question until Monday.

CASE OF GEORGE WILD.

MR. PICKERSGILL (Bethnal Green, S.W.): I beg to ask the First Commissioner of Works whether his attention has been called to the case of a man named George Wild, lately employed in Kew Gardens, who was discharged last year after 40 years' public service, and who is quite blind, and, it is stated, is "starving about the streets of Richmond;" and whether this man received any pension; and, if not, will he explain why?

MR. PLUNKET: I am informed by the Directors at Kew that George Wild was discharged from Kew Gardens in February, 1890, and received, in accordance with the regulations in force at that time, a gratuity of £35 4s., and that from inquiries which he has made he learns that Wild is not quite blind; that his wife is employed as cloak-room attendant in Kew Gardens at 9s. 4d. a week; that he has a grown-up son, and a well-furnished house, and cannot be said to be starving about the streets of Richmond. I shall, however, inquire farther into the

MR. PICKERSGILL: Is it true that Wild had been for 40 years in the public service?

MR. PLUNKET: I am aware that he had had a very long public service, and that he received a gratuity on his discharge.

THE ARGENTINE REPUBLIC AND BRITISH SAILORS.

MR. LEA (Londonderry, S.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs if his attention has been called to a statement in the Standard of April 18th—

"That a number of shipwrecked British sailors had been impressed by the Government of the Argentine Republic into service at a life saving station; that they had tried to escape, but were closely watched, and subject to cruel treatment;"

and whether inquiries had been made to test the truth of the statement, and also the names of the ships to which the sailors belonged, and their release demanded?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: Her Majesty's Government are taking steps to ascertain the facts.

CUSTOMS DEPARTMENT—PENSIONER BOATMEN.

MR. FURNESS (Hartlepool): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether his attention has been called to the grievances of the pensioner boatmen of the Outdoor Department of Her Majesty's Customs; whether it is the case that they complain that they are not provided with uniform, that their pay is stopped for every day (including Sundays) during which they are absent from duty through illness, and that they are not allowed either Bank Holidays or annual leave of absence; and whether he will undertake to inquire into these grievances, with a view to get them remedied?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. JACKSON, Leeds, N.): Pensioner boatmen employed in the Customs Department are paid as wages such a sum as for the time being makes up, when added to their pensions, the fixed sum of £75 per annum. Their status being that of hired men, they are not entitled to be provided with uniform clothing, and they are liable to duty on every day of the year, including Sunday and holidays, except Christmas Day, Good Friday, the Queen's birthday, and the first Monday in August, or days in lieu thereof if the exigencies of the service demand it.

THE "COUNTESS OF CARNARVON."

MR. MORTON (Peterborough): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether his attention has been drawn to the fact that the Managing Director of the Chartered British South Africa Company, Mr. Cecil Rhodes, despatched at the end of February last, from Port Natal, a steamship, the Countess of Carnarvon, under what were virtually false clearance papers; that afterwards Captain Pawley and certain troopers in the employ of the Chartered British South Africa Company were taken on board, as well as 1,000 rifles and 20,000 rounds of ball cartridge; that the Countess of Carnarvon afterwards ascended the Limpopo River, within Portuguese territory, a river not open to free navigation under the modus vivendi of August 1890, instead of proceeding to the port for which she had cleared; and that the arms and ammunition referred to were afterwards landed on Portuguese territory and conveyed into the interior; whether he can say for what purpose these arms were landed, and whether he is aware that no arms are allowed to pass through Portuguese territory into the interior of Africa without a licence from the Portuguese Government; and whether the proceedings of the officers, crew, and passengers of the Countess of Carnarvon constitute a violation of the fourth and other Articles of the modus vivendi of August 1890, between Her Majesty's Government and the Government of Portugal?

DR. CAMERON had also on the Paper the following Question: To ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether any official information has yet been received concerning the seizure of the British steamer Countess of Carnarvon by the Portuguese on the Limpopo River?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: I will reply at the same time to the question of the hon. Member for Glasgow. The reports which have reached us are incomplete, and do not enable me to reply in detail, but they confirm in part the statements as to the voyage of the Countess of Carnarvon referred to in the first part of the question. The High Commissioner has called for further information, and has directed that affidavits shall be obtained. The arms appear to have been supplied to Gungunhana at his request, and were landed at a spot indicated by him. I am informed that a bond was given to a Portuguese official for payment of duties if they could be legally claimed. The only engagement taken by Her Majesty's Government in the modus vivendi was that from the date of that agreement they would not make Treaties, accept Protectorates, or exercise any act of sovereignty within the sphere of influence assigned to Portugal by the Convention of August 1890. There was therefore nothing in the proceedings of the officers, crew or passengers of the Countess of Carnarvon, so far as we are acquainted with them, which constituted a violation of the modus vivendi agreement, but it appears certain that she sailed with false clearance papers.

PRISON CLERKS.

MR. LAWSON (St. Pancras, W.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department why the distinction between first-class and second-class clerks in Her Majesty's Prisons have not been abolished, and their annual increment increased from £5 to £7 10s., in accordance with the recommendation made by the Committee of Accounts, whose authority he quoted on this subject?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (MR. MATTHEWS, Birmingham, E.): The hon. Member professes to quote from a Report of a confidential nature, of which he can have no knowledge in any authentic or authorised way. The recommendations are not accurately quoted, and even if they were, it would not be usual that I should give reasons for acting or not acting upon them. I have stated generally, in reply to a question of the 8th December last, the results that had followed from the recommendations of the Committee in question. I have nothing to add to that answer.

LETTERS TO CANADA.

MR. G. OSBORNE MORGAN (Denbighshire, E.): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether it is the fact that all letters and newspapers passing between the United Kingdom and Canada have now to be despatched via New York, with the result that in some cases a higher rate of postage is charged; and whether this arrangement, under which our largest colony is cut off from direct communication with the Mother Country, is likely to be of a permanent character?

THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. RAIKES, Cambridge University): The Canadian mails were carried by the Allan Line under a contract with the Canadian Government, and my Department has no responsibility with reference to its sudden termination. This action has been taken entirely by the Dominion Government, by whom the contract was negotiated, and who I am given to understand have not found it possible to agree upon a renewal at present. In the meantime, the Mail Service with Canada must necessarily, under present circumstances, be carried on via New York; but so far as the public in this country are concerned, they will be charged no additional rates of postage.

THE PUNGWÉ RIVER.

DR. CAMERON: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether his attention has been called to the telegraphed report of Sir John Willoughby to the effect that two steamers, the Agnes and Shark, carrying British mails and a prospecting party led by him, had been fired on by the Portuguese at Biera, on the Pungwé River; that they, and some lighters belonging to them, had been seized, the British colours hauled down, and the Portuguese run up in their place, and that 16 men belonging to their crews had been imprisoned by the Portuguese; and whether the Foreign Office has received any official information on the subject?

SIR J. FERGUSSON: The High Commissioner telegraphed home Sir John Willoughby's report, which is the same as that published in the newspapers. We have no further information. Instructions have been given to the Admiralty to send some of Her Majesty's ships to the Pungwé in order to give any protection that may be necessary, and to consult with the Portuguese Authorities on the spot on the measures to be taken for facilitating communication with the interior. Orders have been sent from Lisbon which, as we are informed, will ensure that all opposition to such communications on the part of the Portuguese Authorities shall be entirely removed. We have also been officially informed from Lisbon that orders have been sent to put an end to the detention of the vessels and crews conveying Sir John Willoughby's party.

ENGINEERING BRANCH OF THE ROYAL NAVY.

CAPTAIN PRICE (Devonport): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty whether it is the case that there is a considerable falling off in the number of candidates for the engineering branch of the Royal Navy, and that this falling off is becoming more apparent every year; and, if so, what steps he proposes to take to render this branch of the Service more attractive to suitable candidates?

THE SECRETARY TO THE ADMIRALTY (Mr. FORWOOD, Lancashire, Ormskirk): There were 93 candidates last year for 40 vacancies as engineer students, and so far there are 110 candidates for 45 vacancies at the ensuing examination. The number of candidates for the appointments offered to engineer students educated at private establishments, and for Probationary Assistant Engineers, are comparatively small, and the conditions of entry as regards these classes are being inquired into.

ELECTRIC LIGHT PROVISIONAL ORDERS.

MR. J. SPENCER BALFOUR (Burnley): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether it is intended to grant a third Electric Light Provisional Order in any suburban district where two Orders are already in force without first revoking one of the existing Orders, and thus affording a guarantee that the policy of the Board of Trade, as already announced, that there should be only two Orders in force in one district, shall not be departed from?

SIR M. HICKS BEACH: The Board of Trade have no power to revoke a Provisional Order unless the undertakers fail to comply with the requirements of the Order within the prescribed time. In the only case in which the Board of Trade propose to grant a third Order in a district this Session, they have reason to believe that one of the existing companies will not be in a position to comply with the requirements of their Order within the time prescribed thereby. If this should be so, the Board of Trade will, when the proper time arrives, consider any application for the revocation of the Order that may be made to them by the County Council or the Local Authority.

THE BOERS.

MR. O. V. MORGAN (Battersea): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether his attention has been directed to a letter from Pretoria, in the Manchester Guardian of Tuesday, under the heading "Another Boer Trek;" and whether the establishment of the proposed "Republic of the North" is an interference with the rights of the Chartered Company of South Africa?

BARON H. DE WORMS: The High Commissioner has been directed to make it known in the South African Republic that any attempt to establish a Republic in the territories placed under the British South Africa Company will not be tolerated, and to inform the Government of that Republic that any such attempt, or any proceedings inconsistent with the protection accorded to Lobengula, or to any other chief in the territories under British influence, will be deemed an act of hostility against the Queen: and, further, that the Government of the South African Republic will be held to their undertaking in Art. X. of the Swaziland Convention to use their best efforts to support the authority of the British South Africa Company.

INFERIOR WHISKY.

MR. O'HANLON (Cavan, E.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury if he is aware that a much larger quantity of new inferior whisky has been put into consumption for the past 12 months than that of any other year for the last 20 years, owing, it is alleged, to the fact that retailers cannot increase the price of small quantities sold over the counter, and that, on the other hand, they cannot reduce the liquor below the standard acknowledged by law; and whether he will inquire whether this sale of inferior whisky is in any way attributable to the extra Spirit Duty imposed last year, and take the entire matter into consideration when proposing his next Budget?

MR. JACKSON: No record is kept of the quality of whisky brought into consumption.

Sir M. Hicks Beach

TECHNICAL EDUCATION.

MR. FARQUHARSON (Dorset, W.): I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education whether there would be any objection to setting apart a sum from the grants in aid of technical education for the purpose of awarding prizes for efficiency in ploughing, shearing, hedging, hurdle-making, and other matters connected with agriculture; and whether, if there be no objection, he would cause a Memorandum to be sent to the different County Councils to that effect?

SIR W. HART DYKE: Such subjects are plainly included in the processes of agriculture, for instruction in which the Act of 1889 provides; but I think the particular form suggested for the encouragement of such instruction may be open to legal objection, though something might depend upon the method of its connection with any general scheme adopted by the County Council.

COSTS IN THE CHANCERY DIVISION.

MR. DARLING: I beg to ask the Attorney General whether he is aware that costs under the scale in force in the Chancery Division are higher than those allowed in the Queen's Bench Division of the High Court of Justice, and that a Committee of Masters and others was appointed to consider how to bring the two scales of costs into accord; whether that Committee has made any Report; and when it last sat?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir R. WEBSTER, Isle of Wight): The scale of costs is, I am informed, the same both in the Chancery and Common Law Divisions, but I am not sure that the application of the rules is exactly the same in both Divisions. A Departmental Committee did investigate the subject in 1889, and reported in July of that year; but it would not, in my opinion, be for the public interests that I should make any further statement as to the Report of that Committee. It has not sat since. If my hon. and learned Friend will communicate with me, I may be in a position to give him further information upon the question.

THE EVELYN V. HURLBERT CASE.

MR. SUMMERS (Huddersfield): I beg to ask the Attorney General whether he will call the attention of the Public Prosecutor to the case of "Evelyn v. Hurlbert," with a view to seeing whether sufficient evidence exists on which to base a prosecution of one or other of the parties to the suit for perjury?

SIR R. WEBSTER: In this case it is clear there must be the most careful investigation as to whether any or either of the parties can be convicted of perjury.

THE BERLIN CONFERENCE.

MR. ELLIOTT LEES (Oldham): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether any, and if so what, legislative action has been taken by Foreign Governments to carry out the recommendations of the Berlin Conference on labour questions; and whether any system analogous to what is known in this country as the "half-time" system exists abroad?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: In answer to my hon. Friend the information which the Government has received is at present of a somewhat imperfect character, but it would appear that no especial legislative action to carry out the recommendations of the Berlin Conference has yet been taken by Austria, Belgium, France, Germany, Italy, the Netherlands, Portugal, or Spain. In Hungary, the Sunday Rest Act, and an Act for relief of workmen incapacitated by illness have been passed. In Denmark a law stopping unnecessary and regulating necessary Sunday labour has been recently passed, and in Switzerland there has been legislation limiting the hours of railway servants. In Belgium and Switzerland laws are already in force in harmony with the principal recommendations of the Conference. From Sweden and Norway no information has yet been received. In regard to the second part of the question, systems analogous to "half-time" or in some way limiting the hours of children, are in force in Austria, Hungary, France (partially), Germany, Italy, the Netherlands, and Switzerland. In Belgium half-time is voluntarily introduced in several large businesses. In Denmark, Portugal, and Spain there appear to be no regulations as to half-time. Further and fuller details have been asked for, which, when received, I shall be glad to give my hon. Friend.

THE BLOCK IN THE LAW COURTS.

MR. H. H. FOWLER (Wolverhampton, E.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether, having regard to the waste of judicial time involved in the present arrangements for the administration of justice in London and at the Assizes, to the accumulation of arrears arising from the long periods during which the Courts are not sitting, and to the dissatisfaction which exists with respect to the increased cost and delay caused by the working of the Judicature Acts, the Government will institute an Inquiry, either by a Royal Commission or by a Select Committee, either of this or the other House, to inquire into and report on the whole question?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: The Government do not propose to institute an inquiry into the working of the Judicature Acts. The principal Judicature Act, following on a Royal Commission, is of so recent an origin, while the Acts and regulations for the relief of business at the Assizes and for clearing the lists in London have scarcely yet been a year in full operation, that there does not appear to the Government to be any case for an inquiry of the kind suggested?

STORNOWAY AND CARLOWAY.

DR. McDONALD (Ross and Cromarty): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether the £15,000, to be spent on levelling the road between Stornoway and Carloway, is to be spent on levelling alone, or does it also include the laying down of tram lines on that road; and whether, if it is to be used solely as a road, by how many hours its construction will accelerate the carriage of fish to Stornoway as compared with the time that is taken up on the road in its present state?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: The offer of the Government of £15,000 is for levelling and improving the existing road, and does not include the laying down of tram lines. It is proposed to improve the gradient so that it shall not exceed 1 in 30. At present the worst gradient is 1 in 7, thus seriously reducing the load which can be carried. It has been stated that the charge for cartage is now 20s. per ton. If the road were improved as proposed this would probably be materially reduced, and the time of the journey correspondingly reduced.

BRITISH COLUMBIA.

MR. SETON-KARR (St. Helena): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether the Government are considering the proposals of the Government of British Columbia to guarantee the interest on an Imperial loan of £150,000, to be utilised for the colonisation of selected families from the United Kingdom to that country; whether, in view of the favourable nature of such proposals, the Imperial Government are prepared now, or in the near future, to in any way accept or co-operate in them; if so, to what extent; if not, what are the objections, if any, to such co-operation; and whether the Imperial Government are aware how long the British Columbian Government are prepared to keep this offer open for acceptance?

MR. W. H. SMITH: The Government have not yet had sufficient time to fully consider the Report of the Colonisation Committee, but it is obvious that it is too late this year to select families for emigration. It will, however, be necessary for the Government before the autumn to go into the question if emigration is to take place next spring, and I hope it may be in my power before the House finally rises to make some statement of our intentions.

STATE OF SUPPLY.

MR. J. E. ELLIS (Nottingham, Rushcliffe): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether, inasmuch as the House has now been sitting this Session for 70 days as against 125 in the Session of 1890 and 122 in the Session of 1889, and, as out of a total of 175 Votes in Supply only 13 have been taken, he will now mention a time when the Government will enable the House to perform one of its primary duties, by fixing definite and regular days for the consideration of Supply?

MR. W. H. SMITH: I am obliged to the hon. Member for calling attention to the slow progress made with Public Business. The House has been sitting about 70 consecutive days, and Government Business has had precedence only on 43 of those days, eight of them having been devoted to Supply. If the hon.

Mr. W. H. Smith

Gentleman would use his influence with some of the Members on his side of the House, who have occupied two-thirds of the time, or nearly so, with a view to prevent prolixity and repetition, the progress of Public Business might be somewhat more rapid. When the Land Purchase Bill has been reported to the House it will then be in our power to make some arrangement as to Supply.

MR. J. E. ELLIS: Were we not given a promise last Session that Supply should be taken early this year?

MR. W. H. SMITH: I am sure the hon. Gentleman will see that any arrangement to put down a particular order for a given day could be frustrated by gentlemen on his side of the House.

DR. FARQUHARSON (Aberdeen, W.): May I ask whether, if days cannot be fixed, the Estimates cannot be taken in their regular order? There is much inconvenience to Members in the fact that the Votes are not taken in their regular sequence.

MR. W. H. SMITH: It will always be my duty to suit the convenience of the House.

CITY OF LONDON PAROCHIAL CHARITIES ACT.

MR. CAUSTON (Southwark, W.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether, when nominating the five members of the new Governing Body under the Central Scheme of "The City of London Parochial Charities Act, 1883," he will endeavour to secure, as far as possible, the representation on that body of persons of various views and interests, and particularly those who have devoted themselves to considering the various objects on which the Parochial Charity Funds could be most usefully bestowed; and whether he can state when the appointments are likely to be made?

MR. W. H. SMITH: The hon. Member will probably be surprised to hear that the Government, in recommending to Her Majesty members for appointment on behalf of the Crown to the Central Governing Body of the City, carefully considered the fitness of those whose names were submitted. The Central Governing Body had, I am informed, their first meeting on Tuesday. The members who represent the Crown are the Dean of St. Paul's, General Lynedoch Gardiner, C.B., Mr. Hayes Fisher, M.P., Mr. Quintin Hogg (Polytechnic), and Mr. C. J. Drummond (Secretary London Compositors).

BELFAST WATER COMMISSIONERS.

MR. BLANE (Armagh, S.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury is he aware that Mr. E. Murphy, Arbitrator to the Local Government Board, sat on the 1st June to hear claims for compensation re the Belfast Water Commissioners and property owners and occupiers in Oldpark, near Belfast; that the final hearing of objections was held on 28th October, 1890, and the final award only made on 6th April, 1891; whether Mr. Murphy lodged a copy of this final award with the solicitors for the Water Commissioners two months before it was signed by him, for the purpose of enabling the Water Commissioners to consult counsel with reference to the Act which came into force on 1st April, 1889; and if any complaints have reached the Government with reference to the alleged delay in the publication of the award and the small amount of compensation given to property owners and others in Oldpark, Belfast?

MR. JACKSON: I am informed that the dates mentioned in the first paragraph of the question are substantially correct. There is no foundation for the allegations contained in the second paragraph, and no complaints have reached the Government in reference to delay in the publication of the award to property owners and others in Oldpark, Belfast.

CASE OF WILLIAM COLL.

DR. FITZGERALD (Longford, S.): I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether, in view of the facts that the conviction of William Coll at the Maryborough Assizes in the autumn of 1889, for participation in the proceedings at Gweedore on the occasion of the arrest of the Rev. Father M'Fadden, was affirmed, on appeal, only by a small majority of the Judges of the Court of Criminal Appeal in Ireland; that amongst those who dissented from the judgment of the majority of the Court were the Lord Chief Justice (now Lord Morris) and the Lord Chief Baron; and that Coll has now undergone one year and a half of penal servitude, he will advise the Lord Lieutenant to exercise the prerogative of mercy in his regard, and remit the remainder of his sentence?

*THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. MADDEN, Dublin University): There has already been a Memorial to the Lord Lieutenant in this case, and the decision come to was that the law must take its course. The question as to the admissibility of evidence, on which the members of the Court of Criminal Appeal differed in opinion, does not in any way affect the merits of the applications.

INLAND REVENUE — DUBLIN SUPERVISORS.

MR. CLANCY (Dublin Co., N.): I beg to ask the Secretary of the Treasury whether the outdoor supervisors of Inland Revenue in the "collection" which comprises the City and County of Dublin, as well as portions of the Counties of Wicklow, Wexford, Kildare, Meath, and Carlow, are compelled by the extensive character of their duties to work from 10 to 12 hours on week days, and often to work on Sundays also; and whether the Commissioners of Inland Revenue have described the outdoor supervisors as their most important officers, they being solely responsible to the Exchequer for the due and proper charging of the Excise Revenue; and, if so, will he direct the Commissioners of Inland Revenue to investigate the circumstances of their position with a view to increasing the staff of outdoor supervisors for the Dublin collection?

MR. JACKSON: No such Regulation exists, but the Board of Inland Revenue are inquiring into the matter.

THE IRISH LAND BILLS.

MR. BARTLEY (Islington, N.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether, as two weeks (sitting from day to day except Wednesday) have now been occupied with the Committee stage of the Irish Land Bills, and only one clause of the first Bill (out of 58 clauses) has been passed, he will consider the question of naming a day to report these Bills, so as to secure the ending of the Session in July?

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.) also put a question upon the subject.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I am aware of the very serious delay that has taken place in the Committee stage of the Irish Land Purchase Bill, but I trust that the good sense and feeling of the House will enable such progress to be made as will make it unnecessary for the Government to adopt the extreme course proposed by the hon. Member.

MR. J. MORLEY (Newcastle-upon-Tyne): After what hour will the Land Bill be not taken to-night? I see that it is down on the Orders.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: Not after 11 o'clock.

MR. SEXTON: I presume that the right hon. Gentleman gives no countenance to the suggestion that a day should be named for reporting the Bill?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: No, Sir.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

WAYS AND MEANS.

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

*(4.15.) THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square): Mr. Courtney, I wonder whether hon. Members of this House who did me the honour last year to listen to my Financial Statement remember how, when I was suggesting that the Estimates of the Revenue for the coming year ought to be framed in a spirit of prudence, they associated themselves with that suggestion by a responsive cheer. I was then suggesting that, when we looked to the barometrical readings which ought to be studied if we would make a forecast of the condition of the people, there were signs in those barometrical readings directing us to frame our Estimates rather in a spirit of caution than in a sanguine spirit. I asked this House at the time whether they considered that I was right in my suggestion. The Committee associated themselves with me, if I may say so, in a partnership in regard to the caution with which the Estimates ought to be framed. Now, Sir, we are able to point to a surplus of £1,756,000 as the result of last year's finance. Nevertheless, I feel confident that the House will feel that they were right in the view which they took, and that it would have been wrong, looking to the circumstances of the time, to have counted upon the Revenue which happily has flowed into the coffers of the State. There was no certainty at that time of a continuance of the progressive prosperity which we now enjoy, nor of the speculative activity which marked the previous year. The Committee will remember that there were some ominous signs. The relations between capital and labour were strained, and there were symptoms of everything not being entirely right in the regions of high finance; and, accordingly, we were justified in presuming that no sanguine view should be taken of the Revenue of the year. Again, the Committee will remember the position of the Spirit Duties, and the part which they played in the Estimates of last year. Were we justified in calculating upon the cumulative force in the tendency to spend a large portion of the increased wages and profits upon them? The close of the financial year has shown that the anxiety we felt at the beginning of the year was not misplaced. There were incidents towards the latter part of last year—dramatic, I might almost say tragic, incidents—which proved that, although we have escaped the great dangers which were besetting us, it was right not entirely to ignore the possible advent of such dangers. Again, fortunately, some of those strikes which threatened to be of a duration long enough to mar any hopes of an increased Revenue, were settled in the end, and there, again, we have escaped from dangers which might have occurred. I believe I may fairly claim that if ever caution was justified by results it has been so in the financial results of the year of which I have now to present the accounts, although the excess of Revenue over Expenditure has reached the satisfactory figure of £1,756,000. This result is all the more gratifying as in the past year it has been my fate to have to provide for a certain amount of unexpected expenditure. The needs of Ireland have compelled us to incur an increased expenditure of £200,000, an expenditure which this country has not grudged; to its poorer Sister in her time of need. Then there are the Post Office and the Telegraphs; they required Supplementary Estimates of £200,000, and of that amount £150,000 and more has been due to an increase in the wages of the men employed. I would here suggest that, when the inevitable attack is made some day on the increase of the Expenditure, even our most ardent critics should be good enough to remember both with sympathy and with justice, that public opinion has given the Government the cue that it is no longer to buy in the cheapest market, but in the best, and is no longer to employ the cheapest labour, but the best. This tendency will show itself in a more striking form in the Estimates of the current year. There is another item of increased Expenditure in which the Committee will bear a share of the responsibility with the Government. I allude to the boon that was given to the Volunteers last year; I then included in the estimated Expenditure a Supplementary Estimate of £100,000, and the Secretary for War undertook to find another £50,000. But the result of carrying out the wishes of Parliament has been even more expensive than we expected, and the Supplemental Estimates show an increase of £80,000 on that head. With the history of the Supplementary Estimate of £350,000 for the Navy the Committee is already acquainted. But, apart from these excesses, I have had two bequests of liability left me by my predecessors, which it has been my unhappy fate to have to meet this year. The Irish Constabulary Fund was insolvent; and I hope I have put the fund straight at an expense of £150,000. I have had to provide another quite unexpected £100,000 in respect of what the older Members of the House may remember as the Chancery Book Debt. In 1872 it was supposed that a large amount of money owing to suitors in Chancery would never be claimed, and the sum of about £2,500,000 was written off. But experience has proved that an increased spirit of research, assisted by those means of increased publicity which the present day demands, has enabled many suitors, who it was believed would never claim, to make their claim, and possibly also old business has been cleared off at a more rapid pace, and perhaps there has been a desire on the part of some suitors to invest in other securities. The result has been that I have been called upon to find a sum of £100,000 out of the Revenue of the year and to place it to the credit of this fund. The Committee will sympathise with a Chancellor of the Exchequer who in a heavy year like this has been called upon to find £250,000 to meet such inherited liabilities. I have put before the Committee certain increased charges which we have had to meet. This last item of £100,000 increases the head of "Other Charges on the Consolidated Fund." Under this head there have been some savings, partly of account and partly of fact; £40,000, which was charged on the Consolidated Fund for Ireland in lieu of the licences given to England and Scotland, was not paid by the Consolidated Fund, as the Bill authorising the payment did not pass; but it was voted in Committee of Supply, so that it has no effect on the aggregate expenditure of the year. But we placed on the Consolidated Fund £300,000 for the erection of barracks, which I had undertaken to pay out of the Revenue of the year. Of this sum only £225,000 has been actually required, which gives a saving of £75,000. Lastly, the Committee will remember that a large sum was taken for the drawback on silver plate after the repeal of the duty. I am happy to say that the drawback did not reach the Estimate by £25,000—a very satisfactory result, due in great part to the administrative ability with which this complicated matter was carried out. As the final result of the excesses and savings which I have mentioned, the charges on the Consolidated Fund show a decrease of £65,000 as compared with the Estimates. The Supply Services show an increase of £421,500. The net increase is accordingly £356,000, which is less than one-half per cent. over the Budget Estimate. The exact totals are—£87,377,000, Budget Estimate; Exchequer Issues, £87,733,000, difference £356,000. If I include all that has been granted by Supplementary Estimates the final figures are somewhat different. The total grants were £88,511,000, against an annual Expenditure of £87,733,000, but the Departments have spent £778,000 less than Parliament placed at their disposal. I mention this to show that savings have been going on, and that the Departments have not abused the liberality of Parliament. The past year has not been free from Emergency Expenditure, but nevertheless the elasticity in the Revenue has enabled us to meet the increased expenditure in a manner which I hope will be considered on all sides as satisfactory. What has been the Revenue? The actual Revenue exceeds the Estimate by £1,879,000. Yet, as I have ventured to suggest, the Estimates were carefully framed, and framed with every propriety, of which I hope to submit proof to the Committee. The Committee will be impatient to learn under what heads these excesses have arisen. But let me point out that this increase of £1,879,000 is, after all, but about 2 per cent. on the total Revenue. One turn of the screw, one change in the general current of prosperity, and you might lose that 2 per cent. on which, happily, we are able to congratulate ourselves this year. In 1889-90, the Committee will remember, it was alcohol which played the principal part in depositing no less than £1,800,000 in the coffers of the State beyond my expectations. I refused to believe at the time that it was probable that the increase in the consumption of alcohol would continue and the revenue from its taxation again be exceeded. I think that was the view of the Committee also; but we were wrong in that respect. I believed we had reached the summit of the consumption of alcohol; but this year again, in the various items of alcohol, the consumption exceeds the estimate I had formed by no less a sum than £900,000. Out of the total increase of £1,879,000, alcohol counts for £900,000. There is the same rivalry this year between the various forms of alcohol as there was last year. Brandy, rum, wine, beer, foreign spirits, British spirits—all have shown again an increased yield; but the increase is chiefly in spirits; it has been larger in spirits than in any other department of alcohol. But it must not be said on that account that it is to Scotland or to Ireland that we mainly owe the increase in the Revenue. Being now able to trace the consumption to different parts of the United Kingdom with comparative accuracy, we have been able to see where this increase of consumption has taken place, and we find that the ratio of increase has been considerably larger in England than it has been either in Scotland or Ireland. In England the consumption of home-made spirits was over 18,000,000 gallons in the year—an increase of nearly 9 per cent. over the high figures for the previous year. The consumption beat the record by 1,000,000 gallons; and it was the highest consumption in England since 1880. In Scotland the consumption was 6,500,000 gallons, or an increase of $7\frac{1}{2}$ per cent.; and in Ireland the total consumption was 4,900,000 gallons, showing the same increase of $7\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. over last year. In both these parts of the United Kingdom this height of consumption has frequently been reached before, and sometimes passed; but in England it has never before reached this level. Rum once more shows a large percentage of increase—nearly $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. over my estimate. Rum gives an increase of £144,000, brandy of £34,000, wine of £10,000, beer of £137,000, spirits of £586,000—together £901,000. I have taken British and foreign spirits together, because of the change in the system of methylation, which involves a transfer of a certain portion of revenue from Customs to Inland Revenue, amounting last year to £280,000. The net increase of revenue from foreign and British spirits is £586,000. The Committee can scarcely judge of the importance of this increase without reference to the amount on which it is an increase. That amount is about £15,000,000. The aggregate total of alcohol revenue is about £30,000,000. The total increase over the Receipts of the previous year is £720,000, and the increase over the Estimate is £900,000. I had allowed for a slight decrease in the consumption of spirits, not being prepared for the continuance of that considerable increase in every department of alcohol which we have witnessed in the past year. [Sir W. HAR- COURT (Derby) here asked a question.] I ought to have said the figures do not include the additional 6d. a gallon on spirits, nor the additional 3d. on the barrel of beer, imposed for purposes of local taxation; I am speaking of Imperial Revenue only, which, of course, makes these figures all the more striking. Although this increase in the consumption of alcoholic beverages may be viewed with some disappointment and regret, there is at the same time in that increase of consumption one element of satisfaction. It shows that the powers of consumption of the working classes, owing to the increase of wages, has been on the increase during the last year. I have now the satisfaction to tell the Committee that the Customs, irrespective of the increase of spirits, show a satisfactory result all round, and bear eloquent testimony to the fact that the year 1890 will stand out as one of the years in which the working classes, as well as all other classes, have been able to add to the Revenue by their power of securing increased comforts for themselves and their families. I estimated the total Revenue from Customs at £19,116,000, and the Receipts have been £19,480,000, showing a surplus of Revenue over the estimated receipts of £364,000. To this must be added, for the purpose of comparison as regards Customs, £280,000 owing to the change made as regards the methylation of spirits, so that the Customs really show an increase of £644,000. Before the change was made as to the methylation of spirits, the spirits that were introduced from abroad first paid duty to Customs and afterwards had it returned in the shape of drawback by the Inland Revenue after the methylation had taken place. The spirits are now methylated in bond, and the Customs, therefore, lose the Revenue they previously obtained. On the other hand, the Inland Revenue is saved from the necessity of paying drawback, and thus the receipts of the Inland Revenue are increased by the sum by which the receipts of the Customs are diminished. The Committee should understand that the total of foreign spirits, owing to the circumstance that I have described, does not show an increase in Customs, but a decline of £107,000 as compared with the estimate. The increased power of consumption shown by the Revenue Returns of last year is also manifested by non-alcoholic beverages. The minor non-alcoholic beverages, including cocos, show as usual little change, but tea plays a happy part in the history of last year, notwithstanding a Paper which has been circulated this morning to Members of the House in which it is suggested that no greater injury could be done to the consumers of tea than to take off the duty—a somewhat novel doctrine in political economy. I am not sure I do not see in that document some jealousy on the part of importers of tea from China in respect of the teas imported from our own possessions of Ceylon and India. Those possessions are contributing more and more to the tea supply of this country, and I doubt whether the strictures passed upon these newer imports in the document to which I allude are just. The reduction of the Tea Duty last year involved a loss of £1,500,000, but I reduced this loss in my Estimate to £1,282,000, by making allowance for increased consumption and other causes, but an increase in the receipts of £209,000 over my Estimate reduces the net loss to the Revenue to £1,073,000. A certain portion of the increase is due to the remission of duty, and the remainder is due to increased consumption irrespective of the reduction of duty. Making a careful calculation of all the necessary allowances, I conclude that the increase in 1890-91 over 1889-90 was at the rate of $6\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. This, however, is not to be judged alone by the imports of the tea leaf, but also by the difference between the teas of China and those of India and Ceylon. Impartial judges say that the power of the leaf from our own possessions as compared with China teas is in the proportion of $7\frac{1}{2}$ to 5 gallons of liquid of ordinary strength. Therefore, the increased consumption of tea is really still greater if we calculate the number of cups that have been drunk as distinct from the quantities of tea imported, because the tea from India and Ceylon goes further than the tea from China. I offer no opinion of my own as to relative strength; I only mention it as the opinion of impartial judges; and I believe the comparison is justified by the relative prices of the different teas. Taking into consideration the increase in gallons of liquid, the total increase in the amount of tea drunk per head is about 7 per cent., instead of $6\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. calculated on imported leaf alone. I pass to another article on which the duty was reduced last year, namely, currants. In 1861 the duty on currants stood at 15s.; it was first reduced to 7s., and last year it was further reduced to 2s. I calculated the Revenue from currants at £120,000, allowing for a considerable increase of consumption, and that Estimate has been almost exactly verified. While by that reduction we lost £215,000 of Revenue, the consumption has increased 26 per cent., and I think everyone will acknowledge that to be a satisfactory result. But, more than this, we obtained at the same time when we reduced the Currant Duty, concessions from Greece as regards the taxes on imports from England. And I see, just as might have been expected, that our imports of currants having increased, our exports to Greece have increased by 22 per cent. I now come to another interesting article. Possibly the majority of the Committee will be pleased to hear, while others will deplore it as an evil sign, that there has been an increased consumption of tobacco. There is no article which played a larger part in the Revenue of last year, considering its position in the Customs, than tobacco, the receipts of the year exceeding those of its predecessor by £474,000. I calculated on an increase of £213,000, but that has been more than doubled. A small portion was due to the cigar trade, but the great bulk was in that kind of tobacco which is sold to the people. I have looked at the quantity supplied, and I find that there has been a large increase of consumption by the wage-earning classes. One ounce of tobacco gives 12 pipes, and, according to that calculation, the increase in the number of pipes smoked last year was 560,000,000 pipes. But, though I put it in that way, there is a serious side to this question, too. We see in all this the increased powers of consumption, on which we are able to congratulate ourselves. We expected to lose by the reduction of the duty on tea £1,500,000, on currants £210,000, and on wine £10,000, making a total of £1,720,000, in addition to £280,000 through the methylation of spirits, which would show a total estimated loss on Customs of £2,000,000, but the actual loss was only £980,000 as compared with last year. Here we have satisfactory evidence of a considerable recuperation. I now pass to the Excise. As regards the Beer Duty, apart from the additional 3d. per barrel imposed for local purposes, it realised £375,000 more than the year before, and an increase of £127,000 over my Estimate. The total is £9,391,000. Of spirits I have already spoken. The increase over my Budget Estimate has turned out to be £870,000, or, deducting the gain resulting from the saving of drawback on methylated spirits, about £600,000. I now pass to the other items of Revenue, and the transition shows some curious results. The considerable advance shown in the Revenue derived from consumption almost immediately disappears. I particularly call the attention of the Committee to the somewhat remarkable figures connected with the Death Duties. One would think that that item of Revenue was most likely to be affected by the changes and chances of this mortal life, but none appears more possible of an absolutely correct estimate. I estimated those duties at £7,460,000, and the receipts were £7,444,000; the whole difference between Receipts and Estimates being only £16,000. The half Probate Duty was estimated to yield £2,400,000, and it gave £2,412,000, a most extraordinary instance of exact calculation. The increase, as compared with last year, is £148,000. The Estate Duty shows an increase of £124,000, and Succession Duty £110,000. Legacy Duty fell off £262,000, which I must balance by the other two. On the whole, the Death Duties come out right within £16,000. Therefore, they contribute nothing to that excess of Revenue over Expenditure to which I referred at the commencement of my remarks. General stamps have not realised the Estimate by £90,000. I allowed for a decrease of £85,000, and, therefore, the decrease is £175,000 as compared with the previous years. Then there is a loss as compared with the previous year on deeds and other instruments of £92,000; on bonds to bearer, of £50,000; on transfer of foreign securities, £18,000; on tax on formation of companies, £43,000; and on contract notes, of £7,000. In all these cases, while the Estimate has scarcely been realised, there has been no serious loss. It shows the forecast that the year would not be a very fruitful one in speculative transactions was accurate, and the caution exercised was abundantly justified. The whole Estimate under the head of Stamps (which includes the Death Duties) was £13,572,000, and the receipts were £13,460,000—a decrease of £112,000. House Tax was estimated at £1,460,000, and it realised £1,570,000, being £110,000 more than was anticipated, but a loss of £400,000 as compared with the proceeds of last year's tax. The result of the Income Tax again shows a remarkably accurate Estimate. We calculated on £13,200,000, and it realised £13,250,000, the whole difference on that enormous sum being £50,000. The total receipts of Inland Revenue collected for Imperial purposes exceeded the sum estimated by £1,114,000, but if from that is deducted the amount due to the increased consumption of beer and spirits, which comes roughly to

£1,000,000, it will be seen that the difference on the total Estimate is less than $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent.—conclusive proof of the caution and accuracy with which the Estimates had been framed. If, on the one hand, there has been a large increase in the produce of indirect taxation, when we come to Stamps, Death Duties, and Income Tax, the Estimate has just been realised, and that is all that can be said. I have still to deal with non-Tax Revenue. The Post Office and Telegraphs show an increase of Receipts over Estimate of £120,000, but that increase of Receipts is less than the increase of Expenditure over my Estimate, and, on the whole, the Post Office and Telegraphs show a loss, taking both sides together, as compared with my Estimates of last year, notwithstanding the fact that we did not realise the whole loss anticipated on the reduction in Colonial Postage, which only came into force on January 1. On Miscellaneous Revenue there is a satisfactory increase of £280,000. Of that sum, £200,000 was derived from profit on silver. In the year before it had given more than the ordinary profit, and we were of opinion that we had supplied the country with as much silver as they required. The country, however, have taken so much more than we anticipated that the receipts have been increased by £200,000 over our estimate. The total increase in non-Tax Revenue is £401,000. Adding to that the increase on Customs of £364,000 and the increase on Inland Revenue of £1,114,000, I get a total of £1,879,000 increase of Receipts over my Budget Estimate; and if I now deduct the Exchequer issues from the Receipts, I find a surplus of £1,756,000, as compared with the margin which I provided last year of £233,000, not, I hope, an unsatisfactory result in a year of uncertainty and doubt. This concludes the story I have to tell as regards the past year; and I venture to hope, although I thought it necessary to go into some detail, that these figures will not have been without interest to the Committee. I now approach a different, but a cognate, subject of our finance. I have spoken of the Expenditure which has been voted by Parliament and paid out of the taxes. I now come—and I think that hon. Members opposite will be particularly anxious that I should say a few words on this point—to the expenditure which we have incurred out of loans, and I will put this matter in the simplest form possible. The Committee will remember that there were three Acts passed. There is the Barracks Act, the Naval Defence Act, and the Imperial Defence Act. The Barracks Act I can dismiss in a few words. Our borrowing powers were only to begin in 1891-2. In the past years the funds for proceeding with the building of barracks were provided out of the Revenue of the year. Nothing has been borrowed under this Act. With regard to the Imperial Defence Act, that is divided into two parts—(1) naval, and (2) military. We were authorised to borrow under the naval part £850,000, and under the military £2,600,000. Under the naval portion we spent in the year 1888-9 £270,000; in the year 1889-90, £337,000; and in the year 1890-91, £243,000, or a total of £850,000. This total amount, less £52,000, charged on the Navy Votes, was borrowed from the National Debt Commissioners in 1889-90, the sums spent in 1888-89 and in 1889-90 having been taken out of balances, to which they were restored last year. The whole of this loan is to be repaid by annuities running over the next 12 years, amounting to £97,000 a year. On the other side we receive contributions from the Colonies, for the construction of the ships alone, of £35,000, irrespective of their maintenance. This is estimated at 5 per cent. on £700,000, the original estimate of the cost of the ships, but is actually about $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. of the cost. After 12 years this Fleet becomes the free property of the State. I say free property, because up to that time, as the colonies undertake to pay the interest of the debt, the ships are not the free property of the State. They have to be kept in Australian waters, for the defence of which they are used jointly by the Imperial and Colonial Authorities. The annuity of £35,000 is provided by Statute by the Colonial Parliaments. We have proceeded by Statute also, and I will leave it to the impartial critic to say whether, considering that we are to be paid over a course of years by the colonies, and shall be in receipt of a sum of £35,000 for 12 years, it would have been fair to the taxpayers of two years that they should have paid the whole cost of these ships, while the taxpayers of the following 10 years would be receiving as a free gift the sum remitted by the colonies. I think I may say that, whether hon. Members agree with me or not, I have given a rational and fair account of that transaction. I now come to the military portion. Under this there was spent in 1888-9, £390,000; in 1889-90, £500,000; and in 1890-91, £780,000, which with a balance in hand of £60,000 makes up a total of £1,730,000. This total amount was borrowed on Treasury Bills in 1890-91, the sums issued in 1888-9 and in 1889-90 having been taken out of balances, to which they were similarly restored last year. The repayment of the sums borrowed in whatever form, whether by Treasury Bills or Exchequer Bonds, has been provided for, as the Committee will remember, by the arrangements made as regards the Suez Canal shares. The Suez Canal shares, after the year 1894 begins, will give us a revenue of from £500,000 to £600,000 a year, which, I think, I may call a wind-fall. Therefore, it will never be necessary to levy any taxation for the repayment of this sum, amounting, on the whole, to £2,600,000, unless, indeed, you consider foregoing all this revenue, on which you never calculated, and which you never before enjoyed, equivalent to taxation. Then I pass to the third head, the Naval Defence Act. Under this Act there has been borrowed in 1889-90 nothing, and in 1890-91 £696,000 from the National Debt Commissioners. In the Return moved for by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford it was anticipated that a much larger sum would be required. If I had not some special knowledge, I might have been impressed by the utterances which I have heard in a good many directions of a belief that many millions had been borrowed, whereas the actual amount borrowed with regard to naval defence is £696,000. There were two heads under which borrowing was authorised, one being that of naval construction in the Government Dockyards, and the other being that of contract ships. Under the first head, for the purposes of the ships built in the naval dockyards, it was anticipated that £611,000 would be borrowed. As a matter of fact, nothing has been borrowed, but £350,000 was taken as a Supplemental Estimate. Borrowing, according to the Treasury reading of the Act, could not commence till £2,650,000 had been spent, and that sum was only reached within the very last days of the financial year, and nothing was borrowed. On the contrary, I call the attention of the Committee to this: that in the previous year the whole amount which had been estimated had not been spent, and the taxpayer of the year 1889-90 paid more than the Expenditure of that year; and generally under all those Acts it will be found that if there has been any borrowing that ought not to have taken place, according to the judgment of some persons, it is only in the year 1890-91, and the proportions of that borrowing, and the circumstances under which it has taken place, will not be absent from the mind of the Committee. On the other hand, according to the terms of the Act, balances not expended in previous years had to be paid over to an account styled in the Act the Naval Defence Account. To this account there has been paid over last year £380,000, the unexpended part of the sum voted for Dockyard construction in 1889-90. I now pass to the question of contract ships. Under this head an annuity of £1,428,000 was provided in 1889-90, to be charged on the taxpayer, to run for seven years, and special provision was made by the Estate Duty and the duty on beer. It was necessary, in our belief, to increase the Fleet and for that purpose we established this system of building these contract ships under a statutory programme; and £1,428,000 being the sum established in the Act as the provision for each year. It was my painful duty to find the funds to meet that annuity. I remember the difficulty which I experienced in imposing the Estate Duty, and still more have I a lively remembrance of the difficulty of raising the extra 3d. on beer imposed for that purpose. It will be seen, therefore, that we made provision in that first year to meet that annuity, to go in payment of contract ships. The Estate Duty of £1,200,000 was almost equivalent to the annuity of £1,428,000. What has been the result? In the first year when the Act was passed £1,428,000 was charged upon the taxpayer. The whole of that could not be spent, as the contracts made would not embrace the whole of that sum in that year, and the result was that the Admiralty drew only £653,000, and the balance was retained in the Naval Defence Fund. To sum up as regards the year 1889-90, with respect to contract ships, £776,000, and as regards ships in Government yards £380,000 were put aside. These sums have been paid by the taxpayer of the year, but not spent; so that up to this year, far from the taxpayer being relieved from expenditure which a future taxpayer will have to bear, he has practically paid £1,000,000 more than it has been possible to spend. I trust that neither side of the House thinks that it is unnecessary for me to enter into these details, as so much confusion has prevailed. In the year which has just been concluded it was anticipated that, besides the amount standing to the credit of the Naval Defence Fund from the preceding year, the sum of £2,750,000 would be required. The estimate was made in January, 1890, and those who had to frame it had to consider not only how much the contractors would be able to do in the remaining three months of that year, but also what payments they would become entitled to in the year 1890-91. I think that every one who has had experience of these matters knows how difficult it is to estimate how much contractors will spend in a given time. The Admiralty took a liberal estimate. They considered how much the contractors would require, and they put it in the Return which was moved for by the Member for Bradford. As a matter of fact, partly through strikes and partly through having other work on hand, the Admiralty found that the contractors were not able to do the whole of the work for which it had been thought necessary to borrow money, and so did not draw the amount. The result has been that in the financial year we were only called upon to provide (beyond the money voted in Supply and the annuity charged on the Consolidated Fund) for £1,076,000, under the Naval Defence Act, for dockyard shipbuilding, towards which £380,000 was available from the Defence Fund, instead of the much larger sum which had been anticipated. The National Debt Commissioners have provided this balance of £696,000 out of their resources. To sum up the amounts which have been borrowed during the last three years under all the Acts that have been passed for Defence, the amount borrowed under the Imperial Defence Act was £2,580,000, of which £52,000 has been already repaid. Under the Naval Defence Act £696,000 has been borrowed, making a total of £3,276,000 for the year 1890-91. I am very sorry that it has been my duty to bring together these figures, which occupy a certain amount of time that I would gladly have devoted to subjects of more thrilling interest to the Committee, but, at the same time, it is right that I should have taken the course I have followed. Now I will speak of the estimate of the amounts likely to be borrowed under the Naval Defence Act in the coming year. For Naval Defence it is expected that £2,300,000 will be borrowed, and the anticipated amount for both the Defence Acts is £2,850,000. I pass now to a heavy subject, but, nevertheless, one which is full of interest, if we look to its effect upon taxation and the ultimate burden upon the people; I mean the reduction of the Debt. Last year in my Financial Statement I showed that £23,323,000 had in three years been applied out of taxes in the process of reduction of Debt. Since the 1st of April, 1890, the Funded Debt has been decreased by £6,665,000. On the other hand, the Unfunded Debt has been increased by £3,888,000, of course including the amounts borrowed for Imperial and Naval Defence purposes, and I have still to add £800,000 borrowed from the National Debt Commissioners for the Australian Squadron, so that, deducting these amounts of increase from the decrease, there has been a net reduction of £1,977,000 of Funded and Unfunded Debt. To this total I add, as usual, the diminished liability in respect of Terminable Annuities of £3,385,000, and the increase in the balance of £1,150,000, which is equivalent, of course, to a reduction in the Debt. Taking these items together, the reduction of liabilities in 1890-91 was £6,512,000, reduced by the repayment of the Cape Loan of £400,000, leaving a net reduction of £6,112,000, after taking into consideration the debt that has been incurred under the Defence Acts. I wonder whether this figure will surprise hon. Members. Let me further state, as I stated last year, the amount actually paid out of Revenue in the last financial year in reducing our capital liabilities, or applicable to that purpose—I mean the amount which the taxpayer actually paid within the year for the purpose of diminishing Debt. By Annuities and the new Sinking Fund, the taxpayer paid off Debt within the year to the amount of £5,860,000, to which I have to add the old Sinking Fund, i.e., the surplus of the Revenue of last year, of £1,756,000, making a total applied from Revenue to the payment of Debt of £7,616,000. Adding that to the £23,323,000 paid in the three former years, the taxpayer has paid £30,939,000 for the reduction of Debt during the four years I have been in Office, or an average yearly application of taxes to the payment of Debt of £7,735,000. May I put the matter in another way? What was the effect of the process of reduction during last year, and of the conversion on the interest which the country is bound to pay on the Funded and Unfunded Debt? The interest for one year, as it stood in 1887, less Local Loans Stock, at 3 per cent. for the Funded, and 2½ per cent. for the Unfunded, Debt, was £18,771,000. The actual interest paid in 1890-1 was £16,986,000, a reduction of the charge for interest for last year of £1,785,000. Now let the Committee remember that this repayment of the Debt is optional, but that the charge for interest is compulsory; and it has been the good fortune of the present Parliament to be able to reduce, not the optional, but the compulsory, charge upon the taxpayers for the payment of Debt by a sum of about £1,800,000. Let us consider for a moment the measures as a whole affecting the reduction of the National Debt which have been passed during the last few years. In 1887-8 we reduced the permanent charge from £28,000,000 to £26,000,000, but the change has been materially modified by the result of the conversion, which reduces the interest on the National Debt by £1,500,000. If the whole of that reduction had been left within the permanent charge, the reduction would not have been more than £500,000; but, as hon. Members will remember, I gave the taxpayers the benefit of £1,000,000 of that saving. The permanent charge, therefore, was put at £25,000,000, and now the extent of the reduction of the means available for paying off Debt, as compared with the permanent charge at £25,000,000, is £1,500,000 less, but not less by a greater amount than that. But that is not all. The annuities have also been at work; Debt has also been otherwise reduced; and I am able to inform the Committee that, notwithstanding the reduction from £28,000,000 to £25,000,000, we are practically able to pay off as much Debt now as in 1886. The difference against us is only £369,000, though the charge has been diminished by £3,000,000. However, I do not want the pace of the reduction of Debt to be tried by what I call the measured mile. Let me, therefore, take a somewhat longer period. The total amount during the last five years applied out of taxation to the reduction of the National Debt has been £37,200,000. The total for the five years before was £24,600,000. We have accordingly in the last five years provided out of taxes for the repayment of £12,000,000 more than was done in the preceding five years. But I will give another comparison. I will omit the years 1885-6 and 1886-7, which were years of exceptional military operations, and I will take the four years before and after, namely, 1887-8 to 1890-1, and 1880-1 to 1883-4. In the earlier years the total was £27,200,000, and in the later years it was about £30,900,000, the difference being £3,600,000 in favour of the later years. I think, therefore, that the present House of Commons has not failed to discharge its duty in following up, and not slackening, the pace of the reduction of Debt, to which we all attach the very greatest importance. Now, let me return for a moment to the question of the Funded and the Unfunded Debt. We paid off a portion of the Funded Debt to the amount of £5,000,000 just at the beginning of the present financial year, and we increased the Floating Debt accordingly, but I am happy to say that the amount of the Floating Debt—for I am anxious not to see it too high—in the hands of the public has been diminished by £2,400,000 during the past year. It stands to-day at about £21,000,000, which is only £7,000,000 in excess of what it stood at before the conversion operation, and that after we had paid off £24,000,000 of the Funded Debt in cash. I have seen a remark in one quarter calling attention to the large increase which has taken place in our Unfunded Debt without the slightest allusion to the reduction in the Funded Debt. It was laid to my charge as a crime that I had increased the Unfunded Debt, and as the sentences ran one would have thought that this was an increase of Debt altogether. But, as a matter of fact, we have reduced the Funded Debt to an amount quite out of proportion to the increase in the Unfunded Debt. I know there are men who think we ought to fund our Unfunded Debt; but if we are to do so we ought to be able to do it under favourable circumstances, and without loss to the State. I do not know whether hon. Members will remember that I undertook to use my best abilities in carrying out the conversion in order that we should not increase the capital of the Debt, and by that declaration I have stood. There are, no doubt, inconveniences in a large amount of Floating Debt, but I would rather gradually reduce that Debt than throw a large amount of Consols on the market in order to fund it. As far as the Floating Debt is in the hands of the National Debt Commissioners, the matter is as broad as it is long, inasmuch as I propose to give Exchequer Bonds—and in fact I have given them—running for a certain period. As regards the public, to fund that Debt would mean to offer an equivalent amount of Consols in the market, and that is an operation which those acquainted with the Money Market would not view with any satisfaction. I am sometimes twitted with the price of Consols. The price of Consols is comparatively low, but that has not only been due to the conversion, but to two or three other causes. It has been due in the present year to the immense sales of Consols to meet the financial exigencies in which some of the greatest houses have found themselves. Of course that has had a great effect upon the market. But, besides, it has seemed good to this House and to the other House to make some serious changes as regards Trust Funds; and there has been a kind of invitation issued in every direction that these stately Consols, which our forefathers and our fathers wished should constitute the maintenance of their children, should be replaced by other less patriotic securities. I venture to think, Mr. Courtney, that the bones of some of those patriots would turn in their graves if they knew what was being done in regard to their intentions that their daughters should subsist on Consols. There has been no sympathy whatever in the view that Consols should be the chief element in trusts. Imperial considerations have given way, I am afraid, before fair legacies and importunate cestui-qui trusts. This accounts for many sales of Consols which have affected the market. But I venture to think that the time will come when Consols will again resume the supremacy which we must all wish for them, and which constitutes the great strength of the nation. And now, before I pass to the finances of the coming year, let me say one word with regard to a subject in which hon. Members of this House take the deepest interest—that is, the question of the relief of local taxation and all that hangs thereby. I think the House would like to hear an authoritative statement of what has been done with regard to the transfer of funds to the Local Authorities. We have transferred in 1890-91 for Licence Duties to England £3,011,000, and to Scotland £310,000, making a total from Licence Duties of £3,321,000. For Probate Duty to England £1,930,000, to Scotland £265,000, to Ireland £217,000—total for Probate Duties, £2,412,000. For Beer and Spirit Duties to England, £1,039,600, to Scotland £143,000, and Ireland £117,000—total from Beer and Spirit Duties, £1,300,000. The grand total transferred in these forms, with a sum of £40,000 voted for Irish labourers' cottages in lieu of the gain accruing to England and Scotland by the transfer of licences, is £7,073,600. But, of course, against that you have to set off the grants in aid which have been dropped, and which would have been given from the Imperial Exchequer in the old time. In the last year in which they were granted—1886-87—they amounted to £2,944,000, but as some of the contributions expanded from year to year, they would probably have amounted by this time to £3,200,000. If I deduct that sum, the total net relief given to local taxation in England, Scotland, and Ireland is £3,873,600. Generally, I may say, this has been given in relief of local taxation. But the Committee will remember that there were some special purposes to which this was to be turned. There was a sum of money that was available for school fees in Scotland, for payment for intermediate education, labourers' cottages, and national school teachers in Ireland. But, of course, the bulk has gone to the relief of local taxation. If I separate England from Scotland and Ireland, and say what the relief to England alone has been, after making allowance for the dropped grants, the amount is £3,100,000. Now, the Committee will observe that the relief is given not only by the Probate Duty, which represents personal property, but partly by the Beer and Spirit Duties, and this, doubtless, is a new element in our finance. I am prepared to say it is a sound element. I do not see why indirect taxation should not be put under contribution, looking to all the new purposes to which the Local Authorities are obliged to apply themselves. I do not see that it is unfair that indirect taxation should contribute, in some measure, to the relief of local taxation. Well, then, to what purposes has this additional Beer and Spirit Duty been put? It has been applied to three purposes. First, to Police Superannuation, about one-third; second, to general relief of local taxation; and, third, it was intended to be applied to the extinction of licences. I have received a great many communications which would indicate that the tax had been imposed for the last purpose only, but no one who has a shred of memory can forget that that is not so. There were three distinct purposes for which it was imposed. Well, now, I ask, has the higher scale of duty proved that the total duty is more than the alcoholic beverages would bear? I admit that considerable reconsideration ought to be given, if it had been found that this increased duty had generally proved that the duties were too high. That is not so. There is another argument on which I may slightly touch. It is argued that this additional tax falls, not upon the consumer, but upon a particular and limited trade. But I am unable to admit that plea, because, if that were so, I think we should never be able either to reduce or increase a tax. It may be that in some articles a tax falls more heavily upon a particular class interested in that article than upon others, but I do not think that we can hold that any particular class bears the whole amount of the duty put upon the article in which it deals. I will not deny—I will not attempt to deny—that the fact of the failure of one part of our scheme has naturally created much disappointment and irritation; but I repudiate in the strongest degree the suggestion that there was any pledge on the part of the Government that if we could not carry out the whole of our scheme, then this tax would fall to the ground. I am deeply concerned that a body of men engaged in a legitimate business should think themselves ill-treated because they are not relieved of this tax, but I must say at once that to relieve them of the whole of this tax would in any case be absolutely impossible, as it was imposed not only for the extinction of licences but for two other purposes. Then should a portion of the tax be repealed? Should one-third be repealed? I can assure the Committee that this matter has given me a great deal of anxiety, because the charge has been levelled more than once against me that I have broken my pledge in this matter—a charge I once more emphatically repudiate. But at the same time I have looked into the matter very closely. I have received 146 Memorials from the trade and others praying for the repeal of the whole of the tax, but in only one important Memorial has any mention been made of the repeal of a third of the tax. What would a third mean? It would be 1d. a barrel on beer and 2d. a gallon on spirits. Well, I confess it appeared to me at one time that it would be a comparatively small boon to take off these sums. It appeared to me, especially in the case of spirits, that a reduction of 2d. per gallon would disturb contracts, agitate trade, and would cause more confusion than the advantage which would be derived from the repeal. To an important deputation which I received I put the question whether they endorsed the view I held with regard to taking off this one-third, and they did not repudiate it. Then, on the other hand, I asked myself to what purposes has this one-third been put; what has been done with it? In a great many cases it has been applied to the development of technical education. County Councils have taken the greatest interest in the matter, and I think it would be very important if my right hon. Friend the Vice President of the Council would give the Committee and the public full information with regard to it. I may say, roughly, that a very large proportion of the County Councils have assigned the whole of this Revenue by resolution to technical education. A large number of others have assigned a portion of the money to the same purpose, and in other cases no answer has been given. Looking at the whole state of the case, it appears to me that it is felt by the country at large that the assignment of this sum of about £400,000 has been of incalculable advantage in stimulating technical education in the counties and elsewhere. Looking to that fact, and looking, on the other hand, to the very small and doubtful boon which it would be to take off 1d. a barrel and 2d. a gallon, I have come to the conclusion, I may say not without reluctance, not to disturb the tax. I say not without reluctance, because it will be admitted that those on whom it has fallen have been subjected to a great disappointment; but, at the same time, I should rejoice as much as any man in this House if the grant of this money should have the effect, which we all hope it may have, of stimulating technical education in all parts of the country. Mr. Courtney, at this point it becomes my duty to give my cordial thanks to the Committee for the great patience and indulgence with which they have listened to me hitherto, because, though I think there are many things in the Revenue of the past year which are interesting, and I have only given explanations which ought to have been given, nevertheless I know hon. Members are impatient to hear what the finance of the present year is to be. Well, then, in the first place, I come to the question of the Expenditure of this year. The Committee is already acquainted with the immense sum for which I am bound to provide the means. The Consolidated Fund Services amount to £28,295,000, being a decrease as compared with last year's issues of £408,000. The total of the Supply Services is £60,024,000, an increase of £1,000,000 over last year's figure of £59,030,000. Adding together the expenditure, therefore, as known to the Committee, I get a total of £88,319,000—I am giving round figures—which is an excess on the issues of last year of £586,000, and of nearly £950,000 on my Budget Estimate for 1890-91. That is a large increase; but the whole facts cannot be grasped without an analysis of the charges on the Consolidated Fund, which result in a diminution, as I have said, of £408,000. The Consolidated Fund last year included a sum for barracks of £225,000, for drawback on silver of £95,000, and for another item of £100,000 for the Chancery Book Debts. These figures vanish, at all events for the present, from our calculations. They are not included in the Estimates of the year, but they bring up the real excess of expenditure over last year's issues to nearly £1,000,000. And, further, the Committee is entitled to know that from the Miscellaneous Revenue an item of £120,000 has been withdrawn and appropriated, as Appropriations in Aid to Civil Service Votes, in accordance with the views of the Public Accounts Committee. Thus the Civil Service Votes appear so much the smaller, while the £120,000 vanishes from the item of Miscellaneous Receipts, and in effect our expenditure is so much the larger. Now, I think the Committee will agree with me that I am putting the full significance of these figures before them. I am not attempting to hide in any degree the vast expenditure which we are incurring. Why should we attempt to hide it? Why should we attempt to conceal from the people this expenditure if we believe the expenditure is made in response to the demands of the people and to the requirements of the Imperial Service? Do not attempt to say that we wish to palliate or excuse our expenditure. What we have to do is to defend it and show that it is necessary in the interests of the Empire; and not only so, but that the public itself is urging us on and is responsible for a great part of this increased expenditure. There are two ways in which you may show moderate Estimates. You may do so by being moderate in framing your Estimates; but you may do so also, by leaving half the work undone, and it has been the case sometimes that Governments—I do not make any distinction of Party in the matter—have sinned in the direction of entering upon a competition for the moderation of Estimates, while, as a matter of fact, work has been accumulating which their successors had to discharge. Now, I think the Committee will do me the justice to say that I have never attempted to hide our expenditure. Those who remember the language I used last year with reference to the expenditure of the country, especially for the two great Services, will remember that I was not the mouthpiece of a Government wishing to screen themselves from criticism; but I used the language of a Chancellor of the Exchequer anxious for the security and strength of the country, in which no one was more interested than himself. I repudiate the suggestion that we had, or have, any desire to hide the real expenditure from the country. Let me place some of the items before the Committee, and show whence this increased Expenditure arises. We have an increased Expenditure this year, but only £70,000 of that increase is due to the two great Services. No; it arises from other causes. Ireland [a laugh]; yes, do hon. Members wish to dissociate themselves from the increased Expenditure which we have felt ourselves bound to give to Ireland? The increase of Expenditure in Ireland arises from the relief works there, and from the light railways which we are constructing, though they are permanent works, out of the actual taxes of the country; and we ask in this coming year, and without any fear that our action will be repudiated by the House, that £200,000 more should be voted for Ireland for light railways and relief works. £500,000 of the increased Estimates of this year go, I will not say to the debit of Ireland, but to the satisfaction of the desire which has been felt in all parts of the United Kingdom to come to the assistance of our poorer Sister. [Interruption.] At all events, we are not ashamed to ask the taxpayers to vote an extra £1,000,000—for that is the amount in two years—to go to the needs of that portion of Ireland which is suffering from distress. The sneers of hon. Members below the Gangway, if they were sneers, are somewhat misplaced. I think they will prefer that their sneers should not be placed before the taxpayers of the country, who without a murmur, as far as I know—has there been a single public meeting where any member of the opposite side?—[slight interruption.] I do not wish to be controversial. How many men are there who would be reproached at any public meeting of English taxpayers for having assisted Ireland in her need, and having constructed light railways, by which we hope the material prosperity of that country may be increased? [AN IRISH MEMBER: Out of Irish money.] Yes; Ireland contributes. I quite agree—perhaps it was an omission on my part not to say so—that Ireland bears her share in the contribution. These are occasions when Ministers are not expected to be controversial, and I apologise to the Committee if I was carried away for a moment by the interruptions. I am dealing now with matters which do not concern the Executive Government of one day alone. I am pointing to a tendency to increased Expenditure, the results of which will fall as severely on any successors we may have as upon ourselves. It is a tendency to which I would call the attention of the country, apart from the assistance to Ireland. The next item, after Ireland, is Education. There is an increase of £140,000, partly due to the automatic increase in the number of school children, partly due to the extension of drawing in the elementary schools—a small matter which, nevertheless, swallows up some £70,000 or £80,000. Public Buildings show an excess of £70,000, and yet we are accused of miserable stinginess for not more rapidly advancing various public buildings which are required. Post Office and Telegraphs show an increase of nearly £400,000. That is the way in which the Expenditure is rising. Of this £400,000 a large proportion is due to increased salaries; and though we have this substantial increase, all the large cities are clamouring for new Post Offices, with sites that are valued at £100,000 or £200,000, and I think the time will come before long when the House of Commons—when the most ardent zealots in favour of the diminution of the Post Office Revenue—will find that in this matter of increased Expenditure they have a difficult element to deal with. Then there is the Census. We have £150,000 this year extra to pay for the Census; and a number of persons—I am not sure whether you, Mr. Courtney, were not yourself amongst the number—thought, on the whole, we were not going to conduct the Census with sufficient liberality and magnificence of statistical scale. Adding together these items we find an increase, after making all the necessary allowances, of £1,090,000 in the estimated Expenditure of this year as compared with the previous year. I have, I think, accounted to the satisfaction of the Committee for this increase in the Estimates. We have two Supplementary Estimates which we shall have to propose, and which hon. Members will be kind enough to add to the Estimate of the Expenditure of the coming year. There is a sum of £125,000 for the relief—for the continuation of the relief—of the distress in Ireland during the present financial year, and for the amount necessary for the relief of the crofter districts, and for carrying out in them those operations which my right hon. Friend the First Lord of the Treasury has described. Well, now I have done with the Expenditure of the year but for one remark, which, long as I have occupied the Committee, I should wish to make. I wish to make it before I approach the question of the means for meeting this Expenditure. We have some contributions in aid of our Expenditure; but to a very slight extent indeed, from our colonial fellow-subjects. We have had to consider—it was the bounden duty of the Executive Government to consider—while looking to the immensely increasing cost and the increasing requirements of the great Military and Naval Services, looking to the total which the British taxpayer is bound to pay, whether we have not a right to call for some increase of these colonial contributions which have been made in the past. We have examined this matter in no narrow or exacting spirit. We have looked to see whether such colonies as the Straits Settlements, Mauritius, and Hong Kong—we have looked to see whether their revenues have increased as ours have increased, under the protection of the British flag; we have looked to see whether they pay anything like the sum which some of the poorest and smallest States contribute for their defence. We have looked to their population; we have looked to their revenue; we have looked to their trade; and we have thought it to be our duty to see whether, in view of the changed circumstances, those contributions should not be revised. I have thought it right to make this public allusion to the subject, and I wish to assure our distant fellow-subjects trading under the British flag that we do not desire to approach them in a niggardly spirit; but we do think that they should, like some of the larger colonies, take an increased share in bearing the immense burdens of the Empire to which they belong. Some of the colonies, indeed, have come forward. Australia has done much in this direction. Some of the colonies pay their own troops; and I strongly hold that the smaller colonies should feel that they have duties cast upon them in connection with the Empire. I have made these remarks with the view of showing that this subject of colonial contribution is a question of importance to all sides of the House; it is a question for Parliament to consider. And now I pass to a review of the means of the nation to meet its general expenditure, and I ask the Committee, as I did last year—what is the spirit in which we are to frame our Estimates of Revenue? And, again, I invite the Committee, on most substantial grounds, to approach the Estimates of the Revenue in a spirit of caution. 1890 has been a brilliant year in many respects. I speak particularly as to trade and wages; but there are many people who believe that we may find ourselves upon the top of that curve of prosperity, and that we have not so good a year before us as the past. Still, we have two advantages in this year. One advantage is a permanent advantage. There is always that increased consumption which may be put down to the increase in the population, and 1 per cent. would be the normal increase of that portion of the Revenue which is due to the increase of population. Another advantage is that we have a larger number of tax-earning days in this year than last year. In the first place, it will be a Leap Year, which gives us one day more. Then we have no Easter in the present financial year. The present financial year is a year without an Easter. We have no Good Fridays and no Easter Mondays. [A VOICE: "Less consumption."] My right hon. Friend probably alludes to the consumption of certain special articles. True as regards consumption, but not as regards business! The provision for the consumption for holidays does not take place at the moment of the holidays, but at a different time, as experience has shown. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian, who in 1861 had exactly a similar state of affairs, was able to speculate, and speculate successfully, on an increase of Revenue owing to the increase in the number of tax-earning days in that year. Three extra days mean 1 per cent. on the total working days of the year, and 1 per cent. is a large amount when you come to deal with millions. I add this 1 per cent. to the 1 per cent. for the increase in population, and if I allow for no other causes than those I have stated, we ought to have an increase of Revenue by 2 per cent. That would give about £1,200,000 on the £60,000,000. Now, let me turn to another matter, which I think will interest the Committee. What is the degree of prosperity on which we can count in the country as regards the general Estimates which I have to submit? How far has our prosperity been affected, for instance, by what has happened in the City? I do not think that the general prosperity has been greatly affected by the breakdown in speculation. It might have been otherwise if the danger had not been averted; but as it was met, and as there was no breakdown of credit in the country, the general estimate of the prosperity of the country has not been influenced by these events. I have made the closest inquiry into the state of commerce and industry, of trades and wages, and of agriculture in the country during the year 1890. Let me give the Committee some figures, because 1890 is a year which has topped all others in regard to the profits of the employer and the wages of the employed. There are exceptions, no doubt. The wool trade has not been so successful, and there is the shipping trade, which has been only fairly successful; but, looking at it broadly, 1890 has been an extremely prosperous year. For computations for the Returns under Schedule D of the Income Tax, the year 1887 vanishes from the average, and its place is taken by the year 1890—i.e., the three years on which the average would now be built are 1888, 1889, 1890, instead of 1887, 1888, 1889. The comparison, therefore, of 1890, with 1887 becomes of peculiar importance. The sums at issue are so vast that it requires an exuberant fancy even to be able to form some conception of them. For instance, the bankers' clearings in London in the year 1890 were £7,801,000,000, against £6,077,000,000 in 1887, an increase of over £1,700,000,000. It seems like calculating the distance from the earth to the sun. The bankers' clearings in the cities of Birmingham, Manchester, and Newcastle-on-Tyne have been £225,000,000 in 1890, against £205,000,000, in 1889, an increase over that year, which was in itself a good year, of some £20,000,000, or 10 per cent. I congratulate the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle, whom I see opposite, on the prosperity of that city. Nor have the profits fallen much behind the transactions. The profits of 18 provincial banks in 1890 were £1,122,000, against £882,000 in 1887, an increase of nearly 40 per cent. The railways have carried more passengers, more merchandise, more minerals, and more live stock. In the vast cotton industry more cotton has been consumed than ever before, and not without some good returns. The profits of 88 companies in Oldham have risen from £86,000 in 1887 to £368,000 in 1890. Let the Committee look behind these enormous figures, and then they will see more work, more wages, more happiness in many homes in this increased prosperity. The increase in the value of coal has been immense. It is calculated that in 1889 the value of coal exported was £14,782,000, against £19,020,000 in 1890. The increase in the value of coal exported is thus no less than 28 per cent. The amount of the coal exported was 28,956,000 tons in 1889, as against 30,130,000 tons in 1890, an increase in quantity of 4 per cent. The profits of 16 Derbyshire Coal Companies in 1887 were £176,000; in 1890 they reached £572,000. In a number of other collieries, which I will not specify, the profits, which were £770,000 in 1887, rose to £2,330,000, in 1890. I will not carry on the comparison, but I require to state these things in order to justify the estimate of the Income Tax which I am going to make for the year 1891-92. The result of the examination of the Income Tax Collectors and others who report to me with regard to the prosperity of the country is this—that instead of putting the Income Tax down at £13,250,000 for the coming year, I am putting it down at £13,750,000, being an increase of £500,000 over last year. That brings up the Income Tax to £2,300,000 for each ld. in the £1. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian can look back to the first statements of Sir Robert Peel with regard to the Income Tax, and will remember that he calculated the ld. in the £1 as representing £700,000.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE (Edinburgh, Mid Lothian): No; only £500,000.

MR. GOSCHEN: Yes; only £500,000, the right hon. Gentleman says, and now ld. in the £1 represents no less than £2,300,000. But the Committee will not be satisfied if I speak only of the profits of the employers. I have made inquiries into the wages of the employed, and I may cite one instance, which is a pregnant and interesting instance with regard to the rise in wages. In one set of collieries the wages have risen from 1s. 9d. per ton in 1887 to 2s. 4d. per ton in 1890. I have an estimate before me which places the total increase in the wages in the coal trade in 1890, as compared with those of 1885, at no less a sum than £6,000,000. That is an increase of wages on which we may congratulate ourselves. Well, I have spoken of the past year, but what about the future? I see no great cause for alarm with regard to any decline in the coming year; but I do not see indications that, having realised such high wages in 1890, it would be probable that they will continue to advance. I will not calculate upon a decline, but, looking to the possible effects of the M'Kinley tariff, and to other features upon which I have not the time to dwell, I am not prepared to expect any increase in the consumption of the various great articles of trade beyond the 2 per cent. I indicated in the earlier portion of this branch of my remarks. I will now proceed as rapidly as I can to give the figures at which I estimate the Revenue of the coming year. The Committee will bear in mind that I put down the Income Tax at £13,750,000. The Customs Revenue of last year was £19,480,000, but from this I have to deduct £200,000 for the Tea Duty collected before the change of duty took effect, and, that, with other adjustments, reduces the amount to £19,280,000. Adding 2 per cent. to this, the sum is £19,665,000, and I put the total of the Customs Revenue for the coming year at £19,700,000. Some of the items in this large figure are coffee, £333,000; dried fruits, £340,000; tea, £3,400,000; tobacco, £9,730,000; rum, £2,370,000; brandy, £1,370,000; and Geneva, £755,000. The total Customs, as I have said, I put at £19,700,000. I now pass to Excise, in which we estimated beer at £9,580,000; and British spirits at £15,150,000. I increased the Probate Duty last year by £140,000; this year I raise it from £2,400,000 to £2,450,000. The Estate Duty, I calculate, will produce £1,220,000, and the Legacy Duty, £2,580,000, a very slight increase in each case, because I do not think that in the face of the fall of securities which has taken place it would be wise to calculate on a greater excess. The Succession Duty I increase by £40,000, which brings it to £1,300,000. In general stamps, owing to what I have seen in the last months of the past year, I do not venture to place the figure as high as last year, and I reduce the Estimate by £67,000 to £5,900,000. The grand total of stamps, including general stamps and Death Duties, is £13,450,000. I make no alteration in the amount estimated from the Land Tax, and in the House Duty I allow for a further loss of £120,000, the total from that source being £1,450,000. The total of the receipts of the Inland

Revenue I put at £54,980,000, as against £53,983,000 last year, or an increase of £997,000, being about 2 per cent. increase on last year. I add that to the increase on Customs, and I calculate the total increase in the taxed revenue at £1,017,000. I have still to deal with the non-Taxed Revenue. Under this head I hope for an increase of £320,000 in the Post Office and Telegraph Service receipts. In Miscellaneous Revenue, I am sorry to say, I find a tremendous gap. I place it at only £2,500,000, as against £2,979,000 last year, being a decrease of £480,000. I have alluded to the loss of £120,000 as being given in Appropriations in Aid of the various Civil Services. But another loss is due to the fact that I can no longer count on the difference of the profits of the Mint to which I have alluded. Therefore, I am unable to put the miscellaneous revenue at a higher figure than that I have named. I estimate the total of the non-taxed Revenue for the coming year at £15,750,000, as against £15,911,000 for the past year, being a decrease of £161,000. These figures give me a net increase for last year of £941,000, and a total Revenue of £90,430,000. I will now give the Committee a résumé of the figures:—Customs, £19,700,000; Excise, £25,300,000; Stamps, £13,450,000; Land Tax £1,030,000; House Duty, £1,450,000; Property and Income Tax, £13,750,000; total produce of taxes, £74,680,000; Post Office, £10,120,000; Telegraph Service, £2,480,000; Crown Lands, £430,000; Interest on Purchase-money of Suez Canal Shares, Sardinian Loan, &c., £220,000; Miscellaneous, £2,500,000; total produce of non-Tax Revenue, £15,750,000; total Revenue, £90,430,000. The Expenditure, as the Committee will remember, including the Supplementary Estimate of £125,000, is estimated at £88,444,000. I therefore find myself with a surplus—I will not say to dispose of—of £1,986,000—let us call it in round figures £2,000,000. I have now to ask myself, Am I to have this surplus? Is it to be at my disposal for my own financial purposes? Am I in the position of being able to give any remission of taxation? I approach the consideration of this question with considerable apprehension from the experience I have had of the past. There sits my right hon Friend the President of the Local Government Board with a guilty look which reminds me that one year he deprived me of all power of remitting taxation; another year the First Lord of the Admiralty did the same; and the Chief Secretary for Ireland has cost me an extra £1,000,000 within the last two years, although he may seek to palliate his guilt with the idea that I need not, on principles of financial propriety, have provided the means for the building of permanent railways out of the taxes of the year. Is there on this Bench yet another despoiler of the public purse? Well, Mr. Courtney, I am not without my anxieties, as a few minutes will show. Before I part with, or before the Committee dispose of, the surplus, let them look for one moment at the dimensions of the surplus. It amounts to £2,000,000. It is not a very large sum compared with the Revenue out of which it springs. It is scarcely more than 2 per cent. I do not know that any great things could be done with it. To do great things you want two elements—a surplus of money and a surplus of time; and although I have a moderate surplus of money, I do not know that I have any large, or any surplus of time. There are some great tasks to which I have been invited, including the reorganisation or re-arrangement of the Death Duties, of the Income Tax, and of the Stamp Taxes. My right hon. Friends opposite, as well as my Colleagues, know the difficulties of such gigantic tasks, and the length of time they require. The right hon. Member for Mid Lothian has spoken of the re-construction of the Death Duties as requiring a Session; the re-construction of the Income Tax would require a full Session also.

C. 110011

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: A century.

MR. GOSCHEN: The right hon. Gentleman has been half a century in the service of his country, and during that half-century he has not been able to submit, or has not desired to submit, a plan for the re-construction of the Income Tax. We have no surplus of time, and I have only a small surplus of money which I mention, as sometimes it is by greasing the wheels, by exemptions, and otherwise, that re-construction can be achieved. I have yet another reason why it would be impossible to attempt the re-construction of the Income Tax, even with more time than I have, and that is because I am profoundly convinced that the two tasks, for one of which a Session is required and for the other, according to my right hon. Friend, a century, are practically two tasks that must be undertaken together. The re-construction of the Death Duties could not be undertaken without the re-construction of some features of the Income Tax. The re-construction of the Death Duties involves an increase in the taxes on real property; and, if so, you would have at the same time to consider whether a change in the Income Tax ought not to be balanced by a corresponding change in the House and Land Duties. But, however that may be, we are agreed in this, that both these two efforts would constitute a gigantic task. There remains the third task, the re-arrangement of the Stamp Duties, which are full of anomalies, some of which ought to be redressed; but if I might give a word of friendly advice to my successor, of whatever Party, it would be that he should not rush into any precocious passion for the redress of anomalies. There is no field more dangerous, in which there are more pitfalls and snares for the unwary, of which I have had experience myself. I found, for instance, that on the Stock Exchange stately British Stocks, all the most respectable securities, were taxed on their transfer or at their birth, while a certain class of shady foreign securities escaped scot-free; British respectability was taxed, but foreign gambling went scot-free. I thought that here was an anomaly to be redressed, and I put a tax upon fugitive securities, but I have never heard the last of it and of the "cumbersome method" by which it was done. I only created a grievance in trying to redress a wrong. I maintain that the principle I followed was correct; but if the experts of the Stock Exchange could find a less cumbersome form of taxing these securities, I should be only too glad to listen to them. As to stamps generally, one thing we have been able to accomplish—and I trust the announcement will not be unsatisfactory—the authorities of the Inland Revenue have prepared a Bill in which the existing law is consolidated; and I venture to think that will be a great boon to business men and the public generally. Whether it will be a boon to the Chancellor of the Exchequer I will not inquire, because all the anomalies and exemptions are brought out in the Bill with such clearness that I am doubtful whether I shall have a moment's peace from the denunciation of existing arrangements. While the House may undertake consolidation by referring the Bill to a Grand Committee, we have not time at our command for a general re-arrangement of the Stamp Duties. In none of these fields do I see the possibility of action this year, even if I had time at my command. I say, even if I had time at my command. But the question arises whether I have money at my command. I have £2,000,000 at my disposal, in one sense; but there sits on the Treasury Bench another despoiler of the Public Purse—my right hon. Friend the Vice President of the Council, who, I believe, has serious designs upon me. In the Gracious Speech from the Throne at the opening of the Session this passage occurred—

"Your attention will be invited to the expediency of alleviating the burden which compulsory education has, in recent years, imposed upon the poorer portions of my people."

The Government do not intend to depart from the pledge which was given in that Speech—a pledge which we intend to carry out at the earliest date and in the amplest manner. The cost of that operation is large—the cost of following up compulsory education with a corresponding amount of free education, [A VOICE: "Assisted," and cries of "Free, free!" from the Opposition Benches, followed by cheers.] I do not object to stand by the word "free." We intend to deal with the subject in no niggard spirit, as the Committee will see when I tell them that the cost of that operation will absorb the £2,000,000 at my disposal. The Committee will judge from that of the degree and completeness with which we are prepared to carry out the pledge given in the Speech from the Throne. I have said that it will cost us £2,000,000; that is the aggregate cost, including what will be given to Ireland and Scotland; but, of course, we have now not to deal with an entire year. We do intend, if the House of Commons, as we expect and hope, second us by a resolute determination to get through its Business, that if possible no administrative delay of a single day shall occur, and if our views are carried out, the parents will be relieved under the Bill from fees for the children whose education will be freed under our proposals from the 1st of September next. It is not for me to disclose the particulars of the Bill which we shall introduce; but I may say that, asking Parliament as we shall to make the Bill operative on the 1st of September forward, we shall require in the course of this financial year something near half the amount of the £2,000,000. I must leave a margin, a balance, of course, and that will leave me a balance of £900,000. Am I to dispose of it, can I dispose of it, or must I not look forward to next year when the full £2,000,000, which our plans will cost, will come into operation? I cannot reconcile it with my duty to speculate, looking to the whole circumstances of the day, as to our having an additional £900,000 ready next year if I part with this £900,000. I feel that hon. Members will sympathise with a Chancellor of the Exchequer who is parting with a surplus to other persons, while he is burning to meet all those piteous petitions which are made for the remission of taxation. But one thing I have made up my mind about, and that is that the £900,000 ought not to be disposed of for a certain number of small reliefs. It must be kept together for the finances of next year in order that we may have the certainty of being able to carry out the whole of our task without any doubt and without any anxiety. If there were any strong claimants in this year I am bound to say it would be the class that could not be relieved by this £900,000, even if it were in my power to do it. Looking to the reductions which took place last year, and looking to the alleviations of the burdens of the masses of the country, I do not deny that the Income Tax payers would have a strong claim, but this £900,000 would be as nothing compared with the £2,300,000 which are wanted; and therefore I say again that it is impossible for me, looking to the future, to mortgage that £900,000. I trust that I may have the support of public opinion, notwithstanding the certain disappointment of many who look for some relief. But hon. Members will ask, what I am going to do with the £900,000? I propose to devote £500,000 to the construction of barracks, relieving me of the necessity of borrowing to that amount, and the remaining £400,000 to a purpose which will occur only once for all, which will not pledge the future, while it will at the same time, as I consider, meet an urgent public necessity, to which also we are pledged, namely, the withdrawal from circulation of light gold. That will leave me entirely free for next year. It would be improper for me to trespass further upon the time of the House with any explanations as to the measures which I think ought to be proposed as regards the strengthening of the circulation of the country in connection with the withdrawal of light gold. And now I have come to the end of my long story. I hope that the Committee will feel some slight sympathy with a Chancellor of the Exchequer who for the second time finds himself in the position of having his surplus snatched from his hands for other purposes. Again, the cup of pleasure, as regards the remission of taxation, is dashed from my lips, but I nevertheless feel an earnest sense of gratitude for the good fortune which, on the whole, I have enjoyed. The prosperity of the country has gone on increasing in a widening and fertilising stream during the last three or four years, and the energies of the people, followed by increased earnings, have sent more and more revenue into the Public Purse. And so we have been able to meet the larger demands made upon us. We have found that the spirit of the people has been requiring from us that we should undertake many costly functions which the State did not undertake before. I hope that in no niggard spirit, but watching the credit of the State, we have been able to meet those demands. I will conclude with the earnest hope that the prosperity which has blessed this nation for the last four years, undisturbed by the crises of big or little wars, may continue to grow, and that the people, in the enjoyment of prolonged peace, security, and plenty, may continue to rise to an even higher plane of physical comfort and of social and mental content.

TEA.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That, towards raising the Supply granted to Her Majesty, the Duties of Customs now chargeable on Tea shall continue to be levied and charged on and after the first day of August, one thousand eight hundred and ninety-one, until the first day of August, one thousand eight hundred and ninety-two, on the importation thereof into Great Britain or Ireland (that is to say) on—

Tea . . . the pound . . . Four Pence.—"
(The Chancellor of the Exchequer.)

(6.55.) MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: I do not know what course the right hon. Gentleman proposes to take with regard to the method of proceeding. After his long and able statement, showing that no change of taxation is about to be made, it is not probably that any serious draft will have to be made on the time of the House for securing assent to the financial arrangements of the year. Of course no practical steps will be taken at the present stage, and I will ask what time the right hon. Gentleman proposes to take for the practical consideration of the subject.

(6.56.) MR. GOSCHEN: If it will meet the general view, the Government will put down the further consideration of the question for Monday.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: Undoubtedly that is a very short period. I have no doubt the Government make the proposal from its consideration of what is most convenient for public business, but, considering that there is no question of new taxation, and that the very important subject to which my right hon. Friend has adverted must necessarily stand over for discussion till positive proposals are made, I really think the Committee will be indisposed to go forward with the consideration of the subject on Monday.

(6.57.) DR. CAMERON (Glasgow, College): I should like to know what the right hon. Gentleman proposes to do with regard to the proportion of the surplus that will go to Scotland and Ireland?

MR. GOSCHEN: I am not prepared to state the exact form which the contribution to Scotland will take. Under the ordinary distribution of Revenue between England, Scotland, and Ireland, she will be entitled to a fair share which will represent the increase in the expenditure due to free education.

(6.59.) SIR R. FOWLER (London): There was one remark of my right hon. Friend's to which I listened with great pleasure, and that was the remark about light gold. I think the commercial community will hear with very great pleasure that it is intended to withdraw the light gold from circulation. I wish to ask my right hon. Friend whether he will be in a position on Monday to make a statement as to what he is likely to do on that question?

(7.0.) MR. MUNDELLA (Sheffield, Brightside): Having regard to the very important statement of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and as the First Lord of the Treasury is aware, I have asked him two or three times during the Session when we may expect to have the scheme of the Government relating to free education laid before the House, I rise to ask whether he can now state when the scheme will be in the possession of the House? All parties in the country are most anxious to see what the scheme is. We have heard with pleasure from the Chancellor of the Exchequer that the question is not to be dealt with in any niggardly spirit; there is really to be free education, by which we suppose that all the standards from top to bottom will be free. As every section of the community is most interested in this very important measure, I am quite sure we shall all be glad to hear when we may expect to have the measure placed in our hands.

COLONEL NOLAN (Galway, N.): I hope the Chancellor of the Exchequer will give us an assurance that the grant made to Ireland is to be devoted to the payment of the childrens' school pence. There are many ways in which the Chancellor of the Exchequer could distribute the money. The system of education in Ireland is somewhat different to that in England and Scotland, and, therefore, I hope he will make it plain that the grant is intended to be applied in lieu of the school pence.

(7.2.) MR. PICTON (Leicester): I think both sides of the House are extremely rejoiced to hear of the speedy advent of free schools; an ideal for which many of us have so long contended. Of course, we trust that the enlargement of public grants will be accompanied by an equitable extension of public representation upon the management. But while I feel the Chancellor of the Exchequer could scarcely have devoted his surplus to a better or nobler purpose, I cannot but regret he has not endeavoured by means of economies also to make provision for a free breakfast table as well. Free schools are all very well, but a free breakfast is a very substantial advantage likewise. The Chancellor of the Exchequer has spoken of the sudden increase in the consumption of tea. Last year but one he had to tell us that tea made no progress; last year again he told us that the Revenue from tea had actually fallen off. During the past 12 months the amount of tea consumed has very considerably increased. What does this mean? It means that through the imposition of a 6d. duty on tea a very large number of very poor people were deprived of tea that they would otherwise have consumed. It is clear that if the whole tax were taken off a large number of people would be able to procure a great addition to their daily comfort in the use of tea.

(7.5.) SIR R. PAGET (Somerset, Wells): I desire to refer to that portion of the speech of the right hon. Gentleman in which he dealt with the action of the County Councils in respect to technical education. I hope I am right in my estimation of the right hon. Gentleman's remarks, namely, that the County Councils may now go forward with a free hand and deal effectually with the important matter of technical education. In other words, I trust we may with certainty reckon that the sum which has been placed at our disposal during the past year will be paid to us in future years for the purposes of technical education. The matter is a little urgent, because at this moment County Councils in every part of the country are engaged in consideration of the circumstances. They are endeavouring to frame schemes to give effect to a complete system of technical education, and it is of the greatest moment to them that they should be informed whether they may rely upon this revenue, and thus be enabled to enter into definite engagements. I cannot refrain from expressing the belief that great satisfaction will be felt at the conclusion at which the right hon. Gentleman has arrived; that satisfaction will be considerably enhanced if he can assure the County Councils that they may regard the Grant as of a definite and permanent character.

*(7.7.) MR. SHAW LEFEVRE (Bradford, Central): I desire to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he can now lay on the Table of the House a Return of the estimated military expenditure for the present year, showing also the various ways in which it is proposed to deal with the money?

(7.8.) MAJOR RASCH (Essex, S.E.): As an humble agricultural Member, I wish to express my gratification at the redemption by the Government of their promise with regard to assisted education. With bread at 6d. a quartern loaf, and wages at 13s. a week, as they are in Essex, the boon the Government are about to give can hardly be adequately described. I am certain my constituents and the inhabitants of East Anglia generally will never regret the support they have given Her Majesty's Government.

MR. RATHBONE (Carnarvonshire, Arfon): I did not quite catch what the Chancellor of the Exchequer said about the withdrawal of the light gold in circulation. Does he intend to accompany that withdrawal by other measures connected with the statements which have been attributed to him?

(7.9.) MR. SYDNEY BUXTON (Tower Hamlets, Poplar): I trust the Chancellor of the Exchequer will be able to inform hon. Members that in his statement just now, he meant that the duty of 3d. a barrel of beer and 6d. a gallon of spirits will be continued as a permanent tax, because with regard to technical education many of the County Councils are in great difficulty. They do not know whether to treat the amount they receive as capital or as interest. I think the right hon. Gentleman gave good reasons why it should be a permanent tax. I am afraid I can hardly share the sanguine anticipations of the hon. Gentleman in regard to assisted education, and I am afraid that when the measure is introduced it will hardly satisfy the desires which we entertain in regard to it. The right hon. Gentleman has said he intends to deal with the question in no niggard spirit, and certainly some of us who are in favour of free education desire to see it dealt with, from top to bottom, in a thorough manner, and not merely in the way of further remission of fees. I think the Bill will receive cordial support from all quarters of the House, if it is found to be thorough and workable, and if it provides, as we hope, for further control over those bodies which are, at present non-representative, and which we are to provide with these further large sums. I congratulate the right hon. Gentleman, not only on the fact that he is able to introduce this system of free schools, but on the generally satisfactory results shown in the Budget. I think his proposal to practically keep over the £1,000,000 until next year for free schools is a very sensible and satisfactory one, and I think we may very well be satisfied with the present financial condition of the country.

(7.13.) MR. BRYCE (Aberdeen, S.): I join in the congratulations of Members on both sides of the House on the resolution of the Government not to withdraw the Special Excise Tax, but to let it remain available for the promotion of technical education. I concur in what has been said with regard to the growing and increasing interest which the provision of this money has excited on the subject of technical education. In Scotland, the application of the grant has been somewhat impeded by the deficiencies of the existing law in regard to technical education. I commend to the Government the desirability, now that we are assured that this source of income will be permanent, of considering whether they could not amend the Act in this respect. I think that in Scotland the object we are most entitled to consider in dealing with grants of this kind is the promotion of technical education. I think the Chancellor of the Exchequer has lately heard that the grant to the Scotch Universities has also proved inadequate, and that the desired reforms cannot be carried out without an additional contribution from the Treasury. I think the Government would do well to make inquiry as regards the needs of secondary and universal education in Scotland, and to consider them as among the objects to which the Scotch portion of the fund should be devoted.

*(7.16.) MR. F. S. POWELL (Wigan): I am glad my right hon. Friend, the Chancellor of the Exchequer has been able to hold out the prospect of a permanent grant for the work of technical education. The different localities will require some time to consider the whole subject, and to ascertain their own wants in regard to it. I do not wish to be drawn on this occasion into a Debate on free or assisted education. I rely upon the declaration made by the Prime Minister elsewhere that, under a system of assisted education, the voluntary schools are to be kept intact; but I hear with some apprehension and alarm from the other side, that there is to be a change in their management. I believe that change in that direction would be met with sharp resistance. Hon. Members opposite seem to think that because there is to be a larger grant from the Consolidated Fund the voluntary schools should be subjected to an extension of public local control. I can see no connection between the two conditions. If you have a grant from the rates you must have ratepayer's control; and it is because I do not wish to see any control by the ratepayers that I have always declined to receive money from the rates.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Gentleman is anticipating the discussion on this question.

*MR. F. S. POWELL: I am sorry I have gone beyond the Rules of the House, but some allusion was made to the subject, and all I desired to do was to make a protest, and so far to cover the ground.

*(7.19.) SIR U. KAY-SHUTTLE-WORTH (Lancashire, Clitheroe): I only wish to ask a question as to the time when we may expect to have the Education Bill before the House. Hon. Members anticipate that the Bill will contain provisions altering the system of management of voluntary schools. The measure ought to be before the House in ample time to be properly considered by the country. We are already far advanced in the Session. If the Bill were introduced late in the month of May, there would not be time for its proper consideration, and I hope we shall have it presented to us in the smallest number of days, so that our constituents may have time to consider it before it is brought on for Second Reading.

(7.21.) MR. SINCLAIR (Falkirk, &c.): Will the Chancellor of the Exchequer give some information as to his views about £1 and 10s. notes in relation to the currency? A very important and interesting speech on this question was delivered by the right hon. Gentleman at Leeds, and I hope we shall have a little more light on the subject. With regard to technical education, I think it is necessary to have legislation to secure that the money shall be applied in the way intended by the State. In some cases the County Councils have not so applied the money, but have used it in reduction of rates. As to the proportion of the money to which Scotland is entitled, she has for some time past provided out of her own funds for elementary education, and I trust it will be found that the higher education and secondary education grants will be provided for out of money she will become entitled to under the right hon. Gentleman's proposals.

*(7.23.) MR. BARTLEY (Islington, N.): I should like to say one word on what may be called the Education Budget. I believe you, Sir, ruled it out of order to allude to the effect of free education on the voluntary schools; therefore, I will not touch upon that point. I may say, however, that any system of free schools which in any way injures the voluntary schools will certainly meet with very strong opposition. I must say I do look with some apprehension on this very large subject which has been sprung on us at this period of the Session. It almost reminds me of the large question sprung on us in the last Budget, and which led to so great difficulty; and though the question of free education is one which, in theory, all sections of the House hold to be popularly attractive, yet, when you come to work out the matter in detail you will find that you are entering on a matter that will involve great difficulty. We have had some indication of that already. I can say, having devoted 20 years of my life to dealing with education and having been connected with the Education Department during the whole of that period, I have yet to learn that the Educational Authorities, from the late Professor Fawcett downwards, are agreed as to the advisability of free education. I am not going into the matter fully, but I would state emphatically, that unless precautions are taken in the Bill to protect voluntary schools, determined opposition will be offered on this side of the House.

(7.27) MR. R. T. REID (Dumfries, &c.): I observe that the Chancellor of the Exchequer maintains a strict reserve as to the application of the money that will belong to Scotland corresponding to the sum to be granted for free education in England. I am pleased to observe that. I hope that means that the right hon. Gentleman contemplates inviting the opinion of the bulk of the Scotch Members as to the application of the money. The hon. Member behind me says he wishes to see the money devoted to secondary education. I do not want to say a word against that, but it is possible that different parts of Scotland may desire to see the money disposed of in different ways. Therefore, I trust the right hon. Gentleman will consult the Scotch Members.

(7.29.) MR. BUCHANAN (Edinburgh, W.): I do not altogether agree with the hon. and learned Gentleman who has just sat down. I understand the Chancellor of the Exchequer to say to-night, that he is now going to take the course he followed three years ago when a third of the Probate Duty was given in aid of local taxation, and when the application of the amount which was to go to Scotland was not decided in the Budget but put off to the end of the Session, in order that representations might be received from the Scotch Members and Local Authorities on the subject. I think it will be in the recollection of the House, and that the Chancellor of the Exchequer will allow that the distribution of the money in the first instance was not very satisfactory, and that it had to be re-distributed subsequently in a more effective manner.

What I would press on the Chancellor of the Exchequer is that the apportionment should not be put off to a remote date, and that the responsibility for the distribution should rest with the Government. For my own part, I think the first object which it should be sought to attain, is the completion of the scheme of free elementary education in Scotland. I will not elaborate the point, but it is acknowledged by all Scotch Members here that the money has not been quite sufficient for the total freeing of elementary education in the Scotch schools.

(7.30.) MR. ILLINGWORTH (Bradford, W.): The Chancellor of the Exchequer is to be congratulated on having faced, at any rate, if not overcome, the prejudices of the entire Party on the other side of the House, as well as of those whom they represent in the country, against the principle of free education, and on having ventured to make provision for carrying out such a scheme. Liberals have been favourable to the principle for a long time past, and it is some consolation to know that part of the proceeds of the right hon. Gentleman's overflowing Budget is going to provide free education. The Government should go further, and make the boon worthy of the acceptance of the people of this country. They are proposing to appropriate the taxpayers' money, and they should see that the control of the taxpayers is associated with that great boon. It is, I hold, an elementary principle that along with this grant there should be associated popular educational control.

(7.32.) MR. J. STUART (Shoreditch, Hoxton): I rise to express a hope that the Chancellor of the Exchequer, when he rises to answer the questions which have been put to him, will give us some information as to when the Bill he has referred to with respect to education will come on, because it is clear that the interest of the right hon. Gentleman's Budget is concentrated on that point. It is natural that it should be so. It is a point of great national importance, and we shall look forward to the grant of free education in the country with great satisfaction. But the Bill may be of a very one-sided character, consequently the House and the country will be on the tip-toe of expectation to know what its provisions are—to know whether there is to be a great and real solution of this important question, or whether only a small portion of it is to be dealt with. Therefore, I trust the Chancellor of the Exchequer will be able to undertake to let us have his proposals before us in the course of a very few days.

*(7.33.) SIR A. ROLLIT (Islington, S.): I only rise to congratulate the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the Government on the proposal they have made in reference to free education, and to repudiate the suggestion of the hon. Member for Bradford that there are prejudices to any great extent to be removed on this side of the House. The country will welcome the announcement which has been made by the Chancellor of the Exchequer this evening. We have long felt free education to be a corollary of compulsory education, and we feel satisfied that when the details are made known the Government will know how to appreciate the past services of, and deal justly with, the voluntary schools, which have done so much for the education of the country, and the loss of which might produce a reaction dangerous to all education.

(7.34.) SIR G. CAMPBELL (Kirkcaldy, &c.): If the proposal for free education in England is received in the spirit of the remarks of the hon. Member who has just sat down, and not in that of the hon. Member who spoke a little time ago from that side of the House, I think the Government will succeed in solving the difficult problem they have taken in hand, so far as Scotland is concerned. It may be more difficult in England, but, at any rate, I hope he will be successful so far as Scotland is concerned. I would support the appeal of the hon. Member for Edinburgh that the Chancellor of the Exchequer will take care to settle in due time how the money is to be spent in Scotland. The right hon. Gentleman has done Scotland justice in arranging to give her a share of this money, but I am afraid that unless he is very careful it will become a bone of contention. I have already heard different opinions expressed from different parts of Scotland, as to how the money should be appropriated; and I, therefore, hope the question will be settled in time, and will not be held over to be dealt with hurriedly at the end of the Session. I should object to the money being spent on secondary education, if that education means the teaching of Greek and Latin to the higher classes, but if it is to be devoted to teaching useful information I should be satisfied. If the Government take upon themselves the responsibility of producing a plan I hope they will be able to settle the matter satisfactorily.

(7.36.) MR. C. S. PARKER (Perth): I think the Scotch Members are quite capable of discussing the application of funds of this description in a different spirit to that of dogs quarrelling over a bone. But I rise to put a question to the Chancellor of the Exchequer. I wish to know how far the granting of this money to Scotland is to be contingent on the passing of the Bill conferring free education on England? Is Scotland to wait until the English Bill has been discussed and disposed of? I do not quite see how it can be otherwise; still I think we should have early information so that we may have an opportunity of discussing what proportion of the money should go to education and what to other things.

*(7.37.) SIR J. LUBBOCK (London University): I have heard with regret some of the remarks made on both sides of the House with reference to free education. No doubt the question is full of difficulty, but I hope that when we come to consider it we shall do so with a desire for conciliation rather than to conjure up points of difference. I join in the congratulations addressed to my right hon. Friend for having introduced a simple Budget, and am glad that he has taken a prudent course in his Estimates. The announcement with reference to the rehabilitation of the gold coinage will, I am sure, be received with general satisfaction among those engaged in business; but I wish to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether, in addition to restoring the gold coinage, he proposes, as I hope will be the case, also to take steps to prevent it from falling again into the present unsatisfactory condition?

(7.39.) MR. GOSCHEN: I have to express my thanks for the kind way in which hon. Members have spoken of my proposals. In briefly answering the questions which have been put, I will say that I quite foresaw—and I have had no reason to change my mind—that the fact that a certain sum of money is to be devoted to Scotland will deprive me of any peace of mind for the next few weeks. In reply to the natural curiosity of Scotch Members, I would point out that I have not said that the Government have determined the matter, but that we are not prepared to disclose the matter; at the same time, we shall be anxious to ascertain and know the views of the Scotch people on the subject, and not only of the Scotch Members. I believe, I am sorry to say, that there is no degree of unanimity. If there had been, our case would soon come to an end. In this connection I would suggest that it is not precisely the Chancellor of the Exchequer who will have to deal with the matter, but rather the Scotch Office, through whom such inquiries ought to filter. With regard to a question as to what will be the fate of Scotland if the money does not finally go to England, all I can say is that hon. Members opposite should do their best to pass the English Free Education Bill in order that Scotland may have her share afterwards. As to when we expect to be able to introduce the Bill, that depends to a certain extent upon the House itself. The Government will see what progress is made with the Land Bill. I feel confident that we shall have no reason to complain of right hon. Gentlemen on the Front Opposition Bench with regard to delay in connection with that Bill; and I am sure that all sides of the House will feel that, while every clause ought to be adequately discussed in the case of an important measure which all the country wishes to see passed, we should further the business of the House as much as possible. There will be no delay on the part of the Government in introducing the Bill. I may say that it is not only the object, but the intense desire of the Government not to injure any schools; and I think that any alarm that may be felt on this side of the House as to the result of the measure is entirely premature, and I hope will be entirely allayed when hon. Members see the measure. With regard to what has fallen from the right hon. Baronet the Member for the University of London, I most fervently hope that the House of Commons will rise superior to any rivalry or jealousy with regard to the question of free education. I have been asked a question with reference to the probability of the continuance of the grant of money set aside by the County Councils for technical education. Hon. Members wish to know whether they may count upon the continuance of the grant. I think they can count upon the continuance of the receipt of that grant in the same way as they can count on the continuance of the Probate Grant. Of course, no grants of the kind can be declared to be permanent, because some Government may think that altogether different arrangements ought to be made with respect to local taxation. It would, therefore, be unwise for the present or any other Government to pledge itself to the continuance of any particular form of taxation. At the same time, I think the County Councils may continue to apply this money with the same degree of confidence with which they apply other sums placed at their disposal. In answer to another question which I have been asked, I have to say that it certainly would be my wish, if time can be found, to place the gold circulation of the country upon a satisfactory footing. I have measures in preparation which will put both our coinage and currency upon a firmer basis. I will take an early opportunity, if one occurs, to make further declarations as to my views on the currency question. I think now I have answered all the questions that have been asked.

COLONEL NOLAN: What as to the educational question as affecting Ireland?

MR. GOSCHEN: Does the hon. Member mean that Ireland should stand on the same footing with England and Scotland with regard to free education? The consequence, I fear, is only too manifest in the large number of illiterate voters. I am not prepared to disclose any particular proposals; but I trust when they are disclosed they will be satisfactory.

(7.50.) MR. MUNDELLA : Sir, I should be very sorry, after the benefit which the Chancellor of the Exchequer has conferred on the community, to express anything like dissatisfaction, but I submit to him that to tie up the Education Bill with the Irish Land Bill is disappointing. To-morrow there will not be a schoolmaster or manager throughout the country but will be anxious to know what are the Government proposals. It is important that there should be ample time for their discussion; and I have no doubt that if the Bill is not in the right hon. Gentleman's pocket now, it is in some red box in his office. I know it was ready three weeks ago. There will be the greatest anxiety to know on what principle education is to be given to the people of this country, and I press upon the right hon. Gentleman that he should give us ample opportunity to consider the proposals before they are discussed.

MR. HALLEY STEWART (Lincolnshire, Spalding) : I rise for the purpose of joining with my right hon. Friend in urging upon the Chancellor of the Exchequer the desirability of printing the Bill and having it read a first time. We have no desire to hurry the Second Reading stage, but the formal stage might be taken, and thus give the House and the country an opportunity of knowing what the proposals are.

*(7.57.) THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster) : I think my right hon. Friend has misapprehended my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer. There is no desire whatever to tie up the Education Bill with the Land Bill. But it is necessary to make progress with one set of measures before entering upon another. I, however, give the House assurance that ample time will be given for the Second Reading of the Bill, before the Second Reading. We have no desire to take the country by surprise with a measure of this great importance. We shall introduce it at the earliest possible moment consistently with the progress of other business, and we shall give full information long before the Second Reading.

COLONEL NOLAN : The Chancellor of the Exchequer has said very little about Ireland. All I wish to ask is whether he will put school fees in Ireland on the same footing as they are to be put in England?

MR. GOSCHEN : Certainly, Sir.

SIR J. LUBBOCK : The right hon. Gentleman received some weeks ago a deputation from English University Colleges asking for an increased grant. Can the right hon. Gentleman inform us what conclusion the Government have arrived at?

MR. GOSCHEN : I am scarcely in a position to state; but I will communicate with my right hon. Friend.

(8.0.) MR. PICTON : I would point out to the right hon. Gentleman that it is only a question of printing the Bill, and to tie it up with the Land Bill is a sort of threat that we shall not have any information unless we do what the Government tell us. I do not think it is fair to the House or the country. Surely it is only reasonable that the Education Bill should be read a first time and printed.

(8.1.) MR. HUNTER (Aberdeen, N.) : Sir, if the Government are going to give free education in England, in the amplest manner, a sum exceeding £1,900,000 would be required for England alone, while a proportionate sum would be required for Scotland—which would bring the sum far above £2,000,000, which is the amount at his disposal. The Chancellor of the Exchequer must not be misled by the somewhat artificial demonstration which has been set up in Scotland—I know not by whom—with reference to the feeling of the Scotch people on this subject. The first claim upon the money given to Scotland will be to complete the system of free education. The sum of £40,000 a year is still required for that purpose. I warn the right hon. Gentleman that we shall not listen to any proposal which does not in the first place give free education up to the Fifth and even Sixth Standards in the elementary schools. The people of Scotland, too, are unanimously agreed that something must be done for secondary and technical education, and perhaps the most urgent demand is for continuation schools in the evening. It is also absolutely necessary, if the deficiency in connection with the Scotch Universities is to be met, to say nothing of their development and growth, that some provision should be made for them. I hope that the right hon. Gentleman when he comes to deal with that part of the surplus which is to be distributed in Scotland, will remember that the Scotch people have these subjects very much at heart. He must not be deluded by these deputations from Parochial Bodies, and some Town Councils, which in no sense represent the real feeling of the electors of Scotland.

(8.3.) MR. M. J. KENNY (Tyrone, Mid): Will the right hon. Gentleman state that he will do for Ireland, in respect of abolishing school fees, what he is going to do for England? Will he undertake definitely to abolish school fees in Ireland?

MR. GOSCHEN: I do not know that I could pledge myself distinctly, but there is no purpose to which I would more gladly assign a portion of the surplus than for the remission of school fees in Ireland. I am scarcely in a position to say what will be done; but the subject will, at all events, have the most benevolent consideration of the Government.

MR. M. J. KENNY: Will the right hon. Gentleman consider it during the present Session?

MR. GOSCHEN: If it is the general wish of the great bulk of the Irish Members, I shall endeavour to consider the subject this Session.

MR. A. DYKE ACLAND (York, W.R., Rotherham): I listened with great satisfaction to what the right hon. Gentleman said with regard to County Councils and grants to education, but as he quite truly observed, some future Government may alter the destination of the money; and in some further scheme for intermediate and technical education those County Councils which do nothing, may have a claim made upon them by the Government to organise some scheme.

(8.5.) MR. ROWNTREE (Scarborough): I wish to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if the Government cannot see their way to prevent any district being denied the benefits of technical and secondary education. It happens, I am sorry to say in many parts of the country, that towns with very considerable populations are anxious to promote further education, but have no means supplied to them for doing so under the present system. There is much dissatisfaction and disappointment in very many parts of the country on this account. The President of the Local Government Board introduced an Amendment into last year's Bill empowering County Councils to devote their portion of the Imperial Grant to these purposes, but I regret that many of those bodies have not availed themselves of the power, and do not intend to do so; hence it is that many of our towns have received nothing at all under these grants, and feel themselves exceedingly prejudiced by the withholding of the money. Now, the town which I represent has contributed from £600 to £800 to the fund which the County Council has received, but so far, it has not received a penny back, and apparently it will get nothing for educational purposes. I respectfully ask the Government to consider whether some Amendment may not be made in the application of this money of the coming year by which the grievances to which I have referred can be remedied.

(8.8.) MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): We shall have to press for some specific information as to the intentions of the Government with regard to Ireland, so far as this New Educational Grant is concerned, before a decision is come to on Clause 3 of the Land Purchase Bill. Clause 3 provides that the moneys granted by the Imperial Parliament for the purpose of primary education in Ireland shall be technically seized and impounded for the purpose of guaranteeing the fulfilment of contracts made under the Bill—contracts in which the mass of the people of Ireland have no concern whatever. I think the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer will see the reasonableness of what I am urging. We want to make our position clear. We want to know before we assent to the hypothecation of the Primary Education Grant what chance we have of the improvement of our position in the new aspect of affairs. I may remind the hon. Gentleman of what I said last year. We, in our judgment, in Ireland, contribute double our share to the Imperial purse. The Secretary to the Treasury laughs at that. Does he think he knows more about it than Mr. Giffen, the expert? Mr. Giffen tells us that while our contribution to the Imperial purse is one-twelfth of your Revenue, our capacity to pay should be judged by the amount of amassed capital in Ireland, and in that case we ought only to contribute one-twenty-fifth. In this position we contribute one-sixth of our earnings—we, the poorest country in the world—whereas you only contribute one-twelfth. Surely that gives us a powerful claim for relief. We fared very badly indeed in connection with the surplus of last year. That surplus amounted to £3,500,000, for the right hon. Gentleman was in a more prosperous position than he now is. That surplus arose mainly for the Spirit Duty, of which we contribute one-sixth. Well, we ought at least to have received £450,000 out of last year's surplus. We got, as a fact, a benefit of perhaps £100,000 by the reduction of the Tea Duty, and we had £4,000 or £5,000 from the reduction of the duty on currants; the truth is, we got one thirty-fifth instead of a twelfth, which it is admitted we were entitled to, although we claim we ought to have had one-sixth—of course the right hon. Gentleman will ride off on the question of light railways and relief works. But we assert that that question ought not to be taken into consideration in connection with the finance of any particular year. It belongs rather to an historical examination of the connection of Ireland with England, and such an examination would show that we are entitled to a good deal more than we have yet received. I now ask what is to be our fate this year? The Revenue of the year arises in great measure from the consumption of an article in respect of which we contribute a large share of the Imperial Revenue, and I do trust the

Chancellor of the Exchequer will do us justice in this matter.

(8.14.) MR. GOSCHEN: Yes, I assure the hon. Member this matter shall receive my most careful consideration. I thought I had conveyed that in my speech. I do not think he has made a very fair statement as to what has been done for Ireland, for my surpluses of last year and this year have been very largely diminished by the money granted—and cheerfully granted—to Ireland for relief works. If Ireland contributes, as the hon. Member thinks, more than her share to the Imperial Revenue, she also receives back largely in excess of what she is entitled to.

MR. M. J. KENNY: In one year perhaps.

MR. GOSCHEN: I think that if the figures are investigated, the hon. Member will see that this does not apply to one special year merely. I have always endeavoured to treat Ireland with perfect fairness. May I point out that England was responsible for more of the excess revenue on spirits than either Scotland or Ireland?

MR. SEXTON: Not very much more.

MR. GOSCHEN: England 9 per cent. and Ireland $7\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. I can only assure hon. Gentlemen that Ireland shall receive her fair share out of the surplus, and from that position I do not intend to budge one iota.

(8.17.) Motion made, and Question, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Mr. Jackson,)—put, and agreed to.

Committee report Progress; to sit again To-morrow.

LONDON (CITY) TRIAL OF CIVIL CAUSES BILL.—(No. 269.)

COMMITTEE. THIRD READING.

Considered in Committee, and reported, without Amendment.

(8.21.) THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir R. WEBSTER, Isle of Wight): I trust the House will permit the Bill now to be read a third time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read the third time."

MR. A. O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.): Does the Attorney General mean this Bill to provide for a permanent or merely for a temporary arrangement?

SIR R. WEBSTER: I do not contemplate it will be a permanent arrangement. The object of the Bill is merely to remove a doubt, more than once expressed, as to the power of the Judges to sit in the City.

MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camborne): I think we ought to have fuller explanations.

(8.23.) MR. M. J. KENNY (Tyrone, Mid): There was an Amendment on the Paper which proposed to limit the duration of the Bill. The learned Attorney General says he does not contemplate a permanent arrangement; did he give an undertaking it should be temporary before the Amendment was withdrawn?

SIR R. WEBSTER: No undertaking was asked for. The hon. Member merely intimated that he did not intend to press it.

(8.24.) MR. KNOX (Cavan, W.): If the Bill is only to be temporary, it will be necessary for the Government to provide additional accommodation at the Law Courts. There are serious objections on the score of health to the present arrangement. I believe a ready consent was given to the Second Reading of this Bill on the understanding that it should only be a temporary measure.

(8.25.) SIR R. WEBSTER: May I point out that this Bill gives no fresh powers at all. It simply removes a doubt as to existing powers.

Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read the third time, and passed.

MAIL SHIPS BILL.—(No. 163.)

COMMITTEE.

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Amendment proposed,

In Clause 8, page 7, line 10, after "sessions," insert "In Scotland such person may appeal in manner provided by 'The Summary Prosecutions Appeals (Scotland) Act, 1876.'—(Sir J. Fergusson.)

(8.26.) MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camborne): Is this a fresh Amendment put down by the Government? If so, we ought to have some explanation.

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Sir J. FERGUSSON, Manchester, N.E.): The Amendments have been on the Paper a fortnight.

MR. KNOX (Cavan, W.): What is the meaning of Clause 3 of this Bill? If—

The CHAIRMAN: Order, order! We are not now discussing Clause 3.

Amendment agreed to.

Other Amendments made.

Amendment proposed, in Clause 9, pages 7 and 8, leave out Sub-sections (2) and (4).—(Sir J. Fergusson.)

MR. CONYBEARE: The right hon. Gentleman may say that the Amendments have been on the Paper some days, but that does not do away with the necessity for further explanations.

*(8.30.) SIR J. FERGUSSON: I am always willing to give any explanations required. This Amendment has been introduced, because the present powers possessed by the Post Office are considered to be adequate to fulfil the Convention.

MR. CONYBEARE: There is one matter to which I should like to draw attention. Within the last few days, there has been a robbery of mails from one of the boats running between Dover and Calais, and I should like to know if the right hon. Gentleman will take steps to ensure that greater precautions are taken, so as to avoid the possibility of some robberies in the future.

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! That has nothing to do with the subject.

MR. CONYBEARE: It seems to me very important that such steps should be taken.

Amendment agreed to.

Amendment proposed, in Clause 10, page 8, line 43, at end, insert "The expression 'subsidy' includes a payment for the performance of a contract."—(Sir J. Fergusson.)

(8.34.) MR. M. J. KENNY (Tyrone, Mid): What is the meaning of this Amendment?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: The point is this: Some of the contracts provide for a fixed payment for the service done, and others provide for payment according to the weight of the mails carried. That is the case with the Atlantic steamers. Hence the necessity for this change.

(8.35.) MR. M. J. KENNY: Why not have a uniform system?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: That might be a proper thing to consider when the House has before it the question of the mail contracts.

(8.36.) MR. CONYBEARE: Would it be in order for me on this Amendment to raise the question as to the mail robberies?

THE CHAIRMAN: No.

Amendment agreed to.

Bill reported; as amended, to be considered to-morrow at Two of the clock.

PRESUMPTION OF LIFE LIMITATION (SCOTLAND) BILL.—(No. 243.)

COMMITTEE.

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

(9.9.) Clause 1 and 2 agreed to.

Clause 3.

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; House counted, and 40 Members being found present,

MR. M. J. KENNY (Tyrone, Mid): I would like to receive an explanation from the Lord Advocate as to the object of the Bill. The Bill is very obscure, and I think it is right an explanation should be given.

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. P. B. ROBERTSON, Bute): I shall be happy to offer an explanation, but I am afraid it will be as obscure to the hon. and learned Gentleman as he thinks the Bill is. There are in Scotland, estates in fee and in life rent, and in some instances the death of one person might involve the estate which was in fee becoming burdened with a life rent. I am certain the hon. and learned Gentleman follows me up to this point. There are cases in which it is desirable to provide in an Act for the presumption of life in cases which are not provided for under the Acts of 1881. There are some other cases which, if I went into an explanation, would involve a similarly lucid statement, and, therefore, probably I may be dispensed from the necessity of inflicting it upon the Committee. I have only to add that the Bill is entirely approved by the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Clackmannan, and the only Amendments standing in my name are the effect of an arrangement come to by the hon. and learned Member for the town of Elgin (Mr. Asher).

Amendments made.

Clause 3 and remaining clauses agreed to.

Bill reported; as amended, to be considered to-morrow at Two of the clock.

SUMMARY JURISDICTION (YOUTHFUL OFFENDERS) BILL.—(No. 194.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

(9.16.) THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. MATTHEWS, Birmingham, E.): I think it will not be necessary for me to detain the House for any long time in moving the Second Reading of this Bill. As the House is aware for many years past the principal, or a great, object in the mind of every person who desires the reform of the Criminal Law has been to find some means whereby it may be possible to avoid the necessity of sending juvenile offenders to prison and the contamination that follows from mingling with the habitués of our prisons. A taint attaches to young creatures in the beginning of their lives which is often never removed. I do not like to trouble the House now with many figures, but some of the figures are interesting. In 1871, during 12 months, there were committed to prison 1,467 boys and girls under 12 years of age, and of boys and girls between the ages of 12 and 16 there were 7,510.

MR. PICKERSGILL (Bethnal Green, S.W.): Can the right hon. Gentleman give us the figures distinguishing the sexes?

MR. MATTHEWS: I can do so if the hon. Gentleman thinks it is material. In 1871 there were committed to prison 1,341 boys and 126 girls under 12 years of age, and 6,480 boys and 1,030 girls between the ages of 12 and 16. This gives a total of 8,977 persons under 16 years of age committed to prison during the year.

AN HON. MEMBER: And to reformatories?

MR. MATTHEWS: I am speaking only of those sent to prison. At that time the only cases where the alternative of whipping could be resorted to, were cases of simple larceny, placing obstructions on railway lines, and throwing stones at railway carriages. This large amount of juvenile imprisonment naturally attracted attention, and in 1879 the Summary Jurisdiction Act was passed, which largely extends the number of cases in which whipping can be resorted to for male juvenile offenders, instead of imprisonment. A larger list of offences under the Act had attached to them the alternative punishment of whipping; and not to mention all these were included those I have mentioned—larceny from the person, larceny by clerks or embezzlement, receiving stolen goods, aiding and abetting larceny, and offences under the Post Office. This Act largely diminished the number of juvenile prisoners. The numbers in the year ending March 31, 1879, were for children under 12 years 667 boys and 53 girls, and for children between 12 and 16 years 5,270 boys and 820 girls; altogether a total of 6,810 prisoners under 16. Besides this Act the Home Office, while the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby was at the head of it, introduced a course of administration which tended in the same direction. In the year 1880 the Home Secretary addressed a circular to all the Chairmen of Quarter Sessions and the Recorders of Boroughs, directing them to suggest some means by which the imprisonment of young children could be prevented. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby had always entertained a very strong feeling on this subject. The replies from these Courts of Summary Jurisdiction have been put before the House in the form of a Return, and so far as I have examined this Return, with almost unanimity, with only one or two exceptions, the replies to this circular suggest as alternatives, partly the whipping of boys and partly the exercise of some remedy against the parent of the juvenile offender. In consequence of these opinions, the right hon. Gentleman initiated a course of administrative action which has proved highly useful. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby required the governors of prisons to report to the Home Office every case of young children under 14 years in prison; and then inquiries were addressed to the Magistrates as to how they came to have committed such young offenders to prison; in many cases remonstrances were addressed to the Magistrates and sometimes, though rarely, the sentences were in part remitted. So without interfering with judicial discretion and action the administrative action of the Home Office has been steadily to decrease the number of juvenile offenders in prison. On the other hand Magistrates, when inquiry has been made, have said, "This was a very bad case, this was a very naughty boy, and we should have been delighted if we could have inflicted the punishment of whipping instead of imprisonment, but the law does not allow that and it was too serious a case to allow to go unpunished." I believe the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby intended to remedy the law in the direction of the present Bill, but I do not think he carried his intentions so far as to introduce a Bill. One reason for delay was because the system of reformatory and industrial schools, which offers an alternative to prolonged imprisonment, was then under the consideration of a Commission. The Report of that Commission has since been issued, and, in consequence, I introduced three years ago a Bill to amend the reformatory system, and two clauses which are now embodied in a separate Bill. I gave Courts of Summary Jurisdiction the alternative of sending a child to a reformatory or to an industrial school, or they can have recourse to the punishments provided under the present Bill. The House of Lords suggested, at the instance of Lord Herschell, that these two clauses should be put into a Bill by themselves; and I, having adopted this suggestion, the clauses are now before Parliament for the third time. Twice they have passed the House of Lords, where they have met with the approval of most experienced able lawyers, Lord Herschell approving them with slight modification. I ought to say before I go further that a great change for the better has been the consequence of the legislation of 1879 and of the administrative action of the Home Office, which has been going on for the last 10 years. In the year 1890 there were only 237 boys and 16 girls under 12 years of age committed to prison, and there were only 3,620 boys and 493 girls between the ages of 12 and 16 who were committed to prison. But this vast improvement is not improvement enough. It is still very distressing to think that over 4,000 juveniles are yet annually sent to prison. But there is no alternative punishment for boys, except corporal punishment, and therefore the Bill proposes that in all trivial offences which can be summarily punished the Court may adjudge the offender, if a male, to be whipped. That whipping, by a subsequent sub-section, is limited to whipping with a birch rod, by a warder or constable, in the presence of the governor of the prison or of some other high official, and in the presence of the parent, if desired. The number of strokes is also limited. These are details which may be modified in Committee. Then as to the alternative of a fine. It is idle to attempt to punish a boy by the infliction of a fine; he probably has no money, and then comes in the alternative of imprisonment—the very thing we desire to avoid. The only alternative, which is also embodied in the Report of the Commission, is to punish the parent, who is in many cases the person really at fault. The Bill provides that the parent may be ordered either to pay compensation to the person injured, or to pay a fine, or to give security for the good behaviour of the offender. I take the case of throwing stones at railway trains. Very often it is not a criminal act; it is an act of boyish mischief for which a whipping is the best cure. But if the boy throws stones at a steamboat he must be either fined or imprisoned. Is there any sense in that? It seems to be ridiculous to order a whipping in the one case and not in the other. Take another case. The offenders for which, under the Summary Jurisdiction Act, whipping may be inflicted are not all such as I should have selected—cases of larceny, embezzlement, and thieving—but I take the cases of stealing fruit and cruelty to animals—often mere boyish boisterousness. What punishment ought to be inflicted in such cases? Whipping is, I think, more effectual and more humane. I have had remonstrances from Magistrates at Hastings, where fruit-stealing is of frequent occurrence, and where boys do an enormous amount of mischief. Fruit growers complain bitterly of the amount of mischief in the aggregate inflicted by these boyish depredations. The Magistrates feel compelled to administer some punishment, and they have no alternative but to send the boys to prison. I deeply regret that these boys should be sent to gaol and stamped for life as gaol birds because they got over a wall to pluck fruit. Take offences under the Vagrants Act—playing pitch-and-toss, for instance, on the highways, in which so many idle and naughty boys waste their time. It seems to me most distressing that a boy should be sent to prison for such an offence as that. Whipping appears to me the best form of punishment for such an offence. I do not know that I need occupy more time—

MR. ROWNTREE (Scarborough): Has the right hon. Gentleman any explanation of the words, "with or without conviction"?

MR. MATTHEWS: This is a discretion to be vested in the Magistrates, and similar to that they exercise under the Industrial Schools Act. If you attempt to draw a hard and fast line in regard to these punishments, you may do great injustice. Nobody can adjust the degree of criminality in such offences, but the Court who tries the case. You must trust the discretion of the Court; if you cannot do so then substitute another Court. What we intend is, that a boy having, say, plucked an apple from another person's tree should not therefore be placed under the stigma of having committed larceny, that he shall not throughout his life have the record against him that he was convicted and punished for larceny. I heartily commend the Bill to the House. I think it will be a valuable improvement in our Summary Jurisdiction for juvenile offenders, and be the means of preventing many boys, not to speak of girls, passing into that wretched class—habitual criminals. When a child passes into that class the gates of hope close behind him, and the social reformer drops his hands in despair at the spectacle that confronts him.

Motion made, and Question proposed.
"That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Matthews.)

(9.35.) MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): I think the right hon. Gentleman has not quite proved his case. He says it is most undesirable that the taint of imprisonment should be imposed upon a lad which will last to old age for some trivial offence such as stealing apples or playing at pitch-and-toss in the streets, and I quite agree with the right hon. Gentleman. But I am not at all certain whether the fact of the lad having been condemned by a Magistrate to be flogged—and he can be so punished up to the age of 16—will, becoming known in the neighbourhood, cling to that boy more than the fact of his having been imprisoned for four or five days. [Cries of "No, no!"] It is a matter of opinion, I think it would. It is proposed that the punishment of flogging shall be inflicted for playing pitch-and-toss in the streets. But we have heard a great deal lately about gambling in high places, and why is a child to be flogged for playing pitch-and-toss, an undesirable amusement no doubt but not a criminal offence, when grown-up persons are allowed in their homes or clubs to gamble for large sums of money? What will be the feelings of a boy so punished when he goes to a race-course and sees a betting ring established for betting to be carried on publicly and police to guard the ring to see that the betting is carried on fairly? The boy sees this, and yet if he plays pitch-and-toss close by or on his way home he is then taken into custody and flogged by order of the Magistrates. I do not know how it may have been with the right hon. Gentleman, but I certainly as a boy have played pitch-and-toss hundreds of times. Stealing apples, too, no doubt, is very wrong, but you can stop these youthful misdeeds by bringing the force of public opinion to check them. The right hon. Gentleman knows that in Germany trees line the roads laden with apples and plums, yet no fruit is stolen because public opinion is strongly against it. There is a fine for the offence, but there is no necessity for the punishment of flogging to check the offence. If a boy is perpetually stealing fruit or making himself a nuisance, playing pitch-and-toss in the streets, probably that is the fault of the parents, and I should like to see a small fine inflicted on the parent, and then the parent would exercise some sort of domestic discipline over his boy and correct his bad habits.

MR. MATTHEWS: The Bill provides that.

MR. LABOUCHERE: Yes, but it gives an alternative to the Magistrate, and we know what Magistrates are—that they almost always apply the harshest construction of the law. Let the right hon. Gentleman strike out this flogging provision from his Bill and I will vote for the Bill with the greatest pleasure, but I cannot support this giving Magistrates the alternative of inflicting punishment by flogging.

(9.40.) MR. PICKERSGILL: I regret that the right hon. Gentleman should grudge the time spent on this Bill, and apparently resent the interference of hon. Members interested in the subject. It is an important measure, and remarkable in that, as the right hon. Gentleman has himself stated, it introduces considerable novelty into our criminal jurisprudence, giving Magistrates larger discretion. The Bill naturally divides itself into two parts. First, it attempts to enforce parental responsibility. That is a good principle, and if the Bill were confined to that, I should not vote against the Second Reading. Even with regard to the enforcement of parental responsibility in the way proposed by the Bill I think very consider-order that a punishment should be inflicted without actually committing to prison, which would blacken the lad's character for life. I believe it would be a relief to all who have to administer the law if in cases of this kind a lad could be sentenced to be whipped instead of being sent to prison. As to the demoralising character of the punishment, I have heard it said of Dr. Keate, of Eton, that he has been known to boast of having flogged half the aristocracy of England. Well, if that is so, I do not think boys of the lower classes would feel it as degrading to be whipped as the hon. Gentleman who last spoke seems to think. If you think the Magistrates of the country should not be entrusted with these powers, and are a body deserving condemnation, that is a much larger question, and one which ought to be dealt with on a different occasion.

*(10.4.) SIR WALTER FOSTER (Derby, Ilkeston): The title of this Bill is hardly a sufficiently clear definition of what the measure aims at doing. If the Government had called it "The Flogging of Young Persons Bill," I think it would have excited much more attention than it has done, both in this House and outside. I feel very strongly on this question. One of the first duties I had to perform for the constituency I now represent, was that of bringing before the House a case in which the child of one of my constituents was brutally flogged. He received eight strokes with the birch, and a few days afterwards, when I saw him, his back was scored and torn with the severity of the punishment. That case created a great impression on my mind; and though this Bill may be made to raise the age of children who may be flogged, I think that punishment too severe, and that it will have a brutalising effect on those who administer it. The hon. Baronet opposite has referred to the wide application of the rod in certain public schools; but from what we know of the aristocracy, to whom he referred as educated at those schools, I do not think that their conduct is such as to very highly commend the character of their bringing up. If flogging were a method of improving the morals of that class generally, we ought to have a better result than we see around us. But I do not think there can be any comparison drawn between the floggings of the schoolmaster and those to be administered to children for trivial offences, when they are taken before the Magistrates. I do not say that in no case should the punishment of flogging ever be administered; but I think it should be very exceptional. Under this Bill, however, it will be commonly resorted to by the Magistrates, as a deterrent against offences in the case of boys, instead of trying other methods of bringing boys to a healthy state of mind. I would point out that flogging is discouraged in the elementary schools of the country, and has been banished from the Services, and, therefore, I think we ought to guard the Statute Book from a further introduction of the punishment. I believe that many a child who, under other circumstances, could be persuaded to lead a better course of life, and to avoid offences against the law, under this brutal punishment will become callous. I believe that a more tender treatment of juvenile offenders would be productive of better results. It is difficult to measure the effect of 10 or 12 strokes on the tender skin of a young person. It varies very often with the individual child, and you have to take a number of considerations into your judgment before deciding upon the administration of such punishment. The schoolmaster differs from the Magistrate in this respect. He knows the individual characteristics of the child to be punished, whereas the Magistrate may never have seen the culprit before, and may be totally unacquainted with his nervous system or physical characteristics. The parallel drawn, therefore, between the schoolmaster and the Court of Summary Jurisdiction is not a fair one. Even if it were, I think we ought to endeavour to bring about a more humane system of punishment than flogging.

(10.10.) MR. A. O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.): If all the Magistrates of the country were like the hon. Baronet opposite few of us would hesitate to increase their discretionary power in the manner proposed in the Bill, but unfortunately a large number of the Magistrates of this country are very different to the hon. Baronet. It is not very many years ago since a Magistrate in Cornwall sent a little boy to prison, because he was found playing at marbles during Church hours on Sunday. This Magistrate might be watched in other parts of the country; and when you consider the wide-reaching scope of the words in this Bill, I think the Home Secretary himself will admit that what he is proposing now is a very serious matter. The Home Secretary is responsible for the administration of the prisons, and yet, speaking in his capacity as Minister, with all the solemnity of tone of which he is master, on an occasion on which he had to deal with this very matter, he told the House of Commons that when once a child was sent to prison he must abandon all hope. That very phrase is eloquent of the brutal, I might almost say infamous, prison system that obtains in this country. There is room for amendment, but I would venture to suggest it is not in the direction suggested in the Bill. The measure itself appears to me very badly drafted. It says that where a juvenile offender is proved before a Court of Summary Jurisdiction to have committed an offence for which it is liable to conviction, the Court may without prejudice to its other powers do any one or more of several other things. If we interpret that under the Act of 1889, we find that the Bill does not apply to Scotland, and we find, further, that it gives a single Justice power to convict or not as he chooses, and if he convicts to exercise his full power of punishing under the existing law, and over and above that to adjudge the offender to be whipped in any case, and besides that to inflict a fine on the parent in any case, and to order the parent to pay damages to the extent of £5 or any sum below, and, more than that, to order the parent to give security for the good behaviour of the child. I say that is a most extraordinary proposal. To trust a Magistrate, such as that in Cornwall whom I have mentioned, who thought it a reasonable thing to send a small boy to prison because he played marbles on the Sunday during the hours of Divine service—to entrust such a man as that with the power, over and above those he already possesses, of ordering an offender to be whipped, of fining the parents and requiring them to become sureties for the good behaviour of the offender, is a thing which will require a great amount of justification at the hands of the Home Secretary. This Bill, though it refers to Scotland, could not really be enforced there, because it is confined to England and Wales. I base my objection to the Bill on the ground that, though there may be cases in which whipping is desirable, still there should not be power conferred upon Justices to inflict corporal punishment wherever they are able to sentence under the existing law. I do not join in the denunciation of whipping. In cases of violent assaults the criminal is probably best dealt with by whipping; there are certain offenders who do not understand anything but corporal punishment. Still the power to be conferred upon Justices by this Bill is one which ought to be conferred only on persons who can be trusted to exercise it with very great discretion. This Bill presents many objectionable points, and I shall oppose it in almost every line.

(10.20.) MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camborne): I join in opposing the Bill as it stands, while admitting that there are some provisions in it which are not to be altogether condemned. The broad power proposed to be given to Magistrates for the infliction of corporal punishment ought not to be sanctioned by the House without grave consideration. In Cornwall, for example, some Magistrates have frequently shown an utter disregard of humane feeling in dealing with young offenders, and often for very trivial offences very heavy punishments have been inflicted. It is not desirable, therefore, to place in their hands a greater power of punishment than they already possess. Indeed, I should prefer to see their powers curtailed rather than extended. It appears to me that, under the present system, a grave necessity exists for a re-classification of offences so far as they are committed by juvenile offenders. Would it not be possible to include provisions which would tend, if not to a general reform of the law applicable to juvenile offenders, at least to a mitigation of the injuries which are liable to be inflicted by the Magistrates under the Bill? The Home Secretary admitted that there are a number of offences which are not really criminal—such, for instance, as stealing an apple, throwing stones at steamboats and trains. Surely offences of a purely mischievous and thoughtless character ought to be dealt with in a different manner from offences which betray something like a criminal intent. Under this Bill it would be within the discretion of the most stupid, blundering Magistrate to sentence a boy to be whipped for a purely idle, mischievous freak, without having had an intention to do any wrong. I contend that the House ought to carefully limit the discretion given to the Magistrates dealing with such offences. A line should be drawn between the mischievous freak and the graver offences showing criminal intent; and in this connection I would propose that, in all circumstances, before a boy is ordered to be sentenced or whipped, he should first receive a caution, and where offences resulting in loss or injury can be rectified by a money payment, the parent should be fined or ordered to pay compensation. In cases of a more criminal character, however, I would not object to the infliction of a whipping. The more corporal punishment is resorted to, the more will it deaden the moral sense of those punished, and strengthen in them the lower feelings of humanity. There are, however, some cases in which it appears to be almost the only punishment that can be conveniently suggested; and in such cases there ought to be a greater check on the exercise of magisterial discretion than any that is provided by this Bill. The Royal Commission in 1886 limited punishment by whipping to boys under 14, but the Bill raises the age to 16, and some explanation of that change ought to be given. I should like also to draw the attention of the right hon. Gentleman to a passage in the Report of the Royal Commission as to the desirability of checking the undue and unlimited discretion conferred upon Magistrates. It is on page 12, the passage to which I refer—

"We ought to be allowed to divide the convicted cases into two classes—one for serious, and one for trivial offences. Many of the latter might fairly be transferred to the heading, 'doing well.'"

Mr. Conybeare

That, of course, refers to the conduct of the offenders who have been placed in reformatories. I am quite certain that the same principle should be applied to cases of idle freak and grave criminal intent. That can only be done by securing that the Magistrates have not unrestrained authority to inflict whipping.

*(10.35.) MR. S. HOARE (Norwich): I do not know whether there is an intention to oppose the Second Reading of this Bill, certainly I shall give it my support as a County Magistrate, one of those apparently who have not the confidence of the hon. Member for Camborne. I can assure hon. Members that there is no desire on the part of County Magistrates to inflict punishment upon youthful offenders. I did what I could to assist legislation in the passing of the First Offenders Act, and have done my best to prevent youthful offenders being treated as criminals. There are questions that may arise in regard to whipping, which may well be left for consideration in Committee; but there are other parts of the Bill I consider are of not less importance. Take the provision that permits the infliction of a fine upon a parent of a sum not exceeding 20s. That I take to be a most useful provision. Again and again I have wished, when it has fallen to my lot as a Magistrate to have youthful offenders before me, that I had authority to punish the parent instead of the child. The hon. Member for Camborne has, no doubt, studied the question, and he thinks that Magistrates do not take the care they ought to take in such cases; but if I may make a personal allusion, I may say that it has been my constant desire to prevent young offenders being sent to prison, and I have striven for such legislation as this. Only to-day I have been trying to get a girl into a home instead of having her sent to prison, whence she would emerge branded for life as a criminal. I sent my emissary to see the girl's parents, and the good woman whom I employed was warned against personal violence from the mother, and the father did all he could to turn her out of the house. Well, the girl is safe in a home to-night and is not in gaol, and I am thankful my humble efforts have been instrumental in placing her there. But I should like in such a case as this, that the law should allow the infliction of a fine upon the parents. For this reason, and without going into the whipping question which has been more dwelt upon, and being a County Magistrate anxious to do what I can to prevent juvenile offenders becoming criminals, I heartily congratulate the right hon. Gentleman on the introduction of this Bill and cordially support the Second Reading.

*(10.38.) SIR U. KAY-SHUTTLE-WORTH (Lancashire, Clitheroe): This Bill deals with a small part only of a great subject in which for many years I have taken a deep interest. In 1880 and 1881 the attention of the public and the House of Commons was much called to the subject, and my right hon. Friend (Sir W. Harcourt) appointed a Royal Commission to inquire into the whole question of juvenile offenders and the most suitable method of dealing with offences committed at a tender age. I had the honour of serving on that Royal Commission on Reformatories and Industrial Schools which reported in 1883; and if I may be allowed to make a slight digression for a moment, I may say I am sure I express a feeling shared by every Member of that Commission of disappointment that our recommendations have been so long neglected. I may particularly call the attention of Members of the present Government to this, because they, even more than their predecessors, have shown a predilection in favour of referring inquiries to Royal Commissions. It is a deep disappointment to members of a Commission, after they have spent months and even years in the investigation of a very important subject, and have come to the conclusion that legislation is urgently needed, to find that eight years go by after they have issued their Report, and there is no fruit to their labours. I hope some of the Royal Commissions appointed this year will not have similar reason to complain. The present Government, last year and the year before, introduced in the House of Lords tolerably complete measures dealing with the subjects upon which the Royal Commission reported—there was a Reformatory Bill, an Industrial Schools Bill and a Juvenile Offenders Bill. They introduced in the first year two Bills, and in the second year three, dealing with these subjects, but as yet this Session the Government have only introduced this Bill dealing with an exceedingly small part of the recommendations of the Royal Commission and in a very incomplete manner. The Commission found that there were only three modes of dealing with juvenile offences — by fine, a method often most unsuitable, in cases where the vice or fault lies in the child and not in the parent, because the punishment simply falls upon the parent; by imprisonment, and I think every Member of the House will agree that this is not a suitable punishment to be inflicted upon very young persons; and, thirdly, there is the plan of committing the child to a reformatory or industrial school for a lengthy term, generally of five years. Now, the Commissioners came to the very clear conclusion that for a very large number of juvenile offences this committal to a reformatory or industrial school for so long a term was an unsuitable and unnecessary treatment, and that it was very much better to deal with them summarily or else by a shorter term of detention. The Commission recommended detention in truant schools or in day industrial schools, for it has been found that by such detention for a few weeks or months the child is cured of his fault and makes good attendance at the ordinary schools of the country. The experiment tried at Liverpool of sending offenders to day industrial schools has been remarkably successful, and has shown that after a few weeks' detention in these schools the children go regularly to the Board Schools, and are among the best attendants there. This Bill is a mere fragment, it deals with an extremely small part of the Report of the Royal Commission. That Report covers some 74 pages, but the recommendations dealt with in this Bill are contained in about 12 lines at the bottom of one page. What is the able hardship might be inflicted on perfectly innocent persons. It is provided in the Bill in regard to any offence committed by a boy under 16, the parent may be included in the summons, apparently without any prima facie reason to believe that he has been guilty of fault or neglect, so that unless great precautions are taken and the section is more carefully guarded, a very great hardship may be inflicted upon poor persons, who will be taken from their work and compelled to attend the Court, certainly for a day, and possibly in London, where the pressure upon the Courts is great, for more than one day. However, if the Bill were limited to the enforcement of parental responsibility, I think the right hon. Gentleman might fairly ask the House to pass it without much discussion. But, as the right hon. Gentleman has correctly inferred, my opposition is based on those provisions in the Bill which increase the number of offences for which the punishment of flogging may be inflicted. What is it really that the Bill proposes to do? At present the punishment of flogging may be inflicted on young persons up to the age of 14, and this Bill proposes to raise the age from 14 to 16. That in itself is a very considerable and important change. In the second place, boys under the age of 14 may, as they may under the existing law, be punished with whipping—but with whipping only—in cases specially considered and provided for. The right hon. Gentleman himself stated in the course of his remarks that the evil of imprisonment of young persons, such as it is, has been very considerably remedied in recent years, for he has stated that a large number of additional cases have within the last decade been made punishable without imprisonment. Now, my point is this. That whether the House approves or disapproves of whipping as a means of punishment, at all events, it ought carefully to consider each particular case before it assigns that particular punishment to an offence. Again, when the right hon. Gentleman said there was no alternative to whipping, he rather cut away the ground from his own feet in this position, by stating that the action of the Home Office during the last few years had very considerably diminished the number of cases in which children have been committed to prison. Again, how does his argument apply to girls? The right hon. Gentleman will not have the audacity to suggest the whipping of girls of 16; and in regard to girls, though I admit the number of offenders is not so large as in the case of boys, so far no alternative has been provided. Then, again, how is Scotland to get along without this alternative? Now, if I may refer to it for a moment, the position of Scotland under this Bill is very peculiar, and I confess I do not understand the draftsmanship of the Bill in regard to Scotland. It is provided in the 1st section that a male offender shall be whipped, and Scotland appears to be included within the enactment of this section. But then we come to Sub-section 4, where at the end it is provided that this sub-section shall not apply to Scotland, so I submit Scotland is really excluded from this Bill. Now, am I surprised that Scotland should be excluded, for I venture to think that only by excluding Scotland could the right hon. Gentleman get his Bill through, for as everybody knows the Scottish people have a strong feeling against the infliction of corporal punishment. I object to corporal punishment so far as this, that I do not regard it as an effectual preventative of crime, and I submit that the result of experience does not show that corporal punishment does prevent or diminish crime. It has sometimes been said that garrotting in London some years ago was stopped by the passing of the Act inflicting corporal punishment upon persons convicted of garrotting. But again and again has it been shown in this House most clearly, and I have shown by chapter and verse, that garrotting had materially diminished before the Flogging Act came into operation at all. Garrotting in London was suppressed by the greater activity of the police, and not by the Flogging Act. I object to flogging, not so much in the interest of the person flogged as because I believe it has the most brutalising effect on everybody concerned in the infliction of the punishment. It is curious that at this time the Home Secretary should propose to extend the punishment of flogging to young men of 16. We know that in former years the punishment was resorted to in our public schools for young men of that age, or even older. I need scarcely remind hon. Gentlemen that flogging in our public schools has been reduced to narrow limits of late years, and that it is, therefore, a retrograde step for the Home Secretary to get up and say that that punishment should be inflicted for such an offence as playing pitch-and-toss. I cannot but think, having regard to recent disclosures, that the right hon. Gentleman was singularly maladroit in the reference he made to this venial form of gambling. I do not wish to go so far as the hon. Member for Northampton in his strictures on the right hon. Gentleman's proposals, but I think it would be a mistake to give this enormous power to Magistrates, who in a certain description of cases are actuated by class feeling, whatever may be said to the contrary. I do not desire to detain the House any further, but, for the reasons I have given, I propose to take a Division on the Second Reading.

*(9.53.) MR. WEBB (Waterford, W.): I desire to support the remarks of the hon. Gentleman who has just sat down. I must say I think the Home Secretary has made a mistake in not being a little more explicit in the title of his Bill. When a Bill proposes to enable the Magistrates to inflict the punishment of flogging there should be something on the face of the measure to say so. It should not be left to the chance of a Member going out into the Lobby to obtain a copy of the Bill, for him to become aware of the great change proposed. I believe that this punishment of flogging is a brutalising one, and that in most cases where it is believed to have a beneficial effect the improvement could be traced to causes other than this punishment. When the right hon. Gentleman says that it is less brutalising to flog a boy than to imprison him he makes a statement which almost takes away one's breath. I cannot imagine anything fixing a greater stigma upon a young child than his having been publicly flogged in prison, and I do not think anyone would be found to advocate flogging in this House if the punishment could in any way be inflicted on the children of the upper classes. The right hon. Gentleman said that it would be right to punish in this way idle boys found playing pitch-and-toss in the streets. Perhaps pitch-and-toss is more innocent than the gambling that is carried on by the upper classes of society. These poor boys often have no place but the streets in which to amuse themselves, and even if they do fall into practices that are regrettable we have no right to say that they shall be flogged. When I look at the possibility of a Bill like this being applied to Ireland, where the Magistrates are so entirely out of sympathy with the mass of the people, I do not like to think of the consequences. In that country during the past few years we have seen children brought up and punished heavily for hissing or cheering, or indulging in what the police termed a humbugging sort of a smile. The Home Secretary has spoken of the bad influence of gaols upon children; but I cannot accept that as an argument in favour of the principle of the Bill. It is not an argument for rendering our punishments more barbarous; but an argument against our present prison system, and one which goes to show that we should devote more of our time to that subject, for I can conceive nothing more discreditable to a country like this than that the means you take to make people better really have the effect of making them worse. For these and many other reasons, I hope the House will reject the Bill.

*(10.0.) SIR R. FOWLER (London): For my part, I shall certainly support the Second Reading of the Bill. As a Magistrate, I have frequently had boys brought before me for offences which I may characterise as of a heartless description. Boys have been brought up for robbing parents. One has, perhaps, robbed a mother, a poor creature to whom a shilling means a great deal. He has, perhaps, stolen from her all she had. What is to be done with him? The hon. Member opposite says flogging is more demoralising than sending the boy to prison, but I do not agree with him; and in cases such as I have mentioned I have often remanded a boy for eight days (which is the longest period for which a prisoner can be remanded) in order that a punishment should be inflicted without actually committing to prison, which would blacken the lad's character for life. I believe it would be a relief to all who have to administer the law if in cases of this kind a lad could be sentenced to be whipped instead of being sent to prison. As to the demoralising character of the punishment, I have heard it said of Dr. Keate, of Eton, that he has been known to boast of having flogged half the aristocracy of England. Well, if that is so, I do not think boys of the lower classes would feel it as degrading to be whipped as the hon. Gentleman who last spoke seems to think. If you think the Magistrates of the country should not be entrusted with these powers, and are a body deserving condemnation, that is a much larger question, and one which ought to be dealt with on a different occasion.

*(10.4.) SIR WALTER FOSTER (Derby, Ilkeston): The title of this Bill is hardly a sufficiently clear definition of what the measure aims at doing. If the Government had called it "The Flogging of Young Persons Bill," I think it would have excited much more attention than it has done, both in this House and outside. I feel very strongly on this question. One of the first duties I had to perform for the constituency I now represent, was that of bringing before the House a case in which the child of one of my constituents was brutally flogged. He received eight strokes with the birch, and a few days afterwards, when I saw him, his back was scored and torn with the severity of the punishment. That case created a great impression on my mind; and though this Bill may be made to raise the age of children who may be flogged, I think that punishment too severe, and that it will have a brutalising effect on those who administer it. The hon. Baronet opposite has referred to the wide application of the rod in certain public schools; but from what we know of the aristocracy, to whom he referred as educated at those schools, I do not think that their conduct is such as to very highly commend the character of their bringing up. If flogging were a method of improving the morals of that class generally, we ought to have a better result than we see around us. But I do not think there can be any comparison drawn between the floggings of the schoolmaster and those to be administered to children for trivial offences, when they are taken before the Magistrates. I do not say that in no case should the punishment of flogging ever be administered; but I think it should be very exceptional. Under this Bill, however, it will be commonly resorted to by the Magistrates, as a deterrent against offences in the case of boys, instead of trying other methods of bringing boys to a healthy state of mind. I would point out that flogging is discouraged in the elementary schools of the country, and has been banished from the Services, and, therefore, I think we ought to guard the Statute Book from a further introduction of the punishment. I believe that many a child who, under other circumstances, could be persuaded to lead a better course of life, and to avoid offences against the law, under this brutal punishment will become callous. I believe that a more tender treatment of juvenile offenders would be productive of better results. It is difficult to measure the effect of 10 or 12 strokes on the tender skin of a young person. It varies very often with the individual child, and you have to take a number of considerations into your judgment before deciding upon the administration of such punishment. The schoolmaster differs from the Magistrate in this respect. He knows the individual characteristics of the child to be punished, whereas the Magistrate may never have seen the culprit before, and may be totally unacquainted with his nervous system or physical characteristics. The parallel drawn, therefore, between the schoolmaster and the Court of Summary Jurisdiction is not a fair one. Even if it were, I think we ought to endeavour to bring about a more humane system of punishment than flogging.

(10.10.) MR. A. O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.): If all the Magistrates of the country were like the hon. Baronet opposite few of us would hesitate to increase their discretionary power in the manner proposed in the Bill, but unfortunately a large number of the Magistrates of this country are very different to the hon. Baronet. It is not very many years ago since a Magistrate in Cornwall sent a little boy to prison, because he was found playing at marbles during Church hours on Sunday. This Magistrate might be watched in other parts of the country; and when you consider the wide-reaching scope of the words in this Bill, I think the Home Secretary himself will admit that what he is proposing now is a very serious matter. The Home Secretary is responsible for the administration of the prisons, and yet, speaking in his capacity as Minister, with all the solemnity of tone of which he is master, on an occasion on which he had to deal with this very matter, he told the House of Commons that when once a child was sent to prison he must abandon all hope. That very phrase is eloquent of the brutal, I might almost say infamous, prison system that obtains in this country. There is room for amendment, but I would venture to suggest it is not in the direction suggested in the Bill. The measure itself appears to me very badly drafted. It says that where a juvenile offender is proved before a Court of Summary Jurisdiction to have committed an offence for which it is liable to conviction, the Court may without prejudice to its other powers do any one or more of several other things. If we interpret that under the Act of 1889, we find that the Bill does not apply to Scotland, and we find, further, that it gives a single Justice power to convict or not as he chooses, and if he convicts to exercise his full power of punishing under the existing law, and over and above that to adjudge the offender to be whipped in any case, and besides that to inflict a fine on the parent in any case, and to order the parent to pay damages to the extent of £5 or any sum below, and, more than that, to order the parent to give security for the good behaviour of the child. I say that is a most extraordinary proposal. To trust a Magistrate, such as that in Cornwall whom I have mentioned, who thought it a reasonable thing to send a small boy to prison because he played marbles on the Sunday during the hours of Divine service—to entrust such a man as that with the power, over and above those he already possesses, of ordering an offender

to be whipped, of fining the parents and requiring them to become sureties for the good behaviour of the offender, is a thing which will require a great amount of justification at the hands of the Home Secretary. This Bill, though it refers to Scotland, could not really be enforced there, because it is confined to England and Wales. I base my objection to the Bill on the ground that, though there may be cases in which whipping is desirable, still there should not be power conferred upon Justices to inflict corporal punishment wherever they are able to sentence under the existing law. I do not join in the denunciation of whipping. In cases of violent assaults the criminal is probably best dealt with by whipping; there are certain offenders who do not understand anything but corporal punishment. Still the power to be conferred upon Justices by this Bill is one which ought to be conferred only on persons who can be trusted to exercise it with very great discretion. This Bill presents many objectionable points, and I shall oppose it in almost every line.

(10.20.) MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camborne): I join in opposing the Bill as it stands, while admitting that there are some provisions in it which are not to be altogether condemned. The broad power proposed to be given to Magistrates for the infliction of corporal punishment ought not to be sanctioned by the House without grave consideration. In Cornwall, for example, some Magistrates have frequently shown an utter disregard of humane feeling in dealing with young offenders, and often for very trivial offences very heavy punishments have been inflicted. It is not desirable, therefore, to place in their hands a greater power of punishment than they already possess. Indeed, I should prefer to see their powers curtailed rather than extended. It appears to me that, under the present system, a grave necessity exists for a re-classification of offences so far as they are committed by juvenile offenders. Would it not be possible to include provisions which would tend, if not to a general reform of the law applicable to juvenile offenders, at least to a mitigation of the injuries which are liable to be inflicted by the Magistrates under the Bill? The Home Secretary admitted that there are a number of offences which are not really criminal—such, for instance, as stealing an apple, throwing stones at steamboats and trains. Surely offences of a purely mischievous and thoughtless character ought to be dealt with in a different manner from offences which betray something like a criminal intent. Under this Bill it would be within the discretion of the most stupid, blundering Magistrate to sentence a boy to be whipped for a purely idle, mischievous freak, without having had an intention to do any wrong. I contend that the House ought to carefully limit the discretion given to the Magistrates dealing with such offences. A line should be drawn between the mischievous freak and the graver offences showing criminal intent; and in this connection I would propose that, in all circumstances, before a boy is ordered to be sentenced or whipped, he should first receive a caution, and where offences resulting in loss or injury can be rectified by a money payment, the parent should be fined or ordered to pay compensation. In cases of a more criminal character, however, I would not object to the infliction of a whipping. The more corporal punishment is resorted to, the more will it deaden the moral sense of those punished, and strengthen in them the lower feelings of humanity. There are, however, some cases in which it appears to be almost the only punishment that can be conveniently suggested; and in such cases there ought to be a greater check on the exercise of magisterial discretion than any that is provided by this Bill. The Royal Commission in 1886 limited punishment by whipping to boys under 14, but the Bill raises the age to 16, and some explanation of that change ought to be given. I should like also to draw the attention of the right hon. Gentleman to a passage in the Report of the Royal Commission as to the desirability of checking the undue and unlimited discretion conferred upon Magistrates. It is on page 12, the passage to which I refer—

“We ought to be allowed to divide the convicted cases into two classes—one for serious, and one for trivial offences. Many of the latter might fairly be transferred to the heading, ‘doing well.’”

Mr. Conybeare

That, of course, refers to the conduct of the offenders who have been placed in reformatories. I am quite certain that the same principle should be applied to cases of idle freak and grave criminal intent. That can only be done by securing that the Magistrates have not unrestrained authority to inflict whipping.

*(10.35.) Mr. S. HOARE (Norwich): I do not know whether there is an intention to oppose the Second Reading of this Bill, certainly I shall give it my support as a County Magistrate, one of those apparently who have not the confidence of the hon. *(10.38.) SIR U. KAY-SHUTTLE-WORTH (Lancashire, Clitheroe): This Bill deals with a small part only of a great subject in which for many years I have taken a deep interest. In 1880 and 1881 the attention of the public and the House of Commons was much called to the subject, and my right hon. Friend (Sir W. Harcourt) appointed a Royal Commission to inquire into the whole question of juvenile offenders and the most suitable method of dealing with offences committed at a tender age. I had the honour of serving on that Royal Commission on Reformatories and Industrial Schools which reported in 1883; and if I may be allowed to make a slight digression for a moment, I may say I am sure I express a feeling shared by every Member of that Commission of disappointment that our recommendations have been so long neglected. I hope some of the Royal Commissions appointed this year will not have similar reason to complain. The present Government, last year and the year before, introduced in the House of Lords tolerably complete measures dealing with the subjects upon which the Royal Commission reported—there was a Reformatory Bill, an Industrial Schools Bill and a Juvenile Offenders Bill. They introduced in the first year two Bills, and in the second year three, dealing with these subjects, but as yet this Session the Government have only introduced this Bill dealing with an exceedingly small part of the recommendations of the Royal Commission and in a very incomplete manner. The Commission found that there were only three modes of dealing with juvenile offences — by fine, a method often most unsuitable, in cases where the vice or fault lies in the child and not in the parent, because the punishment simply falls upon the parent; by imprisonment, and I think every Member of the House will agree that this is not a suitable punishment to be inflicted upon very young persons; and, thirdly, there is the plan of committing the child to a reformatory or industrial school for a lengthy term, generally of five years. This Bill is a mere fragment, it deals with an extremely small part of the Report of the Royal Commission. That Report covers some 74 pages, but the recommendations dealt with in this Bill are contained in about 12 lines at the bottom of one page. What is the intention of the Home Secretary with respect to the other parts of the recommendations of the Commission? The whole matter hangs together. The right hon. Gentleman himself the other day objected to a proposal brought forward by the hon. Member for Central Sheffield dealing with one small part of the recommendations of the Commission. It was, he said, piece-meal legislation; but is not the right hon. Gentleman himself bringing forward piece-meal legislation on this very same Report? For myself, I confess I feel some difficulty about the attitude I should take up towards this Bill. I have the example of the attitude of the right hon. Gentleman towards the Bill of the hon. Member for Sheffield, when he objected to the picking out of a clause from a former Bill, and yet I know the urgency of the matter. Knowing the urgency of the question for the last 10 years, and seeing that the Commission reported on it eight years ago, I think I am justified in pressing the Home Secretary to deal with the whole subject. The Home Secretary experienced some difficulty with regard to the question last year, but that was because he imported into the Bill matter not contained in the Report of the Royal Commission. No doubt this Bill is founded to some extent upon the recommendations of the Commission, which, feeling the extreme importance of introducing alternative forms of punishment, reported in favour of giving power to order boys under 14 to be whipped, and imposing fines upon parents, or taking sureties from the parent for the good behaviour of the child. That is an important recommendation—to fine the parent instead of sending the child to an industrial or reformatory school. That a child's offence should be dealt with in suitable cases by making the parent give security for the good behaviour of the child is supported by the evidence given by men in different parts of the country who have had experience in administering the law and in the management of industrial schools. With regard to whipping, the right hon. Gentleman does not carry out the recommendations of the Royal Commission; nor has he introduced anything to specify in what particular class of cases that punishment should be applied. There ought to be discrimination in those cases, but I find none in the Bill. I quite agree that whipping in many cases is the best form of punishment for a boy—better than imprisonment or sending him for five years to an industrial school. But the Royal Commission carefully restricted this punishment, and recommended that it should not be inflicted upon any boy under 14. The House is very unwilling I am sure to inflict the punishment upon any but mere boys. Though very much disappointed that the House is not invited to deal with the whole matter, I feel a difficulty in declining to support the Bill, and I hope that when it goes into Committee alterations will be introduced, and that the Bill will be greatly improved in the directions I have indicated.

*(10.55.) THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. STUART WORTLEY, Sheffield, Hallam): I am glad the right hon. Gentleman finds himself able to support the Bill, and that he has made a speech which is substantially a vigorous defence of the Bill. We have great reason to thank the right hon. Gentleman and his distinguished colleagues on the Royal Commission for their Report on this subject. It is perfectly true that they limited themselves with regard to this proposal in one respect only, and I think I can show the House that this was an extremely small limitation. It might be supposed from the speech of the right hon. Gentleman and others that this is the first time it is proposed to inflict corporal punishment upon boys between 14 and 16; but there are several clauses in the Criminal Law Consolidation Acts of 1861 under which corporal punishment can be inflicted up to the age of 16 on the discretion of Justices of Quarter Sessions. When Parliament sanctioned that, Parliament had good reason for thinking, as we have good reason for thinking now, that even up to the age of 16 it is not desirable to send a lad to prison.

*SIR U. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH: They are all specified offences.

*MR. STUART WORTLEY: Yes, no doubt; and there is, I admit, some ground for introducing Amendments in that direction; that is a matter well worth consideration. The House must not suppose that this Bill will give the power to any single Justice—a lay Justice sitting by himself. A Stipendiary Magistrate will have the power, but it will only be given to those Courts which are described in the Summary Jurisdiction Act as fully-constituted Courts. The right hon. Gentleman says that this is but a very small part of the entire scheme, but the magnitude of the parts is not to be measured by a superficial area of pages in the Blue Book, and among the many valuable recommendations made by the Commission those embodied in the Bill are the most valuable. There were also special recommendations relating to industrial schools, and a measure giving effect to those recommendations the Government succeeded in passing through the other House in three successive years, though, unfortunately, we have never had the opinion of this House upon it. I think my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary has done well in detaching these particular provisions from others which have proved a stumbling-block to the progress of any Bill on the subject. This Bill has been described as containing new propositions; but I would remind the House that these propositions did not originate with the Commission of 1883, but were recommended to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby in reply to a circular sent round to all the Quarter Sessions throughout the country. This Bill now comes down to the House after having three times passed the criticism of the Lord Chancellor and ex-Lord Chancellor in another place, and after having gone through the ordeal of a Standing Committee of the other House, of which no less a man than Lord Herschell was Chairman. That, I think, is at least a presumptive claim to our respect. It gives effect to recommendations which have too long been unfulfilled. It is high time that we should carry still further the beneficial policy of diminishing as far as possible, even up to the age of 16, the number of juvenile committals.

(11.1.) MR. ROWNTREE: I think there is a general agreement that the law as it stands is in urgent need of amendment, and that Magistrates are often placed in a painful position when juvenile offenders are brought before them. Still, it does seem to me very undesirable to pass such sweeping provisions as those contained in this Bill. There is, however, great jealousy at the present time with regard to corporal punishment in public elementary schools, and this jealousy may possibly be increased. As the Bill stands two Magistrates in Petty Sessions may sentence a youth to be flogged, and apparently may also fine the parent, and order him to give security for the good behaviour of the offender, all without the conviction of the offender in the first instance, or without even a record of the fact. This seems to me to be a grave innovation in the law, and I hope that the Home Secretary will explain this point. I can quite understand that it is desired to prevent a slur attaching to the offender, but the slur ought to be in the offence and the fact, rather than in the record.

(11.8.) MR. SYDNEY GEDGE (Stockport): Certainly, the disgrace should attach to the offence, not to the record of the offence, but we do know that a recorded sentence will be brought up against the offender in after life, and that legal consequences attend it. So far from this principle being an innovation in the law, it is contained in the Industrial Schools Act, and has been found most beneficial. It is thought advisable not to put a stigma of perpetual disgrace upon the offender. I think the hon. Member for Donegal looked at the Bill with rather less than his usual acumen. He will find that the proviso at the end of the 4th subsection is necessary because of the Summary Jurisdiction Interpretation Act of 1889, which else would include Scotland within the Bill. We are not creating any new offence or constituting any new Courts; but taking the cases will include, as I think it should do, the guardian of a child. I cannot help feeling, however, that the number of strokes proposed to be given should be re-considered, for, remembering the ill-fed, poorly-clad, and wretched physical condition of many of the children who will come under the operation of the Act, 18 strokes, administered perhaps by a strong, stalwart prison warder who is not aware of the force he uses, constitute too severe a punishment, and might become torture. I hope, therefore, there will be not an extension of the punishment, as has been suggested, but rather a diminution. Personally, I may say I believe it is possible to bring up a child without corporal punishment. I believe in a parent's mental kingship, in his strong will and wise judgment for properly guiding children of tender character. Still, believing that the Bill in its intention and construction is a thoroughly good one, that it enunciates a sound principle, and that it will save many a child from being forced into criminal associations in prison and from being branded as a criminal, I shall heartily support it.

*(11.37.) MR. HOWARD VINCENT (Sheffield, Central): One reason I heartily welcome the Bill is that it will save many thoughtless young persons who may have been driven into crime for an existence from being sent to prison and given the prison taint for life. The probation of the First Offenders Act, which I had the honour of introducing, and which was passed by Parliament in 1887, has, I hope, done some good. It has, since then, been adopted in most of our colonies and in some foreign countries, but for some reason Magistrates in Great Britain have failed to put it into force as much as they might have done, for I find by the judicial statistics that, out of 170,466 persons whom they convicted in 1889 on summary process, no fewer than 90,018 were sent to prison for the first time. I believe this Bill is calculated to save many of this class from the taint of prison life, and to make them decent and useful members of society.

*(11.40.) MR. WINTERBOTHAM (Gloucester, Cirencester): I do not like to give a silent vote on this question. Very few of us who have had to exercise duties as County Magistrates but have felt the difficulty which this Bill attempts to deal with. There is a good deal to be said on both sides, though I cannot but think, after having considered the matter for a good many years, that the evil you will create by passing this Bill in its present shape will far outweigh the good which it will produce. I agree with the hon. Member for Durham that there are young people, and some old people as well, not excepting Members of Parliament, who would be better for a flogging. There are certain offences, such as brutality, cowardly assaults upon women and children, and cruelty to dumb animals, which I think many of us would like to see dealt with in that way. But there are children—and children! There are sensitive children, to whom a flogging would be a very different thing, and a far severer punishment to what it would be to children of a different character. And, besides, the House must admit there are Magistrates and Magistrates! and it cannot be denied that there are in this country among Magistrates men who have made themselves disliked and distrusted by ridiculous, arbitrary and absurd decisions. I believe that they form a very small minority of the Magistrates, but still they exist. What would be the effect in rural districts if big fellows of 16 years of age were thrashed not by their own parents, or with the consent of parents, but by policemen, at the dictation of the squire and parson, say, for stealing an apple? The Home Secretary used this very illustration of apple stealing, and I can only say that you may risk bringing the law into contempt, and destroying that confidence and respect, which is at the bottom of all obedience to the law, by flogging for a petty larceny. Hence it is that I say that this law may do a great deal more harm than good. I do not believe in thrashing for such offences as apple stealing, but I do not object to thrashing for defined offences, such as violent and cowardly assaults. But even in such cases I hold that thrashing over 12 years of age ought not to be administered exin its preparation. It is open under this Bill to inflict the punishment of the birch rod upon juvenile offenders under any clause of the Summary Jurisdiction Acts, including almost every offence of the most venial character. I would suggest that the Home Secretary should give an assurance that the class of offences in respect of which the punishment of whipping may be inflicted shall be strictly defined and limited to offences involving dishonesty, and possibly also crimes of violence, and that some adequate protection shall be afforded to parents against their being vexatiously brought before the Court.

*(11.25.) MR. MILVAIN (Durham): I was rather surprised to hear an hon. Member opposite speaking as if corporal punishment were entirely alien to the spirit of the age. Hon. Members will not forget that it is only because the opportunity does not present itself this Session that I have not the honour of again introducing my Corporal Punishment Bill, which is very much wider in its powers, and the Second Reading of which was carried in this House by a majority of 68 votes one Wednesday afternoon in a previous Session. I know there was an endeavour to whip up an opposition to that Bill, but I am glad to be aware that that endeavour utterly failed. I welcome this Bill, especially for the general jurisdiction it gives to apply the birch rod to youthful offenders. I believe that many of these juvenile offenders, who commit offences for which they are brought before a Court of Summary Jurisdiction, commit them not in consequence of any evil in them so much as because of the mischief which incites them to the commission of offences. During the time my Corporal Punishment Bill was before the House, there was a general wish among Stipendiary Magistrates, Metropolitan Magistrates, and Magistrates in Borough Police Courts that the provisions of the Bill should be extended to Courts of Summary Jurisdiction, and for this reason: that up to a certain age nobody knows what to do with a youthful offender. It may be desirable to send him to a reformatory school, but unfortunately, before that can be done, under the present law it is necessary to first send him to prison, from which he will probably emerge worse than when he went in. We ought not to make him a criminal, and yet, if we avoid sending him to prison and inflict a fine, the punishment falls not upon him, but upon the poor innocent parents, who may have done their utmost to keep the boy from mischief. It appears to me that the only punishment which can be inflicted upon a boy over a certain age to bring him to a sense of what he ought to do, is one the burden of which should fall upon his own back, instead of being borne by his parents. I only regret that the age of the youthful offender is not put somewhat higher in the Bill. I do not suppose that hon. Members of this House are in sympathy with the young ruffians who stand about the corners of the streets in towns and villages and insult innocent girls who may be passing by. They are usually of the age of 16 and even older. My own belief is that, instead of sending these young roughs to gaol for a fortnight or a shorter period, they would be much more readily brought to a sense of their position by inflicting the degrading punishment of the birch rod upon their backs. Firmly believing that the general jurisdiction given to the Courts to inflict the punishment of the birch rod will have a tendency to reform these young children, I shall give my cordial support to the Second Reading of the Bill.

(11.30.) MR. J. L. GANE (Leeds, E.): I have not the sentimental objection to the kind of punishment proposed by the Bill which many persons seem to have, and I think there are very many cases in which no reasonable man would doubt that, for the sake of the young offender himself, it would be wiser and better to administer moderate corporal punishment than to send him to prison, and make a gaolbird of him. Objection has been taken to the parent being summoned before the Court when his child is charged with an offence, and to a fine being inflicted. Indeed the hon. Member spoke of the "innocent" parent, but I think that for many reasons the provision is an excellent one, for the child's misconduct may be an effect of his neglect or wrongdoing. I should like to know whether the word "parent" in such cases will include, as I think it should do, the guardian of a child. I cannot help feeling, however, that the number of strokes proposed to be given should be re-considered, for, remembering the ill-fed, poorly-clad, and wretched physical condition of many of the children who will come under the operation of the Act, 18 strokes, administered perhaps by a strong, stalwart prison warder who is not aware of the force he uses, constitute too severe a punishment, and might become torture. I do not believe in thrashing for such offences as apple stealing, but I do not object to thrashing for defined offences, such as violent and cowardly assaults. But even in such cases I hold that thrashing over 12 years of age ought not to be administered except on the order of a Court of three Magistrates. Fully admitting the evil of the present system, there is another way of dealing with young offenders, and that is to improve and enlarge our reformatory system, so that children can be sent to reformatories and industrial schools for short terms, without the necessity (as at present) of being committed to gaol first. If this Bill goes to a Division to-night I shall feel it my duty to vote against it.

(11.45.) MR. J. R. KELLY (Camberwell, N.): I should like to say one or two words with regard to this Bill. I do not understand exactly what power it is proposed to give the Court. I think it ought to be required that the parent should be present when the flogging is administered. The attendance of the parents is of paramount importance, and I do not think that a child ought to be visited with corporal punishment without the consent of the parents. The poor have the same feelings with regard to their children as we have, and it may be that the parents know that in the case of a troublesome child corporal punishment is absolutely futile. Under such circumstances, they would reasonably and properly object to the character of the punishment which is sought by this Bill to be made legal. Moreover, I think the punishment of 16 strokes is unnecessarily severe. I can understand sentences of flogging upon a totally different plan. For instance, two floggings are generally regarded as having a greater deterrent effect than one. I trust we shall have some assurance that there will be a careful definition of the punishment under the Bill. I trust we shall be assured that there will be a diminution of the strokes, at any rate, at one birching; and I hope, also, that the parents will be consulted as to whether this punishment should be inflicted upon their children or not.

(11.47.) MR. HENEAGE (Great Grimsby): I welcome this Bill because it will, to a great extent, do away with the necessity for sending young offenders to prison. I have been Chairman of Petty Sessions for 25 years, and I have found juvenile offenders the most difficult class to deal with. As to consulting the parents, in nine cases out of ten the parents of such offenders have come to me and asked whether flogging could not be given as a punishment instead of imprisonment. There are some points in the Bill to which I object strongly. The first is with reference to the summoning of the parents. I think that every parent ought to be made cognisant of the charge against the child, but should not be punished for failing to answer the summons of the Court. Again, the number of strokes prescribed in the Bill is unduly severe. The children are often in an emaciated condition, and the warders in all probability are not accustomed to inflicting such punishment, and therefore do not know the effect of their own strength. There is another point on which I hope to see an amendment. At present the Magistrate is bound to send a child to prison before the child is eligible for a reformatory. The power ought to be given to the Magistrate either to order the child to be flogged or to be sent direct to a reformatory. The first question Magistrates have to consider in dealing with questions of this sort is what is best for the child; but when they look at the Statute Book, they find they are debarred from dealing with him in the way they would wish. If they wish, for instance, to send him to a reformatory, they have to send him to prison first. I shall support the Second Reading of the Bill on the ground that it will do away with imprisonment; but unless it is very much altered in Committee, I shall vote against the Third Reading.

*(11.53.) MR. MATHER (Lancashire, S.E., Gorton): I desire to appeal to my hon. Friends to allow this Bill to go to a Second Reading. Its faults of omission and commission are obvious to both sides of the House, and there is no doubt that the Home Secretary will profit by the Debate and agree to the amendment of the measure in Committee. I think it would be a great mistake if the House postponed legislation on this question for another year, and I earnestly hope that those who take an interest in the matter will allow the Bill to be read a second time on the understanding that the very important points raised are fully dealt with in Committee. There is one defect in the Bill to which I should like to call the right hon. Gentleman's attention. There is great hardship in the present treatment of youthful offenders taken up under the bye-laws of Local Authorities for such trivial offences as throwing orange peel or refusing to move on. Offenders of that sort are often taken to the Town Hall or prison and detained all night and treated in the same manner as common criminals. I hope an Amendment will be introduced giving the Local Authorities power to deal with such cases altogether outside the present method. I trust we shall agree to the Second Reading, and in Committee do our best to improve the measure.

(11.55.) MR. SEXTON: I wish to ask the Home Secretary whether he has made up his mind as to the application of the Bill to Ireland? Is there any evidence that the Bill is required in Ireland? Just remember how jurisdiction is exercised under the Coercion Act. Children have been sent to gaol for cheering on the highways. They have also been imprisoned for selling newspapers; and if this Bill is now passed, it may be that a Magistrate will order a boy to be flogged by a police constable for one of these offences, or he may order the parent to enter into sureties for his better behaviour and send him to prison for failing to do so. I say that if any attempt is made under the guise of social reform to confer powers of this kind to Ireland, we shall be obliged to oppose it, because it will only be making the Act a political weapon.

(11.57.) MR. J. MORLEY (Newcastle-upon-Tyne): Before a Division is taken, I must ask whether the Home Secretary will give the House an assurance that when the Bill goes into Committee he will re-consider the whipping portion?

Mr. Mather

If that assurance is not given, I shall vote against the Second Reading.

(11.58.) MR. MATTHEWS: I have offered the whipping portion of the Bill to the House under the deliberate conviction that it is a good part of the Bill. In that I am borne out by every authority on the subject, and I certainly do not mean to drop that part.

MR. M. KENNY (Tyrone, Mid): Will you exclude Ireland from the Bill?

MR. MATTHEWS: I am willing to consider that.

Bill read a second time.

MR. MATTHEWS: I would ask the House to allow the Bill to go to the Grand Committee on Law. A number of Amendments have been suggested which would be more conveniently considered there.

Objection taken.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Friday, 24th April, 1891.

SAT FIRST.

The Earl of Rosslyn, after the death of his father.

The Lord Byron—Took the oath.

THE DISASTER AT MANIPUR.

QUESTION—OBSERVATIONS.

*THE MARQUESS OF RIPON: My Lords, I rise for the purpose of putting a question to the noble Viscount opposite, the Secretary of State for India, of which I have given him notice privately. I am anxious to learn whether he is in a position to lay before the House any Papers he has received with reference to the recent deplorable events in Manipur? In doing so, I do not propose to express any opinion whatever upon those occurrences; but I hope your Lordships will allow me to say how very deeply I regret the sad loss of life which took place in connection with them, and especially to express my sorrow at the great loss the Government of India has sustained by the death of Mr. Quinton, the late Chief Commissioner of Assam. I was well acquainted with Mr. Quinton, and had much to do with him in the transaction of business in India, and I always found him a man of marked ability, sound judgment, and great moderation of character. I am quite confident that the Civil Service, of which he was so distinguished an ornament, has sustained a serious loss by his untimely death. The matters connected with the Manipur incident may be the subject of discussion at a later period; but at the present moment I will only express an earnest hope that Her Majesty's Government, in India and at home, in dealing with this question, will bear in mind that every step which is taken in regard to Native States in India is watched with the utmost care, and I may say jealousy, by every native prince and chief. I trust that Her Majesty's Government, in dealing with this question, will be strictly guided by those principles of policy in regard to the Native States which were established upon the termination of the Mutiny, and which have given to India nearly 40 years of internal peace and contentment, and have done so much to increase the confidence and develop the loyalty of the native princes of that country.

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Viscount Cross): My Lords, in reply to the question of the noble Marquess, I should first of all state how entirely I join with him in deploring the loss of so many valued officers in the disaster at Manipur. I should like, also, to join with him in what he has said as to the late Mr. Quinton, whose loss I deeply regret. He had been in the service of the Government of India for 35 years, and he had risen to his high position entirely by his own exertions. He had been a member of the Viceroy's Legislative Council, and had won the confidence of no less than three successive Viceroys—the noble Marquess opposite (Ripon), the Marquess of Dufferin, and the present Viceroy, the Marquess of Lansdowne; and it was only last year, in consequence of the high esteem in which he was held, that he was appointed to the somewhat difficult post of Chief Commissioner of Assam. I deeply deplore his loss, and I desire to say that I quite join in what has been done by the Viceroy and his Council in India in publishing remarks in a special Gazette with reference to the officers who lost their lives. On behalf of my Council, as well as on my own part, I entirely endorse all that has been said by the noble Marquess, and I should like to express my deepest sympathy with the widow of Mr. Quinton and with the relatives of the other officers who lost their lives on that sad occasion. With regard to the question as to Papers which the noble Marquess has put to me, I have only one Despatch from the Viceroy of India which brings matters down very nearly to the end of February. That Despatch reached me on the 23rd of March, exactly one day after this fatal disaster took place at Manipur. Of course, I shall have no objection whatever in course of time to lay that Despatch upon the Table of your Lordships' House; but I do not think it would be right to produce it until more information is gained as to the whole circumstances, from later Despatches, which I have no doubt I shall receive from the Viceroy of India, and which will be presented in order to completely furnish the information which I agree ought undoubtedly to be laid at once upon the Table. I do not know that I have anything further to say in answer to the noble Marquess; but I can assure him, if he wants assurance, that there is no person more likely to treat the Native States of India with justice, whatever may have been the provocation given, than the present Viceroy, the Marquess of Lansdowne.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT (SCOTLAND) ORDER (STIRLING AND ST. NINIANS) BILL.

COMMITTEE.

House in Committee (according to order).

THE SECRETARY FOR SCOTLAND (The Marquess of LOTHIAN): I have to ask your Lordships to assent to one or two Amendments upon this Bill. It is to confirm an Order by the Boundaries Commissioners who have been selected under the Local Government (Scotland) Act. The object of the Amendments is simply to make one or two alterations which have been found necessary in consequence of misunderstanding by the Boundary Commissioners in making their Order. One of the misapprehensions was that the boundaries of the Burgh of Stirling were co-terminous as regards the municipal boundaries and the boundaries of the Royal Burgh; and the other was as to an understanding or an arrangement previously come to between the Parishes of Stirling and St. Ninians. With those observations I will ask your Lordships to assent to the Amendments which I now propose.

Amendments made; Standing Committee negatived; Report of Amendments to be received on Monday next.

COMMITTEE.

House in Committee (according to order).

Clause 1.

LORD GRIMTHORPE: My Lords, I have to move an Amendment in order to more clearly indicate what the Bill does. In consequence of what was said the other night I think this is necessary. Unfortunately, I have not had the opportunity of communicating with those who are interested in the measure as I should like to have done, and, therefore, I can only propose such Amendments as have occurred to me, and state the reasons why it appears to me most of them ought to be accepted. When we come to the Preamble I wish to insert words not stating that the Act of George IV. was passed, but that it is expedient to amend the Act, and to leave out the subsequent lines with regard to that Act being in force in respect of marriages according to the rites of the Church of England, and to the expediency of altering and amending the Act in the certain particulars mentioned. I also propose to modify the Short Title Clause, which stands that "This Act may be cited as the Church of England Marriage Amendment Act, 1891." That sounds to me an inconveniently long short title. It is really a Bill for improving the condition of things, chiefly in reference to the law affecting marriages by banns in England and in regard to the places in which they are solemnised, or where it is lawful for persons to put up their banns of marriage. The object of providing a short title, of course, is that it shall be short, but it ought not, at the same time, to be made so short as to be misleading; and it appears to me that the best title would be to call the Act "Banns of Marriage Amendment Act." It is substantially an Act for amending the law in reference to publishing banns of marriage and nothing else. There is no occasion to have in the words "Church of England," because there are no other banns published in England.

Amendment moved, in page 1, line 15, to leave out "Church of England," and to insert "banns of."—(Lord Grimthorpe.)

THE BISHOP OF LONDON: It will be obvious to your Lordships that the only objection to what the noble and learned Lord proposes is that this Bill deals with marriages by licence nearly as much as with marriages by banns, and, therefore,

I think that that title might be considered rather misleading. For myself, I should prefer putting it "Acts"—in the plural—thus leaving it in the form of "Church of England Marriage Acts." However, if the noble and learned Lord presses his Motion, I shall not object to his words.

LORD GRIMTHORPE: I make the suggestion for this reason: I think it better that the short title should indicate what the Bill chiefly does. No doubt the Bill deals also with licences, but in a very small degree. We shall find as we go on that the majority of the clauses have relation to the publication of banns. I may mention, as an instance, that there was an Ecclesiastical Act passed not many years ago, namely, the Clergy Pluralities Act Amendment Bill, as it was called, though it had a great many clauses relating to getting rid of clergymen who do not do their duty, and I think very many of the clergy were much surprised when they found out what had been done. This title might therefore, I think, be allowed to go for amending the law relating to banns of marriage without reference to licences. Probably it could be still more shortly cited as the "Marriage Amendment Act, 1891," and I will move to omit the words "Church of England" from the title.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 2.

LORD GRIMTHORPE: Clause 2 is, I think, quite unnecessary, and is not altogether correct. But, perhaps, it is enough to say it is unnecessary, because the Act does not say, in fact, either directly or indirectly, anything about any marriages except those performed according to the rites of the Church of England. This clause is, therefore, entirely superfluous. Besides that, there are other technical difficulties which I do not think it right to trouble your Lordships with now.

THE BISHOP OF LONDON: The real purpose of the clause is to fix the date from which the Act shall apply.

LORD GRIMTHORPE: The date cannot be fixed so exactly in this way, because marriages by licences or banns may be performed at any time within three months after the licence has been got or the banns put up. What you really want to provide for, I suppose, is that the Act shall come into operation at a certain time. In an Act of this sort, which is purely an enabling one, there does not seem to be any objection to the Act coming into operation when it has received the Royal Assent; but if anybody thinks it worth while to provide that the Act shall come into operation on a certain day, it must not be done in this way; for there will be one kind of law in existence when people begin to put up their banns, and another kind of law in existence when they come actually to be married. That is rather inconvenient, I think.

THE BISHOP OF LONDON: I think, perhaps, after what has been said, it would be better that this clause should go out now; and if it is necessary to put in something else in substitution for it, we can do so in Standing Committee.

LORD GRIMTHORPE: Now, my Lords, as Clause 2 has gone out of the Bill, it seems to me this is a better place to put in the Interpretation Clause than at the end. I confess, when I first read the Bill, I was a good deal puzzled by some of the phrases used in it. By the last clause but one (Clause 19), it is required that copies of the Act shall be sent to the ministers of every parish in England, one of them to be kept with the marriage register by the clergymen where banns are to be put up, and so on. It is desirable, I think, that it should read as easily as possible, and, as it is a very common thing to put the Interpretation Clause at the beginning of Acts of Parliament, I think this would be a convenient place for it. Therefore, I propose to insert here some interpretations. I will take them separately. The first would be this, that "in this Act the following words shall mean or include the following things, unless the context otherwise requires." Then it goes on to define "church." That is the material word all through the Act; "Church" shall mean a church or chapel of the Church of England in which marriages may lawfully be solemnised." But, as there has been some question raised on account of some small number of those churches and chapels where one is now lawful without the other, it is, perhaps, necessary to add, "or banns be published," I must ask your Lordships' permission to explain a little on that point. There is a clause in an Act of 6 George IV. which recites that there were a certain number of small chapels which had the privilege of performing marriages without having the banns published in them. They were allowed to continue the privilege by that Act, which had been destroyed by the previous Act of 4 George IV. unintentionally. I suppose Marriages were allowed to be performed in churches in which the banns had been lawfully published. I therefore propose to add here the words, "or which banns have been published." That will include other places than churches.

*THE BISHOP OF LONDON: I had supposed that the noble and learned Lord had overlooked the fact to which he has referred when he wrote his Amendment; and, after consulting my advisers, I thought it would be best corrected by making an alteration in the definition of the word "parish," but I do not object to what is proposed here.

*LORD GRIMTHORPE: Then, my Lords, the next is the definition of the word "parish." It is desirable to add at the end some other words. I propose that "parish" shall mean every old undivided parish, and every one from which another has been cut off and has become the whole or part of a new parish for ecclesiastical purposes under any Act of Parliament. That embraces both parishes under Lord Blandford's Act, and also parishes which have become so under special and Private Acts of which I know there are some existing. Then it goes on—"and every such new parish in which there is a church where marriages may lawfully be solemnised," and I propose to add "or banns published."

*THE BISHOP OF LONDON: I think it would be a little better if the noble and learned Lord would consent to this alteration: that, instead of "every one," we should say "every old and undivided parish and every old parish from which a part has been cut off."

Lord Grimthorpe

*LORD GRIMTHORPE: I will tell your Lordships why I do not put in the word "old" there. A parish may have a slice cut off when it is anything but old. If you keep in the word "old" it has a kind of technical meaning, and there may be some difficulty in construing it afterwards.

*THE BISHOP OF LONDON: I would rather have the words "every parish."

*LORD GRIMTHORPE: That may be, but I want to get rid of the word "old." Let it be, if you like, "every parish from which any portion has been cut off."

THE CHAIRMAN: Then it will read, "and every parish from which any portion has been cut off and has become," and so on.

LORD GRIMTHORPE: Yes. Then the next definition is—

"'Usual place of abode' shall mean any ordinary residence of the person referred to whether he has more than one or not, or his residence for fifteen days of the thirty immediately preceding his making an affidavit or declaration of residence to lead a licence or applying for publication of banns."

It would be better, instead of using the word "residence," to keep the same word as is used in other cases—"usual place of abode." Those are the words used in other Acts. But I thought that as the word "usual" alone would allow of some laxity of interpretation, it would, perhaps, be as well to put in "for fifteen days immediately preceding." Of course, where a person has only one ordinary residence, or where he generally dwells, that would be sufficient. The reason I have put in those words is that there has been found a practical difficulty arising from the fact that people have been afraid to go away from their homes during the 15 days previous to the celebration of the marriage for fear they should be held to be breaking the Act. I think the proviso will be sufficient for the purpose, but I will await what may be said upon it by the right rev. Prelate. I put it in that way that his usual place of abode shall be for this purpose his residence for 15 days immediately preceding his making the affidavit of residence in applying for a licence or for publication of banns. I think we had better, perhaps, add another definition to that which may be taken separately, for the phrase "where they generally dwell." I would therefore, put it in this form if the right rev. Prelate does not object, "usual place of abode or where they usually dwell," omitting the words "for fifteen days of the thirty immediately preceding."

*THE BISHOP OF LONDON: I do not object to that.

*LORD GRIMTHORPE: The next is the definition of the word "minister." I am not quite sure, but I am inclined to think that during the absence of the incumbent of the parish the "principal curate" would be enough. I should have thought the principal curate was the proper person to put in, not any curate who may be acting in the parish.

*THE BISHOP OF LONDON: I think myself it would be better, because the clergyman acting may not always be the principal curate; if the noble and learned Lord does not object, that during the absence of the incumbent "minister" shall include any curate or other officiating minister of the parish or church.

*LORD GRIMTHORPE: Very well.

Moved, "That the following New Clause:—

In this Act the following words shall mean or include the following things, unless the context otherwise requires:

"Church" shall mean a church or chapel of the Church of England in which marriages may lawfully be solemnised, or in which banns have been published:

"Parish" shall mean every old undivided parish, and every parish from which any portion has been cut off and has become the whole or part of a new parish for ecclesiastical purposes under any Act of Parliament, and every such new parish in which there is a church where marriages may lawfully be solemnised:

"Usual place of abode" shall mean any ordinary residence of the person referred to, whether he has more than one or not, or his residence for fifteen days of the thirty immediately preceding his making an affidavit or declaration of residence to lead a licence or applying for publication of banns:

"Minister," except with reference to fees due to the incumbent of the parish, shall include during his absence any curate or other officiating minister of the parish or church.

—stand in substitution of Clause 2,"—
(The Lord Grimthorpe.)—agreed to.

Clause 3.

Verbal Amendments made.

THE BISHOP OF LICHFIELD: My Lords, I have an Amendment with regard to the publication of banns in the ecclesiastical parish where the parties dwell. I propose this Amendment with the view to minimise what I regard as the very singular position of the Marriage Law rejecting the residence as the usual place of abode. A man may have had his abode in a parish for 20 years and may be thoroughly well known to everybody there, but a fortnight before the publication he moves into another parish where he is unknown, and his residence would, of course, be there. Thereupon the banns are published in the parish of his new place of residence where people cannot possibly know anything about the man, or his character, or the circumstances under which the marriage takes place. What I propose is, that in every case the man shall be asked what is his usual place of abode, and that upon that inquiry the banns should be published there. If there be no usual place of abode, you might then accept the minimum provision provided in the Act; but I think such a provision as that would remove what I think is rather a scandal in our present law, that is to say, the ease with which a man may leave a parish where he is well-known and go, just before the marriage, to another, where the circumstances of the marriage he is intending to make are unknown. That always proceeds from one of two reasons: either the man has good reasons for keeping his marriage secret, and, of course, in that case no facilities should be given him, or he may wish to be married in some particular church which he may select, and of course there is no reason why he should not be allowed to be married in the church of his choice. But this Bill actually provides that a man may be married in any church within the whole diocese, and, therefore, the minimum period of residence as relating to the latter case ceases to have any real object, and it remains only to suit the case of those who wish for good reasons, with a view to their known character, to hide the circumstances of their marriage. I think the clause which I propose will meet the difficulty for that purpose, omitting the word "dwell" in this clause.

Moved,

In page 1, line 26, to leave out ("dwell") and insert ("have their usual place of abode, or if there be no such usual place of abode then in such church or chapel as may be situated within the parish in which they have had their residence continuously for not less than fifteen days previous to the first publication of the banns.")—(The Bishop of Lichfield.)

*THE BISHOP OF LONDON: I confess I am surprised at the proposition of my right rev. Brother, because it would in many cases make the conditions so stringent as to be really very oppressive. To insist upon it would be a hardship in a great many cases, and to require a continuous residence within the parish of not less than 15 days previous to the publication of the banns, and only to allow the publication there if the man confessed he had no usual place of abode would curtail the liberty of the subject in regard to marriage very greatly indeed, and the result would be to drive a great many more people to the Registrar's office than are driven there at present. Therefore, I am not very well disposed to accept this Amendment.

*LORD GRIMTHORPE: I quite agree with what has been said by the right rev. Prelate who spoke last. If you begin introducing these things into the law it would lead to a tremendous and almost boundless tyranny. What is it to us where people may choose to get married? Everybody has a right to get married as they please—of course, not within the prohibited degrees; and I am very glad to find that the right rev. Prelate who spoke last declines to accept the Amendment, and that he is inclined to defend the liberty of the subject instead of allowing this aggression upon it.

THE BISHOP OF LICHFIELD: I do not press the Amendment.

On question, that the word "dwell" stand part of the Clause, agreed to.

*LORD GRIMTHORPE: I have an Amendment, in lines 26 and 27, to leave out "the persons to be married," and insert "they." This is more of a grammatical nature than anything else, but it is no use loading the clause with unnecessary words. It cannot possibly make any difference, because you go on to provide that "Where the persons to be married shall dwell in divers ecclesiastical parishes" the banns shall be published in the church of the parish where each of them dwell. You have already, therefore, provided for it; but I should prefer the common word "different" to "divers."

Amendment moved, in lines 26 and 27, to leave out the words ("the persons to be married") and insert ("they.")—(The Lord Grimthorpe.)

Agreed to.

*LORD GRIMTHORPE: I have another Amendment to leave out "ecclesiastical" and "chapel" with any connecting word throughout the Bill. They occur several times in this clause.

*THE BISHOP OF LONDON: I think it would be better not to omit the word "ecclesiastical" here, because, as I happen to know, there is perpetual confusion among people between the old parish and the new ecclesiastical parish taken from it; and what is meant here is distinctly the ecclesiastical and not the other parish.

*LORD GRIMTHORPE: I think it would be well to avoid confusion, but I should like to say a few words before we get to the consideration of "ecclesiastical parishes." It is suggested to me by a very high authority that I was right in the opinion I have expressed with regard to the word "divers." That word implies a good many, and the parties in these cases will certainly not reside in a good many, though they may in two different parishes. I beg, therefore, to substitute that word.

Amendment moved, in line 27, to omit ("divers,") and insert ("different.")—(Lord Grimthorpe.)

Agreed to.

*LORD GRIMTHORPE: Now with regard to the word "ecclesiastical," I think it safer to leave the word out throughout the Bill, than to put it here and there only. As we have already defined that the word "parish" means ecclesiastical parish, we had better not, I think, raise a question about it by sticking in "ecclesiastical" in one or two places.

Amendment moved, in lines 23 and 25, to leave out the word "ecclesiastical."— (Lord Grimthorpe.)

Agreed to.

Other Amendments made.

Clause 3, as amended, agreed to.

LORD GRIMTHORPE: My Lords, I propose, after Clause 3, to insert a clause, which is really necessary, however it may be done. The way of doing it I am willing to leave to the right rev. Prelate; but I would say this: I do not think I made it quite as plain as I ought to have done on the Second Reading that in a great many churches there is now, practically, no legal or proper way of publishing banns at all. In many churches there is very often no Communion Service at the common Morning Service, and your Lordships also know the Nicene Creed occurs in what is popularly called the ante-Communion Service. Consequently, if that Creed is not read, there is absolutely no legal time for publishing banns. In some cases they are published at the conclusion of the second lesson, and in others at the conclusion of such Morning Service as they have. That is all irregular, but I know that for a long time the practice prevailed of publishing the banns always after the second lesson till Baron Alderson, when the case came before him, pronounced it illegal, except at Evening Service under the Act of 4 Geo. IV., c. 76, and that stopped it. These things grow up by degrees, but I can hardly think anybody would wish to go on in an illegal manner after his attention has been called to the fact. The practice in this respect has grown up by the change of habit in dividing the Morning Prayers. It would be quite absurd to publish banns of marriage at an early Communion Service, the very object being to give publicity at a time when the congregation in the church is largest. I think it is quite plain that the time has come when there ought to be fresh legislation on this point, and the first thing for us to do is that we should make up our minds at what period of the service it is best that banns should be published in order to secure the greatest publicity. I do not think anybody will deny that the way I have proposed to do it here is the best method of doing it.

I am only proposing to follow the course which was followed in the Act of George IV., adapting it to the circumstances which have altered considerably since that time. In the first place, the time fixed for publishing banns should, of course, continue to be on Sundays. Let me tell those who do not know it that an alteration was made in the Act of George IV. upon the canons made in Convocation, which some persons fancy are to govern us, but which have never done so. The canons allowed holidays; the Acts of Parliament do not. It should be done on Sundays after the Nicene Creed has been said at the usual Morning Service, and I suppose we should be right in saying, "at the usual Morning Service after ten o'clock, or, if that Creed should not be used at that service," which would provide for the case of every church in London, at the end of the Morning Service, then the banns shall be published at the end of Evening Prayer, if there is no such Morning Service, as was done in the Act of George IV. But since then another change has taken place. There has come into fashion the holding of two afternoon or evening services; and of the two the later or, as it is more commonly called, "Evening Service," in distinction from the earlier afternoon service, is much preferred, and is, therefore, the time when the greatest publicity can be secured for banns. Therefore, I propose that they shall be published in the evening, the latest service of the day. That is as commonly understood, but then comes in another change of fashion. In order to meet the wishes and habits of various people, some of the clergy have not only early Morning Services but what they call "Midnight Services," and it is necessary to provide for those cases. If, therefore, we say "the latest service of the day before 9 o'clock," and "at the usual Morning Service after 10 o'clock," we shall have provided against both publishing banns at Midnight Services, and before 10 o'clock in the morning, which are not convenient for the purpose. I do not know that I have anything further to say beyond this, that if anybody objects to adding this at all, all I can say is that Parliament has done these things ever since the time of Edward I., or rather since Henry VIII.

Amendment moved,

After Clause 3, to insert the following clause:—

("The time for publishing banns shall be on Sundays after the Nicene Creed at the usual morning service after ten o'clock, or, if that creed is not used then, at the end of Morning Prayer. If there is no such morning service, the banns shall be published at the end of Evening Prayer at the latest service of the day before nine o'clock."—(The Lord Grimthorpe.)

*THE BISHOP OF LONDON: I should not object to the insertion of this clause if the noble and learned Lord will give some freedom to bring it more into accordance with the modern practice. I would suggest instead of saying if the Nicene Creed is not used "At the end of Morning Prayer," that it should be "After the second lesson at Morning Prayer," and instead of saying "At the end of Evening Prayer," say "After the Second Lesson at Evening Prayer;" because it is obvious that if you are to publish banns while people are in the act of going out of church it would be practically useless. It is much better not to disturb the present ordinary practice.

*LORD GRIMTHORPE: I have not the least objection. The alteration that it should be done at the end of the Second Lesson was made or supposed to be made by Parliament in the year 1823. The practice went on for a good many years until Baron Alderson decided that it was a mistake. But if the right rev. Prelate prefers that time by all means let it be so. I only thought it would be better to put it at the end of Morning or Evening Prayer, and not to interrupt the prayers by banns.

*THE BISHOP OF LONDON: That would in some cases be the end of the service. At many services there is no sermon.

THE BISHOP OF LICHFIELD: As to publishing banns at the end of Evening Prayer, I think it cannot be conceived how great is the interruption to the solemn thoughts which have been evoked; and if there is any technical difficulty about the expression "At the end of Evening Prayer," as suggested by the noble and learned Lord, the publication of the banns might be made at the end of the service. It seems singularly irreverent to many people.

LORD GRIMTHORPE: Non nostrum est tantas componere lites—that is all I can say.

*THE BISHOP OF LONDON: I do not wish to divide the House on this point, but I still think as it is the practice not to do it at the end of the service it would be preferable to put it "After the Second Lesson at Morning Prayer, and after the Second Lesson at Evening Prayer."

THE MARQUESS OF LOTHIAN: In order that somebody who is not sitting on the same Benches as the right rev. Prelates may express an opinion upon this matter, I will say a few words. I hope sincerely your Lordships will give effect to the suggestion of the right rev. Prelate, and enact that the time for the publication of the banns shall be after the Second Lesson. I confess I am somewhat surprised at hearing the argument of the right rev. Prelate who has previously spoken. As far as my experience goes I do not know that anybody who goes to Church has ever felt any feeling of irreverence from the publication of banns at that time. The object being that the banns shall be announced in the most public manner, I cannot conceive any objection to the time as proposed by the right rev. Prelate, as the congregation would then be most numerous, and it is the time which is almost universal in this country, that is after the end of the Second Lesson.

Amendment amended, to read as follows:—

"The time for publishing banns shall be on Sundays after the Nicene Creed at the usual morning service at 10 o'clock, or, if that creed is not used, after the second lesson at morning prayer. If there is no such morning service, the banns shall be published after the second lesson at evening prayer."

Amendment, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 4.

*LORD GRIMTHORPE: I propose to amend this clause. It says, "When banns shall have been published as aforesaid the marriage shall be solemnised" as provided. I propose to leave out "shall" and to insert "may at any time within three months." "Shall" is obviously wrong, and for the information of all sorts of unlearned people it is better to tell them at once that it may be within three months as provided by the law already. It is always much better to have a complete Act of Parliament than to refer people backwards and forwards from one to another.

*THE BISHOP OF LONDON: I will accept that.

Amendment moved, in page 2, line 2, leave out ("shall") and insert ("may at any time within three months.")—(The Lord Grimthorpe.)

Agreed to.

*LORD GRIMTHORPE: The next Amendment is what may be called a grammatical or structural one. It seems to be quite unnecessary to have two sub-sections here. I have always protested against unnecessary sub-sections, and I propose to leave out (1) and (2) so that the clause may read straight on. I merely move the omission of those two little numerals.

THE CHAIRMAN: I do not think it is necessary to move the omission of numbers.

*LORD GRIMTHORPE: Then, as a matter of form, I will move to insert the word "or" in the place of (2), so that it shall read that—

"The marriage may at any time within three months be solemnised either in one of the churches or chapels in which the banns shall have been published, or in any other church or chapel,"

Amendment moved, in page 2, line 2, to insert the word "or."—(Lord Grimthorpe.)

Agreed to.

Verbal Amendments made.

*LORD GRIMTHORPE: Perhaps I may put now the omission of the word "chapel" wherever it occurs in this clause with any connecting word.

Amendments agreed to.

LORD GRIMTHORPE: There is one more Amendment in this clause. It is in the 2nd sub-section, after the words "provided that," leaving out the rest of the clause, and substituting an Amendment. This, again, is for the convenience of reading. It would, I think, be better to let it run in the negative form, that—

"The marriage shall not be solemnised in a church where the banns have not been published without the consent of the minister nor until seven days after production to him of certificates of publication of the banns at the churches where they were published, and"— this is omitted by mistake in the Bill—"not forbidden by any person having the right to stop the marriage"—that is a parent or guardian. And then it provides for entry in the banns book. That is all that I propose by this Amendment. I rather infer that the right rev. Prelate wishes to have the place where the marriage is to be solemnised published also. That is in the Bill as it stands, and I make the same remark upon that as I did upon the other part of the Bill, that putting in so many restrictions will only cause unnecessary difficulty. In addition to that it will be extremely inconvenient and tiresome when a great many banns have to be published to have thrust in that "such-and-such a marriage will be solemnised in such-and-such a church," and altogether it will make the thing so disagreeable that there is sure to be some reaction against it, and very possibly the whole will be swept away.

*THE BISHOP OF LONDON: The reason of the thing is clear enough. In the present condition of matters banns are very often published where the parties are unknown, and those persons, therefore, who have the right of interference have no means of intervening; whereas if the church where the marriage is to be solemnised is publicly announced at the same time as the publication of the banns takes place, it will then be possible for those persons to come forward and take whatever steps may be necessary to prevent the solemnisation of the marriage. Therefore, I think it would be much better that the publication of the banns should include an announcement of the church where the marriage is to take place. I think in the case also of marriages before a Registrar, if the marriage is not to be performed in the Registrar's office it is always necessary to state where it is to be performed. In cases, too, of marriage by licence, the licence contains a distinct statement to that effect. There ought, therefore, I think to be some precautions taken in these cases as is taken in cases of marriage at a Registrar's office, or by licence.

LORD GRIMTHORPE: I think the right rev. Prelate has not observed that that is exactly what I have done. I provide for an entry to be made in the banns book of where the marriage is to be solemnised; but he wants to have it published in church. Probably the right rev. Prelate knows that that very kind of publicity was first introduced into what I may call the Dissenters' Act; but it was struck out some years afterwards. It was found to be extremely disagreeable. I have exactly followed that precedent here. If the place where the marriage is to be performed is entered in the book, any one interested in the marriage who has heard the banns in the church, can look in the book or ask the clerk, and follow such marriage to the church where it is to take place. But I would further ask: What can the person do if he does follow it? He has no power to do anything at all. He has power to forbid the banns; but when once it comes to the actual marriage he has nothing to do with it whatever. Therefore, it seems to me, that to provide for such announcements is simply wearying the congregation--making the uninterested public who are present, angry, by prescribing that which does nothing at all; whereas all that is really necessary is provided for in this clause exactly as it is provided for in the Registry Acts.

THE BISHOP OF LONDON: I do not contend very earnestly for it I confess; but, nevertheless, I know that a large number of people feel that if people are to be at liberty to have marriages performed at any church in the diocese there ought to be very distinct means of ascertaining beforehand where the marriage is to take place. If the noble and learned Lord proceeds on the supposition that where the banns have been published, and the persons who are to be married are in a position in which the marriage would be wrong, it ought to be stopped, but nobody could stop it; that would not be the case where the persons were minors and their parents heard of it. They might not hear of it until the banns were published; but then they should be able to go to the church and stop it.

LORD GRIMTHORPE: I have provided for that by giving the information in the banns book. That is a book which is open to them to look at just as would be the case in the Registrar's office.

THE ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY: Is it not generally taken to be meant by the publication of banns of marriage in a church that the persons named are to be married in that church or the church of the other parish named? It is not supposed that they would be married at perhaps considerable distances away, elsewhere in the diocese, and no doubt the people who heard the announcements would naturally assume that the same custom prevailed in the absence of a statement to the contrary.

LORD GRIMTHORPE: Matters of this kind rapidly become the subject of general knowledge, and it would very soon become known that people need not be married at the particular church, but could be married elsewhere, and as I said before, they have only to go and look at the book, and they can see at once

THE BISHOP OF LONDON: I shall not make any further objection.

Amendment moved,

In line 8 to leave out from ("that") to the end of the clause and insert ("the marriage shall not be solemnised in any church where the banns have not been published without the consent of the minister thereof, nor until the end of seven days after the production to him of a certificate of due publication of the banns at each of the churches where they were published, and not forbidden by any person having a right to stop the marriage. And an entry shall be made in the banns book before any publication of banns of the church where it is intended to solemnise the marriage, unless it is one in which the banns are published.")—(Lord Grimthorpe.)

Agreed to.

Clause 4, as amended, agreed to.

LORD GRIMTHORPE: Then after Clause 4 I propose to insert a new clause which is really consequential on what has been done already in reference to the publication of banns. I hope nobody will think hereafter that I am wanting in due respect to great dignitaries, for I propose to give to them the power and duty in this matter of making alterations in the rubrics instead of the Queen's Printers and the authorities of Oxford and Cambridge Universities, for the purpose of making the rubrics conform to the Acts of Parliament upon this subject. I now propose that the two Archbishops shall make such alterations in the rubrics relating to the Marriage Service in the Prayer Book as will make them agree with this Act notifying the same to the Queen's Printers and to the Vice-Chancellor of the two Universities in order that they may be printed in the Prayer Book.

*THE BISHOP OF LONDON: I should not myself have been willing to put in a clause of this sort. It would seem to be more appropriate for one of the Archbishops to move the insertion of such a clause; but if the Primate is willing to allow it to be inserted I shall certainly not object. If, however, he objects to it I shall support the objection.

*THE ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY: I shall not make any objection to it.

Amendment moved, after Clause 4, to insert as a new clause—

"The Archbishops of Canterbury and York are hereby authorised, subject to the approval of Her Majesty the Queen, to make such alterations in the rubrics after the Nicene Creed and before and in the Marriage Service in the Prayer Book as will make them agree with this Act, and those rubrics shall be so printed in all Prayer Books after such alterations have been notified by order of Her Majesty to the Queen's Printers and the Vice Chancellors of Oxford and Cambridge Universities."—(The Lord Grimthorpe.)

Agreed to.

Clause 5.

*LORD GRIMTHORPE: I propose that this clause shall read somewhat differently, so that it shall read that the publication of a seaman's banns of marriage may be made in any church in the parish where he usually resides when on land. That was the meaning of the clause as understood on the former occasion.

*THE BISHOP OF LONDON: That is really a verbal alteration, and I do not object to it.

Amendment moved, in page 2, line 2, to leave out from ("in") to the end of the clause, and to insert ("any church of the parish in which he usually dwells when not at sea.")—(The Lord Grimthorpe.)

Agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 6.

*LORD GRIMTHORPE: This clause raises a question upon which there was a discussion the other night about the information to be given by the parties to the minister. I think all the information we ought to require to be given is that which, in the interest of the public, we are legally entitled to demand. Now, what is it that the public are entitled to demand? They are entitled to know that the marriage is not an illegal one, that it is not within the prohibited degrees, and that the proper persons to consent, where consent is required, have consented. But, my Lords, that requires some qualification, because of the state of the law on the subject. The law was altered by the Act of George IV. from what it had been before. It had been before for some time the law that the consent must be proved as a positive thing. It was then altered by the regulations for putting up the banns, leaving the parents and guardians to object if they thought fit. That was a material alteration, and I think your Lordships would be slow to go back again to the former practice and alter it after, now, a good many years' experience. As I have mentioned previously, it dated back from the time of Lord Hardwick, in the reign of George II. down to the Marriage Act of 1823. Now, beyond that, I confess, in my opinion we have no business to go; and when it is proposed to require that people should tell their ages, may I take the liberty of asking why people should be bound to do that when they are of full age, and to tell their age under penalties for perjury? You are claiming under this Act to do that which is only required for public purposes under the Census—where it really is of consequence that people should state their exact ages. But there is no penalty there. What does it matter to us whether a woman who is going to be married is 25 or 30 or 35? I do not think we should sanction such inquiries as a piece of legislation. I first propose to leave out the words "prior to" the last publication, because the clause is not English, as it stands.

*THE BISHOP OF LONDON: I do not object.

Amendment moved, in page 2, line 28, to leave out ("prior to the") and insert ("their.")—(The Lord Grimthorpe.)

Agreed to.

LORD GRIMTHORPE: Then the next is to leave out the words "of the banns" and from "church" to the end of the clause, inserting instead, a provision that the clergyman may require a written statement signed by the person applying, containing the abodes of the parties within the parish, and a statement that they are both of full age, and if not, whether they have obtained the consent of parents or guardians. That, as I have told your Lordships, is an advance upon the present law; I warn you of that, and it is for you to say whether you like to adopt it or not. It then goes on to provide that the person applying knows of no legal impediment by reason of relationship within the prohibited degrees, or from any other cause. The minister, after receiving the statement shall allow the publication to proceed (unless he ascertains it to be false,) and is not bound to ask the parties any further questions, informing them that they are liable to prosecution if they sign such statement falsely. I ought to have mentioned the other night that the Bill as far as this matter goes is founded, I think upon a misapprehension of the Act of 1823, for there is in that Act a power which really seems to me to be big enough as it stands, at least as to the exact place of residence. However, if it is desired to re-enact it here I do not know that it matters. There is a provision there that no parson or curate shall be obliged to publish banns unless the parties shall seven days before the publication deliver a notice in writing stating their true christian and surnames, their place of abode within the parish, and the time they have lived there. If that provision had been borne in mind I cannot help thinking that a good deal of this Bill need not have been drawn. It is not the first time, I may say, that I have known instances of a Bill being drawn for the purpose for effecting what there are already sufficient provisions for in the Statute Book. The Dilapidations Act, which has been absolutely condemned by a Committee of the House of Commons, was drawn in entire forgetfulness that in an Act of Elizabeth, provision is made for everything that was really wanted. Here it is done again, but, as I said before, I have no objection to it, because I have no desire to prevent any Statute being made complete on the face of it.

THE BISHOP OF LONDON: I should like to explain, because the noble and learned Lord made a great point of this the other night, that the form in which this clause with the different questions in its Schedule are cast is not due to any desire on the part of the clergy or on the part of the Bishops to make inquisition into the private affairs of anybody. But the fact of the case is this: the Lower House of Convocation, and afterwards the Upper House with them, represented that it would be of great advantage to have a distinct schedule or form which the parties were to fill up, and accordingly the drawing up of such a form or Schedule was urged, and it was entrusted to legal hands. Of course it may be said I was in fault, and I am perhaps to blame for too implicitly trusting the profession of which the noble and learned lord is a representative, and I should not, perhaps, have left it entirely to legal hands, but should have asked the clergy to do it, and if I had done so the clergy certainly would not have asked such questions as that people should give their ages, because it is surely quite enough to know whether the parties are of full age or not, and with how old a person is precisely, we have no business at all. The reason why the Schedule was drawn in that shape was simply this: It is found in dealing with uneducated people that questions of this sort must be minced up very small for them or else they will not understand what you are about. The idea was that it would be much easier to put it to them in the form of question and answer than simply to leave it in the general form which the clause provides. I do not object to the noble and learned Lord's way of putting it in the least. The result of this, of course, would be that the clergyman would of necessity have the duty of eliciting the information involved in the answers to each one of these questions, which would be inconvenient. But it is obviously very inconvenient not to put in correct form what is required to be filled up. I think it better that we should have a Schedule, but if the noble and learned Lord objects to its form he may work his will upon it, and if the lawyers see any necessity to contend about the matter I can assure them that the Bishops will listen to them with great equanimity. As it is, I really think it would be better to keep the Schedule even if we adopt the noble and learned Lord's proposed clause. That clause is, I think, very well drawn, and I am quite willing to accept it, but I should nevertheless like to put in the Schedule, if the noble and learned Lord does not object, in order that we may have some guidance, and partly, too, for educating the people in the matter. We can amend it, no doubt, and I think with very great effect. I should like to add to the noble and learned Lord's clause what really seems to me of considerable importance, namely, the words that

"The delivery of such statement to the minister shall relieve him from the duty of making inquiries as to the matters therein contained."

I think it is of importance that it should be distinctly stated that the clergyman is then to be no longer responsible. He has these things put before him; he has to accept them upon the assurance that any person who makes a false statement will be punished for doing so, and I think that being the case clergymen ought to be distinctly relieved from all responsibility of finding out whether the facts are so or not.

LORD GRIMTHORPE: That I intended by providing that the clergyman is not bound or authorised to make further inquiry. The moment you provide that a man shall make no further inquiry he ceases to be responsible. I do not think there is anything needed more than that. That has reference to the Schedule, but I am now discussing Clause 6, and certainly, as I understood the other night, such precise inquisition is not desired by the Ecclesiastical Authorities; but the strange thing is that I now find in Clause 6 the age of the parties demanded which the right rev. Prelate says he is willing to give up. I think, therefore, I was right in imputing to somebody or other substantially the inquiries which are directed in Clause 6, and also in the Schedule. If convenient to your Lordships, I am willing to say what I have to say about the Schedule now. It is all very well to make provisions of this kind in reference to places like a Registrar's office where you have all necessary books and Schedules provided at public expense, and officers for the performance of such duties; but who is to provide all that is required for this Schedule here? Are the clergy to do it? Are they to give the attendance required upon all these people? Your Lordships are aware that is not the case now, for the banns are put in through the clerk, and if you do not allow these things to be filled in through the clerk the parties must do it themselves, or the clergyman from such information as he can get. Beyond the suggestion he has made, I understand the right rev. Prelate to be satisfied, otherwise, with my clause.

THE BISHOP OF LONDON: If it is quite certain as a matter of law that these words will carry it, I desire nothing more.

LORD GRIMTHORPE: I think your Lordships may take it as a legal dictum, now, that exemption from being bound or authorised to ask any further questions is quite sufficient to relieve from responsibility.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: I should like to say a few words upon this clause. Hitherto I have refrained from saying anything in the matter because I propose to attend the Standing Committee, where I thought a good deal of this might be much more conveniently discussed and Amendments disposed of; but with regard to this particular Amendment, I am a little apprehensive that if we adopt it in its present language there may be some difficulty arising in regard to requiring a statement in writing of the particulars demanded. Still, anybody who gets a licence has to give these particulars, and I should strongly object, myself, to its being left optional with the clergyman to require these particulars to be furnished for the purpose of public convenience, and in the public interest. I think he ought to be bound to do so. But, as I have said, I would rather not interfere at this stage upon this mere drafting of the Bill, and I merely wanted to point out that the adoption of this clause in the form proposed might lead to difficulty.

LORD GRIMTHORPE: For the present I will propose the Amendment as it is with the understanding that if it is found convenient in the Grand Committee to alter it, I, at any rate, shall make no objection.

Amendment moved,

In line 29, to leave out ("of the banns,") and to leave out from ("church") to the end of the clause and insert ("where they are to be published, may require a statement in writing signed by the person who applied for the banns of the abodes of each of the parties within the parish, and whether they are both of full age, and if not, whether each one who is not has got the consent of his or her father or guardian; and that the person applying knows of no legal impediment by reason of relationship within the prohibited degrees or any other cause. And after receiving such statement the minister shall allow the publication to proceed unless he ascertains it to be false, and he shall not be bound or authorised to ask any further question of the parties, but may inform them that they are liable to prosecution if they sign such statement falsely.")—(The Lord Grimthorpe.)

Agreed to.

Clause 6, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 7.

LORD GRIMTHORPE: It is necessary to move an Amendment to leave out the word "chapel," here, in consequence of what we did in the interpretation clause. It will read "in any church within the diocese," leaving out the intervening words.

Amendment moved, in page 3, line 1, to leave in the words "or in any chapel."

Agreed to.

Other Amendments made.

Clause 7, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 8 agreed to.

Clause 9.

THE BISHOP OF LONDON: I desire to add some words to Clause 9, providing that nothing in this Act contained shall be construed to detract from or qualify the authority in regard to marriage licences, or to affect the legality of any marriage in conformity therewith. I am advised that it is important to protect the Vicar General and other officials in the exercise of their duties that those words should be inserted.

Amendment moved,

In page 3, at the end of the clause, add ("and nothing in this Act contained shall be construed to abridge, detract from, or qualify the authority which the said Master of the Faculties or the said Vicar General now has the exercises in issuing marriage licences, or to affect the legality of any marriage solemnised in conformity therewith.")—(The Bishop of London.)

Agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 10 agreed to.

Clause 11.

LORD GRIMTHORPE: I propose to leave out from "post," in line 26, to the second "to," in line 28, and insert words "providing that the notice shall be sent by the person obtaining the licence." I think that burden ought rather to be imposed upon the person who is to be married than upon the surrogate, unless there is some occasion for it.

THE BISHOP OF LONDON: I do not object to that.

Amendment moved, in page 3, line 26, leave out from ("post") to the second ("to") in line 28, and insert ("by the person who obtained the same.")—(The Lord Grimthorpe.)

Agreed to.

THE BISHOP OF LICHFIELD: There is a further addition which I propose to make in this clause on page 3, line 28, for the purpose of giving greater security against improper marriages. I suppose the real meaning of all marriage legislation is to facilitate as far as possible the performance of proper marriages, and to render difficult or impossible all illegal marriages. It seems to me that in the absence of anything to prevent it, persons may go to a surrogate and make a declaration and obtain a licence with a very wide range of the sources from which such licences may be obtained, and there are no means whatever except the statement of the persons themselves of ascertaining whether the marriage be a legal and proper marriage or not. One knows very well—I know it painfully well from experience in populous parishes in London for upwards of 20 years, and now in a large diocese for a number of years—that the number of illegal and improper marriages is something enormous, and chiefly because we do not take proper precautions to ascertain the circumstances of the marriage. There is something more, and that is the rash facility with which people take affidavits, and make declarations such as are required before obtaining licences of marriage. It seems to me that to send a notice to a clergyman who is at some distance, in whose church the marriage is to be solemnised, is of comparatively small importance; and I propose that notice should be sent to the incumbent of the parish where the persons applying for the licence have their usual place of abode. There would then, if that were done, be some chance of ascertaining whether the marriage was a legal one or not. Of course the clergyman where the marriage is to be solemnised, ex hypothesi knows nothing about the parties; but the incumbent of the parish where they have resided might know the circumstances; as occurred in one case in a parish of mine where a man wished to marry his grand-niece—and he really did marry her. When I heard of the matter I wrote to tell the surrogate that he must withdraw the licence and get it back. He was able to do so by persuading the old man that it was not a proper marriage, and for a time it was stopped; but after some time had elapsed he was able to get a licence elsewhere. Marriages of an illegal nature are celebrated in hundreds, I might almost say in thousands, in this country, and surely the object of all marriage laws ought to be to prevent persons from contracting illegal and improper marriages. It seems to me not only in this clause, but throughout this Bill, there is very great laxity with regard to obtaining information on those points, and I do not hesitate to say that in some respects this Bill will facilitate improper and illegal marriages unless such precautions as I propose are taken. Care should be taken by somebody to ascertain whether the man is going to contract such a horrible marriage to which I have alluded, or whether mere children are going to marry at the age of 16 or 17. Such cases are of continual occurrence, whereas, if notice of these marriages were sent to the incumbent of the parish where the parties dwell, he might know the circumstances, and perhaps be able to say immediately—“This is an improper marriage.” Without that I think we shall open the door to an extension of the really painful irregularity, and laxity, now existing.

Moved—

which the persons applying have had their usual place of abode and also.”)—(The Bishop of Lichfield.)

LORD GRIMTHORPE: I quite understand the Amendment, but I do not understand how it is to be enforced. I confess I sympathise with a great deal the right rev. Prelate has said; but consider what his proposal is. Here is a proposal that notice is to be sent to the incumbent of the place where the people reside; no definite time is fixed for it; no penalties are imposed—you dare not put in a penalty; and the whole thing would fall through in a very short time. Why is all that trouble to be given to the incumbents of parishes for no purpose. I cannot think that is a discreet way of legislating.

THE BISHOP OF LONDON: In support of what has fallen from the noble and learned Lord, I am afraid it would overwhelm incumbents, who are often hardly enough worked, to have numberless notices coming by post saying that people who had lived in his parish were going to be married. I think it would be very hard to put upon them the duty of inquiring and replying to the notices, and that it would be a mistake to insist upon the performance of such a duty.

THE BISHOP OF LICHFIELD: After what has been said, I will withdraw the Amendment.

Amendment (by leave of the House) withdrawn.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clauses 12 and 13 agreed to.

Clause 14.

THE BISHOP OF LONDON: I think after the word “diocese” some words ought to be inserted. It is probably my mistake for not looking to it. It will read that where the marriage is by licence, it shall not be necessary to give proof of abode for 15 days in any parish in the diocese, “or compliance with the directions in Section 11.” I think it is necessary to insert these words in order to make the meaning of the clause complete.

Amendment moved in page 4, line 15, after “diocese,” to insert “or of compliance with the directions mentioned in Section 11 of this Act."—(The Bishop of London.)

Agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 15.

LORD GRIMTHORPE: I think there is a superfluity of adverbs here. It says, "Any false statement made knowingly, intentionally, and wilfully." It seems to me the words "wilfully and intentionally" are certainly unnecessary. I therefore propose to put it "knowingly" alone.

Amendment moved in page 4, line 18 and 19, to leave out the words "intentionally and wilfully."—(Lord Grimthorpe.)

Agreed to.

THE BISHOP OF LICHFIELD: I would ask my right rev. Brother who is to be the prosecutor in these cases. I presume there would have to be a prosecution.

THE BISHOP OF LONDON: I did not think it would be reasonable to desire that the Public Prosecutor should take up such a matter as this as a question of duty. I do not think Parliament would agree to it.

LORD GRIMTHORPE: Perhaps the Bishops would like to undertake it in addition to their duties under the Clergy Discipline Act.

THE BISHOP OF LICHFIELD: This is one more symptom of weakness in the Act. I think all this is in the wrong direction. Too much importance is attached to obtaining information. Everybody knows very well that nobody will come forward to give information in such matters as these merely in the public interest. What is everybody's business is nobody's business.

LORD GRIMTHORPE: Another slight Amendment which I propose is with regard to the word "committal." I cannot find the word "committal" used in this sense in the dictionary. We have the commission of offences but the committal of offenders. I therefore propose to insert the word "commission" in its place.

Amendment moved, in page 4, line 22, to leave out "committal," and insert "commission," agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 16.

LORD GRIMTHORPE: This clause will come out here as the interpretation clause has been put in at the beginning.

Amendment moved, "To leave out Clause 16."—(The Lord Grimthorpe.)

Agreed to.

Clause 17.

THE BISHOP OF LONDON: I wish to add to this clause "or to marriages celebrated by special licences granted by the Archbishops." It is necessary to clearly exempt the Archbishops from the operation of this Act.

LORD GRIMTHORPE: Surely that is done already by Clause 9, and by the addition which the right rev. Prelate has already moved. That was done for the express purpose of keeping those powers alive.

THE BISHOP OF LONDON: If the noble and learned Lord thinks that is enough I do not want to add it.

LORD GRIMTHORPE: I have no objection to one of them, but the two together seem to be unnecessary.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: Here again, although I feel the same reluctance to intervene, I will point out that the first part of Clause 17 was not necessary at all, because an Act of Parliament does not bind the Crown. With reference to the second part also I am not at all certain that it is required.

THE BISHOP OF LONDON: Perhaps it would be better to strike it out now. We can re-insert it in Committee.

THE ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY: It might be well to leave that proviso in now.

Amendment moved,

At the end of the clause to add ("or to marriages celebrated by special licence granted by the Archbishop of Canterbury or his successors referred to in statute 4 George IV., chapter seventy-six.")—(The Bishop of London.)

Agreed to.

Clause as amended agreed to.

Clause 18.

LORD GRIMTHORPE: There is an unnecessary quantity of description in the first line of this clause. It looks as if a new Act were referred to, whereas it is only the Act called "the principal Act" which has already been referred to in the Preamble. Surely it would be better to say "the provisions of the said Act are hereby repealed so far as they are inconsistent with the provisions of this Act and no further."

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: But surely this is mere drafting. It can all be dealt with in Standing Committee.

*LORD GRIMTHORPE: As the Chairman has pointed out "the said Act" has been struck out in the last clause, and we should only be repeating it. I propose the Amendment now and we can alter it hereafter, if necessary.

Amendment moved, to insert, "That the provisions of the said Act be repealed."

Agreed to.

Other Amendments made.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 19.

*LORD GRIMTHORPE: There is something in this clause which I should like to alter. It provides in line 8 that copies of the Act shall be sent "to the officiating ministers of the several ecclesiastical parishes in England." What I suppose it means is to the ministers of every parish in England. I propose, therefore, to make the alteration.

Amendment moved, to omit the words "the several ecclesiastical parishes," and insert "every parish."—(The Lord Grimthorpe.)

Agreed to.

SCHEDULES.

Amendment moved, in page 6, to leave out Schedules A and B.—(The Lord Grimthorpe.)

*THE BISHOP OF LONDON: I hope the noble and learned Lord will be willing to leave the Schedules in. I did not myself intend to engage the House in mere drafting. Of course, it can be considered in Standing Committee.

*THE LORD PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Viscount CRANBROOK): I do not think we need go into this now. It might be left for the Committee, and I would advise the right rev. Prelate to be ready with a form in the Schedule, which can be easily filled up and signed by those who desire to have banns published.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

VOL. CCCLII. [THIRD SERIES.]

PREAMBLE.

*LORD GRIMTHORPE: The Preamble is quite contrary to modern usage, and it is quite enough to put in "Whereas it is expedient to amend the Act," and so on, leaving out the other two paragraphs.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: Might I suggest that the whole of it might very well be left out. I am told that in well-drawn Bills a Preamble is now omitted. If they say anything, they may do harm, and if they do not say anything, they are of no use. I am informed they are never put in now, as they are never any good.

On Question, "That this be the Preamble of the Bill," negatived.

Bill re-committed to the Standing Committee, and to be printed, as amended. (No. 102).

COLONISATION.

QUESTION.—OBSERVATIONS.

*THE EARL OF MEATH: My Lords, I desire to draw your Lordships' attention to a Report of the Committee on Colonisation appointed by the House of Commons which has lately been laid before Parliament, and to ask Her Majesty's Government certain questions which I have placed upon the Notice Paper. It will be in the recollection of your Lordships that within the last ten years public opinion has slowly but certainly been increasing in regard to the necessity of demanding some assistance from Her Majesty's Government for the purpose of enabling poor but suitable persons to transfer their labour from this country, where in certain cases it is not needed, to other countries where it can be made available for the benefit both of the individuals who emigrate and of the general community. In this country there are certain districts as your Lordships are aware in which the population may be said to be in a very congested condition, as for instance some districts in the Highlands of Scotland, certain places in the West of Ireland, and certain portions of our large towns. It has been felt by many that if this congested population could by some means be transferred to those broad and fertile fields which are to be found in Her Majesty's Colonies, fields which are awaiting labour, and which at present are unfruitful owing to the impossibility of getting hands sufficient to cultivate them, a double benefit would be conferred; a benefit would be conferred upon this country by enabling those left behind to earn higher wages, and a benefit would be conferred upon the colonies by enabling them to develop the immense resources which lie at their command, while at the same time a further benefit would be conferred upon the artisans of this country, inasmuch as those who transfer themselves to the distant shores of Canada or Australia having acquired British tastes would certainly buy British products, and would thus create those markets which it is necessary for this country to possess. I would desire to lay great stress upon the difference between simple emigration and colonisation. The colonies have shown over and over again that they do not desire that large masses of the population of this country should be sent to their shores without any care being taken to see that they do not glut the labour markets of those distant countries; but they have never shown any hostility to colonisation, when colonisation has been explained to them to mean the placing of suitable persons with their families upon those uncultivated lands, and enabling those people by providing them with houses, with seed, with implements, and with sufficient funds to tide over the time until the crops which they have sown shall bring in the reward of their labour. I say that when the colonies have been shown that this can be done, they have always received such propositions with favour. This public feeling gradually increased until it resulted in the formation of a body which was created for the purpose of urging upon Her Majesty's Government the adoption of some such policy as that which I have sketched, and in 1886 Her Majesty's Government took the first step towards assisting colonial emigration by the establishment of an Emigration Office, which since that time, at a small expenditure of £500 a year, has done most valuable service—service which is recorded in the Report to which I desire to draw your Lordships' attention. It is one of the recommendations of the Committee on Colonisation which issued the Report that this office should be continued, and that the amount given to it should be increased. In 1887, the year after the formation of this Emigration Office, 32 Peers and 135 Members of the House of Commons formed themselves into a body for the purpose of still further urging Her Majesty's Government to consider the advisability of giving increased aid to colonisation. The result of this was that Her Majesty's Government in the following year undertook to establish a scheme of Crofter Colonisation, and gave £10,000 for that purpose (placing the scheme under the direction of the Scotch Office), on condition that £2,000 were subscribed from other sources. Four Commissioners were appointed by Her Majesty's Government to constitute this Colonisation Board, one representing the Imperial Government, one representing the Canadian Government, one representing the private subscribers, and another representing three of the principal Land Companies in Canada. It was proposed at the time to make advances of £120 to each family. The repayment of that sum was to be made in eight annual instalments at the rate of £20 17s. 8d., and the first repayment was not to be asked for until the fifth year. In the Report to which I am alluding, your Lordships' will see it is stated that this £120 has not been found sufficient, and it is now thought that from £150 to £180 per family is what will be required, the repayment of that sum being secured on the 160 acres of land which the Canadian Government gives free to any person who chooses to settle upon them. Seventy nine families have thus been settled in Manitoba by Her Majesty's Government in 1888 and in 1889. In 1888 the Colony of Killarney was established; and in the year following the colony of Saltcoats, which is about 200 miles further to the West beyond Killarney. The next step, I have to mention, taken by Her Majesty's Government, was to appoint in 1888 the Select Committee, which has drawn up the Report I am now inviting your Lordships' attention to, and whose Chairman was Sir Jas. Fergusson. That Committee consisted of 21 Members. This is the third Session that the Committee have sat. They have examined a large body of witnesses, 54 in number, they have entered into the question with the greatest possible care, they have heard the opinions of persons possessing very different views—those who advocate emigration and those who hold with colonisation; and I am thankful to say as one, who, from the first has advocated colonisation, that the Report of the Committee appointed by Her Majesty's Government was distinctly in favour of State Colonisation. At the conclusion the Report states—

"The Committee are of opinion that the success of the Canadian experiment is sufficiently established to justify a further despatch of a moderately numerous party."

With regard to the advantage of colonisation over emigration the Report says—

"That Colonisation would seem to be the remedy which is most acceptable in the majority of cases, and one which would meet with the least resistance in our Colonies and elsewhere."

I am not at this late hour going to detain your Lordships at any length, but I simply propose to draw your attention to the three principal recommendations made by this Committee. The first and most important to my mind is the recommendation made by the Committee that Her Majesty's Government should accept a proposal made to them by the Colony of British Columbia which has asked for an advance of £150,000 bearing interest at 2½ per cent. and guaranteed by that flourishing colony. This offer for some reason or other was not accepted at the time it was made, and I do not understand why Her Majesty's Government failed to accept an offer which to my mind seems a most favourable one considering what are the resources of this flourishing colony, and considering that the colony were going to take the entire responsibility of placing some 1,250 families upon the land. I hope now, the Report being so distinctly in favour of this proposal, that Her Majesty's Government will re-consider the decision which they came to, as far as I understand they did come to a decision formerly, with regard to this matter, and that they will grant the request which has been made to them by that colony. The Report states with regard to that matter—

"That project"—

that is, the proposal of the Colony of British Columbia—

"Presents the rare recommendation that it demanded from the public purse or from local funds no assistance beyond the Imperial loan, the repayment of which is guaranteed by a solvent and promising Province, which seems to possess ample resources for the settlement of a large population."

The Report goes on to say—

"Your Committee think that in no way could the object recognised as necessary be obtained with less outlay or risk to the National Exchequer, and they can conceive of many considerations in which the colonisation of British Columbia by a maritime population would appear to be desirable in the interests of the British Empire," and they conclude by saying they recommend the offer of British Columbia to the favourable consideration of Her Majesty's Government and Parliament. Then the next and most important matter, to my mind, is the recommendation of the Committee that Her Majesty's Government should not require County Councils, when they borrow money for colonisation purposes, to obtain a local guarantee. The Committee state, and justly state, that the only local guarantee they could obtain would be the local guarantee of the Poor Law Authorities; and, as Her Majesty's Government are well aware, it is most inadvisable that colonisation should be in any way mixed up with the taint of pauperism. I hope, therefore, Her Majesty's Government will make the necessary alteration in regard to this matter in the Local Government Act of 1888, which granted powers to the County Councils to expend money for colonisation purposes, but required them to have a local guarantee before they advanced such sums. Then the third, and a most important recommendation, is that the crofter emigration experiment should be tried in Canada; and the fourth is that the emigration of children, especially through the industrial schools, should be encouraged. There are several other recommendations, but I will not go into them now. I will conclude by asking Her Majesty's Government whether they will consider the advisability of adopting any of the following recommendations contained in the Report of the Colonisation Committee of the House of Commons, and, if so, which of them:—(1) That the Colonisation Board be continued and re-constructed for the purpose of colonisation and emigration; (2) That the congested districts of Scotland, and of the Highlands and Islands of Scotland, form an exceptional case, and require relief by assistance in industries, to colonisation or emigration, and where suitable to migration; (3) That the experiment of colonising the crofter population in Canada should be further tried; (4) That the proposals of the Government of British Columbia (for an advance of £150,000, to bear interest at 2½ per cent., for the purpose of assisting the colonisation of 1,250 families from this country) should be favourably entertained; (5) That similar proposals from any Colonial Government should be entertained; (6) That the agency of companies for colonisation and emigration should be taken advantage of, both as regards the aforesaid colonisation in Canada and elsewhere; (7) That the Government grant to the Emigrants' Information Office should be increased; (8) That facility and assistance should be given to further the emigration of children; (9) That the Treasury should grant pecuniary aid to industrial and other schools to assist in carrying out the above object.

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Lord KNUTSFORD): My Lords, the speech of the noble Earl has shown what probably your Lordships would not be prepared to dispute—the importance of this subject. I do not think he has quite dwelt sufficiently upon certain difficulties which surround the question, difficulties which must be obvious to anyone who has studied not only the evidence given in the Report of this Select Committee, to which his question refers, but also the Reports and the proceedings of preceding Committees. This Select Committee only reported on the 17th March, and it is obvious, therefore, that Her Majesty's Government have not yet been able to give that full consideration to the question which would enable them to answer conclusively the noble Earl as to whether we are prepared to accept any or all of the recommendations which the Committee have made. It is clear, in the first place, that before Her Majesty's Government can arrive at any decision upon this question, the recommendations of the Committee and their Report must be referred to the several Departments which are directly interested in the question, as, for instance, the Scotch Office, the Irish

Office, and the Treasury, who will, after full consideration, present us with their Reports. Now, as regards the Scotch Department, I may refer to the answer which was given by the Lord Advocate on Monday, April 20th, in the House of Commons in answer to a question whether the Secretary of State had been in communication with the Government of Canada or other Colonial Governments, in order to complete arrangements as to colonisation. The Lord Advocate answered that—

“The consideration of all proposals for State-aided emigration from the congested districts of Scotland was postponed by the Government till they had before them the Report of the Select Committee on Colonisation. That Committee has lately issued its Report, and the Government have now under consideration the recommendation which it contains.”

I believe that further communication and correspondence have taken place with the Scotch Office, and possibly the Marquess of Lothian, if it is desired, will state at what stage the matter has arrived. I may also refer the House to the answer which was given by the right hon. Mr. Smith in the House of Commons, in answer to a question of much the same tenour as the one now put by the noble Earl, but confined to the proposals of the Government, by Mr. Parker Smith. He stated that—

“The Government have not yet had sufficient time to fully consider the Report of this Committee, but it is obviously too late this year to select families for emigration. It will, however, be necessary for the Government, before the autumn, to go into the question, if emigration is to take place before spring, and I hope it may be in my power before the House finally rises to make some statement of our intentions.”

Therefore, my Lords, the general reply to the noble Earl's question is that Her Majesty's Government have not yet had time to give full consideration to the matter; but he may rest assured that we recognise the importance of the subject, and that we will as soon as possible arrive at some decision upon it. I may say that, as far as I am aware, Her Majesty's Government concur with the noble Earl upon this point; that they view with greater hope of success any system of colonisation than that of mere emigration; and as regards the crofters, as the noble Earl himself has pointed out, the Government have shown their complete approval of the principle of assisted emigration for congested districts by the action they have taken in two successive years. I have no reason to suppose that the Government have in any way changed their views; but, on the contrary, I should think they would be willing to consider how far that system, which I gather from the noble Earl has worked well, can be extended. With respect, also, to the proposal of British Columbia, the Report of the Select Committee shows that the terms which the Treasury desired were not agreed to—I think it was a question of amount of interest—but it is clear from that Report, and from what has passed, that Her Majesty's Government viewed with favour a proposal of that kind from a province so well able to ensure the performance of their agreement as British Columbia, or from any colony equally able and willing to give such ensurance. I think I may add with reference to the question, why nothing has been done since 1888, when Mr. Begg first communicated with Her Majesty's Government, that, as I think was announced by the right hon. Mr. Goschen in the other House, it was thought better, as a Select Committee had been appointed, that before agreeing to any proposal Her Majesty's Government should wait until the Select Committee had reported. I believe that Mr. Begg is corresponding now with the Scotch Office, and that further proposals have been laid before them, and I can assure the noble Earl we sincerely hope that some satisfactory arrangement may be made not only with British Columbia, but on similar terms with other colonies. Before I sit down I should like to express my hearty concurrence with the noble Earl in his praise of the excellent work that is done by the Emigrants' Information Office, and to say also that I hope we may be able to induce the Chancellor of the Exchequer to increase the very moderate sum which is now given to it, so that we may have branches established in the principal towns in the country. I can assure the noble Earl that most careful consideration will be given to the subject, as we fully recognise its importance.

*THE DUKE OF ARGYLL: My Lords, when I saw this Notice on your Lordships' Paper, in the name of the noble Lord on the Cross Benches, I thought that probably he would not merely put a formal question as to whether the Government could or would adopt the recommendations of the Committee, but that he would also go somewhat into an examination of the remarkable evidence which is contained in that Report and summarised in it; and I came down to the House to-night prepared to lay before your Lordships some very interesting and important facts with which I am personally acquainted, in addition to those brought forward before the Committee, and showing the immense importance of the subject, at least as regards particular districts in Scotland. But really, my Lords, I think in the present condition of the House, it would be absurd to go on with a discussion which could only be very languid and perfunctory. Many noble Lords have left the House who would probably be interested in the districts which I have mentioned. The noble Lord on the Cross Benches has not entered upon that part of the subject at all; he has simply dealt with the recommendations of the Committee. I must say that better work has never been done, in my judgment, by any Committee of the House of Commons than that which sat and produced this Report. I think it a matter of extreme importance that the House should be put in possession of the facts, this being a matter which affects many local interests. Many Members of the House, probably, have not read the evidence, which is bulky, and I shall certainly propose, at a later day in the Session, to bring the matter specially before the House, not merely with reference to these recommendations of the Select Committee, but with regard to the facts which they had in evidence before them. I was very glad to see that this subject had been taken up by the noble Lord on the Cross Benches, because his name is a sufficient guarantee that it was taken up with no merely political or Party object, and not in reference to fads of any kind, but that it was a matter of pure philanthropy and benevolence on his part, for he is well-known now to be connected with the work of practical philanthropy—more so, perhaps, than any other Member of this House. At the same time, we cannot shut our eyes to the fact that propositions with regard to emigration have been more or less connected with political questions at the present time, and, therefore, I think it would be better, in bringing the question before the Government, that we should lay before them our view of the facts with which they have to deal. Some of the facts connected with the question of colonisation, and of emigration of the crofters from the Highlands and Western Islands of Scotland, are very remarkable, more especially in reference to Lewis. I shall not go into them to-night, but simply give notice that on a later day I shall call the attention of the Government to this subject, and to the Report of the Select Committee.

THE MARQUESS OF LOTHIAN: The noble Duke who has just sat down was kind enough to give me notice that he intended to bring this matter before the House with regard to the reforms in Scotland; but as he has told your Lordships, he proposes to defer the question mentioned in his notice to a later period in the Session, I think it is unnecessary for me to enter upon the subject of it. At the same time, I should like to say a few words with reference to the question which has been put by the noble Lord on the Cross Benches to the noble Lord the Secretary for the Colonies with regard to emigration, or rather, colonisation. He has drawn your attention to the very able Report of the Committee upon that subject, and it is exceedingly gratifying to me to find, after all the care which the Committee gave to the consideration of the questions with regard to colonisation and emigration, it is distinctly stated in their Report that the success of the experiment in Manitoba had been so so decided as to induce them to recommend that the scheme should be further continued. I cannot go fully into the matter now; perhaps on some future occasion I shall have the opportunity of doing so; but I may mention to your Lordships the great difficulties which I had in carrying out that scheme. The principal difficulty was caused by the fact that Her Majesty's Government were then unable with the information at their disposal to give me the funds necessary for carrying out the scheme at the proper time of the year. With regard to the observations which the Secretary of State for the Colonies has just made, I hope to be able to induce the Chancellor of the Exchequer to put funds at my disposal at such a time of the year as will enable the scheme to be carried out successfully. If the scheme is to be successfully carried out, the funds must be placed at our disposal at a proper period of the year, before the emigrants go out. In order to make the scheme successful, it is absolutely necessary that the ground should be prepared for occupation. One of the principal difficulties experienced was that when the crofters went out, the ground, in consequence of the shortness of the time, could not be prepared. The time for preparing it is in the month of June. The soil being virgin in those places requires to be turned over twice, once in June and once later in the autumn. With the view of turning over the soil and making the necessary preparations, it is absolutely essential we should be in a position to know how many families are to be emigrated. We cannot spend money in turning over the soil upon these different holdings in Canada without knowing whether they are going to be occupied or not, and, therefore, it is perfectly clear that if necessary preparations are to be made we must know within two months of the time, at the very least, how many families are to be emigrated during the year. If that is not done the experiment must be carried out at greater cost than is necessary and at the risk of the grumbling on the part of the crofter families who are being sent out which we have constantly heard of. There is another reason why I think it is exceedingly desirable that nothing should be done hurriedly, because unless preparations are made in such a way as to enable the emigrants to rely upon themselves during the winter months it will be necessary to provide for them in the way of clothing and the means of subsistence. That strikes away the principal object in sending them out, namely, teaching them reliance upon themselves, and to provide for themselves and their families. For every reason, being exceedingly anxious that these recommendations of the Committee in their Report should be carried out, it being necessary that a further sum should be placed at my disposal for that purpose, and also that the scheme proposed by the Colony of British Columbia should be carried into effect, I am anxious, if the scheme is to be carried out at all, that the money should be placed in our hands at the earliest possible moment.

*THE EARL OF MEATH: My Lords, I am very grateful, indeed, to the noble Lord opposite for having promised that Her Majesty's Government will take this subject into serious consideration, and also to the noble Marquess for all he has said. I feel, that if anything is to be done, as the noble Marquess has said, it ought to be done by the Government at once, because between now and June is not a long interval, and there is no time to be lost. Therefore, I sincerely hope that Her Majesty's Government will take this matter into their serious consideration at the earliest possible moment.

INTERMEDIATE SCHOOLS, &c. SITES
BILL.—[H.L.] (No. 94.)

Amendments reported (according to order).

*LORD NORTON: My Lords, before accepting the Report I merely wish to ask the noble Lord who has charge of this Bill whether he will on the Third Reading introduce a clause to define its object? In a Bill dealing with limited and trust property the object should at least be defined. In this Bill, for conveyance of sites for intermediate schools or other schools sanctioned by Act of Parliament, there is no definition of what such schools are meant to be, nor of the body to whom the sites are to be conveyed. In the Welsh Intermediate Schools Act there are definitions of both, but only as respects that particular Act. Elementary Schools are distinctly defined in the Act of 1870, and I can perfectly well remember in the Office that the definition was often found most useful in withstanding constant attempts to set up private and profitable establishments under the name. There are now unlimited schemes for private advantage under the name of public education, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer announced only yesterday that, besides his late appropriation of Votes for other purposes to technical education, he is about to propose, under the name of free education, that everybody should be taxed for the education of those who want any kind of education at all publicly provided for them. I maintain that it is a most dangerous mode of dealing with this subject to have no definitions making it clear what the objects of the Bill are. This Bill must have some definition of what it means by intermediate schools, or any schools sanctioned by the Act. It might for the first phrase adopt the Welsh definition; for the last, Heaven knows what it means. I would, therefore, ask the noble Lord who has charge of the Bill whether he will promise, on the Third Reading, that he will introduce a clause defining the object of his Bill?

*LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY:

The noble Lord wishes to have a definition of intermediate schools. In the private notice he has given me he says the Act of 1889 contains no definition of an intermediate school, but I would point out to him that the whole Act of 1889 is definition. Among the definitions there are five or six lines of what intermediate education is intended to be for the purpose of the Intermediate Schools Act. The noble Lord says there is no definition in the words "any sanctioned by Act of Parliament and in receipt of aid or monies provided by Act of Parliament," those words were given by the Education Office, and originally stood, "as provided from the Consolidated Fund," but the Chairman of the Standing Committee altered that to "monies provided by Act of Parliament." In deference to the wishes of the noble Lord, I have prepared an additional clause with that definition, but the noble Lord the Chairman of the Standing Committee says it is unnecessary; and, therefore, I do not propose to move it. If the noble Lord thinks it necessary, he can move it on the Third Reading. The Bill has been considerably altered in Standing Committee, and I wish to take this opportunity of thanking Lord Kensington for the support he gave to the Bill which concerns Wales especially. The noble Lord the Chairman of the Standing Committees has made an improvement in a part of this Bill, which is nothing but a verbatim transcript from the Public Worship and Burial Sites Act, by amending it so that if part of the land is not used that part, but only that part, should revert to the use of the owner. I regret that other Amendments have been made which I think take away a large part of the usefulness of the Bill. In the case of a minor land cannot be given, it must be sold. This alteration is principally due to the wishes of my noble Friend who now represents Mr. Gladstone in this House. But I must say that on this occasion he has not represented Mr. Gladstone properly, because Mr. Gladstone has on all occasions shown a wish to please the Welsh people, and to obtain these schools is an object which they have very much at heart. I have examined into the matter, and have found that there are not many cases of minors in Wales to which this will apply; but there is one place asking for an intermediate school where I believe all the land belongs to one owner, and the provisions of this Bill will prevent him giving the land, or will furnish him with an excuse for not granting it. What I have seen in the Standing Committee has I must confess increased my objections to them very much; but I will reserve my remarks in that respect until some occasion when the noble Marquess the Prime Minister is in the House, or until some other noble Lord raises the question.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: My Lords, I only desire to say that I was not the only person who made an objection to this clause of the Bill. I believe the first person who made an objection to it was Lord Herschell, who is not here. Though I quite sympathise with the desire of the Welsh people to obtain these sites for their schools, I do not think it is necessary, in order that their legitimate desires in that direction should be satisfied, that the property of minors should be taken away without proper payment being made for it. It seems to me unreasonable that the property of minors who cannot themselves consent to a gift should be taken away from them by other persons. They can sell the property, and that seems quite sufficient for the purpose of the Bill. As regards the Standing Committees, I think my noble Friend will find there are some noble Lords at all events in this House, at all events who think the Standing Committees are very useful; and I cannot help thinking that the experience we have had this evening in Committee on the Marriage Bill must have caused a great many people to wish that the Bill had gone to a Standing Committee instead of coming before a Committee of the whole House.

The House met at Two of the clock.

QUESTIONS.

BURNING OF VILLAGES AT MASTAON.

COLONEL NOLAN (Galway, N.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India if his attention has been called to a paragraph in the Times of the 22nd, stating that villages had been burned on or near the Mastaon Plateau; whether this statement is correct; and, if so, how many villages have been burned; whether these villages have been burned as a punishment or from military contingencies; and, further, if as a punishment, whether as a punishment for simple resistance or for some specific act of treachery committed by the village burned; and if the villages have been burned owing to military contingencies, would he state the nature of such contingencies, giving such data as would enable a comparison to be instituted with similar unavoidable accidents in European warfare?

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Sir J. GORST, Chatham): The Mastaon Plateau is not in Manipur, but on the Afghan frontier. The Secretary of State has not received yet such detailed information respecting the military operations in that part of India as would enable him to reply to the various points in the hon. Member's question.

COLONEL NOLAN: When will the Secretary of State be in possession of such information?

*SIR J. GORST: My noble Friend the Secretary of State for India has the greatest confidence in the humanity and discretion of the Government of India, and he will not press them with questions which would seem to imply a want of confidence. There is no doubt that full Reports will come home in due course, by post, and when they are received they will be laid before Parliament. It will then be in the power of the hon. and gallant Member, if he wishes to find fault with the Government of India, to do so.

COLONEL NOLAN: I wish for a plain answer to a plain question. When will the Secretary of State for India be in the possession of such information as will enable him to answer the question? Will it be a week hence, or a month, or how long?

*SIR J. GORST: It is obviously impossible for the Secretary of State to form any conjecture as to when the Reports may be sent to him. I think that the hon. and gallant Member ought to be much more able to form an estimate than I can.

COLONEL NOLAN: Is it not usual to write a despatch within a week after an engagement? Is that the custom in India?

*SIR J. GORST: I am not able to answer a question as to the military customs of India without notice. I should say that the General commanding in the field would send in a Report as soon as was possible consistently with the proper discharge of his duties in the field.

THE OPERATIONS AT MANIPUR.

COLONEL NOLAN: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India if he will state who has given their instructions or orders to the officers commanding columns operating in Manipur; and if the conduct of all operations, civil or military, in Manipur is at present in the hands of the Military Authorities, or if civil officials exercise any authority in Manipur, or are furnished with any instructions giving them power in that district if the military operations should be successful?

*SIR J. GORST: The answer to the first paragraph of the question is—the Commander-in-Chief in India. The answer to the question contained in the second paragraph is that all operations in Manipur are in the hands of the Military Authorities at present.

THE FACTORY LAWS IN INDIA.

MR. HOWELL (Bethnal Green, N.E.): I wish to ask the Under Secretary of State for India if he will give a Return, in addition to the Return already presented to the House, showing the operation of the Factory Law in India? What I want is a Return that shall show what the alterations in the law have been.

*SIR J. GORST: The Return which I have already given to the House shows, I believe, the changes which have been made in the law, as well as the existing law.

MR. HOWELL: If the right hon. Gentleman will look at the Return, I think he will find that it is only the changes in the law which are given and not a comparison between them and the law as it stood previously.

*SIR J. GORST: If the hon. Member will put a question on the Paper, I shall be happy to give him all the information he may require on any point he can suggest.

BILLETING OF SOLDIERS.

MR. BROOKFIELD (Sussex, Rye): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether he can state the present rates of pay authorised to keepers of licensed houses for the board and lodging of soldiers billeted upon them; at what period such rates of pay were originally decided upon, and whether they have of late years been revised or altered; and whether, before he next introduces the Army Act for renewal, he will consider the expediency of either improving the present rates of pay or extending the obligation to receive soldiers and their horses to the houses of any other persons besides those enumerated in Section 104 of 44 and 45 Vic. c. 58?

THE FINANCIAL SECRETARY TO THE WAR OFFICE (Mr. BRODRICK, Surrey, Guildford): The sum paid to the innkeeper until 1868 was 10d., from which sum it was raised to 1s. 4d. in 1873, and has remained at that amount since. From the known cost of supplies, which have fallen since 1873, there is every reason to believe that this sum affords a fair profit to the innkeeper, and the only complaint received has been from one innkeeper, who complained that he had been struck off the list for billets. The Secretary of State does not propose to introduce any change in the Army Act.

THE LABOUR COMMISSION.

MR. HOWELL: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether Mr. John Burnett, the Labour Correspondent to the Board of Trade, is appointed one of the Joint Secretaries to the Royal Commission on Labour; and whether, in view of the fact that the work of the Labour Bureau is much in arrear, the Reports for 1889 not having yet been issued, some substitute for Mr. Burnett, or temporary helper in that work, has been or is about to be appointed in that office?

*THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster): Mr. John Burnett, Labour Correspondent to the Board of Trade, has been appointed one of the Joint Secretaries to the Royal Commission on Labour, and the President of the Board of Trade will doubtless provide Mr. Burnett with assistance in the work of the Labour Bureau if it is found that he requires it.

SAMOA.

SIR T. ESMONDE (Dublin County, S): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs if there is any anticipation of trouble at Samoa in connection with Mataafa's succession to King Malietoa; and, if so, whether steps are being taken by Her Majesty's Government to meet it?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Sir J. FERGUSON, Manchester, N.E.): The most recent reports received from Samoa are satisfactory, and do not lead us to anticipate any trouble.

THE PORTUGUESE IN SOUTH AFRICA.

MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether Her Majesty's Government has received from the Portuguese Government any complaints of a violation of the modus vivendi on the part of the agents of the Chartered South African Company; whether specific complaints have been made of the imprisonment and deportation of Portuguese Officers by the agents of the company; and, if so, what reply has been made to the complaints; whether Masse Kesse is within the territory that was agreed to be within the Portuguese sphere by the modus vivendi, and whether its occupation by the agents of the company constitutes a violation of the status quo agreed to in that instrument; and whether the company has obtained the permission of Her Majesty's Government to exercise power in Manicaland; and, if not, what is the exact status of agents of the company exercising power in that territory as regards Her Majesty's Government and as regards the Portuguese Government?

SIR J. FERGUSSON: (1) Such complaints have been made, but it has not been shown in what respect the modus vivendi has been violated; (2) only one such complaint has been made referring to the reported arrest of Lieutenant Freira in January. The Company has denied the arrest, but further inquiry is being made; (3) Masse Kesse is outside the territorial limits of the British sphere indicated in the August Agreement, and it would have been a violation of the modus vivendi if Great Britain had accepted a Protectorate there, or exercised Sovereignty. There has been no such Act. There is nothing in the modus vivendi which would prevent the presence of Masse Kesse of the Company's agents. We are assured that the fact is that the Mozambique Company's vacant buildings are protected by four policemen, who have been ordered to give them up when the Portuguese arrive; (4) the Company is not exercising powers of Government in Manicaland. The Government is, by the Convention with Mutassa, expressly reserved to the Chief, with the assistance of the residents and the Company's police.

EAST AFRICA COMPANY.

MR. LABOUCHERE: I also wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether any application has been made to the Government by the Imperial British East Africa Company to guarantee the capital for a railroad to be made under its auspices; and whether any assurance has been given to the Company, or to anyone connected with the Company, that such a guarantee will be granted; and, if so, whether he will undertake that no definite promise will be given before the House has had an opportunity to consider its expediency?

SIR J. FERGUSSON: Such an application has been made, and is under consideration. Parliamentary sanction would, of course, be required before such a guarantee can be carried into effect.

KING JA JA.

SIR WALTER FOSTER (Derby, Ilkestone): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether King Ja Ja's health has been improved by his removal to Barbados; whether any steps have been taken to enable his wife to join him there; and whether any deductions have been made from his allowance for personal expenditure since his removal from St. Vincent?

SIR J. FERGUSSON: The reports of Ja Ja's health are not good, and as the administrative Staff for the Oil Rivers Commission is now organised and the Commissioner will shortly start for his post, he has been informed, with the Commissioner's approval, that he will be permitted to return at once to Opobo. It is understood that the wife refused to accompany him to Barbados or to Opobo. We are not aware of any deductions from the allowance.

CYPRUS.

MR. A. O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies why the Return relating to Enforced Sales in Cyprus, ordered on the 25th July last, has not yet been rendered; and when it will be laid upon the Table?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Baron H. DE WORMS, Liverpool, East Toxteth): The materials for a Return in the terms of the Address were received some time ago; but would have been of little value without further particulars which have been asked for and promised. The delay in sending the further particulars is due to the fact that there is a scarcity of public officers. In the meantime, I can show the hon. Member what information we have.

PLACES OF WORSHIP ENFRANCHISEMENT BILL.

MR. KELLY (Camberwell, N.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether, in view of the overwhelming majority by which the Motion for the Second Reading of the Places of Worship Enfranchisement Bill was carried, and of the technical character of the Amendments which are likely to be made in its provisions in Committee, he would be willing to agree to a Motion to refer it to the Standing Committee on Law, &c.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: Unless it is the unanimous wish of the House it is not usual to refer a private Member's Bill to a Select Committee, such reference being confined to Government measures. The question is, therefore, essentially one for the decision of the House, as the Government have no particular interest in the Bill to which the hon. Member refers.

FEVER AT RANAFAST.

MR. A. O'CONNOR: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland with reference to his statement on Thursday last, that fever does not exist in Ranafast, and that, though an outbreak of scarlatina had occurred in the Dungloe Dispensary District, it was practically over on the 25th March, whether he is aware that the dispensary doctor did attend 11 cases of fever in Ranafast on the 21st instant, eight of them being scarlet fever cases; and that two brothers from a neighbouring townland, who died suddenly of scarlatina, were buried on the 21st instant; whether, seeing that his previous information was incorrect, he will cause further inquiry to be made through fresh channels; and whether he requires to see the doctor's certificates in confirmation of the above statements?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (MR. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): The statement which I made last week gave correctly what had occurred up to that time. I have now called for a further Report.

SIR T. ESMONDE: My hon. Friend will repeat the question on Monday.

LAND COMMISSION—WEXFORD.

MR. J. BARRY (Wexford, E.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that the Chief Land Commission has appointed 3rd June next to hear appeals from the decisions of the Sub-Commission for County Wexford; if he is aware that there are upwards of 100 appeals listed from the Poor Law Union of Wexford alone, and, whether, considering the enormous expense and inconvenience of bringing the tenants and their witnesses to Dublin, he would suggest to the Land Commission the desirability of hearing these appeals in the Assise town of Wexford.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: This question is down without Notice, and I have not been able to obtain the necessary information to enable me to answer it. Perhaps the hon. Gentleman will be good enough to repeat it.

OLDPARK, BELFAST.

MR. BLANE (Armagh, S.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury is he aware that Mr. E. Murphy, Arbitrator to the Local Government Board, sat on the 1st June to hear claims for compensation re the Belfast Water Commissioners and property owners and occupiers in Oldpark, near Belfast; that the final hearing of objections was held on 28th October, 1890, and the final award only made on 6th April, 1891; whether Mr. Murphy lodged a copy of this final award with the solicitors for the Water Commissioners two months before it was signed by him for the purpose of enabling the Water Commissioners to consult Counsel with reference to the Act, which came into force on 1st April, 1889; and if any complaints have reached the Government with reference to the alleged delay in the publication of the award and the small amount of compensation given to property owners and others in Oldpark, Belfast?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (MR. JACKSON, Leeds, N.): I answered this question yesterday. It was put by one of the hon. Gentleman's Colleagues.

MR. BLANE: I am sorry to say that I did not hear the answer.

MR. JACKSON: Nevertheless, it was answered.

INLAND REVENUE COLLECTIONS IN IRELAND.

MR. CLANCY (Dublin Co., N.): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether the out-door supervisors of Inland Revenue in the "collection" which comprises the City and County of Dublin, as well as portions of the Counties of Wicklow, Wexford, Kildare, Meath, and Carlow, are compelled by the extensive character of their duties to work from 10 to 12 hours on week days, and often to work on Sundays also; and whether the Commissioners of Inland Revenue have described the outdoor supervisors as their most important officers, they being solely responsible to the Exchequer for the due and proper charging of the Excise Revenue; and, if so, will he direct the Commissioners of Inland Revenue to investigate the circumstances of their position with a view to increasing the staff of out-door supervisors for the Dublin collection.

MR. JACKSON: I answered this question also yesterday.

PUBLIC BUSINESS.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): May I ask if the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland intends to include the Labourers' Dwellings (Ireland) Act in the Expiring Laws Continuance Bill?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Yes, Sir; I believe that is the intention of the Government. I do not know that it is the most satisfactory mode of procedure, but it is evidently impossible to bring in an Amendment Act, and we cannot allow the existing Act to drop.

MR. J. MORLEY (Newcastle-upon-Tyne): Is it intended to take the Land Purchase Bill on Monday?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I think it will be more satisfactory if it is postponed until Tuesday. The Budget Resolutions will be taken on Monday, and some smaller matters afterwards.

As amended, considered; Bill read the third time, and passed.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

PURCHASE OF LAND AND CONGESTED DISTRICTS (IRELAND) BILL.—(No. 111.) COMMITTEE.

Considered in Committee.
(In the Committee.)

Clause 2.

Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 39, after "holding," insert "or from the guarantee deposit."—(Mr. Sexton.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. MADDEN, Dublin University): I accept the Amendment, modified so as to provide that all sums carried to the account in respect of the redemption of the purchase annuity, whether received from the proprietor of the holding, or upon the sale of the holding, or from the guarantee deposit, and also all other moneys carried to the land purchase account, shall be paid to the Sinking Fund.

Question put, and agreed to.

(240.) Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 40, after "Act," leave out "any residue," and insert "all other moneys carried to the Land Purchase Account."

Question, "That the words 'any residue' stand part of the Clause," put, and negatived.

Question, "That the words 'any other moneys carried to the Land Purchase Account' be inserted," put, and agreed to.

The next Amendment stood in the name of Mr. BLANE, and it was as follows:—To add at the end of the clause—

"Provided always, that the Irish Land Commission may applot the purchase money and annual instalments for any labourer's holding or homestead situated on any tenement purchased under the provisions of this Act, in the same way and manner as may be done by the Irish Land Commission in the case of a tenancy purchased under the powers of "The Purchase of Land (Ireland) Act, 1885," and subsequent Acts amending the same, and upon the full discharge of such annual payments by such labourer in occupation, he shall be deemed the owner of such holding."

Colonel NOLAN rose to address the Committee upon the Amendment.

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! This Amendment is not appropriate to the clause.

Question proposed, "That Clause 2, as amended, stand part of the Bill."

*(2.45.) MR. KEAY (Elgin and Nairn): I beg to move the omission of the clause as a protest against Sub-section 3, whereby one-half of the consequences of a default on the part of the tenant of a holding are thrown upon the locality. I regard the sub-section as containing a most iniquitous provision. There is an absolute unanimity of opinion among the Irish Members against it, and I do not think that even from the landlord element on the other side of the House there has been a distinct protest against the views expressed here.

COLONEL WARING (Down, N.): The landlords have had no wish to endanger the passing of the Bill.

*MR. KEAY: Although they may have a desire to pass the Bill quickly we are fairly entitled to assume that their silence means consent to the equity of the case we have urged.

COLONEL WARING: Then I hope the hon. Member will disabuse his mind of that impression. He must not assume anything of the sort.

*MR. KEAY: I am glad to find that there is nothing like an expression of opinion on the other side of the House against the equity of our case, and I gladly welcome the interruption. The Government have refused to give way upon this point. They consider that one half of the burden should be borne by the localities, on the ground that the localities ought to have a large interest in the fulfilment of their obligations by the tenants. I was much surprised to hear the remarks of the Chief Secretary to this effect, because if they mean anything at all they seem to me to point to boycotting. He threatens the locality with a pecuniary loss in case of a single tenant becoming a defaulter.

(2.47.): Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; Committee counted, and 40 Members being found present,

*(2.50.) MR. KEAY: I want the Chief Secretary to satisfy my conscience in regard to this matter, which simply means the boycotting of a number of innocent ratepayers for the default of one man. My principal objection to the clause, however, is that it is an attempt to improve the position of the landlord at the expense of the locality, and unless I get some further assurance from the Government, I shall certainly divide the Committee against the clause.

(2.52.) MR. J. MORLEY (Newcastle-upon-Tyne): I hope that my hon. Friend will not divide the Committee. I agree with everything he has said in regard to the landlords' guarantee deposit not being made wholly available to meet any default. I believe that that is a great flaw in the Bill; but the point is one which has been adequately discussed in previous Sittings, and, therefore, with all due respect, I hope my hon. Friend will not take up time that may be devoted to other good and valued points.

(2.53.) MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): I wish to support the suggestion of the right hon. Gentleman. Unquestionably, if the clause had remained in anything like the form in which it was introduced, I should have felt it my duty to vote against it; but I think that an important concession has been made. At the same time, I must protest against a provision which limits the landlord's liability to one-half of the guarantee deposit.

(2.54.) COLONEL NOLAN (Galway, N.): The hon. Member for Elgin (Mr. Keay) has fought the Bill inch by inch, and he is quite consistent in his objections to this clause; but I think he would act gracefully if he were now to yield to the suggestion of the right hon. Member for Newcastle (Mr. Morley). No doubt the clause is bad, and I hope it may still be amended, but if the hon. Member goes on at the same rate his valuable lectures on finance will take up two volumes of Hansard. The volumes will doubtless form amusing reading for those who are interested in the subject, and especially for the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere), who has taken the hon. Member for Elgin as his financial adviser.

(2.56.) MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): The hon. and gallant Member has given a singular reason for voting in favour of the clause. He considers that it is a thoroughly bad clause and he hopes that it may be amended on the Report. I trust that before the discussion is closed the Chief Secretary will inform the hon. and gallant Member whether he intends to bring in another Bill or to amend the Bill now before the Committee. So far as the clause itself is concerned I take a large and broad view of the subject, but I am confronted with this difficulty—that the clause conflicts with the principle of the Bill. As I understand the Bill it is intended to carry out the Ashbourne Act, but we now find that the landlord is to be relieved of a considerable share of the liability which is imposed on him by the Ashbourne Act. I am sorry to differ from my right hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle. My right hon. Friend takes the same view as I do as to the pernicious character of the clause, but on a point of procedure he thinks that having voted against the pecuniary part of the clause we ought now to accept the proposal of the Government. Now, I think that if there is any part of the clause that is so objectionable that it will do violence to our principles we ought to vote against it. Therefore, if my hon. Friend goes to a Division I shall certainly support him. I regret that I was not in the House in time to move my Amendment as to total capital loss in case of forced sale, and I should like to ask the Chief Secretary if he will propose some way of preventing injustice being done to the Local Authorities.

*(2.59.) MR. KNOX (Cavan, W.): I hope the hon. Member will not divide against the clause, but I wish to point out that on Lord Waterford's estates holdings have been sold in a case of default, subject to a reduced annuity. No doubt it is much easier to sell a holding subject to a reduced annuity than for the Commission to keep it in hand and work the farm. At present the Land Commissioners have no power, without consent, to apply the principal of the Guarantee Fund to the redemption of capital loss in such a case.

(3.2.) THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): The hon. Member somewhat misunderstands the state of the law. Under the existing law, and under this Bill, it will not be possible for the Land Commissioners to sell a holding subject to a reduced annuity. It is therefore unnecessary to alter the Bill to meet such a case. If the Bill passes, the landlord will take his share of loss as represented by a diminished annuity. If the Land Bill (No. 2) passes there is a provision to enable the Land Commissioners to sell at a reduced rate and to make the landlord bear his share of the reduced annuities.

(3.3.) MR. KNOX: Then how is it that the Land Commissioners have actually sold holdings subject to a reduced annuity? Does the right hon. Gentleman contend that their action in such a case has been illegal?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: At the present moment I have no doubt that it is not competent for them to sell a holding subject to a reduced annuity. It is not necessary therefore to provide for a case which cannot arise.

MR. STOREY (Sunderland): I think the hon. Member for Northampton has made out a clear case of objecting to the principle of the Bill, but as the second clause only deals with the machinery of the measure I do not see that there is any necessity for prolonging the discussion upon it. But for matters in which I am privately concerned I should have been in my place earlier to oppose the principle of the Bill.

*(3.6.) MR. KEAY: I am unwilling to put the Committee to any unnecessary trouble, but I feel compelled to call pointed attention to the fact that the Chief Secretary has doggedly refused to say a word on the only question I raised in moving the rejection of the clause. I asked him what he means by this system of pressure on the localities, unless he means an incitement to boycott the defaulter, and the right hon. Gentleman, by his persistent silence, is himself the person who is prolonging the Debate. On every occasion on which I have brought forward what have been admitted to be important points, the right hon. Gentleman has refused doggedly to reply to them. He has just replied to my hon. Friend behind me (Mr. Knox), but he has made no reply to me. Under these circumstances, unless I can get the right hon. Gentleman to do his duty I do not see how I can avoid dividing the Committee.

THE CHAIRMAN put the Question, "That Clause 2, as amended, stand part of the Bill," and declared that the "Ayes" had it.

MR. LABOUCHERE: I rise to protest. I said "No" most distinctly.

THE CHAIRMAN: I thought the hon. Gentleman acquiesced.

MR. LABOUCHERE: No, Mr. Courtney.

Question again put.

(3.9.) The Committee divided:—Ayes 137; Noes 44.—(Div. List, No. 150.)

(3.20.) Clause 3 (Establishment of Guarantee Fund).

MR. SEXTON: I beg to move as a protest against the proposed guarantee an Amendment, which provides that "contingent" shall be substituted for "guarantee" fund. The clause provides for and defines a local guarantee to which, as the Chief Secretary knows, we are irroconcilably opposed. We protest against the guarantee, first because we think that, as this is an Imperial scheme, it ought to be founded on Imperial responsibility; secondly because the Government have means enough in their hands to make everything safe without a local guarantee; and thirdly because they have no right, against the will of the Representatives of Ireland, to pass a scheme which may ultimately have the effect of heavily mulcting the people of Ireland in reference to things over which they will have no control; and lastly because farmers who pay their own debts will be made liable for those of defaulting tenants. The Irish Members will take their objection at the proper time by voting against the clause. In the meantime the question before the Committee has reference to the details of the clause and the possible amendment of those details, and with the view of making substantial progress I have put down Amendments with the object of submitting an alternative scheme which I think worthy of consideration, and the acceptance of which will dispose of a great number of Amendments. In the first place I take issue with the right hon. Gentleman as to the division of the Guarantee Fund into contingent portions. It is an unreal distinction. All funds are equally "cash" and equally "contingent." The effect of taking the Probate Duty grants will be that the local rates in Ireland will have to be raised by £250,000, or on the average 8d. in the £1. I greatly doubt whether in the present condition of Ireland it can stand that augmentation of rates. I am willing that the Exchequer contribution should be taken at once and put into the Guarantee Fund, because it has not been definitely applied to any Public Service in Ireland, and existing arrangements would be disturbed. In the case of exceptional agricultural distress, the Reserve Fund could be applied to the relief of such distress. I therefore ask that in any year any default may be paid out of the Consolidated Fund, as a temporary advance, and that the local finance may not be deranged for that year by taking away the Probate Duty in anticipation of the default. At the end of the year, when it is known precisely what default has arisen, the actual loss to the Consolidated Fund could be recouped from the Probate Duty of the next year. For many years to come there could not possibly be a default exceeding the amount of the Exchequer contribution. The proposal does not conflict with any principle of the Bill or derange any of its machinery. Next, I take exception to the particular funds to be drawn upon in order to constitute the Guarantee Fund; and my Amendment substitutes alternative funds without effecting any alteration in the total capital sum. These alterations will, I believe, make the Bill more acceptable in Ireland. I propose to leave out of the clause as it now stands the sum paid for the care of the insane and the destitute sick poor in Ireland. These services must be continued whatever the cost may be. The Chief Secretary will admit that if an adequate substitute for this sum can be provided it ought to be provided. In place of it the Amendment substitutes the grants in aid of Queen's Colleges in Ireland. Primary education, after all, claims the attention of Parliament before University education, and if it were tolerable that the funds provided by Parliament for primary education should, even in theory, be hypothecated for the guarantee, there can be no objection to the hypothecation of the grants in aid of University education. Secondly, I propose to take, instead of the fund for the expenses of [the Commissioners of National Education in Ireland, the whole Votes for national education. If the right hon. Gentleman sees his way to accept my Amendment, which, in my judgment does not conflict with the principle of his Bill, I think he will find that the number of Amendments moved on the clause will be very greatly reduced.

Amendment proposed, in page 3, line 1, after the word "a" to insert the word "contingent."—(Mr. Sexton.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'contingent' be there inserted."

(3.43.) MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The right hon. Gentleman has with great lucidity explained the very important Amendment he has placed on the Paper, and let me say at once that of some of his remarks I entirely approve. His main reason for objecting to the retention of the cash portion, I understand to be this, that if it be retained, it will delay the distribution among various localities ultimately entitled to it, and the delay will disturb the whole course of local finance for a year. I think if that were the effect of the clause, there would be very substantial ground for his criticism. But the payment into the Guarantee Fund of the Irish Probate Duty grant would, unless that grant were required to meet the deficiency, involve the payment to the various authorities of the sums to which they are entitled. That is distinctly the interpretation put on the clause by the Government, and therefore the criticism of the hon. Gentleman falls to the ground. The hon. Gentleman asks me on what we base the distinction between the cash portion and the guarantee portion. I take it that it is very necessary that there should be in the hands of the Exchequer a certain amount of money, not necessarily to meet permanent default, but to meet temporary default. He has stated with truth that it is a serious matter to touch the contributions from the Imperial Exchequer with regard to pauper lunatics and the sick poor. He and I are agreed that it is scarcely conceivable that the securities which are antecedent to the contingent portion of the fund will not prove sufficient. He states that public opinion will be shocked even by seeing the amounts for pauper lunatics named as part of the contingent security, and he prefers that the money granted for the support of the Queen's Colleges and certain portions of the money now given for elementary education in Ireland should be included in the contingent portion of the fund. The principles which have governed our selection of the contingent portion of the fund have led to the exclusion by us of everything not purely local in its character. We think that neither the Queen's Colleges nor the salaries and expenses of the education officers in Dublin can properly be defined as local. Though it may be said that the Queen's Colleges are mainly of interest to the towns and localities in which they are situated, the officers connected with them in Dublin and the educational machinery are of interest equally to every county and the whole of Ireland. It is clear you cannot touch the salaries of civil servants, and the officers in the Central Office in Dublin are civil servants. The Queen's Colleges are situated in three cities in Ireland, two of which are excluded altogether from the operation of this Bill, namely, those in Cork and Belfast. The College in Galway supplies not only Galway but a large district, and persons even go from Ulster and Munster to take advantage of the grants given to the College. It would, therefore, be impossible to give the Colleges the local significance that is given to all the other funds we take for the guarantee. Moreover, the professors of the Queen's Colleges are civil servants, and I find they come under the Minute of the Superannuation Department of the Treasury. So much for the alteration the hon. Gentleman desires to make in the substantial constituents of the contingent portion of the Guarantee Fund. Now, as to what he has said as to the order in which the grants should be taken, we can have no special objection to the alteration he proposes; but I think he is under a misapprehension. He seems to think that the order in which these various matters are mentioned in the clause governs the order in which the funds will be seized for the purpose of meeting default; but as a matter of fact, the order will depend upon the rules.

MR. SEXTON: I am aware of that, but I desire in my Amendments to indicate the order.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: If the hon. Member has strong views on the point, and is fortified by the views of the Committee, I do not know that the Government need entertain any serious objection. In regard to labourers' cottages, I think we ought to move cautiously in the matter. No use whatever has been made of the money placed to the credit of certain counties, especially in the North of Ireland. I have a full Report of what has been done, and I gather from it that that is the case. To add another £40,000 to the Labourers' Cottages Fund, especially when unaccompanied by qualifying conditions in Clause 2, would be a very serious matter. As the hon. Member knows, I am entirely in accord with him in urgently desiring to see the agricultural labourers of Ireland better housed, but it would be disastrous to localities to build in them labourers' cottages which are not required by the necessities of the case. I am unwilling to hastily accept the proposal.

(3.59.) MR. SEXTON: I have no desire that an undue number of labourers' cottages should be built in Ireland, but I think the money should be so applied in cases where bond fide agricultural labourers pay excessive rents for miserable hovels, which are a disgrace to civilisation and destructive of the health of their occupants. I am quite willing to fall in with any arrangement or provision to prevent the misapplication of funds; but if a proper authority in Ireland should think that the money might be wisely spent in the direction I have referred to, I think it should be done.

(4.1.) MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I think the suggestion of the hon. Member, as I understand him, would involve a serious departure from the clause, which merely deals with the funds which have been captured, so to speak, and are already destined to certain uses. The hon. Member proposes to alter the destination of funds, already appropriated in a particular direction.

MR. SEXTON: That is hardly the case, for the Exchequer contribution has not yet been definitely applied to any purpose. The case is open, and I wish to define what it shall be.

(4.2.) COLONEL NOLAN: If I thought there was even the slightest chance of the fund for medical officers and the kindred funds ever being called on I should regard the Bill as doing more harm than good. But I do not believe that. I believe these things are put in to give a general notion of security to the English electors. [Laughter.] Yes, I look on them as unnecessary, but I do not object to their insertion as I am confident they will never be reached. As to the Queen's Colleges, it would be very hard if the Galway College were taken and the other two were left out. I should vote against the Galway College being made a cock-shy of under this Bill. So far as I understand the proposal of the hon. Gentleman the Member for West Belfast this sum should accumulate instead of being distributed each year, and should then be handed over to the Labourers' Cottages Fund, while in the Bill it is proposed that the money shall be distributed in the first place for labourers' cottages, wherever they are wanted.

MR. SEXTON: No, no.

COLONEL NOLAN: Under the Bill as amended in the second clause.

MR. SEXTON: No.

COLONEL NOLAN: That is my construction of the matter.

MR. SEXTON: The second clause deals with a different fund.

COLONEL NOLAN: The £40,000 a year the hon. Member wishes to vote for labourers' cottages in places where they are required, some of it to go to Unions where they are not required. Well, the Labourers' Act as at present drawn is of very little use. If the Act were drawn so that you could repair and build cottages for the small tenants it would be useful; but as it stands at present the only use is to create an artificial class of tenants to compete with the small tenants—to build houses for competitors of the small tenants at great expense. Wherever the cottages are not required the money should go in aid of the local rates.

*(4.6.) MR. MAHONY (Meath, N.): From his observations I gather that the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary is not disinclined to make concessions on this point, especially as the £40,000, if not required for the purpose of erecting labourers' cottages, will go as proposed in relief of taxation. The substantial matter in the Amendment of the hon. Member for West Belfast is founded on his fear that the financial arrangement come to will be disarranged by the payment to the Guarantee Fund, and I understand that the Chief Secretary thinks the Bill is drawn in such a way that this disarrangement will not take place. It appears to me that the objection of my hon. Friend would be met if the Chief Secretary would agree to these words—

“The cash portion of the Guarantee Fund, so far as it is not required at the date of its payment into that fund in any financial year, shall be forthwith applied as follows.”

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The hon. Member is only referring to the Probate Duty grant.

*MR. MAHONY: Certainly. The right hon. Gentleman seems to think that the Bill will secure what we want without Amendment, but we are in doubt about it.

(4.8.) MR. SEXTON: As the matter stands at present I cannot accept the statement of the Chief Secretary that there is no danger of the funds being withheld. It is provided that the Probate Duty grant shall be paid into the fund each year, there to await default if on the year's financial transactions default is found to exist. It is evident that the Probate Duty will remain in the fund a year, waiting to see if there is default, but what I want is that this money should be paid as at present, and then, at the end of the year, if there is a default, that the necessary amount should be taken out of the fund for the next year. In this way the Local Services in Ireland would not be interfered with. In regard to the order in which the items should stand, though the matter is not one of great practical importance, I think that in Acts of Parliament we should have regard to seamliness.

(4.9.) MR. LABOUCHERE: I shall have a difficulty in voting for the Amendment of the hon. Member for West Belfast, because, although I think that in some respects it is an excellent one, it seems to put the cart before the horse. The first point to decide is whether we should call upon the Irish to incur this liability, and when that has been settled by a decision of the House, we should go into matters of detail such as are raised by my hon. Friend. As I take objection to the principle, I am not prepared to vote that there should be any sort of Guarantee Fund of this nature. In the first place, I do not see anyone present who could pledge what are 'practically the local rates of Ireland.

COLONEL NOLAN: Why should we not pledge them?

MR. LABOUCHERE: The hon. Member belongs to a small and unimportant section of the Irish Members, who would find it quite impossible to pledge themselves, even if backed by the hon. Member for Meath. I gather that my hon. Friend the Member for West Belfast does not recognise the principle of pledging the local rates, which is in direct opposition to the views of the majority of the National Party. Therefore, we have no guarantee that these local rates, if the tenants do not pay, will stand between the British taxpayer and their liability. No one has any right to pledge those rates, and the Representatives of Parliament have received no mandate from their constituents to pledge the local rates for this particular purpose. It depends upon the inhabitants of the locality what shall be done with the rates. The Chief Secretary is one of those generous gentlemen who spend for their own objects moneys that do not belong to them. The whole thing is an utter sham. The object was to find £1,200,000 in order to persuade the British taxpayer that if merely that was capitalised there would be something really tangible which would prevent any liability falling upon him owing to the pledge that he gave. I need not say that is all nonsense. I regard these different items of the Reserve Fund in the same light as the fine crusted port, or the Old Masters, or the paving stones that the usurer tries to palm off upon some silly person who falls into his hands, and calls them "cash." I hope the House does not accept seriously the fact that there is an additional security standing between the British taxpayer and this liability, owing to these particular rates. Take the rates for education, lunatics, or medical officers. You cannot alienate them or you would stop the Local Government of Ireland. I have heard of a savage ruler who kept wild and fierce animals caged, ready to be let loose upon the people if they did not pay. Here you are to have the lunatics turned loose upon Ireland. You know perfectly well that nothing of the kind will occur. No House of Commons would incur the responsibility of interfering with the care of lunatics, with education, or with medical officers. If such a proposal as this were made for England there would be an uproar. I really could not vote for the Amendment of my hon. Friend. I suggest that he withdraw it, and allow us to vote upon the Amendment to leave out "the cash and contingent." If we are beaten, as we shall be beaten, then we could go into details on these different guarantees.

*(4.25.) MR. KNOX: The object of my hon. Friend is to get something in the way of reasonable Amendment without pledging himself to the principle of local guarantees, which we object to in toto. I am afraid, the Chief Secretary having refused any concessions to my hon. Friend, that there is nothing for us but to fight this clause throughout; but I hope there is still some chance of the Government recognising the reasonableness of the course proposed by my hon. Friend. So far as I can understand the distinction between the "cash and contingent" funds, it is a distinction drawn for convenience of drafting, and the cash portion is not to be a cash portion at all, save in name. If this is so, it ought to be made clear, and words inserted to prevent the cash portion from being detained in the Guarantee Fund after it ought to be paid over to the Local Authorities. The Bill, as it now stands, leaving the order in which the contingent portion of the fund is to be called on in the discretion of the Lord Lieutenant, gives an amount of power to the Castle officials which the House ought not to repose in them, and the Amendment of my hon. Friend, I think, is infinitely preferable to the proposal of the Government. Then, as to the order in which the funds in the cash portion are to be called upon, we are not told whether the county percentage is to be used before calling upon the Probate Duty or the Exchequer Contribution. The Amendment of my hon. Friend is to enable the House to say which portion of the cash as well as contingent funds is to be taken first, second, or third. As the Bill is drafted it is impossible to know in which order the funds will be taken. In not accepting my hon. Friend's Amendment, it would seem that the Government are not anxious to facilitate the discussion of this matter, and we will, therefore, be compelled to fight the various portions of this clause.

(4.30.) MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have listened to the arguments in favour of the Amendment, and with some of them I agree, and I do not think there is any great difference between us. There are three matters on which I am prepared to give an answer to the hon. Gentleman. The first relates to the danger which the hon. Member fears if the Bill remains in its present state, and in order to meet his view I shall, on the Report stage, bring forward an Amendment with a view to securing that payment to the Local Authorities shall only be withheld if default was made antecedent to the day at which payment to the Local Authorities was due.

MR. SEXTON: Only the amount of the default.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Quite so. The second point to which the hon. Member called attention was as to the order in which the contingent portion of the fund is mentioned in the second sub-section. I have no objection to altering the order to meet his view, and, therefore, that will become a matter of practical politics. I do not think it is very material, but I defer to the voice of hon. Members opposite. The third point relates to labourers' cottages, and as to this my hon. Friend the Attorney General for Ireland has drawn up an Amendment which will come under sub-head A of Sub-section 2 of the clause. It will, I think, carry out the view of the hon. Member for West Belfast, though I cannot accept the Amendment which is on the Paper.

(4.35.) MR. SEXTON: I believe the right hon. Gentleman's promise effectually provides that there shall be no disturbance of the Local Service in Ireland by reason of the Local Guarantee Fund. The right hon. Gentleman also agrees to take the contingent securities in a different order. Of course I retain my objection to the principle of a local guarantee, but I am so sensible of the extent of the right hon. Gentleman's concessions that I will not press this Amendment, nor will I move the next Amendment.

(4.37.) MR. STOREY: My hon. Friend seems to be satisfied with very little. He must still, however, reckon with the fact that some of us in England object to this arrangement. As I understand the offer of the Secretary for Ireland it is this, that he promises not to dislocate Irish local finance by retaining the local Probate Duty in the future, except to the extent of the antecedent defaults. How does that differ from the words in the Bill? The words in the Bill at the present time mean this and this only. My hon. Friend has got no concession whatever.

MR. SEXTON: I think I have.

MR. STOREY: Well, when doctors disagree who shall settle the matter? I apply common sense to the clause and say that the concession which the Irish Secretary has made just now is precisely on all fours with the clause of the Bill as it stands. The right hon. Gentleman also makes a concession about cottages. He proposes that the Exchequer contribution, if not needed for the Guarantee Fund, shall be applied to the provision of labourers' cottages in the Irish counties. Under this concession you might have this condition of things, that actually there would be a necessity for money to meet some deficiency, and yet the deficiency could not be met because the money was being applied to the building of labourers' cottages. In other words, the money that was to secure English credit against default is to be applied to the building of labourers' cottages.

MR. SEXTON: It is only when every possible claim for deficiency has been met that the claim for labourers' cottages is to be made.

MR. STOREY: Well, if my hon. Friend is content with the provision, I have no reason to be otherwise. As to the Amendment to the whole clause, I was going to vote in favour of it because I thought it was better on the whole than the Government proposal; but I must say that both proposals seem to be very objectionable from my point of view. I cannot understand the methods of the Irish Secretary in this matter. He is proposing an Imperial scheme, actuated by great Imperial purposes, and for great Imperial ends, and then instead of proposing a Guarantee Fund out of the Imperial Exchequer he goes to Ireland and seeks in all the holes and corners of the land for petty sums in order to present them to us as possible guarantees. Why did he not go to the Chancellor of the Exchequer last night and say, "I have a great Imperial purpose to carry out in Ireland and it does not become a great nation like ours to go peddling about Ireland seeking for Guarantee Funds. Let me put down £1,000,000 right away and have a Guarantee Fund that will meet all contingencies." I do not say I should have voted for such a proposal; I must have voted against it; but I am looking at it from his point of view. He actually proposes that we should obtain guarantees from the funds applied to the maintenance of pauper lunatics, to the salaries of schoolmasters and masters of workhouses, to the cost of medicine for the sick poor, and so on. When we say, "You do not mean to tell us that any Government would be mean enough to take this money and allocate it as proposed in the Bill," what does he say? When it was suggested that to take the Irish Probate Duty grant would be to dislocate local finance, the right hon. Gentleman said "The localities will not suffer by our keeping the Probate Duty." Why will they not suffer? If he keeps it they must suffer. If they will not suffer he does not propose to take it at all.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The hon. Gentleman has quite mistaken my meaning.

MR. STOREY: I am sorry if I have mistaken his meaning, but that is certainly how I viewed the matter. What answer did he make when it was suggested it would be shabby to take the money for pauper lunatics, and so forth? He said it was scarcely conceivable that the antecedent guarantees would not be sufficient. Quite so; and if the antecedent guarantees are sufficient, why does he come before the House and the public, and put in small make-shifts of guarantees which he never means to realise? My feeling about this clause is simply this: I would have voted with much more willingness for a Bill to create a peasant proprietary in Ireland if there had been a Ministry that had boldly come forward and said "We are going to do this thing because it is a national thing, and we are going to do it in a national way." But when, in addition to a proposal from which I dissent, the Government come to the House, and in this peculiar way of theirs suggest to the British public all sorts of guarantees, when they know they are not real and tangible guarantees, I must say they add meanness to that policy, and it is my duty to oppose this clause and any succeeding clause which gives effect to it.

(4.48.) MR. SEXTON: I should like to move the next Amendment formally, so as to have it on record, and then to ask leave to withdraw it.

Amendment proposed,

In page 3, line 1, to leave out all after "Fund," to end of Clause, and insert "consisting of the following sums to be paid into the Fund, in the order stated, if and when and to the extent required in pursuance of this Act in any financial year:—

- (i.) the Exchequer contribution hereinafter mentioned and the reserve fund constituted thereout;
- (ii.) the Irish Probate Duty Grant;
- (iii.) the Irish share of the Local Taxation (Customs and Excise) Duties Grant; and
- (iv.) the following local grants, that is to say, the grants—
 - (a.) for rates and contributions in lieu of rates on Government property in Ireland;
 - (b.) in aid of the maintenance of the Queen's College in Ireland;
 - (c.) to defray the expenses of national education in Ireland; and
 - (d.) in aid of industrial schools in Ireland.

(2.) A sum of forty thousand pounds (in this Act described as the Exchequer contribution) shall in every financial year be paid out of the Consolidated Fund, and the said sum shall be carried to a reserve fund until the sum of two hundred thousand pounds has been so carried; and so far as it is not required for that purpose shall be paid, in the same proportion as if it were the part of the Irish probate duty grant divisible between boards of guardians of the poor in Ireland, to the said boards to be applied in providing labourers' cottages under the Labourers' (Ireland) Acts 1883 to 1886.

(3) The guarantee fund shall be under the direction of the Treasury. (Mr. Sexton.)

Question proposed, "That the words 'That under the direction of the Treasury' stand part of the Clause."

*(4.50.) MR. MAHONY: I quite agree with the hon. Member for Sunderland (Mr. Storey) in his objection to the use of Irish credit, but we have already had discussed that subject on Clause 1, and I do not see what useful purpose can be secured by re-opening the matter on Clause 3. We could urge special objections against many of these forms of guarantees, but the Chief Secretary has, on the whole, made very substantial concessions. I hope we shall quickly come to a decision. I, personally, do not intend to move any of the Amendments which stand in my name.

(4.51.) COLONEL NOLAN: At present a portion of the Probate Duty is devoted to Poor Law purposes. It is to be put into the cash account, and then to overflow to the Poor Law Unions. Am I to understand that until there is a deficiency caused by some tenant not paying, the Poor Law Unions will not only receive the same sum as now, but receive it quickly?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Yes; that is substantially the intention.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

*(4.52.) MR. KEAY: My hon. Friend the Member for Meath has just told us he does not intend to move any of his Amendments, and would lead us to believe that in his judgment the fight, so far as the Irish Members are concerned, is all over. But I understand that, on the contrary, the fight has to begin upon my Amendment. I view this Amendment from a financial point of view, and I may add from a British point of view. I do not intend to enter into the question of the incidence of the alleged Irish guarantees on Irish social and political life, but to speak of them as a security, as a form of protection, to the British taxpayer. I decline to recognise them or to have anything to do with them as a security, unless they fulfil one necessary condition. A Guarantee Fund is only created, and ought only to be created, for one honest object. There should be grouped together funds of a class or classes which can be easily and readily arrested for the purpose of covering any default which may have been made. I hold strongly that this Guarantee Fund is useless, because you cannot collect it when you want it. I do not now propose to leave out both the cash and contingent portions of the Guarantee Fund; but only the latter portion. I consider the collection or retention, or interception of the cash portion of the Guarantee Fund for the purpose of meeting a default to be a conceivable supposition; but I hold it to be altogether inconceivable that local grants in aid of local purposes could possibly be intercepted. It is not without reason that all these ridiculous claims are going to be made upon the Irish localities by Her Majesty's Government. The reason of it all is, that under the construction of this Bill, for every £40,000 which they can get swept into the Guarantee Fund they can lend another million sterling to their hungry friends the landlords. I propose to retain the cash portion in the fund, and to move to omit the contingent portion. The financial effect of that will be this: The cash portion comes in round numbers to about £300,000 a year. According to the Government scheme the amount of the Bill will be 25 times £300,000, in other words it will be about 7½ millions. Each of the Ashbourne Acts was put forward with £5,000,000 only in it, and I think that if the cash portion is reserved, and if 25 times that portion is capitalised and paid over to the landlords, it is quite enough to carry out the real purpose of the Government, which is to furnish ample funds to their own immediate friends and supporters among the Irish landlords. I, therefore, move the Amendment which stands in my name.

(4.58.) MR. LABOUCHERE: On a point of Order. I have an Amendment to leave out the contingent portion to which I think there are greater objections.

*MR. KEAY: Perhaps I had better let the words stand.

Amendment proposed, in page 3, line 2, to leave out the words "consisting of a cash portion and a contingent portion."
—(Mr. Keay.)

Question proposed, "That the words 'consisting of a cash portion' stand part of the clause."

*(4.59.) MR. SHAW LEFEVRE (Bradford, Central): I could not vote for omitting the words "the cash portion," but I should be prepared to vote for leaving out "the contingent portion." I do not think it would be possible, under any circumstances, for the Government to withhold the funds which go to the ratepayers in respect of criminal lunatic asylums and education. Therefore, I suggest that the hon. Gentleman should withdraw his Amendment, and allow the hon. Member for Northampton to move his Amendment.

THE CHAIRMAN: I put the question in such a way so as to save the subsequent Amendment.

(5.0.) MR. LABOUCHERE: I object to both portions, but I object to them on different grounds. My reason for objecting to the cash portion, is that it is practically a fund which is obtained from Ireland itself. The proposal as to the cash portion is an attack upon the rights of the localities, and Irish localities have the same rights as any localities in England. According to the Budget last night, Ireland is to receive certain sums. We should have no right to take it away from Ireland unless we withdrew it equally from England. We could acquire that right if we were able to say that the Members for Ireland had a distinct mandate from their constituents; but I do not understand them to pretend that they have that mandate to give it up absolutely. In fact they say just the reverse. And again, it is impossible to tell whether Ireland will continue to contribute this £40,000 for 49 years. We have just read a second time a Sunday Closing Bill for the country, and it may be that some day we shall pass a Bill closing the licensed houses on every other day as well. It may be that Ireland may not drink whisky for 49 years. Yet by this we are pledging them to go on drinking it for all these years. Surely the hon. Member for South Tyrone will not assent to that. He is continually going about the country, urging the Irish not to drink whisky, and thus provide the money; and yet, if he supports this proposal, he will be calmly hypothecating the money obtained from the consumption of whisky for the next 49 years. I say we are not entitled to pledge this money. It is money obtained for the Irish people, and they have a right to it; and we cannot, by the mere fact of its passing through our hands, lay hold of it and hypothecate it without the clear and distinct assent of the large majority of the Irish Members.

(5.5.) The Committee divided:—Ayes 185; Noes 113.—(Div. List, No. 151.)

(5.16.) MR. LABOUCHERE: I am anxious, consistently with my duty, to get on with the business as speedily as possible. I have already expressed my views in regard to this Guarantee Fund, and can consequently abbreviate my observations on the specific Amendment which I now rise to propose. As I said just now, we are opposed to the cash portion, although 'something plausible might be said in its favour; but we are still more opposed to the contingent portion. I would ask the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary a question with regard to this matter: What is his position in relation to it? This contingent portion would be used as a cover in the event of the tenants not paying their rents. We will suppose that they do not pay; we will suppose that a strike has taken place; or we will take the case of a combination of persons who declare that if they do pay the annuities they will be absolutely ruined. It may be that produce has fallen greatly in value or that the harvest has been a very bad one. What would the Chief Secretary do? Would he use this Contingent Fund or not? If he uses it, what would be the result? First, the locality would have to double its rates, because the Imperial contribution would be no longer available. And if they could not get the rates in, the lunatics would have to be released, no medicine would be provided for the sick poor, nor would there be any other relief for them; and if the non-payment of the annuities arises from the fall in the value of produce, how can it be expected that the people will be able to pay a double rate. The probability is they will be unable to pay a single rate. You say that the taxpayers of Great Britain are guaranteed from any possible liability because you impose a double rate at the very moment that the people to whose interest it is to pay the annuities are absolutely unable to do so. I maintain that you cannot do it. I say that the people would not agree to the imposition of this double rate, and if they refuse to pay, what will the Chief Secretary then do? It is humanly possible that the value of produce may fall to such a point as to make impossible the payment of the annuities, and it may be that the people, holding that the rates are already sufficiently heavy, will refuse to pay more. That the Chief Secretary will be face to face with the fact that he must let loose the lunatics and stop all poor relief, I say it will be impossible for him to do that. A Government has certain primary responsibilities and one of those responsibilities is providing for the sick poor and for lunatics. It cannot hypothecate money which is intended for such purposes, and therefore I assert that this proposal is merely an attempt to throw dust in the eyes of the British taxpayers; it is, so far as the lunatics are concerned, a lunatic proposal from beginning to end. Both the Chief Secretary and the Chancellor of the Exchequer know perfectly well that this guarantee is utterly and absolutely illusory; it has been introduced in order to keep apparent faith with the pledges on which they and their followers secured their seats at the last General Election—the pledges that the English taxpayer should incur no sort of liability in connection with land purchase in Ireland. It is only fair we should have a clear understanding with the Chief Secretary. Would he under any or all circumstances insist on this rate being levied? Would he send his police and his bayonets to levy it? Would he, in the event of its non-payment, let loose the lunatics and the paupers, and would he stop all education? I await his reply. I do not anticipate that that reply would do away with the necessity for my taking a Division on this Amendment, but still, I am always open to argument, and if the right hon. Gentleman can prove to me that I am in the wrong I shall be glad to go over to his side.

Amendment proposed, in page 3, lines 2 and 3, to leave out the words "and a contingent portion."—(Mr. Labouchere.)

Question proposed, "That the words 'and a contingent portion' stand part of the Clause."

(5 24.) MR. A. J. BALFOUR: This question has been discussed whenever the general principles of the Bill have been raised, and, therefore, I need not discuss it again to-day. In answer to the hon Member, however, I may say that I do regard the guarantee as a real guarantee, and I shall, if necessary, enforce it. I am not obliged to contemplate such extreme possibilities as those presented by the hon. Member. If such catastrophes as the hon. Member has pictured occurred anywhere in the British Islands, the Parliament of the day would no doubt take measures to cope with them. The Bill deals, as every Bill must do, with probabilities, and there is no probability of the Contingent Fund being called upon, or, if it were, of the local taxation being difficult to enforce. The hon. Member has spoken of letting loose all lunatics and withdrawing aid from the poor. He must know that, the care of lunatics and poor is not a duty of the central Government, but essentially one of the locality, and that the grants from the Exchequer are given only to aid the locality in carrying them out. I think I have covered the points raised by the hon. Member. I do not suppose I shall be fortunate enough to convince him, but I hope I have said sufficient to indicate the views of the Government and to prove to the Committee that this is a real guarantee.

*(5.26.) MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: I agree with the Chief Secretary that this question has been argued before, and therefore I do not propose to take up the time of the House in discussing it again. But, at the same time, I think that the question is too important to be allowed to pass without a protest. I do not agree with the Chief Secretary that the words in question are a fundamental part of the Bill. I think, on the contrary, that they could be omitted without detriment to the measure. There is a great distinction to be drawn between the cash portion and the contingent portion. I hold that under no possible circumstances could a Government withhold contributions for lunatic asylums and for the education of paupers, nor for any other purpose mentioned in the contingent portion of the Guarantee Fund, nor would the fear of such funds being withheld supply an inducement to the payment of the instalments. This part of the Bill is entirely illusory, and affords no real guarantee to the taxpayer. I shall therefore vote for the Amendment.

(5.30.) MR. M. J. KENNY (Tyrone, Mid): I have the strongest possible objection to this proposal to seize and impound local rates without the consent of the locality affected. I say that there is no power in existence in Ireland at the present time which is competent to pledge its own credit, and I do not think any Member for an Irish constituency would venture to support this proposal before his own constituents. Neither do I believe that any considerable body of the Irish people would be found to approve it; I doubt if even the constituents of the Attorney General for Ireland would sanction it. I quite admit that the Chief Secretary has improved his proposal by offering to re-cast the order in which the securities may be impounded. The grant to pauper lunatics would be fifth now instead of second on the list, and that is a material improvement. At the same time, I do not think it would be impossible to realise the securities. I think they might be realised, and the maximum of local inconvenience and irritation caused thereby. Although the Chief Secretary says it is the duty of a locality to provide for its paupers and lunatics, I must remind him that for many years the Imperial Government has assisted in the task both in England and in Ireland, and it would be very hard now to withdraw the grants in aid. Anyone who has knowledge of agricultural life in Ireland knows that the rates and taxes are already equivalent to the rent, and if, by the withdrawal of the Imperial grant, the burden were increased, the farmers would be taxed beyond their means. While the Lord Lieutenant might succeed in levying for the county cess, such a storm would be raised as would be extremely awkward for the Government of the day, and it would not conduce to the satisfactory working of the Land Purchase Bill.

*(5.35.) MR. WEBB (Waterford, W.): This is a Bill of complicated details, many of which require special ability for their discussion; but the point we are now considering stands out clearly enough, and I think every Member who represents an Irish constituency should join in the protest against this proposal, and support the Amendment. My support is given on entirely different grounds to those upon which one hon. Member gives his support. He opposes the clause because he thinks the guarantee is illusory, and that the risk must eventually fall upon the English taxpayer. I am not so credulous as to agree to put our names on the back of a Bill, satisfied with the assurance that it is merely a matter of form, and no liability attaches to it. We are called upon to give this guarantee, and the resources of the locality will be absolutely pledged. Since I entered this House, I have had forced upon my attention the humiliating position that Ireland occupies in our Parliamentary system, but never have I felt this more keenly than in having this clause forced upon my country against the unanimous wish of Irish Representatives. This Bill was introduced with a great flourish of trumpets as a generous measure of assistance for the pacification of the country by the use of British money and credit. It was kept out of sight that our own resources were to be pledged to carry out this Imperial measure. It cannot be too often repeated, it should be thoroughly understood, that to obtain this benefit supposed to be extended from Imperial resources we are called upon to pledge the grants to our asylums, the salaries of our schoolmasters and schoolmistresses, the medical assistance to our poor, the salaries of officers under the Public Health Act, the maintenance of our children in Industrial Schools. I hope a strong protest will be made against the unfairness of the proposal.

*(5.39.) MR. ESSLEMONT (Aberdeen, E.): I have no wish to protract the discussion to any length, but, looking at this question from a Scotch point of view, I am bound to say I do not hold the same views in regard to land purchase as those held by the hon. Member for Northampton. I have not much to say against the principle of land purchase, but my action has been very much guided by what I have heard by the hon. Member for South Tyrone (Mr. T. W. Russell). He, in discussion, has admitted absolutely that if a locality were consulted, the locality would not agree to the purchase of land under existing circumstances. I understand that the terms of purchase will be forced upon the tenants in the interest of the landlords, and a Local Authority, whose resources are to be appropriated as security for payment, would not sanction the terms of purchase. Here the question arises in its barest form. We are told by the large majority of Irish Members that they will not consent to this security. I quite agree with the hon. Member for Northampton that this security is illusory. I am of opinion that it never could be enforced, and probably there will never be the need to enforce it. But that is not the point of my objection. I am not opposed to land purchase in the interest of the tenant, but an objectionable feature of this Bill is, that under its provisions the purchase money will be higher than would be sanctioned if the opinion of the Local Authorities were taken into account as to the securities to be given. This is not denied by the hon. Member for South Tyrone, or anybody else, and so far as we are concerned, and looking upon this as a precedent for land purchase in Scotland—a precedent we shall use in favour of land purchase in Scotland—

SIR G. CAMPBELL (Kirkcaldy, &c.): No, no.

*MR. ESSLEMONT: Notwithstanding the protest of my hon. Friend I, as representing a Scottish agricultural constituency, say that this precedent of buying out Irish landlords will at some time be used, and the Government of the day will find it hard to resist the claim from Scotland under certain circumstances. But I know I stand on a very different platform to some of my colleagues in this matter. I deprecate in the strongest terms as an insult to Local Authorities in Scotland or elsewhere that they should not be consulted at all as to the security they are called upon to give. I am sure the people of Ireland, or of Scotland, in view of the demand for land, would agree that the utmost value should be given compatible with good security, without undue risk. We have before us a very important issue. It is idle to say, after we by a majority have said to Local Authorities, "You shall not be consulted in any way, but we shall keep these grants for local purposes, for education and for the maintenance of your poor, for the security of payment for the land"—it is not to be expected, I say, that these Local Authorities will not resist such action. I do not think they would be doing their duty if they did not refuse to give up these taxes. We in Scotland should resist these local taxes being taken from us against our will, and as it would be in Scotland, so I think it must be in Ireland. Let our friends show whether they believe in the justice of the claim for local government in Ireland. I have no wish to detain the Committee in this discussion of Irish matters, but, apart from Ireland, I wish to protest against a disregard of Local Authority over local funds.

*(5.46.) MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.): I do not pretend to any special liking for this form of security in the contingent Guarantee Fund, but the matter presents itself to my mind in this way: The people of Ireland, generally speaking, desire a land purchase measure such as is now before us. There can be no question about that, because Members who resisted land purchase as proposed in the Ashbourne Act have been forced to yield to the pressure of their constituents and support this Bill. Therefore, I take it that the Irish people desire that this Land Purchase Bill should pass. Although, as I say, I have no liking for this form of security, I come to ask how is land purchase to be effected without some security for the money advanced? Surely the Members below the Gangway do not mean to affirm that the nation is going to hand over some £33,000,000 without any security at all?

MR. LABOUCHERE: That is what the Bill proposes.

*MR. T. W. RUSSELL: It is quite true that in the two Ashbourne Acts there was no security for the £10,000,000 save the land itself and the guarantee deposit of the landlord, but what has taken place since those Acts were passed? Why are the securities in the present case set up? Because of what has since been going on in three out of the four provinces of Ireland. The teaching which has been given to the farmers in those three provinces is now coming home to roost, and guarantees are now required by the British people which would never have been thought of but for the experience of the past seven or eight years in the South and West of Ireland. The matter, therefore, stands thus—we must accept a Land Purchase Bill with these securities, or we shall get no Bill of the kind at all, and I am bound to say that I would not dare to face my constituents if I had refused the Bill with the securities proposed. I deny that Ireland is unanimous as to these guarantees. Ireland is not unanimous, and the Division will show that. Ireland will reap the benefit of land purchase, and it is not asking too much that Ireland should pledge her local securities to secure that benefit. When we find two parties opposing this provision, one declaring that this local guarantee is not required and the other that it is altogether illusory, I say let them come to some general agreement before they assail this fundamental part of the proposal.

(5.50.) MR. STOREY: I do not wonder to hear the hon. Gentleman say he does not like this guarantee. I put it to his sense of justice, if there be a guarantee, from whom does it come?

*MR. T. W. RUSSELL: From the Irish people.

MR. STOREY: Does my hon. Friend say that this clause contains any guarantee from the Irish people? In this Contingent Fund are not the main proceeds of Customs and Excise Duties obtained mainly from the people in the towns drinking more liquor than before?

*MR. T. W. RUSSELL: There are very few towns in Ireland.

MR. STOREY: That does not destroy my argument. As a matter of fact, a much larger amount is drawn from the people in the towns as compared with the contributions from the rural districts. What advantage is it to the people in the towns to have this Land Purchase Bill passed? What advantage is it to the people of Belfast or Dublin that a certain number of farmers in the rural parts of Ireland are to be singled out to become landowners? Not only upon the districts concerned, but upon the people in Dublin, Belfast, Londonderry, Limerick, Cork, and all the towns do you call to contribute their portion of the guarantee that the State may be secured from loss. Is that fair?

*MR. T. W. RUSSELL: Yes.

MR. STOREY: I think it is utterly unfair and unjust, and therefore I oppose the clause. Now, let us look at this guarantee. We have been jibed at because we have called it illusory, but I repeat it is illusory to the extent of absurdity. If there should be any deficiency, if there should be need to call up the guarantee, is there any Government that would take from the Local Authority sums now applied to the support of pauper lunatics and other purposes and use them to make up the deficiency in the Land Purchase Fund? Everybody knows what would happen. Should there be such a deficiency the Government of the day will come to us and say, "We admit that under the letter of the arrangement we ought to refuse Local Authorities these grants, but in decency and in our conscience we cannot do this; it would not be consonant with our duty to do this, and therefore we ask for some other guarantee and the advance of the cash by Parliament to meet this deficiency." Now, I submit to my hon. Friend the Member for South Tyrone—who is a logician outside the House, if he is not in the House—would it not be more honourable and statesmanlike to at once make it an Imperial guarantee entirely, and not put forward this illusory local guarantee? Take the next item, is it possible to withhold the salaries of the schoolmasters of Ireland in order to enable a limited number of farmers to become owners of land in Ireland? Will you appropriate the salaries of the medical officers, or say that the sick poor in Ireland shall not have the medicines now provided at the cost of the State, because the landlords must be paid out, handing over their land to the tenants on certain terms? I will not go through the items, they all hang together, they are of the same mean description. If you carry this land purchase scheme for Ireland, how can you resist a claim for other parts of the Kingdom on the same basis? I am not saying that I would make such a proposition. Anyone who opposes it for Ireland may consistently oppose it for Scotland or England; but how, when such a claim is made, can you consistently refuse it, having established this precedent? It is because we think this guarantee is illusory, and if not illusory most unfair and unjust, we oppose it. Take the case of any county in Ireland, where there are, say, 5,000 tenant farmers. Of these you turn 1,000 into owners, leaving the other 4,000 still in the condition of tenants; besides you have all the trading class, the grazing farmers, and what there is of the professional class, and a number of other people following various occupations, and because 1,000 men have been singled out to receive a particular benefit at the hands of the State you propose that all the other ratepayers shall become guarantees for the minority who are to receive the benefit. Well, all I can say is that hon. Gentlemen opposite must be much duller than I know they are if they do not see the logical conclusion to which a policy of this sort may be pushed. Can you confine the claim to those and a few of those who occupy farms? History repeats itself; and, just as in Imperial Rome, 2,000 years ago, the agrarian question reacted on the occupation of tenements among the working-classes in towns, so may you have the principle agitated, not only for the occupiers of land in England and Scotland, but for the urban population. Having regard to the possible consequences that may flow from such a precedent, we oppose this clause.

(6.0.) MR. P. J. POWER (Waterford, E.): There is much of this Bill complicated and technical in character; but one thing comes out clearly: that it will be more beneficial to landlords than former Land Purchase Bills. This was to be expected, and from their point of view the Government would naturally assist their friends in Ireland. With regard to the danger of repudiation which the hon. Member for South Tyrone sees ahead, I believe there will be nothing of the kind. There is no danger of the Irish people repudiating an engagement they have entered into, providing the bargain is a fair one and freely entered into. But what does this Bill propose? It proposes to provide the means whereby a certain number of tenants may become owners of their farms. But the amount placed at the disposal of the Commissioners will not allow of more than one out of every four tenants becoming owners, and the others, together with all the ratepayers in town and country, are to become security for the defalcations that may arise, though they have no voice in allowing the transactions. Now, I object to such a proposal; it is against any principle of fair play and contrary to the accepted principle that representation should accompany taxation. The Chief Secretary repudiates any right of Local Government to the Irish people; he throws over the principle of representation, and I never heard a more gratuitously insulting observation than that used the other night by the right hon. Gentleman when he said that the elected bodies were the repudiated bodies. If these bargains are fairly made there will be no repudiation of engagements, and the working of the Ashbourne Act proves the truth of my assertion; but without the safeguard of local sanction, there is the greatest danger of tenants acting under duress being forced into unfair bargains. I shall certainly support the Amendment of my hon. Friend.

(6.5.) SIR G. CAMPBELL: I confess I am somewhat in a dilemma as to giving my vote. When I find Irish Members assisting the Government to pass Clauses 1 and 2 to secure the advance of these £30,000,000, then I confess I do not like to go into the Lobby with them to shake off these local obligations. If I thought it would get rid of a real local guarantee, I would vote in favour of retaining it. The hon. Member who has just spoken expressed his belief that his countrymen would not repudiate a bargain fairly entered into; but who is to judge of the fairness? Is there not a danger that Irish farmers may hereafter say they were coerced into these contracts; and as they are not fair, they will not carry out their obligations? I am unwilling to advance the money at all, but I should prefer to have some Irish guarantee for repayment. But I am impressed with the belief that this contingent guarantee is an illusion, and is merely intended to throw dust in the eyes of the British taxpayer to induce him to assent to a Bill which he would never agree to if it were put forward in its naked form of British security only. Under the circumstances, and believing as I do that this contingent guarantee is utterly worthless, I think I cannot do better than vote against it, in so doing endeavouring to put the Bill before the electors in its naked hideousness, showing that we are really going to make these advances without any real security whatever. I object to the principle of the Bill, for I believe it is unnecessary, and that the Act of 1881, properly administered, is sufficient. I shall vote for the Amendment, for the idea that there is any security in this contingent guarantee is altogether a delusion.

(6.10.) DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid): The provisions of this landlord's recuperation Bill are of so highly technical a character that it is difficult for anyone but an experienced legal man to deal with them. We have now, however, arrived at a most important point touching the contingent guarantee—the guarantee which is to be exacted from the Irish people without any expression of Irish opinion with regard to it—and, as one who represents an important constituency in the province of Munster, I cannot consent to give a silent vote. This guarantee is worthless, or it is valuable. If it is worthless, I perfectly understand the proposal to strike it out. If it is not worthless, I want to hear some expression of opinion from gentlemen opposite with regard to it. Are the unfortunate lunatics of Ireland to be turned loose without any sort of care or attention being paid to them? I can conceive nothing more unworthy of even a Tory Administration. The poor children are to go untaught, and the expenses of medical officers and the cost of medicine and surgical appliances are to be sacrificed. What a pretty kettle of fish you will have in Ireland if this guarantee is called upon! If there is any possibility of such a thing happening, no English or Scottish Member can, with a clear conscience, go home to his constituency and say he has voted in favour of such a measure. Either the Government have made a mistake in imposing this guarantee at all, or else they should have acted on some other principle so as to avoid the most fatal error into which they have fallen. I maintain that no Irish Member will be doing his duty at the present time if he does not attempt to alter this proposal, or to obtain some highly satisfactory answer from the right hon. Gentleman.

(6.15.) MR. SEXTON: I must strenuously object to the insertion of this local guarantee; first, because it seems to me unconstitutional in its character; and secondly, because, if it is over exacted, it will be most oppressive to the people of Ireland. I shall not repeat the arguments I have already used on the subject.

Ayes 196; Noes 113. — (Div. List, No. 152.)

(6.28.) MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I beg to move the Amendment which stands in my name.

Amendment proposed, in page 3, line 3, after "shall," insert "in addition to the county percentage."—(Mr. A. J. Balfour.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

Mr. E. ROBERTSON (Dundee): I should like to have some explanation of this Amendment.

Mr. A. J. BALFOUR: It is purely consequential on the alterations made in Clause 2, in deference to the hon. Member opposite.

Mr. KNOX:* I should like to know precisely what the Amendment means. There is absolutely no provision in the Bill now to say what portion of the fund, whether cash or contingent, the county percentage is to go to.

*(6.29.) THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. MADDEN, Dublin University): As the Bill was drafted, the county percentage went as part of the Irish Probate grant, and thus into the cash portion of the Guarantee Fund. This has been modified, and those words are intended to make it clear that the percentage is still to be paid into the cash portion of the fund.

Mr. SEXTON: I think it would be better if the Amendment were inserted in Sub-head 2.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment proposed, in page 3, line 5, after "fund," add "the Irish Probate Duty Grant and."—(Mr. Sexton.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

(6.32.) Colonel NOLAN: Before this is taken I want to know what the Government are doing. We have had so much conversation about this Irish Probate Duty and this £40,000 that I should like to be assured where we are. I should have no objection to giving the first lien on either of these sums to labourers' cottages where they are wanted; but I want it to be clear that if this transposition is allowed, the £4,000, where no cottages are desired by the Local Authorities, shall go to the relief of local taxation.

Mr. STOREY: This is no more than a transposition, so far as I understand it.

Mr. A. J. BALFOUR: It is owing to the fact that we have now allocated the Exchequer contribution to labourers' cottages. When the Bill was originally framed there was nothing of a fund at all, and our idea was to come down on the newest fund; but now there has been an alteration, it follows that the general grant should be come down on. I therefore think that the transposition should take place. The point referred to by the hon. and gallant Member (Colonel Nolan) is provided for by the Bill. There can be no question about it.

Question put, and agreed to.

Another Amendment proposed, in page 3, line 9, to omit the words "the county percentage and." Agreed to.

*(6.36.) Mr. KEAY: I beg to move to omit the following words in lines 11 and 12: "The Irish share of the Local Taxation (Customs and Excise) Duties." This is only a small Amendment; therefore, I do not intend to detain the Committee for more than a moment in dealing with it. This is one of the items which should be left out if any other item is omitted. My objection to these words is a general one, which I have already stated to the Committee. I object to these niggardly and peddling and wholly illusory guarantees, and I consider that the British people, if they are going to devote £30,000,000 to this work, ought to have their eyes open and know what they are doing. They ought not to proceed on the pretence that there is a Guarantee Fund, which, as a matter of fact, does not exist.

Amendment proposed,

In page 3, lines 11 and 12, to leave out the words "the Irish share of the Local Taxation (Customs and Excise) Duties, and."—(Mr. Keay.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

Mr. STOREY: This can be put in a single sentence. Take, for instance, the Excise and Customs of London, and apply them to the purchase of holdings from the landlords in Bucks or Berks, and you have what is the case in Ireland. I object to the clause on principle.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: I do not object to every item, and I hold that this particular one might be left in.

DEER FORESTS.

*(9.0.) MR. ANGUS SUTHERLAND (Sutherland): Mr. Speaker, my justification for bringing this matter before the House in this way is that it is a matter of pressing urgency which concerns a considerable portion of the northern part of this Kingdom. I do not doubt for one moment that Her Majesty's Government would only be too glad to avert any trouble to themselves by carrying out reforms which ought to have been carried out long before now. The question of deer forests in the Highlands is one of importance, not only to people of the Highlands, but to people in other parts of the country. This question is generally what is called the crofter question, though the name is entirely new to the Highlanders; but if, however, the name can be used for the purpose of obtaining justice, I have no objection to it. What is called the crofter question can be summed up in the deer forests. I have framed my Resolution upon the definite recommendation made by the Royal Commission. I fully admit that my Resolution does not go the whole length that the needs of the case would justify, but I expect that in consequence of putting the subject before the House in this way the people of the Highlands will get an amount of support in this House that will be beneficial to them, and encourage them to keep within the bounds of the law. The adoption of this Resolution will show the people of the Highlands that there is a desire on the part of the House of Commons to do them justice. The recommendations of the Commission do not come up to the necessities of the case; but if the Government show they are prepared to legislate upon even the moderate recommendations of the Commission, it will be an earnest to the people that they intend to do something that will really be for their benefit and good. I need not detain the House by going into all the circumstances that led up to the agitation in the Highlands. We know what has troubled the Government in maintaining law and order, as they say, in the Highlands: it had its origin in matters that are long past in the history of the Highlands. The fact that the Government persist in allowing the present state of matters to remain as it is continually invites public attention not only to the present circumstances, but to the prior circumstances, out of which the present state of affairs arose. The public conscience was shocked to such an extent by the result of the clearances in the Highlands that Her Majesty's Government issued a Commission to inquire into the circumstances. Of the composition of the Royal Commission I have not very much to say. It was a Commission that could in no way be described as one having popular sympathy. Two of its members were the largest proprietors of deer forests in the Highlands, and, with the single exception of the hon. Member for Invernessshire (Mr. Fraser-Mackintosh), there was not upon the Commission a single man who was known to be in sympathy with the people of the Highlands. My Resolution, based on a recommendation of a Royal Commission so constituted, ought, I think, to deserve some consideration from the House of Commons. The Commissioners were instructed to inquire into everything that bore upon the state of the people known now as the Crofters and Cottars of the Highlands. They divided their Report into several parts. One part was entitled "Deer Forests and Game." To indicate to the House the state of mind in which they approached the investigation of the subject I will quote what they say on this point. They say—

"The subject of deer forests has naturally engaged our attention. Statements have been of late years frequently made, both in the newspapers and by public speakers, to the effect that deer forests are the cause of depopulation in the Highlands, and are productive of injury to the inhabitants that remain. In several of the papers read by witnesses during our inquiry similar expressions have occurred. It is proposed, therefore, to enumerate the principal grounds of complaint, and to comment on each in detail."

I have read most carefully the whole of the evidence given before the Commission, and with, I think, three exceptions, I have seen no reference made to the subject of deer forests as bearing upon the particular question of depopulation. The Commissioners go on to say—

"The principal objections advanced against deer forests, as presented to us, are the following:—

1. That they have been created to a great extent by the eviction or removal of the inhabitants, and have been the cause of depopulation."

In the presence of the hon. Member for Invernessshire, who has an intimate knowledge of the people of the Highlands, and who was a member of the Commission, I say it is notorious that no one who knew anything of the state of matters in the Highlands ever asserted that deer forests were the cause of depopulation. It is asserted that the Highland clearances were carried out for the purpose of forming large sheep runs; but ultimately the landlords found it was more profitable to change the sheep runs into deer forests. The inference might be drawn from the Report that all this about depopulation was the sort of argument put forward by the people who went about agitating for the rights of the Highland people. The Report proceeds—

"2. That land now cleared for deer might be made available for profitable occupation by crofters.

3. That it might at all events be occupied by sheep farmers, and that a great loss of mutton and wool to the nation might thus be avoided.

4. That in some places, where deer forests are contiguous to arable land in the occupation of crofters, damage is done to the crops of the latter by the deer.

5. That deer deteriorate the pasture.

6. That the temporary employment of gillies and others in connection with deer forests has a demoralising effect."

I wish to direct the attention of the House to the great discrepancy there is between the conclusion drawn by the Commissioners and the evidence laid before them on these points. With regard to the observation that the Commissioners found there was no great strength in any of these objections, I will read only one short extract from the evidence. As to the demoralising effect of the temporary employment upon gillies and others, the Rev. Roderick Morison, who is not a wild and irresponsible agitator, but a minister of the Established Church at Kintail, Rossshire, said:—

"Now this land is wholly withdrawn from contributing to the supply of any of the needs of the human race, except the need of Highland lairds for cash. The venison produced is not worth speaking of, and is indeed often, if not generally, left to rot on the ground or thrown to dogs. And though no doubt wages are paid to keepers, gillies, watchers, &c., none of these men are productive labourers, and they are as completely withdrawn from the industrial population as the land on which they live from the food-producing resources of the country. Further, it is well-known that the life these men lead is demoralising in the extreme, and soon renders the majority of them useless for any purpose except that for which they are trained, so that when thrown out of employment they become simply an incubus on society. Removed, as most of them are, from all the influences of religion, education, and social and family life, it is difficult to foretell what they may become. They are not unlikely to prove, in course of time, a very troublesome and difficult element in the social fabric."

As I have said this is the statement of a responsible gentleman—a native of the Highlands—and who has had ample opportunities of seeing everything he describes. Whatever the qualifications of the Commissioners to have formed a proper judgment may have been I am perfectly satisfied for the present that the Government should make a beginning by carrying out the recommendations the Commissioners have made. I am sensible of the fact that they lack definitiveness, but they point to a principle, and what I say is, we are entitled to expect that the House should endorse the principle in the Resolution. The Commissioners deprecated the turning of any more land into deer forest unless it was above a certain altitude, and they expressed the opinion that they were not in favour of any further afforestation of land. But what has happened since the Commission reported? 2,000,000 acres of land in the Highlands of Scotland had, up to that date, been made into deer forests, and since that time 200,000 acres had been added to the forests. In a Report of a Select Committee appointed in 1873, it was shown that deer forests occupied 9 per cent. of the acreage of the Highlands. In 1884 the percentage had risen to 29, and, according to Lyll's Sporting Guide, it had in 1890 risen to 56½. I think the House will agree with me that this waste of land should be checked, and that the land should be devoted to purposes which would be more beneficial to the public. The recommendations I ask the Government to carry out are very moderate. What do the majority of the Commission say? They report—

"The appropriation of land to the purposes of deer forest might be prohibited below a prescribed contour line of elevation, so drawn as to mark in a general but effective way the limit of profitable root and cereal cultivation, of artificial pasture, and of pasture adapted for wintering live stock, a line which on the east side of Scotland, in a high latitude, might be approximately fixed at an altitude of 1,000 feet above the sea level, and on the western seaboard at a lower level than 1,000 feet, making allowances locally for the convenience of the march. The advantage attached to this system would be, that the area of land which could possibly be devoted to sport alone would be circumscribed once for all, and all indefinite apprehensions, whether on the part of the farmer, the crofter, or the public at large, would be set at rest. The disadvantages attached to the hard and fast boundary would on the other hand be that the line might in some cases include for the purposes of sport exceptional spots available for profitable use, and might in others, especially on the west coast, exclude rugged and precipitous tracts, extending to the very verge of the salt water, of little use to the crofter or farmer from situation or quality, but yet well suited for deer."

I consider that is a very reasonable recommendation and one which, as I have said, for present purposes would satisfy the people of the Highlands. The Commissioners go on—

"The alternative method would be, that in each particular case in which the proprietor desired to withdraw land from agricultural or pastoral occupancy, and deliver it over to deer, the area should be subjected to the inspection of a government officer, and that those portions of it which were adapted for crofting cultivation, for small tenancy, or generally for cultivation or wintering sheep, should be reserved, leaving the residue which was only available for summer pasture to be appropriated at the discretion of the proprietor."

I fail to see how the Government can refuse to adopt a Resolution based upon such moderate recommendations. This question of deer forests is one upon which the whole of the land question in the Highlands turns. It is because landlords in the Highlands get a better price now for the land that was first taken away from the people that the people of the Highlands do not get that justice to which they are entitled. I have my own opinion regarding sport. There is legitimate sport, and it is just as good when the land is devoted to grazing as when it is made into a desert. It is not very far back in the history of the Highlands when you could count all the deer forests on the fingers of one hand. Eminent lawyers have stated that there is some difficulty about the modern deer forests, and that it is not known very well whether those who hold them are not poachers. I remember seeing a case reported in which a Judge in the Superior Court in Scotland ruled that no person could prosecute anybody for shooting a deer in the forest of Athol, except the Lord Advocate. Perhaps the Lord Advocate will give us some information on the subject. These forests have grown in number, and if they did no harm to the people, I do not suppose that I or my constituents would trouble much about it. What I say is that they prevent the people of the Highlands earning their livelihood in a decent manner. It is said that the people can go to the Great North-West of Canada, and the predecessor of the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Lord Advocate stood up in his place in this House, and said he was sorry for the people who dwelt in the Highlands, as it was such an inhospitable climate. Only two or three days after that speech was delivered I saw the right hon. Gentleman speeding away towards that inhospitable climate, whither he was going to recuperate. Why the Highlands of Scotland are the great sanatorium of England. The Highlanders desire that they should remain so even more than they are at present; but English gentlemen are not content to meet the Highlanders on a proper equality, and want them only to be their gillies, and to carry their shooting-bags. The Government have shown great generosity to the people of the Highlands by giving them harbours. A long time ago the people were turned out of the Highlands and sent down to the sea-shore to become fishermen, and, strange to say, it is only now that the Government are giving them harbours. We believe that deer forests are not at all necessary for legitimate sport, but are opposed to it. Quite as good sport is got on sheep-runs as in deer forests. I know a gentleman who refused to take a deer forest because he preferred to have mixed shooting. The modern craze for deer forests simply arises from the fact that there are sportsmen who are not sportsmen, and who must have an artificially-formed desert for their own particular purposes. There are a great many other aspects of this question, but I have no desire to unduly trouble the House with regard to them. I may say, however, that the whole Highland question is at the present moment summed up in this question of deer forests. It has been stated over and over again that, instead of diminishing the amount of local labour, deer forests increase it. I can read you the evidence given by a man, who was perfectly capable of giving evidence on this point, before a Select Committee of 1873. Lord Napier's Commission said that deer forests were beneficial to the Highlands. If so, why have recommendations been proposed which would retard their growth? I see that a Member of that Commission is here to defend the Report, and I hope he will do so. It is stated that the only land used for deer forests is land that is incapable of other use. I have frequently seen that where sheep will live and thrive deer will die. I have seen deer carted away in heaps after a heavy snow storm, which the sheep lived through. The late Mr. Purvis was questioned by Mr. Clare Sewell Read before the Select Committee of 1873 as to the difference between the numbers of people maintained on a sheep run and in a deer forest. He said he employed from six to eight shepherds himself, and one gamekeeper was sufficient for the whole place as a deer forest. He also stated that a sheep-farm which employed from eight to ten shepherds could be quite easily managed by two keepers except, perhaps, in the shooting season. Asked the number of men employed under each system generally, he said the number must be in favour of sheep-farming by six to one at least. He said, further, that sheep would live where deer would not live, and that in 1859-60, when he lost a third of his sheep through starvation, the deer died first. Gentlemen who only see the country in the summer and autumn do not know what happens in the winter when severe weather comes on and the animals are driven to the lower ground. If the proposal of Lord Napier's Commission were carried out it would not mean the extermination of the deer in the Highlands. You cannot confine them, they will come down to feed in the spring. If all the land capable of cultivation were given to the crofters to-morrow, there would still be deer in the Highlands. Are they not indigenous animals? They will never be exterminated, and there will be plenty of sport and more manly sport than can be had now. To say that the deer would be exterminated is to speak without knowledge. I need not waste time in combating the absurd statement that when sheep are displaced by deer there is very little loss of the food supply of the country. Highland mutton is known everywhere, but how little is venison an article of food for the people in the market? Yet the Royal Commission accepted this dictum from gentlemen who were interested. However anxious Gentlemen who occupied positions on the Commission may have been to arrive at the truth, they being only human were bound to be influenced by the fact that if they reported against deer forests they would be taking away a considerable portion of their own revenue at the same time. Notwithstanding, it is the duty of the Government to accept such recommendations as the Commissioners have made, and I think it would be for their own benefit to show that they are determined to redress the wrongs from which the Highland population have suffered in the past. After the Report of the Commissioners was issued, and before the Crofters' Act was passed, there was in 1885 a meeting of Highland landlords held in Inverness, and they declared distinctly, at that meeting, that they were prepared, as opportunities arose, to enlarge the holdings of their tenants. Nothing, however, has been done in this direction, but, on the contrary, the afforestation of the land has been going on ever since. It was because of the promise of the Highland landlords on that occasion that the Crofters Act of 1886 did not contain more drastic measures as to the acquisition of land by the people. Despite that promise very few enlargements have been carried out, and I think I have made out a very good case why the Government should accept this Resolution in the spirit in which it is offered. It is proposed in a very moderate spirit—a too moderate spirit some of my hon. Friends say—but I want the Government to see the reasonableness of the demand that legislation shall carry into effect the recommendations of the Commission, and that the land shall be devoted to whatever purpose is best for the good of the people of the Highlands and the welfare of the country at large. I have great pleasure in proposing the Resolution.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "having regard to the recommendations of the Royal Commission (Highlands and Islands of Scotland, 1884) concerning additional afforestation of land, and to the fact that, since the date of the Report of the Commission, additional land has been afforested to such an extent as to constitute a grave national danger, this House is of opinion that immediate legislation, based upon the recommendations of the said Commission with regard to Deer Forests in the Highlands of Scotland, is urgently called for,"—(Mr. Angus Sutherland,) —instead thereof.

*(9.41.) DR. CAMERON (Glasgow, College): In seconding the Resolution it will not be necessary for me, after the full statement of my hon. Friend, to detain the House more than a very few minutes. When the Royal Commission reported in 1884 there were, roughly speaking, 2,000,000 of acres of land in Scotland under deer forests, or one-tenth of the entire area of Scotland, and, of course, a vastly larger pro portion of the Highlands. Since then some 200,000 acres, or 10 per cent. have been added to this enormous area. The statement of my hon. Friend was not at all exaggerated when he described the composition of the Commission in regard to deer forests. Upon that Commission were Sir Kenneth Mackenzie and Cameron of Lochiel, proprietors of nearly 100,000 acres of forest, or 5 per cent. of the entire amount, and it is natural to suppose that they would not take up an unnecessarily hostile position affecting the interests of the large property they represented. Yet, despite the peculiar composition of the Commission, the Report laid down in effect the proposition that deer forests should not be extended. They expressly said that at that time most of the land specially adapted by its natural features to the habits of deer and the purposes of deer forests, and which could, without substantial injury to other interests be thus applied, had been appropriated, and the formation of other deer forests should be discouraged. Yet, since then, the land under deer forests has increased 10 per cent. The Commissioners made recommendations which, if adopted, would have prevented the extension of deer forests, if they had not led to their curtailment. They recommended that such should not be formed below a given altitude—1,000 feet above the sea. Now, my hon. Friend has said that it is alleged that at that altitude deer cannot live, and that makes me think all the more highly of the recommendation of the Commissioners. The question has been raised as between deer and sheep, and I may say that with that question I am very little concerned; what concerns me is the question as between deer and sheep and men. It is the question as between animals on the one side, and mankind on the other, that compelled the Crofter Commission to Report as they did, composed as they were. They proposed restrictions on deer forests in the future, they proposed that the proprietors of deer forests should be compelled to fence in their property, and that when the deer came upon the crofters' holdings, crofters should have an inalienable right to kill the animals. They made various other recommendations calculated to check the evils of an extension of deer forests, and to protect the crofters' industry. The Commissioners had evidence before them that crofters had to watch all night to protect their produce from deer raids, and other evidence showed how the estate rules, incident to the preservation of deer forests, were oppressive in the highest degree. Here the tenants could not keep a gun, there they could scarcely marry, and could not harbour their sons' wives and daughters' husbands without an infraction of these rules. The Commissioners did not make any recommendations that could be considered as trenching upon proprietors' rights. They were inclined to regard the whole matter in the most philosophical light, and they said if the whole of Scotland were withdrawn from the food-producing area, such was the importation from abroad that it would make remarkably little difference to the food supply of the people, there would be no scarcity, and only a slight increase in the price of the best quality of Highland mutton. Yet the Commissioners go on to say that the absorption of the country by deer forests, even though the people were provided with land in our colonies, where they can carry on their industry under more comfortable and lucrative conditions, must be viewed with alarm, because it is resisted by the force of public opinion, and attended with an amount of irritation much to be deprecated. Now the right hon. Gentleman the Minister for Agriculture, I know from previous experience, will tell us about the advantages, the increase of employment, the wealth, that deer forests bring to the country, and that these advantages are greater than would accrue if the land were under sheep; but I venture to say that his authority, great, as I know it is, and great as is his acquaintance with deer forests from a sporting point of view, cannot be placed against that of Cameron of Lochiel, a sportsman also, one of the largest proprietors in Scotland, and a gentleman who has had more to do with sheep farming than any other man in the district where he lives. He has always had the most friendly feeling towards the people of his race, and has always shown himself ready to give every consideration to all their claims. He, in the special Report which he drew up from his own point of view, recommended an alternative which consisted of the application of the principle that advances should be made to crofters on the security of their stock—an alternative which, as he said, “would gradually lead to a re-distribution of the land, without doing violence to proprietary rights.” Proprietors, as he says, if his recommendation were adopted, “would probably be compelled to sacrifice some share of the rents they have lately been receiving from deer forests; but this is a precarious source of income dependent upon the fashion of the day.” But since the issue of the Report of the Commission, the congestion in the Highlands has increased, disturbances have occurred, and public attention has more than ever been directed to this subject. We have an American millionaire as lessee of an immense tract of country extending from coast to coast, exercising his right in connection with this deer forest in the most arbitrary and tyrannical fashion. We all know of how a crofter was persecuted in connection with a pet lamb, so that deer might not be disturbed. Even an officer of Her Majesty's Excise was turned off the land where he ventured to intrude under warrant to look after illicit distillation. We have had popular tumults in Lewis, and it has transpired that in this congested district, where recourse has been had to State-aided emigration, at a cost which would require the value of the fee-simple of the soil to deport the so-called surplus population, raids have been made upon deer forests covering 144 square miles of ground. We shall be told that these deer forests could never be made capable of supporting a Highland peasantry; but is it not a matter of notoriety that in the glens over which these forests extend there are to be met with, the ruins of villages where a Highland population once lived. It may be true that the clearances were not made for deer forests; but it is equally true that they were made for creating large sheep farms, and the soil being exhausted and these found not to pay, the land has been converted into deer forests to meet the present fashion. Not one of the recommendations of the Royal Commission have been carried into effect, with one small exception, which I was instrumental in inducing the House to adopt—the rating of deer forests in the occupation of their owners, not at their former agricultural value, but at the rate they might be expected to let. I will say no more, because our time is limited and there are many Members desire to take part in the Debate. I would only warn the Government that the longer they delay dealing with this question the more drastic will be the remedy demanded. For the present we claim there shall be no extension, and that below a certain altitude there shall be an inspection, and that land suitable for crofters' cultivation should cease to be deer forest. It will be something to secure, that the evil shall not increase, though I do not say we shall be satisfied with that; and for my part I wish to see all the land that is cultivable in these forests restored to the people from whom it has been taken. Wise proprietors like Cameron of Lochiel, who see what is coming, are willing to meet this demand in a fair and equitable spirit. If this is not done the day of grace is fast slipping away and the recommendations of the Commission of 1884 will soon be regarded as wholly inadequate. Parliament is becoming more democratic, and the rights of proprietors so studiously regarded in the Report of the Commission will not much longer be held not more sacred than the right of men to live and labour on their own native land. I heartily second the Resolution.

*(10.0.) Mr. SHAW-STEWART (Renfrew, El.) : Although a Lowlander, representing a Lowland constituency, I may perhaps be allowed to take part in this Debate, for everything that affects the prosperity or the reverse of the Highlands affects Scotland as a whole. If it were true, as has been declared by the Mover of the Resolution, that the crofter question is summed up in the question of deer forests, hon. Members on this side of the House would certainly support the Resolution. But I do not gather from the speech of the hon. Member that he has proved the assertion with which he commenced. I was glad to hear the hon. Member say that the depopulation of the Highlands is not, as is popularly believed, due to the clearance of the land to create deer forests, but that the clearances were mainly for sheep farming. Now, if the hon. Member has read carefully the Report of the Select Committee of 1873 he cannot fail to see that one great cause of the depopulation, certainly in Ross-shire, was the suppression of smuggling. Though hon. Members may laugh it is not my assertion. I find it in the evidence given before the Select Committee of 1873. In this occupation a considerable number of the population were engaged—

*MR. ANGUS SUTHERLAND: Will the hon. Member say whose evidence he is referring to?

*MR. SHAW-STEWART: The evidence of Mr. Horatio Ross. The hon. Member has quoted the evidence of Mr. Purvis, and I think the evidence of Mr. Ross, a Highland resident for a number of years, is equally entitled to credence when he gives this in addition to the clearances for sheep as one of the reasons for the decline of the population in Ross-shire. The hon. Member based his Motion on the Report of the Commission, and then proceeded to throw some discredit on the Members who constituted it, which seems a peculiar way of proving that the recommendation of the Committee should be attended to. The hon. Member says those recommendations should be put in force because there has been so large an increase in the area afforested since the Commission reported in 1884. Now, what were the recommendations of the Commission? The Commission did not make any recommendation to be carried out at that time, these recommendations were only to be carried out in a certain event. These recommendations, or suggestions rather, were only to be given effect to in the event of there being a very much larger area of land afforested. The Commissioners said that it had been shown that in recent times crofters had rarely been removed for the purpose of making additions to deer forests, and that comparatively little of the land so occupied could be made available for cultivation or pasture. The Commissioners pointed out that deer forests gave about as much permanent employment as sheep farms, and that as regards temporary employment deer forests offered a great advantage, affording more work to masons, joiners, plumbers, plasterers, slaters, road-makers, wire-fencers, and other trades, and in the season brought more trade to shopkeepers. I am not a champion of deer forests, and have no connection with them, but I am naturally interested in the question as a Scotch Member, and I am bound to say the hon. Member has not made out his case that drastic changes should be made as he suggested. The Commissioners, while not anticipating that there would be any large increase in the area of deer forests, made certain suggestions as to the lines upon which legislation might proceed should such a contingency arise. Has there been a large increase? Before the Committee on Colonisation last year, it was shown that in 1883 there were 109 deer forests, with nearly 2,000,000 acres of land, while in 1890 there were 114, with very little over 2,000,000 acres, the increase being 148,500 acres. This is from the evidence of Mr. Malcolm, who seems to be a man who knew what he was talking about. Is that such an increase as to constitute "a grave national danger"? That is the point, because if there has not been sufficient increase since 1884 to constitute a grave national danger I do not see that we are called upon to interrupt the legislation of the Session—which is heavy enough already—to introduce legislation based on the suggestions of the Commission of 1884, which were only contemplated to be carried into effect in the case of a great increase of afforesting. If the hon. Member has failed to show that the increase since 1884 has amounted to a national danger, then his Motion must fall to the ground. On the general question of deer forests, the hon. Member dealt with it rather on the ground of sport. But it is far too grave a question to be dealt with in that light. I represent a constituency in Scotland which contains many working men, and, therefore, I am bound to consider the matter from the economic point of view, and not from the sporting point of view. Were we to do away with deer forests, should we benefit the Highlands or the reverse? I find from the Reports of the Commission of 1884 and the Committee of 1873 that deer forests pay in many parishes in Scotland quite half of the public burdens.

—Mr. Shaw-Stewart

*MR. ANGUS SUTHERLAND: That proves that they constitute half the Highlands; it proves nothing more.

*MR. SHAW-STEWART: And if you do away with the forests what rent will you get? I believe that if we were to do away with deer forests to-morrow we should reduce the Highlands to the condition in which they were before this immense amount of money was brought into the country, we should also reduce the agricultural value of the land to about two-thirds, and sporting-rents would be non-existent. If hon. Members opposite can prove to me that the Highlands would be better for the abolition of deer forests, I should be glad to vote for the Resolution. But I do not believe that the putting down of deer forests would benefit the Highlands, and, therefore, not out of any consideration for sport, but on economic grounds, I feel bound to vote against the Resolution.

(10.15.) DR. M'DONALD (Ross and Cromarty): The hon. Member who last spoke said the Government would be only too glad to do away with deer forests if that would afford a solution of the crofter question. That may be the opinion of individual Members, but I am afraid that it is not the opinion of the Government. I say it would go a great way towards the solution of the crofter question. Whatever the opinion of hon. Members opposite, or of people who know little about the subject may be, it is the opinion of the crofters themselves that to do away with deer forests would help them very considerably, and they will not be satisfied till something is done in that direction. The hon. Member, referring to the recommendations of the Commission of 1884, said that they were merely suggestions, and that it was not intended to recommend that legislation on such lines should be adopted. He quoted paragraphs from the Report. Well, on looking at that Report, I find it sets forth that it is the opinion of the Royal Commission that provisions should be framed under which croftlands should be protected against diminution for the purpose of afforestation. If the hon. Member will again examine the Report he would find that, although in the previous sentence the Commissioners used the word "suggest," they really indicate an intention to give effect to the recommendation there and then. The hon. Member who has just sat down said that no arable land was taken away for those deer forests. I do not know whether the hon. Member has ever walked through one of those deer forests; but if he were to take an exercise from Lochalsh to Beaully, he will find the ruins of many farmhouses. There is a good deal of arable land included in Mr. Wynan's deer forests.] It is quite a common thing to fence in a piece of arable land in the glens, and to sow corn upon it, so that in the winter there may be food for the deer, who otherwise could not live. That is done regularly in some parts of the Highlands.

SIR A. BORTHWICK (Kensington, S.): Where are the oats in bad weather?

DR. M'DONALD: They are standing crops.

SIR A. BORTHWICK: Where are they to be found?

DR. M'DONALD: In the forests.

SIR A. BORTHWICK: Are they standing crops?

DR. M'DONALD: Yes.

SIR A. BORTHWICK: In the winter?

DR. M'DONALD: Yes. It shows that the forests are not sufficient to keep the deer unless the oats are sown for them. If that were not the opinion of the owners they would not go to the expense of sowing the corn.

MR. WEBSTER (St. Pancras, E.): The hon. Member has stated that the deer eat grain grown during the winter months. I should like to know the peculiar part of the Highlands where they grow that grain?

DR. M'DONALD: I do not know what the hon. Member means, neither do I know that grain is grown in the winter months. But perhaps the hon. Member knows the country where it is grown in winter. It certainly does not in Scotland. One hon. Member asked what would become of the Highlands if the rent of the deer forests were not forthcoming? Now, one argument in favour of deer forests is that they are said to pay their owners better; but if on that ground all the Highlands were converted into deer forests because good rents were got for them, what would become of the population? It might pay better for a time, but acting on that principle the whole of the people of the Highlands would have to be expatriated. Many people go on the theory that the so-called deer forests are not fit for anything else, but we in the Highlands know that that is a very great mistake. I was asked yesterday by a man of considerable culture and knowledge if the trees were very thick in the deer forests. That showed that he knew nothing of deer forests, for there are no trees in them at all. And then as to the possibility of keeping sheep on these lands, what does an animal live upon when there is no food obtainable? It lives upon its reserve of fat. It is a well-known fact that deer have hardly any fat as compared with sheep at certain seasons, and consequently sheep are far more likely to thrive in these forests than deer. With regard to the depopulation of the Highlands, the Commission in their Report say no one could contemplate the conversion of arable and pasture land into forests without alarm. And yet, as has been pointed out by my hon. Friend, a considerable quantity of such land has, since the Report, been added to the deer forests, and the process is still going on. The truth is, that as the leases of the large sheep farms fall in, the landlords are not able to stock those farms, which they are obliged to do when the farmers go out, and therefore it is that they let the farms as deer forests. Take, for instance, the deer forests in the Lewis, of which so much has been heard. I admit that the Government have done a great deal for the Lewis, but I am sorry they have not seen their way to making a road in that part of the Lewis where on about six square miles about 1,500 people are located. There is one person in Ross-shire who has a deer forest extending from one side of Scotland to the other, and, as far as I know, not a shot has been fired in that forest for at least four or five years. Do hon. Gentlemen opposite know that it is credibly reported of that gentleman that he keeps that forest up only to show the rottenness of the laws of this old country of ours. It therefore cannot be said to be kept up for sport in any form. I have no objection whatever to part of the land, which is useless for the people, being used for deer forests; but I maintain that most of the land is fit for the people, because it has been proved that sheep can live on it if deer cannot.

(10.30.) THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. P. B. ROBERTSON, Bute): I can sincerely congratulate the hon. Member for Sutherlandshire both on the speech and the terms of his Motion. The hon. Member has spoken, as he always does, with a measure of good humour and intelligence, which we all appreciate. But on the terms of the Motion my congratulation of the hon. Member is perhaps more of an ironical character. The hon. Member has put into his Resolution two topics very badly calculated to attract the interest of the House. He has urged upon its acceptance the recommendation of the Royal Commission, and has called attention to what he describes as a great national danger. First of all, as regards the recommendation of the Royal Commission. I listened with great interest to all parts of the hon. Gentleman's speech, but I did not discover that it was strongly permeated by a profound respect for the recommendations of the Royal Commission, because he permitted himself to say that some of their statements were absurd and ridiculous, and he added that he was not going to insult the intelligence of the House by repeating some of their conclusions. At the same time, he called upon us, out of respect to the Royal Commission, to adopt its recommendations. Now, the conclusions which the hon. Gentleman describes as absurdly ridiculous are argued out and supported by reasons which will recommend themselves as forcible and cogent. They discuss the whole social and economic bearings of deer forests upon the condition of the Highlands, and they arrive at strongly favourable conclusions as to the benefits conferred on the Highlands by the existing system. They arrive at that conclusion upon grounds so explicitly and carefully stated and well argued out that he would be a bold man who would merely stave them off by epithets such as the hon. Gentleman has applied to them. I find, on turning to the Report of the Royal Commission, that the Commissioners do not assign to the recommendations referred to the precise position which the hon. Member does. The recommendations on which the hon. Gentleman has laid stress are treated by the Commissioners as within the region of speculation. They say, for instance, they do not anticipate with any degree of certainty that the contingency to which they have averted will arise,

"But, considering the divergency of opinion expressed and the possibility of unfortunate results from prolonged excitement in connection with this question, we may well consider whether the Government and Parliament may not contemplate such legislative restrictions as will restrain the progressive afforestation of land and allay the apprehensions which are widely felt on the subject. Admitting that this suggestion is worth being entertained, we trust we shall not be thought to go beyond the confines of our Commission in offering suggestively some indication of the lines on which legislation might possibly proceed."

Indeed, it would be difficult to find in 20 lines of the Report of any Royal Commission such a series of hypotheses, qualifications, and reservations.

DR. M'DONALD: But how about the next sentence?

MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: That still further corroborates my argument, for the Commissioners say that they are of opinion that provisions should be framed under which the crofting classes would be protected—observe that that was before the Crofters' Act of 1866 was passed—against the diminution for the purposes of afforestation of the arable or pasture area. I venture to say that the Crofters' Act to which I have alluded affords even a more drastic remedy than was suggested by the Royal Commission. The recommendations which the hon. Gentleman pressed upon the attention of the House were couched in very careful language, and merely offered as alternative suggestions, and offered for discussion. The hon. Member for Sutherlandshire said that there were three recommendations of the Royal Commission which were put as if they were cumulative and combined. They are nothing of the kind. They are alternative suggestions. The first, which was put in cautious language, very well adapted to the highly problematic nature of the suggestion, was that there might be a line of 1,000 feet below which a deer forest should not come. They went on to add that they knew that that formula would break down on the West Coast; but on the East Coast it might be adopted. So far as I could discover, the formula to be adopted for the West Coast was nothing less than the sea level. That is not a very exacting limit. The second alternative was that there should be a Government Inspector to look into the afforestments, and see whether there was cultivable land included in them which might be turned to use in the future. The hon. Gentleman did not even mention that plan as either reasonable or probable. The third was in favour of some reservation of ground for forestry as distinguished from afforestation, for there was much to be said for forestry as one of the industries of the Highlands which might be developed. I hope that I have shown that the hon. Member for Sutherlandshire has rather misplaced the recommendations of the Commission, because he values their doubts more than their certainties. While he regards their conclusions as being so absurd and ridiculous that he will not insult their intelligence by discussing them, he idolises their doubts and uncertainties. Has the hon. Gentleman made out his case on the footing of these recommendations? In the first place, the hon. Gentleman referred to the afforestments which have taken place since the date of the Commission in 1884, the extent of which he puts at 200,000 acres.

DR. CLARK: More than 1,000,000

MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: The hon. Member for Caithness says "more than 1,000,000." The hon. Member interrupted my hon. Friend in the same way, and interposed a good round figure. The hon. Member went before the Colonisation Committee and said that 1,100,000 acres had been afforested since 1883. But the hon. Member for Sutherlandshire has been before the same Committee, and his estimate is 200,000 acres. The hon. Member for Caithness said on the 10th of February, 1891, that he had brought this estimate before the hon. Member for Sutherlandshire, and that the estimate of the latter was only 2,000 or 3,000 acres different in 500,000. That was a bold effort to capture the hon. Member for Sutherlandshire, but it did not succeed. The hon. Member for Sutherlandshire had from the 10th of February to the 24th of April to harmonise his differences with the hon. Member for Caithness, but he waives off the suggestion of 1,000,000, and manfully adheres to his own estimate of 200,000 acres. This is a question of fact and observation; and as the hon. Gentleman alleges that there is a great national danger, the extent of the afforestation must determine the greatness of the danger. Mr. Malcolm, who has apparently gone into the matter with carefulness and accuracy, and who has given precise and definite figures, says that since the Report of the Commission the extent of the afforestation has been 148,500 acres. But, for the purpose of argument, I will take the figures of the hon. Member for Sutherlandshire. The hon. Member declares that the change to which he refers constitutes a grave national danger. How does it do so? Does the hon. Gentleman desire that these 200,000 acres should be restored to the sheep farms? Because the change that has been made since 1884 has been merely turning large sheep farms into deer forests. Is the hon. Gentleman justified in contending that a grave national danger is constituted by having a few deer forests in place of sheep farms? The House ought to be careful in adopting a conclusion of such vast proportions to remove the tendency to alarm, so far as the public mind is concerned, as to what will be the extent of the injury which will constitute this grave national danger. Were we in safety when we had the large sheep farms, and, if so, what new condition of things has been brought about to the detriment of the farmers who are usually under the aegis of hon. Gentlemen opposite? Turning to the recommendations of the Crofter Commissioners, they say that the two points which they were to have in view were, first, to keep for the crofters what they had already—and that has been done—and then to reserve the areas of cultivable land which should be available in order to constitute a sufficiency of holdings for the crofters. The hon. Member's speech contained a great deal, but it did not contain a suggestion as to how much land there is available for cultivable holdings in the tracts afforested. We are left in the dark as to that. The matter is left as an abstract question, consequently we are left to assume that the hon. Member cannot assert that in these afforested tracts there is more than the average amount of cultivable land. What does all this amount to? Take the 200,000 acres and deal with them as a sum of proportion. We know exactly what is the proportion of cultivable land in an ordinary sheep farm such as is turned into a forest. Most of it is high and rough, and very little is cultivable. The hon. Member will hardly venture to affirm that there are more than 200 acres of cultivable land in the afforested acreage which he has named, and a crofter ought not to be penned in a holding of less than 10 acres. Therefore, accepting the hon. Member's own figures, the whole grievance which is said to constitute a grave national danger, comes to this—that some 20 crofters' holdings have been absorbed by these afforestments. The hon. Member ought to be anxious to retain the respect which is entertained for his case and his character by abstaining from exaggerations as grievous as those I have pointed out.

*MR. ANGUS SUTHERLAND: I did not base my case on the fact that holdings of cultivable land are everywhere necessary. There is no reason why small holdings should not be pastoral as well as agricultural.

MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: The House must observe that the whole of the reasoning of the Crofters' Commission has proceeded on taking hill-pasture as well as arable ground, and all the conclusions of the Commission assume that a sheep requires a certain amount of hill ground—five or seven acres, I think—in order to maintain an existence. The A B C of the calculation is that you must have a small patch of arable land and a sufficient acreage for sheep for the crofter to begin with. I have shown, therefore, how devoid of solid foundation are the cases stated by the hon. Member. But I must add a few words on another most important subject—one on which there is, no doubt, frequently an extraordinary attempt made to excite prejudice. Sir, I deprecate most strongly—as the hon. Member for East Renfrewshire did with great force and effect—the notion that this question of deer forests is exclusively a sportsman's question. It is really an economic question affecting the welfare of the Highlands; and the mature conclusions of the Crofters' Commission, after hearing all persons interested, were that for the general well-being of the Highland population, deer forests do more than sheep farms. I am dealing now with the allegation that there is a grave national danger, and it is indispensable that the public should have a clear notion on that subject. As a matter of history, how comes it that in the instances referred to deer forests have been substituted for sheep farms? Not through the caprice of the landowner, not in order to increase the amount of sporting land, but for a purely economic reason—because the fall in the price of wool has made sheep farming a bad business in the North of Scotland, and rents cannot be obtained for large sheep farms; and in every one of the instances where there has been a change since the Crofters' Commission from sheep farms into deer forests it has been due not to any desire to establish luxuries, but simply to employ the land in the only advantageous way available. That is proved to the mind of every one who examines the evidence taken by the Committee, presided over by the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs. Mr. Mackenzie, one of the leaders of the crofters, stated that what had led to the change was the fact that for large sheep farms even barely reasonable offers could not be obtained, while advantageous offers were made for deer forests. The Crofters' Commission reported on this subject—

“The number of persons permanently employed in connection with deer forests as compared with sheep farms is about the same, and as regards temporary or occasional employment the advantage is in favour of deer forests.”

The Commissioners on the more general question also said—

“Contrary to what is probably the popular belief, deer forests in a far greater degree than sheep farms afford employment to masons, joiners, plumbers, rural tradesmen, &c.”

Therefore I emphasise the statement that deer forests are, under the present economic conditions, not advantageous merely for the selfish purpose of the landlords who draw a big rent, but advantageous to the whole community. I will refer to an expression of opinion not by this Parliament, but by one differing in its composition from this very largely—I mean the short Parliament from 1885 to 1886. In the Crofters Act provision was made for the enlargement of holdings, and a clause was assented to by the Member for Clackmannan to the effect that the enlargement should only be made from deer forests in the event of the Commissioners believing that it was for the advantage of the whole community that the change should be made. I say that this was a challenge on the part of Parliament—not a Tory or Unionist Parliament, but one of a very different character—to the parties interested, to show whether the economic condition of the Highlands was better served by one state of things than the other. I have dwelt on these considerations, because the present Motion, although it refers to a comparatively limited subject, opens up large questions. We are asked to-night to avert a “grave national danger.” It is my opinion that it has not been shown that there is any grave or national question to meet. I will go further and say that upon the facts before us the change that has taken place appears to be a change for the better. I trust that the House will resolutely negative a Motion, which, if carried, would give rise to misleading expectations as to the opinions held by Parliament on the state of matters that are not to be considered in the interests of sportsmen or any privileged class, but as every question of this kind should be considered, in the interest of the whole country.

*(10.58.) MR. MARJORIBANKS (Berwickshire): The right hon. and learned Gentleman who as just sat down has attempted to deal with the arguments of the hon. Gentleman behind me in a light and trivial spirit. He has shown that there are such things as ornaments of Debate, and I am afraid that sometimes, also, there are ornaments to the Resolutions which are presented to the House. I find that the right hon. and learned Gentleman has fixed on an ornament of the Resolution of my hon. Friend, and has treated that ornament as if it were the whole Resolution. He has drawn attention to the words “grave national danger,” and has made fun of them, and has left out of consideration and argument the serious and material part of the Resolution. The right hon. and learned Gentleman said that my hon. Friend whilst he professed profound respect for the utterances of the Royal Commission did not pay much attention to the words of their Report. Now, that is a charge that I am prepared to meet with an absolute denial. I want to know how my hon. Friend could have paid more respect to the Report of the Commission than by adopting word for word the recommendations of the Commission with regard to this question of forests. I must say I have to find fault with the right hon. Gentleman for the way in which he has placed the recommendations of the Commission before the House. The right hon. Gentleman has attempted to show that the Commission’s recommendations are mere suggestions as to possible legislation. The recommendations of the Commissioners were fourfold—first as to the fencing off of deer forests from arable land.

MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: I directed myself to what the hon. Member for Sutherlandshire spoke of—namely, fresh afforestation.

*MR. MARJORIBANKS: What we have to consider are the words of the recommendations. The second recommendation is that no land should be taken from crofters for the extension of a forest without other land being substituted therefor. The third is with regard to a method for deciding what land may in future be appropriated for forests, as to which I admit the Commissioners put forward merely suggestions of an attitude limit being fixed, or of a reference to a Government Inspector; and the fourth is as to the planting of land. It seems to me that these recommendations are exceedingly moderate, and they are recommendations which can be adopted by any Government without resorting to revolutionary method, and without doing anything which would injure any interest in Scotland. I certainly should not have been prepared to support the Resolution of my hon. Friend if it had gone to the lengths suggested by the hon. Member for Renfrewshire (Mr. Shaw-Stewart), who seemed to think it involved the destruction of all deer forests in Scotland. I am bound to confess that many people greatly exaggerate the damage that is done by deer forests and the danger to the country that results from them. But there is one thing in the use and another in the abuse of deer forests. I admit that there is great abuse of forests in Scotland, and it is to stop that abuse that I think legislation is required. I should like to refer for a moment to some of the statements made by supporters of the Resolution. The hon. Member for Sutherland spoke of the statement made by the Rev. Roderick Morrison to be found in Appendix A to the Report of the Crofters' Commission. The rev. gentleman said in that statement that the venison produced was not worth speaking of, and that it was often, if not generally, left to rot on the ground or thrown to the dogs. I am bound to say that is an absolute falsehood. I can tell the House how the idea arose. There was a very clever picture in Punch by Mr. Du Maurier representing Mr. Winans seated, surrounded by the dead bodies of deer. Well, I am no friend of Mr. Winans, but I may say that he never got so far as to leave the bodies of the deer he had killed rotting on the ground. Then the rev. Gentleman went on to say that none of the men employed in a deer forest were productive labourers. That is also a very considerable exaggeration, to use the mildest term. I know that these men are used in many other ways than for mere sporting purposes. They are used for the making of roads to a very large extent indeed, and I think sufficient credit has not been given to the proprietors of deer forests for the way in which they have opened up the country by the making of roads.

MR. BUCHANAN (Edinburgh, W.): Nobody goes on them.

*MR. MARJORIBANKS: Oh, that is a mistake. The rev. gentleman further said the life these men lead is demoralising in the extreme. I know them, as a rule, to be temperate, well-educated religious men, often elders in the church to which they belong. I should like the rev. gentleman to make this statement to men so employed in his congregation. I do not think he would find he would long retain his congregation. The hon. Member for Sutherlandshire raised the question of the comparative capacities of deer and sheep to stand hard weather. It is quite true that sheep will stand very hard weather at a high altitude. But those that do so are the hogs, the old sheep of the flock. If a farmer were to attempt to keep his ewes and lambs at high altitudes in winter, the result would be so grave that he would very soon have to give up sheep-farming altogether. I admit that if you were to confine the deer to the tops of hills which were covered with snow they would die. But the deer in bad weather goes to the low ground and finds wintering for himself. My hon. Friend (Mr. Sutherland) said many people preferred to shoot deer on sheep runs than in a forest. I have considerable sympathy with my hon. Friend on that point. I have myself killed a great number of deer on sheep grounds, but I would point out that sheep ground is not a bit more available for the purpose of the crofter than forest. Any sheep ground on which it is possible to kill deer is sheep ground in the occupation of large holders, and is, therefore, just as much a desert and just as solitary as a forest.

*MR. ANGUS SUTHERLAND: My right hon. Friend will admit that it is also possible to kill deer on crofters' ground.

*MR. MARJORIBANKS: I do not think I should expect to kill many deer on common grazing. Reference has been made to the ruins of villages which it is said are to be found in deer forests. It is a very rare thing, as far as my experience goes, to find the ruins of villages in deer-forests. I do not say that they are not to be found, but that the ordinary ruin in a deer forest is that of the shieling where men used to take their cattle out during the summer to feed on the high ground. The hon. Member for Rossshire spoke of having seen ruined villages when walking through the forest now in the occupation of Mr. Winans. Twenty-five years ago, before that land was made forest, I stalked over the whole of it, and I can assure him that such ruins do not exist in the glens—Glen Cannich and Glen Affric—he speaks of. The hon. Member also spoke of oats being sown for deer, and the fences being taken down so that the deer might go in and eat the crop. His experience must be exceptional. I quite admit that deer are fed in winter in places, but the process ordinarily adopted is to make up ropes of hay and straw, and put them out in the forest for the deer to gnaw. I believe that a noble Lord used once to bring beans from Egypt and put them down on the seashore for the deer to eat. The hon. Member further said that sheep could get through the winter better than deer, because they had so much reserve fat on them, whilst deer had not. I should say that there is no animal known which has such an extraordinary faculty for laying on fat as the deer, and Christmas time is the very time when most fat will be found on a hind. It is only as long as the deer forest combines the greatest amount of good with the least amount of harm that it can go on. It is the requirements of the small holders will have to be considered, and it is perfectly evident that if the land is required for, and capable of, cultivation it ought to be available. I believe that to give effect to the very moderate recommendations of this Commission would be a most useful thing, and a measure of concession to the crofter requirements in the Highlands, which even a Conservative Government might give without sacrificing one jot of its principles. For these reasons I shall support the Resolution of my hon. Friend.

(11.17.) DR. CLARK: I quite agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Sutherlandshire that had it not been for the deer forest the crofter question would not have attained its present acute state. It was not a question between sheep and deer, but between sheep and men, and it would be far better to have the sheep and the men back. But the deer forest mania came in, and the landlords have been able to turn their sheep farms into deer forests, which will pay very well as long as the fashion lasts. But in all probability a new turn will be taken, and then the big landlords will find that deer forests will no more pay than did the sheep farms, and then, perhaps, they will be very glad to get the men back again. Now, Mr. Malcolm's evidence has been quoted. Mr. Malcolm is Secretary to the Society formed by the landlords for the Protection of the Deer Forests. We wanted to get reliable evidence, and we got Mr. Macrae, Secretary to the Land League, to make a series of investigations. He took Mr. Malcolm's report and his book on the subject, which the Duke of Argyll and the Duke of Sutherland eulogised too much, and he pointed out how from 1883 the deer forests in the whole of Rossshire had increased from 9 per cent. to 29 per cent. He also took the Sportsman's Guide for the present year, and showed that the amount had increased 56½ per cent. Now, Mr. Malcolm's interest in the landlords has never yet been called in question, and the figures which he gave to the Committee will be recognised by the Minister of Agriculture, who is a relation of the Duke of Sutherland, as accurate. When the Report of the Commission was published, the Duke returned 145,000 acres as deer forests. Mr. Macrae's researches show that he has increased that quantity by 400 per cent., and he enumerates the names of the farms. I brought these figures under the notice of my hon. Friend (Mr. Sutherland), previous to my giving evidence before the Commission. My hon. Friend told me that these figures were true.

*MR. ANGUS SUTHERLAND: I certify to the farms being correct; but I know nothing as to the figures.

DR. CLARK : I suppose we can get them verified from the valuation roll of the country. Well, we have had a defence of the deer forests from my right hon. Friend who has replied to the speaker on this side, and if it be true that we have got a case that will not hold water, then the Lord Advocate ought to laugh at us. My right hon. Friend tells us that we are mistaken about houses being in ruins, and that they were mere shielings used in winter. But it is a fact that we not only find houses but chapels in ruins. In the Park Deer Forests there are 18 townships turned into deer forest. I am not at all astonished at the Report of the Royal Commission being so tentative. It was a Commission of big landlords, who held a large number of deer forests, and got big returns from them. If you had a jury of wolves or sheep you would get a Report of much the same character. But even this jury of men who had destroyed the Highlands reported that afforestation should be restrained, and that the crofters ought not any longer to be turned away from the forests. Evidence was also given that there ought to be a limit to the altitude. Neither the late nor the present Government, have carried out any of the recommendations of the Commission, and the result is that the deer forest system is growing and growing, and the people have less and less room, and are being huddled together in places where they cannot live and thrive. They are being physically, and perhaps morally, deteriorated. You have had more afforestation since the Commission said that things had better remain as they were. We have had the economic argument trotted out, but if the figures are accurate, we have had the enormous growth in deer forests of something like 50 per cent. in seven or eight years. As the matter now stands, the Government are not going to do anything to carry out the recommendations of the Commission. But the time is coming when we shall have an appeal to the country, and we intend to appeal to the people in the North as to whether the land is to be used for the good and the well-being of the whole, or for the amusement of the few. We have no doubt that when the time comes the verdict will be given in our favour.

(11.32.) THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. CHAPLIN, Lincolnshire, Sleaford) : I hope the House will allow me to intervene in this Debate for a few moments. I am glad to admire the spirit and ability with which the hon. Member in introducing this Motion, called attention to the recommendations of the Royal Commission, as well as the sympathy he evinced for the people of the county which he represents in this House. The Government have no reason to complain of the tone of the speech in which the Motion has been introduced, and have certainly no disposition to defend the abuses of deer forests which have been referred to in this Debate. I do not think that any Member of this House will reprobate with greater austerity than we desire to reprobate the alleged conduct of the foreigner who has been mentioned, who holds such large tracts of land, and whose methods of so-called sport have gone far to create widespread dissatisfaction with deer forests in general. I think there is some excuse for the exaggeration which is sometimes indulged in on this question, and on that point I shall have something to say before I sit down, in reply in particular to the hon. Member for Caithness. But what are the facts with which we have to deal? The hon. Gentleman who introduced the Motion referred to the six objections to the system of deer forests which are quoted in the Report of the Royal Commission, and he told the House that he differed entirely from their conclusions. But I observe with some surprise that the hon. Member only dealt in his speech with the sixth objection by way of disposing of the statements of the Commissioners. In support of his case, the hon. Member referred to the evidence given by the rev. gentleman the minister of Kintail before the Commission that venison is left to rot on the ground. That evidence, I venture to say, is tainted with a great deal of ignorance. I am prepared to say that that statement is an absolute fabrication. Venison is neither left on the ground to rot, nor is it thrown to the dogs. All the venison which is not consumed in the establishment of the owner is widely distributed among the cottagers; and if you put the question to the shepherds or to any of the poorer classes in the Highlands—to those who live in the neighbourhood of the deer forests—you will find that a great part of the substance on which they live throughout the winter is venison, and that it is the only flesh which enters their cottages for consumption. For this they are indebted to the liberality and generosity of the owners of the deer forests in the Highlands. With regard to the rubbish talked by this rev. gentleman as to the bodies being allowed to rot on the ground, I will undertake to say that greater nonsense was never given utterance to. Now I come to the question of the acreage which has been added to the deer forests since 1884. That is a point on which the hon. Member for Caithness particularly challenged me. The Resolution submitted to this House to-night stigmatises the increase in the acreage as a grave national danger. If it does not amount to such a danger, then, of course, the Resolution falls to the ground. The hon. Member made a number of quotations, and endeavoured to show that in one county alone—the County of Sutherland—511,000 acres had been added to the deer forests since 1884. He was good enough to give us statistics. Since dinner I have put into operation the resources of the telegraph, in order to make myself fully acquainted with the real facts. I will, with the permission of the House, reply to his statements. The hon. Member for Caithness said that the farm of Glendhu, consisting of 128,000 acres, had been placed under deer. It has been placed under deer; but it consists of about 35,000 acres, and the information was supplied to me by the agent of the Duke of Sutherland in the Lobby 15 minutes ago. I also telegraphed to the Duke of Westminster, who replies that Glendhu was cleared because no tenant offered to pay the rent. He puts the extent of the farm at about 40,000 acres. Let me now take the other instances cited by the hon. Member—

Name farm.	Hon. Mem. Est.	Actual acreage as supplied to Mr. Chaplin.
		Acrea.
Strathmore of Melness	80,000	31,000
Corry Killoch	80,000	10,800
Ben Hec of Skfulness	40,000	5,000
Glen Caniop	60,000	33,000
Oonimore and Coulbag	40,000	19,000
Kildonan.	80,000	30,000
Mudale	3,500	3,500

Thus, while the hon. Member says that 511,000 acres have been added to the deer forests in the County of Sutherland since 1884, according to my information the real amount is 153,000, and the hon. Member was consequently nearly 400,000 acres wrong.

DR. CLARK: Still, the acreage has doubled since 1884.

MR. CHAPLIN: That is the best reply I can put before the House. The House will judge of the sort of value they may generally place on the information of the hon. Gentleman. I look upon this as a specimen of the want of information which widely prevails in connection with the question. Statements are constantly being placed before the public which are utterly and entirely misleading as to the real merits of the matter. But supposing the hon. Member is right, why have these forests been cleared? It has been because tenants could not be obtained for them as sheep farms. Anyone who is acquainted with the County of Sutherland must be aware that the Duke of Sutherland has spent a gigantic fortune in the endeavour to reclaim land for the benefit of the people, and a few years ago no one was more sternly opposed than he to placing land under deer. But when the time arrived when sheep farms ceased to pay, in consequence of the enormous fall in the price of wool, brought about by foreign competition, every proprietor gifted with common sense had to consider by what means he could derive a revenue from his property, a revenue which, in the case of the Duke of Sutherland, is spent entirely in the county and among the people. Surely no one would have been justified in refusing a rental derived from sporting holdings which it was impossible any longer to obtain under the old system. The hon. Member stated that sheep will live where deer die in a severe winter. That assertion I venture to contradict across the floor of the House. I have had some experience in this matter, for it happens that some years ago, in a very wild and inclement district in the County of Sutherland, the sheep on certain farms died off in large numbers, owing to the cold and snowstorms, the tenant was ruined, no one else would take the holdings, and they were converted into a deer forest. I walked over the ground in the early spring, and while I saw hundreds of carcasses of sheep, I found but very few of deer. Where one deer had died, sheep had died by the hundred. It was impossible to continue the holdings as sheep farms, and that I believe illustrates the reason why so many of these deer forests have been added in the Highlands. The hon. Member who introduced the Motion said that the failure of the sheep farms afforded a golden opportunity of restoring the crofters to the land. To what sort of land? Why, according to the hon. Member's own showing, to land so destitute that even deer could not live on it in the winter. Upon the economic question it will not be necessary for me to detain the House long. The Royal Commission sifted this question thoroughly, as their Report shows, and they hold that the deer forests afford as much employment as the sheep farms. As to the food argument, the amount of sheep displaced amounted only to 132,000, out of a total in the United Kingdom of 31,000,000. The food argument, therefore, will not bear investigation for a single moment. The recommendations of the Commissioners for all practical purposes are only two, and relate to forests created after 1884. They have been pressed on the attention of the Government with much energy by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Berwickshire. The Commissioners recommended that deer forests should not be created in districts less than 1,000 ft.

above the sea. Such a limitation would be absolutely impracticable, for some of the most suitable districts for deer forests are on the West coast of the Highlands. In many cases upon the West coast the hills rise almost precipitously out of the water, and even within the limits of 1,000 ft., the land would in many cases be useless, except for a deer forest. It is on the immediate coast—where the snow does not lie, that it would be most useful for the purposes of wintering the deer, and such a limit as that which is proposed would exclude this land, which in many cases would be useless for anything else. I am told the question whether certain districts shall be permitted to be converted into deer forests should rest upon the decision of a Government Inspector, but I cannot imagine anything likely to afford a less satisfactory solution of the difficulty. I will merely say, in conclusion, that the Motion rests solely on the contention that the existence of these deer forests constitutes a grave national danger. I think my right hon. Friend has absolutely disproved that, and there is not now a shred of argument in support of it. The real questions which we have to consider are those asked by the Commission. Does the occupation of land as deer forests inflict any hardship or injury on any class of the community, and, if so, upon what class? And, secondly, does the occupation of land as deer forests produce any crop or benefit to any class, and, if so, what class? To the first of these propositions the Commission in general terms unhesitatingly say "No," and to the second "Yes." The House of Commons will attach more weight and importance to the opinion of a body of gentlemen who have had the whole evidence placed before them than it will to the opinion of any individual Member of the House. The Commission says that since 1884 the addition to the deer forests in the Highlands has been comparatively small; it has been shown that it has been brought about because there are no other means of laying out the land to advantage. In the course of the operation not a single crofter has been evicted or removed from his holding. That is the case upon which the Government is asked to postpone the Irish land question and other Imperial business, in order to introduce immediate legislation upon this question, so as to remove a national danger which has been shown not to exist. I am bound to say that the demand embodied in the Resolution is so extreme and unreasonable that the Government are justified in refusing it.

(11.55.) SIR G. TREVELYAN (Glasgow, Bridgeton): I have to thank the right hon. Gentleman for his careful and interesting statistics produced at such short notice, but what do they prove? They prove that within the last few years the deer forests in Sutherlandshire have been more than doubled. Besides that, I know of my own knowledge that in the Island of Lewis a very large piece of land has been turned into a deer forest—at the least 50,000 acres. In Sutherlandshire we have an addition of 150,000 acres; and, further than that, the increase of acreage has been going on on a large scale in Argyllshire, Inverness-shire, and Ross-shire. I affirm there is a national danger in these conversions. Was there no national danger in the recent deer raid in the Lewis? And that was carried on in a forest which fulfilled all the conditions of the Commission, it was on a low elevation, and if the recommendations of the Commission had been carried out, it could not have been turned into a deer forest. If hon. Members wish to know what the danger is let them read the extremely eloquent speech of the hon. Member opposite. The reason he gave for the existence of the forests was that the land would not pay for sheep-farming because of the rents charged by the landlords; and, in consequence of this economic law, the right hon. Gentleman said landlords were justified in turning the land into deer forests, and this was to be done by the frank advice of the Minister of Agriculture. The Commissioners protest, in a most eloquent passage in their Report, against the doctrine that because of any economic question the Highlands should be turned into a desert. The hon. Gentleman said that these 200,000 acres would not support 100 crofters. But the Commissioners say each five acres will support a sheep, so that these 200,000 acres should support 40,000 sheep, and I should like to know how many crofter families could be supported by 40,000 sheep. The people of the country have unanimously elected Members who sent them to Parliament to ask that these forests might be trenchantly dealt with, and in the long run they must have another sort of answer from the Government.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

METROPOLITAN CEMETERIES.

QUESTION—OBSERVATIONS.

*THE EARL OF MEATH, in rising to ask Her Majesty's Government whether they approve of the interment of bodies in burial grounds and cemeteries situated in populous centres, and, if not, whether they will take steps, by Orders in Council, to close for purposes of interment the Tower Hamlets City of London Cemetery in the East, and the Brompton Cemetery in the West, of the Metropolis, said: My Lords, I desire to draw your Lordships' attention to a danger, which I think is increasing, to the health of this Metropolis. Within the last half century, or, indeed, less than the last half century, over 1,250,000 bodies have been buried within what are now the limits of the Metropolis, and I think it is generally acknowledged at the present day by scientists and by all who take an interest in and who have studied the question, that the accumulation among great masses of population of vast quantities of decomposing human remains is dangerous, and increasingly dangerous, to the public health. It is now some years since Her Majesty's Government were given powers to refuse sanction to such burials in the Metropolis, and yet, curiously enough, there are two very large cemeteries situated within the Metropolitan area surrounded by large masses of population, in which burial is still permitted. I allude to the West Brompton Cemetery and the Tower Hamlets Cemetery at Bow. In the West Brompton Cemetery, which I understand was purchased by the Government in 1856, and which belongs, consequently, to the Government, and is under the control of the First Commissioner of Works, there are over 150,000 bodies buried, and it consists of only 38 acres. Consequently, that is at the rate of some 5,000 interred there a year. I believe that Her Majesty's Government have received from the dues paid from time to time a profit out of this ground of some £7,000 a year. I know that is a great temptation for Her Majesty's Government to say that this burial ground is still fit for interments; but the strength of individuals, and I suppose the strength of Governments is shown by their power of resisting temptation, and I hope Her Majesty's Government may resist any temptation that this £7,000 a year may hold out to them. Then, with regard to the West Brompton Cemetery, that is a still more serious case as a source of danger, for there we have not to deal with 38 acres, but only 17 acres, and 250,000 interments in place of 150,000, and also we have the fact that in some of what are called "common graves" as many as 70 bodies have been interred at one time. Resolutions have been passed by Local Bodies asking Her Majesty's Government to close this cemetery, and the answer that has been given is that there is still room for common graves. Now, my Lords, my contention is that this is not a question whether there is room for common graves or for graves which are uncommon, whatever they may be, but that within the metropolis no burials whatever ought to take place. We have here an enormous population of 4,500,000 crowded within a space of some 17 miles by 12 in size, and, I assert, and I think most of your Lordships will agree with me that we ought not to do anything which can unnecessarily pollute the air. Now, what does a great sanitary authority, Sir John Simon, say upon this subject in regard to common graves. He said in 1853 that they were most dangerous and that "no consideration of cheapness can justify the placing of many bodies in one pit;" and he goes on to say that overcrowding of graves causes the soil to become saturated and polluted with animal matter. Now, it is perfectly certain that in a large town like this, there is the greatest necessity for pure air. Scientific authorities tell us that it is impossible to obtain perfectly pure air considering the enormous number of human beings who are breathing out noxious gases, and who are consuming the oxygen which is the life of the human body. When we think also of the enormous number of animals there are in mews and elsewhere, when we consider the quantity of dust that must be swept up in the streets and the accumulation of dust and offal of all kinds, and when we consider the amount of organic matter that is floating in the air, I think it is extraordinary that we should permit any burials at all to take place within this Metropolis, when we are told by such an eminent sanitarian as Sir John Simon that those burials certainly conduce to the increase of organic matter in the air. I therefore beg to ask Her Majesty's Government the question which stands in my name.

LORD DE RAMSEY: My Lords, before answering the noble Lord's question, I desire to correct a misapprehension under which he labours with regard to the amount of payments from the Brompton Cemetery to the Government. He has stated that they are £7,000, but in reality I am informed that they are £6,000. I only mention that so that the noble Lord may not think for an instant that it has anything to do with the question of payments to the Government whether this cemetery is kept open or not. The Government do not approve of, and it is their policy to prevent, the interment of bodies in populous centres where it can be shown that the interments are or may be prejudicial to the public health. The Secretary of State has power to close by Order in Council burial grounds which may become overcrowded, or where it is obvious that too many might be interred, and be therefore prejudicial to the public health. No new burial grounds can be created in the Metropolis or in any district where an Order in Council has been applied for without the express sanction of the Secretary of State. In the selection and approval of new sites precautions are always taken as to the suitability of the soil, and drainage, and all other conditions necessary to the public health, and under no circumstances can a burial in a new ground take place within 100 yards of a dwelling-house without the consent of the owner, lessee, or occupier of such house. The powers given to the Secretary of State are most scrupulously exercised throughout the country. With regard to these two cemeteries which have been referred to, the West Brompton and the Tower Hamlets Cemeteries, when the noble Lord's question appeared on the Paper, the Secretary of State asked the Inspector to report as to the present condition of those two cemeteries, and he reported with regard to the West Brompton Cemetery that he has from time to time paid surprise visits to that cemetery, and that, in his opinion, it is not a source of danger to the public health. With regard to the Tower Hamlets Cemetery, the attention of the Secretary of State has from time to time been called to it, and careful regulations have been made with the view of preventing possible danger to the public health. The Inspector was specially instructed last year, in consequence of a representation that was made by the Mile End Vestry, to satisfy himself by occasional visits that the regulations were fully carried out. The Inspector has reported, with reference to the noble Lord's question, that since he received those instructions he has paid surprise visits to the cemetery, and has satisfied himself that the regulations are duly observed. He paid a visit as recently as the 3rd inst., and he saw nothing that led him to believe that the cemetery was a source of danger to the public health. The noble Earl is very well aware of the difficulties that the Secretary of State is under in relation to this subject—the difficulty of providing burial grounds for the poorer population. He is most careful in giving assent of any sort to any burial site; and it is only under exceptional circumstances that any site is allowed to be used in crowded districts as a burial ground.

NEWFOUNDLAND FISHERIES BILL.

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Lord KNUTSFORD): My Lords, when I introduced this Bill on the 19th of March I gave such a full explanation of the reasons which necessitated the introduction of the Bill and of the general policy of Her Majesty's Government that I should not feel justified in going over that ground again at any length. But, as some of your Lordships who are present to-night were not present on the former occasion, perhaps I may be allowed to refer as briefly as possible to some of the leading points I then brought under the notice of your Lordships. There is this additional reason for my taking this course. Since the First Reading of this Bill we have had the advantage of hearing a very able and temperate speech at the Bar of this House by Sir William Whiteway, the Premier of Newfoundland; and some of the points to which I shall refer appear to me to afford a sufficient answer to some of the objections which Sir William Whiteway raised. May I observe in passing that although Her Majesty's Government could not give their assent to many of the statements made in the Petition of the colonists—and, although they regretted the tone of some parts of that Petition—yet from the first they have never hesitated to give their ready assent to the prayer of that Petition that the Representatives of the colony should be heard at the Bar of the House? In the first place, then my Lords, I endeavoured to show on the former occasion that this Bill does not interfere with any local questions; that it does not interfere with any matter of internal regulation or administration in the colony, nor with the independence of the Colonial Legislature. The Bill is of an Imperial character, involving international obligations, and it has for its sole object to enable this country to secure the observance of those international obligations and arrangements which are binding upon us. Those obligations affect the fishery rights of the French along certain parts of the coast of Newfoundland, and are as binding upon the colony, as part of the Empire, as upon this country. We hold that the colonists received the grant of a Representative Legislature subject to such Treaties and obligations. Therefore, it became their duty, in the first instance, to pass such measures as might be necessary to secure the performance of those obligations; and I may say that in 1832, when the Legislature was given to the colony, Lord Goderich, Secretary of State for the Colonies, pointed out in a Despatch, dated July 27 of that year, that the Fisheries Act, which was an Act of the Imperial Parliament, would be continued two years—that is, till 1834—but that then the Colonial

Legislature should be called upon to act. I do not gather that this is disputed by Sir William Whiteway, though he made use of the expression that "the Legislature of the colony did not assume the duty." If he means by that that the colony does not acknowledge the duty, he has afforded the strongest possible argument, not only for the introduction of the Bill, but for its passing, because it amounts to a refusal to legislate. But I did not understand him to mean that. I understood him to point out to your Lordships that ever since 1834 the Colonial Legislature had not at any time been called upon to legislate, and that, in fact, no legislation had been passed either here or in the colony since that date. That is true. There has been no question of legislation from 1834 until now, but the reason is very obvious. Since that time the naval officers have year after year secured the observance of the Treaties along that part of the coast, and their powers were never doubted. It was not until last year that the question was raised as to the powers of the naval officers since the expiration of the Act of George IV. Proceedings were taken against Sir B. Walker, in the Supreme Court, and a decision was given on the points of law against the officers. Therefore, while it is not unnatural that no doubts having been raised no legislation should have been resorted to or required, during those many years, it is clear that doubts having now been raised, they must be removed by legislation. I showed on the former occasion that the Colonial Government had up to this time, that is until this Bill was introduced, declined to legislate, and that the responsibilities of this country remain in full force, and I showed also that the independence of the Colonial Legislature was guarded by the provisions of the 2nd section of the Act. I proceeded also on the former occasion to establish three other points. The first, and a very important one in our judgment, is this: I showed that Her Majesty's Government had from the very first endeavoured to the best of their power not only to ascertain, but to meet the wishes of the Colonial Government consistently with our observance of international obligations. After arbitration on the lobster question had been refused by the Colonial Government, full discussions took place in this country between ourselves and the Premier and his colleagues, whom we had previously invited over to consult generally on matters connected with the fisheries, and especially with the object of determining whether it would be possible to submit to arbitration the French claims connected with the lobster fisheries, and to consult generally with them as to the terms of reference. Their views as to arbitration, which, I may say, required as a condition the undertaking on the part of the French to withdraw altogether from the coast, were reduced to writing after discussion, and submitted to the French Government, who declined to accept them. After those views had been so proposed to the French Government and refused, we received what I still must call the ultimatum of the Newfoundland Government of December 5, 1890. In this the Colonial Ministers declared that they would not assent to any arbitration which did not include withdrawal of the French from the coast; and, further, that they declined altogether to legislate with reference to the modus vivendi for the season of 1891. It was not until after that ultimatum had been received that we were reluctantly compelled to arrive at the conclusion that we must give up all hopes of assistance and co-operation on the part of the Newfoundland Government in arriving at a settlement, and that we must take the conduct of affairs into our own hands. It has been argued that that ultimatum was displaced by a subsequent statement of the views of the Colonial Government on March 9. If your Lordships will turn to page 33 of the last Paper that has been presented to Parliament [C. 6334], you will see the Despatch which is supposed to have displaced the ultimatum. I may say that the Colonial Government were informed on January 23 that Her Majesty's Government felt compelled to maintain the position they had taken up, and to commence negotiations with France for arbitration; and on March 7 they were informed that arbitration on the lobster fishery questions would shortly take place; then, on March 9, came the protest from the Colonial Government, in a telegram from the Governor to myself—

Lord Knutsford

"My Government desire me, in reply to your Lordship's telegram of the 7th instant,"—that is the one in which I asked him to inform his Government that arbitration on the lobster fishery question would take place—

"to reiterate the views already so often expressed by them to Her Majesty's Government that they can assent to no Reference of any one particular point arising under the Fisheries Clauses of the Treaties of Utrecht, Paris, and Versailles, while other questions involved in these clauses and the declarations appended to the Treaty of Versailles are withheld from the Reference. My Government contend that the only arbitration, if such a course be necessary, should be on the whole of the Fisheries Clauses and declarations, and this view has been repeatedly expressed by the delegates to Her Majesty's Government, and my Government cannot agree to have any legal representative before any such partial arbitration, and they protest against any such restricted reference. They beg to remind Her Majesty's Government that the colony cannot be bound by the decision of any arbitration to which it has not given its adhesion, and, moreover, they cannot comprehend why Her Majesty's Government should desire such an arbitration after the conclusive opinion expressed by the Marquess of Salisbury, and after Comte d'Aubigny's admission that the French had no right to lobster factories on the Treaty shore."

I admit that the delegates repeatedly expressed their view that if any arbitration was necessary it should not be confined to one point, though at the same time it was strongly urged upon me more than once that no arbitration was necessary. But on no occasion in my recollection, and that of others present at the interviews, did the delegates last year agree to even a general arbitration without coupling some proposal with it—that is to say, withdrawal of the French from the coasts or some reduction or limitation of the bounty system. I may, in confirmation of that view, refer to a Letter sent from the Colonial Office to the Foreign Office (it is to be found at page 20 of the last Paper presented) immediately after one of those interviews, of which I will venture to read an extract—

"At this interview Sir William Whiteway and Mr. Harvey explained that their wish was that the negotiations should proceed on the following basis—that the French should relinquish their rights on the Newfoundland coasts, and should confine their bounties to fish consumed in French territories or possessions, in exchange for the free purchase of bait from all parts of the coasts of Newfoundland, and for a territorial or money compensation in addition. Sir William Whiteway and Mr. Harvey further assured his Lordship that they would be prepared to agree on behalf of the colony to any arbitration upon the basis of the withdrawal of the French from the coasts of Newfoundland."

I merely cite that as a confirmation of my recollection of what passed during those interviews. Certainly the telegram which I have just read of the 9th March makes no offer to agree to any unconditional arbitration. That was the first point I endeavoured to establish. The second point was this—that in the circumstances of the case, and in the interests of peace and order, it had become necessary for Her Majesty's Government to endeavour to arrive at some settlement with the French; to get the extent of the French rights defined; and for that purpose to propose arbitration. As the lobster catching question, involving rights to erect lobster factories, was the most burning question of the day, most likely to lead to collision unless settled, and therefore most urgent, it was agreed by both Governments that the arbitration should in the first instance be confined to this lobster question. I ventured to point out to your Lordships, though it was hardly necessary to do so, the double advantage to be derived from this proceeding. First, there would be no danger of collision, the danger lying in the present uncertainty as to the extent of rights under the Treaties and the divergence of views held by the two Governments of those rights. I ventured also to point out as a second advantage, that the probability of arriving at, if not a permanent settlement, at all events some working arrangement satisfactory to all parties, would be largely increased when once the rights were defined. The third point I endeavoured to establish on the First Reading of the Bill was that, after Sir Baldwin Walker had reported to us in November, 1889, that it would be almost—"Impossible to prevent collisions occurring in 1890 without some special provision was made; that there was an increasing feeling of resentment against the French, and increasing risk of this feeling showing itself in acts of an aggressive nature," that after receiving such an intimation as that from Sir Baldwin Walker, Her Majesty's Government were bound to anticipate this serious danger by endeavouring to arrive at some modus vivendi for the season of 1890, while dealing with the larger question of arbitration. I further pointed out that the same reasons held good for the continuance of the modus vivendi for the season of 1891, and, indeed, that a most inflammatory notice which was published and circulated at many of the leading fishing stations had tended very materially to aggravate the position even as reported by Sir B. Walker. I showed also the reason why, with reference to this modus vivendi, legislation had become necessary, because of the doubts which had been raised in 1890 as to the powers of the naval officers and the decision of the Supreme Court against the existence of those powers, and because the Colonial Government had by that time, in what I have called their ultimatum, absolutely and distinctly refused to give effect to the modus vivendi for 1891. My Lords, I will now, having thus briefly pointed out some of the leading points which I endeavoured to bring under your Lordships' notice on the 19th March, proceed to address myself to what has happened since the First Reading of the Bill. The reports in the colonial papers which have come over here show that very considerable irritation sprang up in Newfoundland upon hearing that a Bill had been introduced into the Imperial Parliament; but I do not think we must assume that there is the same feeling throughout the colony. I have received telegrams, which I think are to be found in the papers, from Mr. Howley, a Roman Catholic priest, who has as great an acquaintance with the views of the fishermen and the population on the West Coast as any one, and he states that he, and those with whom he had communicated, were not opposed, as are the politicians in St. John's, Newfoundland, to the measures taken by Her Majesty's Government. I may also point out, as showing that there is a divergence of opinion in different parts of the colony, that the fishermen on the West Coast have taken it into their own hands to resist the working of the Bait Act, and have determined to carry and sell bait to the French. I am not to be assumed as in any way upholding the action of the fishermen. I do not defend their committing a breach of the law of the land, but

I merely refer in passing to their proceedings as showing that opinion is not all one way in the colony; and we have a right in dealing with this subject to consider not only the feeling at St. John's, but also the feeling, such as we can ascertain it, in other parts of the colony. The attack upon the Government has, I may say, proceeded on two lines. There has been, in the first place, an attack upon the Bill and against the terms of it, and also upon Her Majesty's Government for introducing it; and, in the second place, there has been an attack upon the general policy of Her Majesty's Government in agreeing to arbitration on the lobster question, and possibly upon subsidiary questions, and in renewing the modus vivendi for 1891. Now, as regards the Bill, I have little to add to what I have already said. It has been called coercive and arbitrary, and regarded as interfering with the independence of the Colonial Legislature. I think I have shown that those vituperative epithets are misplaced as regards this Bill; that the policy of the Government is not of a colonial, but an Imperial character, though of course affecting rights along the coast of Newfoundland, and that the independence of the Colonial Legislature is not only secured, but almost prayed for by the 2nd section of the Bill. Sir W. Whiteway, in the speech which he delivered at the Bar, said—

"It is, indeed, provided that the Legislature of the colony may enact legislation to take the place of the present Bill; but this Bill is not to be suspended until the Local Legislature confers upon Her Majesty in Council the precise powers she would have under this Bill, and this provision is, therefore, but an illusory concession, meaning only that the burden of an Act of this Parliament can only be removed by enacting a similar Act in the Colonial Legislature."

That the Colonial Legislature should pass a similar Act in all respects is not required. There may be other means of attaining the end in view. If your Lordships turn to the 2nd section of this Bill you will find the words are, "until sufficient provision is made." Therefore, legislative provision may be made which is different to the Imperial Act, providing of course that it is sufficient to secure the desired object. For instance, some special Courts might be established by the Colonial Legislature, and if it is found possible to vest in such Courts or in the existing Courts powers which were supposed to be vested in the naval officers, that might be a provision which would be accepted. It is not required by the Bill that the terms of the Colonial Act should be identical with those of the Act of the Imperial Parliament; but, as I shall have occasion to point out, the question of the Courts would require some consideration. Then it is alleged that the colonists have been taken by surprise. Certainly the Colonial Government cannot be said to have been taken by surprise, because more than once in the discussions here last year I pointed out to Sir W. Whiteway and his colleague, Mr. Harvey, that if the colony would not legislate, Imperial legislation would be absolutely necessary. I am quite satisfied they will agree with me that that was brought under their notice more than once. Nor could our action, I think, be taken as a surprise to any colonist who had really studied the question, and who recognised the force of international obligations, and that we are bound to perform them on our part. After the doubts as to the powers of the naval officers had been raised, and after the Colonial Government had refused to legislate for the modus vivendi, it must have been realized by any one who had considered the question that Imperial legislation, sooner or later, would be resorted to. I must also remark in passing that expressions of surprise on the part of the colony had never been tempered with any statement of willingness to legislate until this Bill had been actually introduced. Her Majesty's Government knew that the Colonial Government would not legislate as to the modus vivendi—that they had absolutely refused to do. Neither had we had any hope held out to us that the Colonial Government would legislate in respect of the Treaties; and practically there was a refusal to legislate in respect of the arbitration, and to give effect to the decision of the arbitrators, as the colonists declined to be bound by it. That was shown distinctly by the telegram dated March 9, page 34 of the Blue Book, which I have already read to your Lordships, in which we are told that the colony cannot be bound by the decision of any arbitration to which it has not given its adhesion.

And there was a later reference in another telegram of March 24, page 39, in which the Governor informs me—

“My Government deeply regret that they are compelled by the action of Her Majesty's Government to adopt the only course which seems open to them, viz., that of declining to take part in or to be bound by an agreement to which they are not parties.”

I think, therefore, we were justified in assuming that the Colonial Government would not legislate in respect of this arbitration. I think that affords an answer to Sir W. Whiteway's point that Imperial legislation should not have been resorted to until the Colonial Legislature had declined to act. There can be no doubt of their having declined to act up to the time of the introduction of the Bill. As I have said, the Colonial Ministers were aware of the intention of Her Majesty's Government if it was necessary to resort to Imperial legislation, and yet they have persistently declined to introduce the measures which were necessary. And here I would refer in passing to the complaint which has been made, that information as to the Bill and the terms of the Bill was kept back from the colony. That was not the case, at all events as regards the terms of the Bill. It is true that by the 19th of January we had decided to introduce some measure, but the form of the Bill was not settled then, nor indeed were the terms decided upon until the First Reading on March 19, and the Governor of Newfoundland was simply informed of our intention of introducing some measure. That Despatch it is true was not communicated to the Colonial Government. Rightly or wrongly it was not thought desirable that the Despatch and enclosures containing a résumé of the position and views of Her Majesty's Government upon the whole question should be published in the colony while negotiations with the French Government were proceeding, but, as I have already pointed out, the colonists were not deprived by that delay of due notice of the terms of the Bill—for the best of all possible reasons, that those terms had not been decided upon, nor indeed were they finally settled until the Bill was introduced. Therefore, as to the terms of the proposed Bill not having been mentioned, the objection raised by Sir

W. Whiteway loses its force. I will frankly add that I am not disposed to agree with Sir W. Whiteway when he said that—

“If this Bill had before its introduction been submitted to the Government and Legislature of the colony, with an intimation of the British Government's intention to procure its enactment, such arrangements might have been made as would have prevented the present unpleasant conditions of affairs.”

The introduction of the Bill at an early date was necessary because of the approach of the fishing season, and I do not think, upon full consideration, it would have been proper, even if the terms of the Bill had been settled some time before its introduction, that they should have been sent out and published in the colony, and perhaps, even discussed in the Colonial Assembly, before the Bill had been introduced in your Lordships' House and laid before the Imperial Parliament. So far, my Lords, for the attack upon the Bill. I shall, however, have occasion to refer to some of the objections which have been made by the delegates to it and answer them. Then, as to the attack on the general policy of Her Majesty's Government, I must observe that even if we were as wrong as I believe we were right in referring the lobster question to arbitration and in continuing the modus vivendi for the season of 1891; still, it would have been necessary for us to introduce the Bill because of the doubts that had been raised with reference to the action of the naval officers, and upon the broad ground that in the absence of colonial legislation we are bound to take power to this country to secure the observance of the Treaties. The decision of the Supreme Court negatives the power of the naval officers not only with reference to the modus vivendi, but with reference to their powers along the coast altogether, including their powers to secure the observance of the Treaties. This Bill is, then, in any case, necessary, whether our policy has been wise or unwise, unless we are prepared to ignore or deny our international obligations, or unless the colony will legislate. It is argued that the Colonial Government always opposed arbitration limited to the lobster question, but were ready to assent to a general arbitration upon all questions arising under the Treaties. To this I reply, in the first place, that it is true that they objected to the limited arbitration upon the lobster question, but, as I pointed out to your Lordships on a former occasion, their objections were based on untenable grounds. They contended that our right to catch lobsters and to erect factories was so clear, and that the French claims were so clearly wrong, that there was nothing to refer to arbitration, and that our rights must be enforced. I confess I was astonished to find that this view was upheld by a gentleman who so long and so ably represented the Foreign Office in the House of Commons; for what must be the result if effect be given to that view? If the French maintained their claims collision and war must result from our enforcing our rights and resisting their claims by arms; and it is certain that the country would not support any Government in going to war upon such a question unless that Government had first exhausted all possible means of obtaining a peaceful settlement. As to the readiness of the Colonial Government to assent to a general arbitration, I think I have already shown beyond doubt that no unconditional offer has ever been made—that every offer to agree to a general arbitration has always been coupled with some proposal which the French would not accept. I may add that we have no reason to suppose at the present moment that the French Government would assent to a larger arbitration than that agreed to. Then, my Lords, the objection has been urged in the speech at the Bar that the policy of Her Majesty's Government violates the principle laid down by Mr. Labouchere in his Despatch of March 26, 1857. Now, assuming for the sake of argument that all successive Governments are bound for ever by the assurances given by Mr. Labouchere, however much the condition of affairs may vary from that which existed when those assurances were given, or however great an emergency may arise, yet I confidently submit that Her Majesty's Government did not offend against the principle so laid down, either in agreeing to a modus vivendi or in agreeing to arbitration. As to the modus vivendi, I cannot do better than read the answer given in my Despatch to the Governor of June 24, 1890—it is on page 7 of the Parliamentary Paper [C. 6256]—

Lord Knutsford

"This act on the part of Her Majesty's Government does not appear to them to have involved any departure from the principles laid down in the Despatch from the Secretary of State of the 26th of March, 1857, referred to by the Petitioners, of which the following is the actual wording—namely, that 'the rights enjoyed by the community in Newfoundland are not to be ceded or exchanged without their consent, and that the constitutional mode of submitting measures for that consent is by laying them before the Colonial Legislature; and that the consent of the community of Newfoundland is regarded by Her Majesty's Government as the essential preliminary to any modification of their territorial and maritime rights.' The modus vivendi does not cede or exchange any right enjoyed by the inhabitants of Newfoundland. Neither does it involve any modification of their territorial or maritime rights. Any right which British subjects have to erect lobster factories. . . although its exercise may be temporarily suspended, is not surrendered or prejudiced by the modus vivendi."

That appears to me, with deference, to be a complete answer to any charge that the modus vivendi was an infringement of the assurances given by Mr. Labouchere. As to the arbitration on the lobster question, it must be admitted, I think, that when a question of rights is in dispute it is not in any way a cession of those rights to endeavour to have the extent of the rights clearly defined. If without going to arbitration we had yielded all or any of the indefinite claims set up by the French, or if after the rights were defined we conceded any of those defined rights without the consent of the Colonial Government, I admit that we should be open to the charge of not having adhered to the principle laid down, or the assurances given, by Mr. Labouchere; but to endeavour to put an end to grave and complicated questions by obtaining an authoritative decision as to the extent of these rights surely cannot be held in any way to be an infringement of those assurances. And while I am upon this point, I should desire, with your Lordships' indulgence, to deal—and it will be convenient that I should do so now—with one of the further objections raised by Sir W. Whiteway against the Bill, namely, that this Bill is in direct opposition to Mr. Labouchere's assurances, because it empowers the Imperial Government to make permanent arrangements involving a cession of rights. There has been, I think, some misapprehension on this point. There is no departure whatever in this Bill in that respect. The Bill gives no additional powers to the Government which they do not now possess, to make permanent arrangements. If the Government for the time being were to decide to act without regard to the assurances given by Mr. Labouchere, that is to say if they decided to act without the consent of the colony or against its wishes, they could do so now, subject, of course, to their action being impugned, and to the possibility of their being defeated in Parliament. It is not very probable that a Government, except under some very grave pressure, would desire so to act in the face of those assurances which have remained in force so long. But at the present moment all I wish to point out is, that the Imperial Government could now, under their treaty-making powers, make such a permanent arrangement, and that there is no further or special power given to them by this Bill. Nor, I would venture to point out, does the Bill take away any power of protest or appeal against such arrangements. That is one of the objections raised by Sir W. Whiteway. There is not at the present moment any absolute power of rejection secured to the colony, indeed, such an absolute power of rejection would amount to something very like entire independence. But the effective means of protest, which the history of the colony shows have been very effectively exercised on several occasions, are not touched by this Bill. The colonists can still appeal in Parliament against any permanent arrangement, or any Order in Council, and take exactly the same steps that they could take before this Bill was brought into your Lordships' House. I think that before dealing with the proposals of the delegates, which were submitted by Sir William Whiteway at the Bar of the House, I have only one other observation to make with reference to that part of his speech which is contained under the second and third, but mainly under the fourth head of objections. I desire to protest most strongly against the attack made against the naval officers in those objections. For years past Her Majesty's officers have been charged with the duty of seeing that the Treaty rights are not infringed by either the French or the British fishermen, and that the rights of both countries are impartially secured. The statement made here at the Bar practically charges the naval officers with ignoring British rights, and only enforcing the rights which the French claim. Nothing can be more unjust than these attacks upon officers who have for years past been performing very difficult duties—duties which have become more difficult every year—with great tact, forbearance, and judgment. It may well be that in some cases officers, during those years, may have exceeded their instructions, but I can safely assert that in many of the cases where complaints have been made and have been examined into, the charges have been proved to be either ill-founded or grossly exaggerated. If these charges are to be continued against Her Majesty's officers, it is only just and fair to them that the charges should be brought to the notice of the Government and the Admiralty without delay, after the acts of which complaint is made have been done, and that dates and full particulars should be given so that the facts may be, as they certainly would be, fully tested. With reference to the concluding paragraph of Sir W. Whiteway's speech under the fourth head of objection, I would observe that this Bill again does not interfere in the slightest degree with the jurisdiction, or any part of the work, of the Colonial Courts. That paragraph states—

"We therefore most earnestly urge that Her Majesty's ordinary Courts of Justice in Newfoundland are the tribunals which should adjudicate upon questions arising between British and French fishermen. From any judgments in such Courts a final appeal would lie to Her Majesty and the Privy Council. In no case should naval officers be permitted to try causes arising as aforesaid, since Courts of Justice already exist in the colony for the purpose; and if it be deemed impossible for the ordinary Courts to enforce the law in such a manner as to adequately assure justice to the French, then we ask that special Courts should as they could, of course, be established."

The jurisdiction of the Colonial Courts is not in the least interfered with by the Bill; and I apprehend, speaking subject to the correction of noble and learned Lords present, that the view stated by Sir W. Whiteway in the first part of the passage that I have read,

"That Her Majesty's ordinary Courts of justice in Newfoundland are the tribunals which should adjudicate upon questions arising between British and French fishermen" is correct. I apprehend that the Courts can do so now, and that if the question as to the construction of a Treaty were to arise before the Court in the course of such proceeding it would be decided in the ordinary way by the Court subject to appeal to the Privy Council. That decision no doubt would bind persons residing in the colony and within the colonial jurisdiction, and if a foreign Power, affected by that decision, were to dissent from it I presume that the mode of proceeding would be by diplomatic representations, and that the foreign Power would communicate with the Government of this country and protest against the construction put upon the Treaty by the Court. I therefore am not prepared in any way to dissent from what is stated by Sir W. Whiteway in that paragraph. As to the possibility or practicability of erecting special Courts, by which I suppose is meant Courts with French, Colonial, and English Judges, whose decisions are by agreement to be binding upon all the Governments, I am not prepared at present to offer an opinion, but as far as the statement in the speech goes, I see no reason to dissent from it. I am afraid I have taken up a great deal of time this evening, but I think it only fair to Her Majesty's Government to state the case fully and to state the reasons why we introduced this Bill, and why we have assented to arbitration. Now, I will turn to the proposals which were brought forward by Sir W. Whiteway on behalf of the colony. Though those proposals, it is true, have not yet been accepted, Her Majesty's Government have considered them with an earnest desire to find a friendly solution. It is not quite clear whether the first and second proposals are to be taken as a whole, or whether they may be dealt with independently; nor, again, is it quite clear whether the sub-heads of each proposal are to be taken as a whole, or again dealt with independently of each other. The first sub-head of the first proposal is—

"First—(a) the Newfoundland Legislature to pass immediately an Act authorising the execution for this year of the modus vivendi, the award of the Arbitration Commission regarding the lobster question, and the Treaties and declarations under instructions from Her Majesty in Council."

The second sub-head is this—

"(b) The further progress of the Bill now before Parliament to be deferred until the passing of the above Act, and the Bill then to be withdrawn."

Assuming, as I do, that the proposals may be taken independently, I may state on behalf of Her Majesty's Government that, looking to the very close approach of the fishing season, and to the terms of the engagements which we have made with France, we think it necessary that the Bill should pass through this House, with such amendments and alterations as may be made in Committee; but we are willing to agree that the Second Reading shall not be taken in the House of Commons until after the Whitsuntide Holidays are over. That would bring us, I believe, to about the 21st May. If by that time the Colonial Legislature has passed an Act which, in the opinion of Her Majesty's Government, sufficiently secures the observance and execution—first, of the modus vivendi for 1891; secondly, of the decision of the arbitrators upon the lobster questions; and, thirdly, of the Treaties and declarations, Her Majesty's Government will not go forward with this Bill. If such an Act, however, has not by that time been passed by the Colonial Legislature, it will become necessary to press this Bill rapidly forward for the reason I have already stated—namely, the close approach of the fishing season. I think, my Lords, it will be seen that this practically amounts to an acceptance of the substance of the first sub-heads of the first proposal made by the delegates, and I hope that our proposals will be accepted as satisfactory. We are also willing to consider the third sub-head of the first proposal, which runs as follows:—

"(c) The terms of an Act to empower Courts and provide for regulations to enforce the Treaties and declarations to be discussed and arranged with the delegates now in this city as rapidly as possible, and to be enacted by the Legislature of the colony as soon as agreed upon."

We are quite ready to consider with the delegates the terms of a Bill such as is referred to in that sub-head (c), but it must be manifest to your Lordships that there are difficulties of an international character which would require full discussion and careful handling; and it should be understood, therefore, that the passing of the Colonial Act should not be delayed until the terms of the proposed Bill are settled. The second proposal of the delegates is as follows. This is the first sub-head—

"Secondly—(a) the present arbitration agreement not to be allowed to operate further than the lobster question without the prior consent of the colony, and in this case the colony to be represented upon the Commission."

And the second sub-head is—

"(b) The colony desires an agreement for an unconditional arbitration on all points that either party can raise under the Treaties and declarations; and, if this be arranged between Great Britain and France, Newfoundland will ask to be represented upon such arbitration, and will pass an Act to carry out the award."

With regard to this second proposal, Her Majesty's Government require further time for consideration. We do not feel any difficulty as to the colony being represented on the Commission, and, as will be seen by the Papers which have been presented to Parliament, we have requested the Colonial Government to name a delegate to act upon the present arbitration as to the lobster questions, a request which, I regret, has not been accepted. We are not, however, prepared to assent to the first sub-head, that is to say that—although the colonists may rest assured further that we should not agree to refer subsidiary points to the arbitrators until after full consultation with the colony, and after clearly ascertaining the views of the Colonial Government and Legislature. It is clear also, as regards the second sub-head, namely, that "the colony desires an agreement for an unconditional arbitration," that we cannot compel the French Government to agree to an unconditional arbitration of the kind referred to, nor as I said before, so far as I am aware, is there at present any probability of their assenting to any such unconditional and general arbitration. Every consideration will be paid to the wishes of the colony, but if this general arbitration is to be made a sine qua non to the acceptance of the first proposal, Her Majesty's Government, as at present advised, have no alternative but to carry through this Bill. In conclusion, I would say that Her Majesty's Government earnestly trust that this may not be necessary, and they confidently believe that, after what has been said this evening, credit will be given to them for endeavouring as far as they can, consistently with our international obligations, to meet the wishes of the Colonial Government and Legislature. I thank your Lordships for having so patiently listened to me, and I now beg to move the Second Reading of the Bill.

"The present arbitration agreement is not to be allowed to operate further than the lobster question without the prior consent of the colony,"

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^a."
—(The Lord Knutsford.)

*THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: My Lords, it seems to me that three questions are raised for consideration, and it will be convenient to take them separately. The first is whether any legislation at all is necessary; the second is whether this Bill is proper legislation on the question; and the third is, the consideration of the proposals of the colonial delegates to which the noble Lord has referred. Now, as to the necessity for legislation, I adhere entirely to what I said on the occasion of the introduction of the Bill by the noble Lord, that it seems to me he made out a distinct case for legislation of some kind, and if that legislation is refused by the colony, then I think that the legislation must be passed by the Imperial Parliament. There are two obvious reasons why it is impossible to avoid such legislation; first and principally, as the noble Lord has pointed out, because it has been discovered that, in fact, there exists at the present time no lawful mode of enforcing our Treaty obligations in Newfoundland, and it is quite obvious that the accident that an Act which gave the necessary power was allowed to lapse so that we find ourselves unable to enforce those Treaty obligations at the present time by any legal means, cannot in any way relieve us from our duty to the other party to the Treaty, and that we are absolutely called upon by good faith and in the interests of this country, and of the Empire generally, to see that there is lodged in the hands of Government—I mean either the Colonial Government or the Government of this country—power to enforce our Treaty engagements, be they what they may. Then there is a further question which has also rendered some legislation necessary, namely, the enforcement of what is termed the modus vivendi. The modus vivendi, as has been explained to the House, is a means of dealing temporarily with the question of the lobster fishery, and it is quite obvious that during the negotiations with France it is plainly necessary that there should be what I may call a truce between the parties until the respective rights are ascertained. That is the object of the modus vivendi, and that does not in any way infringe upon the assurances given by Mr. Labouchere to the colony, because this modus vivendi is not for the purpose, as I understand it, of making a new Treaty engagement, but is for the purpose of ascertaining what is the specific meaning of the Treaty engagements now subsisting. Therefore, as regards the modus vivendi it is quite clear there must be legislation of some kind, and as regards our general engagements and Treaty obligations there must be some legislation. I need say no more upon that point, because the noble Lord has elaborated it rather fully. I now come to the more important question, namely, as to this Bill itself, and the mode in which it has been introduced. I am quite certain that Her Majesty's Government and every one in this House will agree that when it is necessary to introduce legislation of this kind all possible means should be exhausted in order to do so in a manner which will be least likely to offend the susceptibilities of the colonists with whom we have to deal, and I am very glad that to a considerable extent, I must agree, that course has been pursued by Her Majesty's Government. They saw the delegates last year, and communicated and negotiated with them at great length; they also negotiated repeatedly with the Colonial Government, and asked them whether they would be prepared to enforce the modus vivendi; but the Colonial Government, I think it was on December the 9th, undoubtedly refused to legislate for the purpose. So far, my Lords, I have no fault to find with Her Majesty's Government, but upon one point their proceedings were somewhat unfortunate, and I do not think the noble Lord upon that point quite successfully defended himself—I mean as to their not communicating to the Newfoundland Government, and through the Newfoundland Government to the Newfoundland Legislature, the intention of Her Ma-

jeesty's Government—if there were not any legislation passed by the Colonial Legislature to legislate by the Imperial Parliament. Such a step as that, being of the most grave nature, and being one which directly dealt with the privileges and the status of the colony as regards this matter should, whatever might be the expectation as to the answer the colony would give, have been at the earliest possible period communicated to the Newfoundland Government, and through them to the Newfoundland Legislature. I am rather surprised that Her Majesty's Government had not made up their minds somewhat sooner, seeing how long this matter had been under consideration; but when they did make up their minds not a moment should have been lost in communicating with the Newfoundland Government; and if your Lordships will refer to the latest Papers which have been presented to Parliament you will see it is very singular that several communications were made to the Newfoundland Government with reference to this particular arbitration, and yet not a word was said in them until a late period as to any legislation. On the 23rd January, 1891, a telegram was sent by the noble Lord to the Government of Newfoundland, in which he informed them—

“Her Majesty's Government feel compelled to maintain the position they have taken up, both as regards commencing negotiations with France for arbitration, and as to deferring the ratification of the draft convention with the United States.”

Possibly at the time Her Majesty's Government had not made up their mind as to the legislation here. But let us look on a little later. The Government of Newfoundland on the 9th March repeated—

“That they can assent to no reference of any one particular point arising under the Fisheries Clauses of the Treaty of Utrecht, Paris, and Versailles.”

And then they also said they—“Cannot agree to have any legal representative before any such partial arbitration, and they protest against any such restricted reference.”

That was on the 9th of March. In answer to that the noble Lord the Secretary of State for the Colonies telegraphed on the 12th of March to Newfoundland—

"Agreement for arbitration signed yesterday. Further full information will be sent as soon as possible."

I cannot understand why at the same time the Newfoundland Government was not informed that in order to carry into effect that arbitration it was necessary to introduce a Bill into Parliament; because your Lordships will observe that it is actually contemplated by the Agreement or arbitration itself. In the Notes which were exchanged between the noble Marquess opposite and the French Ambassador it is stated that the French Government on the one hand reserve the consent of their Legislature, and that the Government of this country reserve the assent of Parliament. Therefore, it is quite clear that at that time, when the Arbitration Agreement was signed Her Majesty's Government contemplated that they would have to apply to Parliament for powers. I cannot understand therefore, why they did not immediately inform the Legislature of Newfoundland of the fact. I find further on, which is even more remarkable, that on the 16th of March, when an elaborate telegram is sent to the Newfoundland Government giving the full text of the Agreement for arbitration, signed on the 11th of March, not a word is said as to the intention of the Government to introduce a Bill for carrying into effect and enforcing the Treaties. I think it was unfortunate, the colony being extremely sensitive (and it is not to be wondered at that they should be extremely sensitive on a point of this kind), that this should have been overlooked, and that the colony was not informed at the earliest possible moment, and in the fullest possible manner that the circumstances admitted, that the Bill would be introduced. The noble Lord opposite has said that Her Majesty's Government had not agreed upon the actual terms of the Bill, but they might have informed the Newfoundland Government that a Bill would be introduced, and that its terms would be communicated to them as soon as possible. I cannot say that I attach much importance to the objections of the noble Lord that it would have been wrong that the provisions of that Bill should have been submitted to the Newfoundland Government, and discussed in the colony before it had come before Parliament; on the contrary, that is the very thing which they ought to have been told, because it might very well have happened that in discussing the matter a way out of the difficulty would have been suggested, but by the course which has been followed the Government here have laid themselves open to this assertion of the delegates that if this Bill had, before its introduction in Parliament, been submitted to the Government and Legislature of the Colony, with an intimation of their intention to secure its enactment by Parliament, such results might have been arrived at as would have prevented the present unpleasant condition of affairs. No one can tell now, of course, whether that would have been the case or not, but no one can say that it might not have been so, and, considering the proposals which the delegates have now made, I think that it is by no means impossible that that result might have been arrived at; and, if that result had been arrived at, then all this friction with the colony, and this very disagreeable necessity of applying to Parliament might have been avoided. So much for the mode in which the Bill has been introduced. I come now to the Bill itself, and here I must say there are, I think, various parts of the clauses of this Bill to which very serious objection may be taken. As regards the first part of it, I take no exception. I take no exception to the first clause, which says that—

"The enactments set out in the Schedule to this Act shall be revised and have full effect, and the Treaty or Treaties therein named shall include not only the Newfoundland fishery engagements, but also any temporary arrangement made in France either before or after the passing of this Act."

An objection may perhaps be taken to it as retroactive with regard to its application before the passing of the Act. I think there is some question upon that, but as regards the modus vivendi which would be rendered operative by this 1st clause, and as regards the Treaties generally, I have no objection to make. That does not apply to the particular enactments which are revived, but to the principle of legislating to enforce the modus vivendi and the Treaties. But when I came to the 2nd sub-section of the 1st clause of the Bill I was extremely astonished when I read it. I must ask your Lordships to allow me to read the words of that sub-section, because it is very important to see exactly what it is the words carry with them—

"If any permanent arrangement is made between the United Kingdom and France with respect to the differences which have arisen upon the Newfoundland fishery engagements, it shall be lawful for Her Majesty by Order in Council to direct that the enactments hereby revived shall apply, and the same shall apply accordingly, as if such permanent arrangement were a Treaty mentioned in the said enactments."

Now, it appears to me this gives by anticipation power to the Crown to enforce any Treaty which the Crown may make for modifying the Treaties now subsisting between us and France with regard to the Newfoundland Fisheries without any further application to Parliament—a power to enforce any new Treaty that may be made. With regard to that there seem to me to be two vital objections—the first, a very special objection, that it goes directly in the teeth of the engagement made by Mr. Labouchere with the Colonial Government, because the engagement which was made by Mr. Labouchere with the colony was that the consent of the community of Newfoundland is regarded by Her Majesty's Government as the essential preliminary to any modification of their territorial or maritime right. Now, the original proposal laid before this House by the noble Lord the Secretary of State for the Colonies, as I understood it, was no violation of the assurance given by Mr. Labouchere, for the simple reason that the arbitration was not for the purpose of making a new Treaty, but only to ascertain what the meaning of the existing Treaty is. I find that the noble Marquess, in reply to the observations I made to the House, laid this down with great distinctness. He said—

"All we desire to do is not to modify or alter the status of the colony in any degree, but really to ascertain what that status is before a tribunal of International Law."

Nothing can be clearer than that statement. But this clause enables the Government to make any new permanent arrangements they please, and that, as I have said, would be in the teeth of the assurances given to the Newfoundland Government by Mr. Labouchere. But I go further and say that it seems to set aside Parliament in a manner most unusual, and which seems to me entirely unprecedented, because, as I understand the course that has always been taken in this country with regard to the Treaties with foreign States—the universal practice has been this: The Crown has complete power to conclude Treaties with any foreign States, and if the provisions of those Treaties can be enforced in this country without further legislation nothing further need be done. The consent of Parliament is not necessary to the Treaties, but if there be anything in the Treaties which cannot be enforced in this country under the existing law of the country, then it is necessary to go to Parliament and to obtain the consent of Parliament to the passing of that legislation, and unless Parliament consents, the Treaty falls to the ground. There are numerous instances in which this has occurred, but if this Bill were to pass, Her Majesty's Government would have the power to conclude a new Treaty with France as to the fisheries of Newfoundland, entirely altering the maritime and territorial rights of the colony, and inasmuch as such a permanent arrangement would apply as if it were a Treaty mentioned in the enactments set out in the Schedule to the Bill, full power would exist to enforce any such new Treaty without any further application to Parliament. It seems to me, therefore, that this is a clause which ought never to have been included in this Bill, and to which I sincerely trust Parliament will not be induced to agree. It is really not necessary for the Bill, because, if it should come to pass that Her Majesty's Government were able to conclude a satisfactory Treaty with France on this matter, the whole course would be simple enough, the consent of Parliament would readily be obtained and the Treaty would then come into force. Again, I have a further criticism to make upon Sub-section 3. Possibly that might establish a precedent of the advisability of which I am not at all sure. There is a provision in Sub-section 3 of Clause 1—

That also is open to considerable objection, and for this reason, that if I am right in my contention that a new permanent arrangement can be made under Sub-section 2, then it would seem that instead of the assent of Parliament being asked for in the regular way, and the whole matter being submitted to Parliament, an Order in Council for this purpose is to be laid on the Table of both Houses of Parliament for a month, and that Parliament does not address the Queen against the Order, then I conclude the intention is that it shall take effect. It is not stated here that the Order shall fall to the ground if Parliament does address the Crown in either House within that time; but, practically, I suppose, that would put an end to the Order. Otherwise the assent of Parliament is obtained. Surely that is not the way in which we have dealt or ought to deal with important Treaties of this kind. It has not been the custom that instead of the Crown having to come to Parliament for the necessary power to carry Treaties into effect, draft Orders for that purpose should be merely on the Table of both Houses of Parliament, just as some Order in regard to education. I do not think that is the proper way in which so solemn an instrument as a Treaty should be dealt with. Then with regard to the Newfoundland Legislature, I do not see that there is any provision at all, unless it is to be supposed that if the Newfoundland Legislature should address the Crown that would stop the Order. I do not think that is intended, and it seems to me, therefore, to be without any safeguard as regards the Newfoundland Legislature. Those are the criticisms which I wish to make on the principal clauses of the Bill, but I desire to say something further, and I come now to one of the objections which have been made by the colonial delegates, and to which the noble Lord referred. I mean with regard to the jurisdiction exercised by the naval officers. I think the noble Lord was a little too severe on the delegates in saying that they had spoken disparagingly—I do not remember his exact phrase, but in a manner in regard to the naval officers which those naval officers did not deserve. I am quite sure that no body of men can have deserved better of this country or the colony than our naval officers. The discretion they have exercised in administering these difficult questions under the Treaties has been great, and they have done their duty in a manner deserving all praise; but I do not understand the meaning of the objections of the delegates to be what the noble Lord appears to have understood them to mean. They do not object, as I understand, on the ground that the naval officers have exercised their powers in any way that is blameable, but they protest against the nature of the jurisdiction of the naval officers. What they say is that naval officers act arbitrarily, which no doubt they do; that naval officers are not learned in the law, which no doubt they are not; and that the interests of the colony ought to be dealt with in regular Courts, and not by naval officers. And the noble Lord quite admitted that view. He said, and I was glad to hear him say so, it would be better that such matters as could be referred to the Courts should be referred to them. If I might throw out an opinion of my own on the matter, I should think that probably we might find that the proper solution would be that the naval officers should continue to enforce the Treaties as far as the territorial waters are concerned. I say this, not wishing at all to intrude into that very difficult department of law as to the precise jurisdiction exercised over territorial waters; but I do not think the Newfoundland Government could exercise that necessary control which must be exercised in the waters of the colony. The great length of its shore, the necessity for prompt action in these territorial waters, and the fact that the Newfoundland Government could not afford to keep the number of cruisers which would be necessary for enforcing the Act, and the possible fact that there might be a less friendly feeling between the commanders and crews of such cruisers and the French, than between the French and the commanders and crews of Her Majesty's vessels, are all reasons why the jurisdiction as regards the waters of the colony ought, I think, to be exercised under instructions from Her Majesty's Government by our naval officers. But I draw a great distinction as regards the jurisdiction on land. I cannot conceive that any one would say it is a proper mode of exercising juriadiction on land that it should be exercised by naval officers under instructions from the Government. The state of things in former times was, as the delegates put it, very different from their present state. Here is a coast 700 miles in length, used only for fishing purposes, and practically uninhabited, except during the fishing season. Under those circumstances, I quite understand that it was not found practicable to refer these matters to the Courts, and the only way in which it could be done was to refer them to the naval officers. But the state of things has altogether changed. This shore is now settled. There are markets there apart from the fisheries; there are minerals discovered, trade growing up, and altogether the circumstances are entirely changed from the condition of things when the Act of George IV. was passed. I should regard it as a great misfortune if we had now to enforce these Treaties in such a manner as are indicated by the Act of George IV. It seems to me to be of importance that the Treaty rights, be they what they may on land, should be enforced through the Courts. The noble Lord described most accurately what the course would be. He pointed out that an application would be made to the Court in the first instance, and that appeals would lie to the Privy Council if there were dissatisfaction with the decisions, and that, of course, the French Government would retain on its part all the power of remonstrating against the result if it had reason to think the Treaty had not been duly carried into effect. The International rights would be entirely untouched. I should a little doubt whether by special Courts the delegates mean Courts in which the French would take part. I should think not, but rather special Imperial Courts which would act independently of the ordinary Courts of the Colony. I am strongly of opinion—and I would press this upon your Lordships—that we should on this occasion establish some Court of competent jurisdiction which would deal with all these matters on land, and I am confident that would go a very long way towards removing the disagreeable feeling among the colonists of Newfoundland with regard to the enforcement of the Treaties upon their coast.

The Earl of Kimberley

The other points which the delegates alluded to it is not necessary that I should go into at any length. I will only touch briefly upon one or two of them. With regard to including the whole of these questions in one negotiation, I agree with the noble Lord that I do not think Her Majesty's Government could bind themselves absolutely that they would not negotiate on this subject in such manner as they might think advisable, and that they would not submit a particular question if it was found necessary to do so. The Crown having in its charge the foreign relations of the Empire, and being responsible for the execution of the Treaties must of course, in the last resort, exercise its discretion as to what may be the best mode of negotiating with a Foreign Power. Having said that, I think I am only expressing the view held by the noble Marquess himself, opposite, when I say that it would be far better if all these questions were submitted, and I say so for this reason that in the correspondence which has been presented to Parliament, the noble Marquess himself formulated a series of questions for submission to the arbitrators. The French Government declined to submit to more than one question, and I am not disposed to impugn the action of Her Majesty's Government when they found the French Government would not submit all these questions to arbitration, in agreeing to confine the arbitration at present to the question of lobster fisheries. At the same time, I sympathise with the colonists in their strong desire that the whole matter should be referred to arbitration. That is in the interest of all concerned. It is a matter of great and deep interest to this country that the whole matter should be determined, and when I say that the whole matter should be submitted to arbitration, I mean always the interpretation of the Treaty in the sense in which this Convention has been concluded. Indeed, it seems to me almost impossible to contend that if there is a difference of opinion with regard to the meaning of the Treaty this difference of opinion should be settled by arbitration on one point only, and not upon all. In principle, if it is right to go to arbitration upon one of the points, it must be equally right to go to arbitration upon all, and I still hope that under the Convention it will be found that the French Government, when the lobster question is decided, may agree that the rest of the questions may be submitted. But there seems to me to be a danger which I hope will be guarded against by Her Majesty's Government. I do not think it would be fair to the colony or to ourselves that this Convention should be hung up for an indefinite time. Every one will see that there are strong reasons why the questions at issue should be dealt with within a reasonable time. The object of all parties is to prevent collision, and to allay irritation. Nothing tends so much to increase irritation as to have something of this kind hanging over peoples heads which may be dealt with some day, but they do not know when. It is important, therefore, I think, that it should be dealt with as soon as possible. Then the colonists have one other point of objection—that is, as to St. Pierre and Miquelon. As to that I observe the noble Lord the Secretary of State for the Colonies, in a Letter which is printed in the correspondence, himself stated that he felt the force of the argument of the colony with reference to St. Pierre and Miquelon. The question as to St. Pierre and Miquelon are a very difficult and delicate part of the whole subject; but I must say that I agree with the noble Lord that the using St. Pierre and Miquelon to smuggle goods into the colony does seem to me to go considerably beyond anything which could have been anticipated in the Declaration by George III. Therefore, I do not think the contention of the colony unreasonable, that this is a question which might at the proper time be brought forward. My Lords, I have nothing more to say except as to the important question of the proposals of the delegates. I am extremely glad to hear from the noble Lord that Her Majesty's Government are prepared, under certain conditions, to accept those proposals. I confess, however, that I am sorry they appear to have made up their minds to press the Bill through this House. Unless the necessity is of so urgent a character that it is absolutely unavoidable on account of time—and I cannot conceive that to be the case—that the Bill should be pressed forward so urgently, it appears to me in the interest of our relations with the colony that it is extremely desirable we should fall in so far with the wishes of the delegates as not to proceed with the Bill until they have had a reasonable time within which to pass the necessary Acts. I am told they will pass them with great rapidity. I do not appear here, as your Lordships will have seen, as the representative of the colonists' view. By no means. I feel strongly for the colonists, but I am bound to say that from the very peremptory manner in which they have rejected one proposal after another, and on account of the very strong language which they have thought necessary to use towards Her Majesty's Government, it may almost be said that there has been a certain amount of provocation. But I do not think anything in regard to provocation ought to enter into our minds on this occasion at all. The question we have to deal with is not as to the past, but the present; and if, after all that has passed, the colony holds out the olive branch to us, and if we can see means by which we can smooth down angry feelings, is it not to the interest of both parties to take any means by which that object can be attained? Your Lordships will see this is a question which, although this colony is a small one, may have a very far-reaching effect. There are other colonies besides Newfoundland, and the relations between ourselves and the Colony of Newfoundland are being closely watched by all of them. If we do anything which may appear to indicate that we have put a pressure upon this colony over and above the absolute peremptory necessities of the case, I am afraid it may arouse an unpleasant feeling not in Newfoundland alone. We all feel that if the colonists in Newfoundland have been provoked, there is great excuse for them. I can hardly conceive a more unfavourable position than their colony is in with reference to this Treaty. Then there is this further consideration: that it is only to the interest of Newfoundland, but not of the whole Empire, that the carrying into effect this Treaty, by which we are bound to France, should be as far as possible smoothed and unaccompanied by disagreeable incidents to the colonists, for it is impossible for us to conceal from ourselves that we—and this affects us all throughout the Empire—run the risk during the fishing season of some collision or other which we should all deplore. If the colonists are in a friendly state of mind, it is clear the execution of the Treaty may be facilitated. For all these reasons it seems to me to the interest of Her Majesty's Government, and of all parties, that anything which can be done to smooth down these angry feelings should be done under present circumstances. With regard to these proposals, I do not speak, of course, with any authority in reference to them, but only my own opinion as to what seems to me to be their effect. As I understand them—I hope rightly, and I think as the noble Lord is disposed to understand them also—they are these: The first proposal is that they will immediately authorise the execution for this year of the modus vivendi of the Award, the Treaties, and Declarations. I understand that really, in one sense, to stand alone; they promise to do this at once, without any conditions, and that we are not to wait until we have agreed to arrangements as to the Courts. Under Sub-section A they have expressed an assurance that they will proceed at once to pass legislation, and their passing legislation under Sub-section A is not to be delayed until you have agreed upon Sub-section C. It would take some time to see what these Courts should be, and, therefore, Sub-section A must not be delayed, but must be acted upon at once. It is obviously so, because we have no powers at present to enforce the Treaties, and those powers we must have at once. My Lords, I have very little further to say. I have spoken as to the prior consent of the colony to arbitration upon one particular point being not indispensable, though it is most desirable to agree with them if possible. As regards the arbitration being on all the disputed questions, that is a condition which we have no power to enforce; but as we and the colony are both agreed that it is desirable, that cannot be one of the conditions which the colony make a sine qua non of their action. I will conclude by saying this: that I consider this a very fair and friendly offer as it stands. I am not concerned to look into how it comes about, and I think we should take the offer as it stands. We should endeavour to compose present differences between ourselves and the colony. I should have preferred greatly that Her Majesty's Government should have waited until the colony had had some short opportunity of passing legislation; and if that were done, I think we should find ourselves very happily out of a very difficult and dangerous position. With regard to the Bill itself, I have said what I have to say, and have explained my objections to the particular form in which it is drawn; but as I hope the Bill will never have to be carried into effect, my objections will not have to be pressed as they otherwise would.

•THE EARL OF DUNRAVEN: My Lords, I should like to make a few remarks upon this Bill, because it appears to me to be a measure which may have very far-reaching consequences, and may have a result far larger and wider than those which merely apply to the colony most particularly interested. I am sure your Lordships, whatever views you may entertain about this Bill, will approach its consideration with a feeling of considerable reluctance; and feeling that it is a very hard necessity that is placed upon us that we should have to consider such legislation at all, affecting as it does the Government of a self-governing colony. But, my Lords, alongside of that we are face to face with the absolute paramount duty of this country to carry out its Treaty obligations—it is perfectly true that in this case nobody knows exactly what those Treaty obligations are. But in the meantime an arrangement of a temporary character has been concluded with France, and one thing is perfectly certain, and no one in this House will dispute it, that it is absolutely necessary legal means should be provided for carrying out that arrangement. I hold there can be no doubt whatever that if a self-governing colony, by the use of legislating powers devolving upon it, does not provide necessary legislation in a question of this kind, the duty of providing it reverts in that case to the Imperial Parliament. As regards the Bill itself, there are one or two matters

I should like to point out. The principal object of the Bill I take to be to legalise the method whereby the modus vivendi with France may be carried out. I have some doubts whether the modus vivendi with France can be carried out any more easily, or any more legally, by Her Majesty's naval officers after this Bill is passed—if it is passed—than before. The modus vivendi, as your Lordships know, is an arrangement of a temporary character as regards the lobster industry. It makes arrangements that factories shall not be put up except under certain circumstances, and that where disputes arise the naval officers of France and England respectively can decide upon them. As your Lordships are aware, matters were brought, as I may say, to a head not very long ago when a lobster factory, the property of a British subject, was removed by order of one of Her Majesty's officers. An action was brought by the owner of the lobster factory for damages, and judgment was given in his favour, and the object of the present Bill, or its principal object, is to legalise such action on the part of the naval officers should it become necessary to do similar acts again. I think that is a fair statement of the case. What the Bill proposes to do is to re-enact certain sections of the Act of 1824, and I would ask your Lordships to look particularly at Section 12, which we are to re-enact. Your Lordships will see that the Queen can, by Order in Council, give such instructions as are necessary for carrying out the modus vivendi to the naval officers, and the naval officers, acting upon those instructions, can do certain things which are specified in this section. That is to say, they can remove certain works from the shore—

"They can remove, or cause to be removed, any stages, flakes, train fats, or other works whatsoever."

So far, so good. "Other works whatsoever" is a very comprehensive term, and would certainly include the case of a lobster factory. Naval officers are given every conceivable power they may require. But if your Lordships look at the language following those words and governing them, it appears that the powers are not so ample as might be supposed; for it goes on to say those works are to be—

"Works erected by Her Majesty's subjects for the purpose of carrying on the fishery."

I ask your Lordships' attention to those words because, as I read this section, the only power given to the naval officers would be to remove any "works" erected on the shore for the purpose of the fishery. What is the fishery? My Lords, that is the very matter in dispute. That is the very question about which we are going to arbitrate. We have got to find out whether lobsters are fish, and whether the lobster industry is a portion of the fisheries of Newfoundland. We have made a modus vivendi to enable us to get along amicably until this question whether the lobster industry is a fishery or not is decided, and in the meantime the modus vivendi would be of no use, and cannot be made operative by this section until it has been decided by arbitration whether the lobster industry is part of the fishery. It seems to me we shall be in exactly the same position after this Bill becomes law as before. What would happen would be this: A naval officer might find it necessary to order the removal of a lobster factory, or to pull it down; the owner objects. What is the authority of the naval officer? He derives his authority from this section. "No," says the owner of the factory. "You can only remove 'works erected for the purpose of the fisheries' and lobsters have nothing to do with the fisheries;" and in the contention of Newfoundland, and in the contention of the present Government of this country, and of all previous Governments, the lobster industry has nothing to do with the fisheries. It is perfectly clear, in those circumstances, that the owner of the factory would be in a position to bring an action against the naval officer, and would be entitled to recover damages precisely as Mr. Beard recovered damages against Sir Baldwin Walker. That is the light in which that section presents itself to me. I am a mere layman, and I should be glad to have the opinion of the legal authorities in this House upon it, because it seems to me, if I am right, or if there is any chance that I am right, if there is the remotest doubt about it, then, in passing legislation of this kind, we should be taking a course obnoxious to the colony and very repugnant to ourselves on that account; and our position would not be one atom improved. That is one objection, I say, to the Bill. I object also to it for the reason which the noble Earl opposite mentioned—the application of this enactment to any permanent arrangement that may be made. It appears perfectly plain by that that the Crown is given power by an Order in Council to carry out and enforce any permanent arrangement that any Government may make of any kind without the sanction and approval of the Colonial Parliament, and without the sanction of Parliament here. It is perfectly true that the draft of the Order in Council is to be communicated to the Colonial Government. It does not say it is to be communicated to the Colonial Legislature, but only to the Government. It does not state that it is to be communicated to them at any particular length of time before the Order in Council is made. It is perfectly possible that the draft might be communicated to the Newfoundland Government on the Monday, and the Order in Council made on the Tuesday following. I am not speaking of what is probable—I am only speaking of what is possible; and I hold that in contemplating legislation of this kind, we are bound to consider it in every possible light, and from every possible point of view, and we are bound to consider what, under any possible state of circumstances, may happen. It is perfectly certain that, under Subsection 2 of this Bill, any future Government may make and carry out any kind of permanent arrangement whatever without the consent or dissent, or even the knowledge of the Colonial Legislature, because all it has to do, all it is bound to do by one Provision in this Bill, is to communicate the draft of the Order in Council to the Government in Newfoundland. I agree also with the noble Earl opposite, that the course adopted is a very unusual one as regards Parliament here. The draft of the Order is to be laid on the table of both Houses for one month. It does not say that the terms of the agreement are to be communicated to Parliament. All that is to be done is that the draft of the Order, which will make the permanent arrangement operative, is to be laid on the Table of both Houses for that period. Doubtless, as a matter of fact, it is impossible to suppose that any Government, or any Minister, would refuse to communicate the terms of such an arrangement to Parliament, but still, as a matter of theory, there is no question whatever, I think, that according to this Bill the Crown is given power to make any arrangement of any kind, any permanent settlement whatever with reference to this subject, and is given the power to carry it out without the sanction of Parliament. That is the theory, and unless there is a very strong necessity—I see no necessity mentioned in the Bill, and I cannot see any necessity arising out of the circumstances of the case—I confess I cannot see any reason for departing from the ordinary and usual practice, which is to bring a Bill into Parliament to obtain the necessary powers to carry out an International Agreement. But, my Lords, there is another matter which I object to, if possible more strongly still, because it appears to me it may have a worse practical effect—and that is, the provision that these re-enacted sections of the old Act are to apply to temporary arrangements that may from time to time be necessary. There is no proviso of any kind as regards these temporary arrangements. They need not be communicated to the Colonial Government; they need not be communicated in any way to the Imperial Parliament. What we are asked to do is to empower the Crown to carry out without any reference to Parliament whatever; without the sanction of Parliament; without the knowledge of Parliament—any arrangement that it may make of a temporary character from time to time pending the conclusion of negotiations. Now, my Lords, what is a temporary arrangement? Considering that this question has been in dispute for about 180 years an arrangement lasting over a very considerable time might be considered temporary in view of that fact. Besides that, this temporary arrangement may be renewed from time to time; there may be a whole series of temporary arrangements. It is perfectly certain that most active negotiations upon the subject have been going on for the last 30 years at any rate, and it is therefore, though I sincerely hope it will not be the case, conceivable that negotiations on this subject may still be considerably protracted.

I do protest strongly against what appears to me to be a very unconstitutional action in providing beforehand for carrying out, without any reference to Parliament, any temporary arrangement or any number of temporary arrangements, for however long a period they may last, whatever number of years they may extend over, provided they are not in final settlement of the question. I object to both of these sections, because they appear to me to interfere with the rights of Parliament, as ordinarily exercised, and because they appear to me to interfere largely with the rights and privileges of the Colonial Legislature. It is impossible, my Lords, to reconcile those provisions with the Despatch which has already been quoted of Mr. Labouchere, afterwards Lord Taunton. He laid down—I do not mean to say that it is exactly correct—that—

“The rights are not to be ceded or exchanged without the assent of the colonists, and that the Constitutional means of obtaining that assent is by laying the measures before the Colonial Legislature.”

We are about to proceed by arbitration to define what the respective rights of England and France are. Well, as some that those rights have been defined and specifically ascertained by both parties, it is obvious that the rights of Newfoundland cannot be modified or affected in any degree provided nothing is “ceded or exchanged” after the rights have been defined as laid down in the arbitration. But I would point out to your Lordships that there is nothing whatever in this Bill to prevent any Government making any permanent arrangement it likes for ceding those ascertained and acknowledged rights, and from exchanging those acknowledged and ascertained rights. That may be an almost impossible thing for a Government to do; it certainly would be most unconstitutional; but there is nothing in this Bill to prevent it. If this Bill passes, any Government in the future will have the power, I maintain, of modifying, ceding, or exchanging the acknowledged and ascertained rights of Newfoundland without obtaining the sanction or without the knowledge even of the Newfoundland Legislature, and without the permission or sanction of the Imperial Parliament. If that be so, it is a very serious matter and one which I hope the House will well consider. The only other point which I wish to speak about is the question of arbitration. I did not quite understand in the first place how we stand as regards this question of arbitration. The noble Marquess expressly reserved in his last Despatch relating to arbitration the approval of Parliament. I suppose that is the arbitration mentioned in the Preamble of this Bill, and is one of the reasons why the modus vivendi is required. I should presume that in agreeing to this Bill the House will be agreeing to the proposal for arbitration. If the Bill is dropped altogether then I have not the slightest idea how the arrangement for arbitration is to be brought before Parliament. The arbitration as I understand it, is to define the respective rights of the two countries, and I must entirely and cordially agree with that principle. But I do entertain objections to the method. Newfoundland has agreed to arbitration and accepts it provided all questions in dispute are submitted to arbitration after the lobster question has been decided. I think there is a great deal of justice and a great deal of sense in their view. I look upon it that proceeding to arbitrate piecemeal in a matter of this kind will be exceedingly dangerous, and for this reason: that the questions involved are so intimately associated together, and depend so closely upon each other that it would be absolutely impossible to disassociate them and separate them. It is only natural to suppose that whatever way the award may go one of the parties will be dissatisfied. I never have known anybody yet who was satisfied with an award which went against him. It is only natural to expect that the people on the spot will be somewhat exasperated, and they will be inclined to push their claims in other matters infinitely more strongly than they would be inclined to do before; and I fear greatly that if we proceed in this way to arbitrate piece by piece, the difficulties which goodness knows are hard enough to overcome now, will be greatly increased in the future, and that there will be much greater danger of collisions and regrettable incidents occurring than even in the past. Let me take for one example the question of the lobster industry, the one which tells least in my favour, and the one question which Newfoundland does not object to have treated separately, a matter which I confess greatly astonishes me. Suppose we go to arbitration on this question of lobsters; suppose the award is given against us; lobsters are decided to be fish, very much, I have no doubt, to their own astonishment, and lobster factories will come within the category of those buildings which France has a right to erect upon the shore. Very well, my Lords, what will happen. It is not likely that the people of Newfoundland will be pleased with that award. The French will have a right to catch lobsters, to erect lobster factories, and so on. Three other questions will immediately come up, which will still be in dispute. There will come up our claim of concurrent right of fishing, our claim to pursue the same right of fishery concurrently with the French. There will come up the question of what constitutes "interruption" of the French, and the question of our right to erect permanent buildings, which has nothing to do with the fishery. If these questions are pushed, as they are likely to be pushed, even more strongly than they have hitherto been, it seems to me exceedingly probable that difficulties will arise. On the other hand, supposing the award to be for us, lobsters, whether they be crustaceans or whether they be fish, may be said to partake of the nature of the hare, because before you can cook them you must catch them; before you can put them in a tin you must extract them from the sea. Then what happens? Other disputed rights immediately come up. The French claim that we must not interrupt them in their fishing; and who is to decide what constitutes interruption? It may be perfectly possible that France might press her claims; and if those claims were allowed, and not resisted, might insist upon every lobster pot being taken up and every lobster factory taken down, on the ground that we were interfering with their right of fishing in the sea, and of using the shore for the purpose of drying their fish, and they might make an award in our favour absolutely null and void. It seems to me there is an immense danger involved in our proceeding by that method, and I sincerely hope Her Majesty's Government will re-consider the question and re-consider the advisability of doing what Newfoundland is so anxious should be done, that is, to arbitrate on all the questions at once. As I read the Papers, France has no objection to such a course, or rather I will not say has no objection, but I will say no strong objection. I will ask your Lordships to look at the Despatch of October 2, 1890, from M. Ribot. On page 38 of France No. 2 (1891), containing further correspondence respecting the Newfoundland Fisheries, he says, at the end of the Despatch, that "The Government of the Republic are, however, quite prepared to consider such other conditions of an agreement as may be submitted to them, whether they approximate to the bases of the scheme drawn up in 1885, or whether they contemplate an eventual resort to arbitration, in conformity with the preliminary opinions already exchanged on the subject between the two Governments."

Well, my Lords, the French Government say there they are quite ready to contemplate a general recourse to arbitration. They make no mention of arbitration on one particular point.

LORD KNUTSFORD: They refer to the former negotiations which turned upon the lobster question.

THE EARL OF DUNRAVEN: I will now ask your Lordships to look at the Despatch from the noble Marquess to M. Waddington on page 90 of the same Blue Book, in which the noble Marquess says that he has seen his Excellency the day before Christmas, and continues—

"And I conveyed to you the probability that, in view of the recent failure of all attempts to close the question by agreement, we should take an early opportunity of inviting the French Government to refer the principal questions in dispute to arbitration. You expressed a general concurrence in this policy, and intimated your willingness to receive any proposals I might have to make. I now submit to your Excellency, for the consideration of the Government of the Republic, a proposal to refer the extent and limits of the rights secured to France by the Treaty of Utrecht, and subsequent stipulations, to the decision of an arbitrator."

My Lords, that certainly appears to me to be the whole question, and I cannot see that in the Papers presented, France has made anything in the nature of a definite refusal, as has been stated. It is perfectly true that on page 91 of the Despatch of the noble Marquess to Lord Lytton, he states that—

"The French Government accept arbitration as the means of putting an end to the difficulties in regard to the Newfoundland Fisheries which the two Governments desire to adjust. They agree at once that the arbitrators shall adjudge any question which may be submitted to them by either Cabinet in regard to the capture and preparation of lobsters. They think there would be considerable difficulty in settling beforehand the exact issues to be submitted, and that it should be open to either Government to submit to the arbitrators any question connected with the western shore of Newfoundland, provided that it is one which concerns the capture and preparation of lobsters."

and so on. Well, that I should judge to mean that there is considerable difficulty in settling beforehand all the issues to be submitted, that they prefer to go on with this question of the lobster industry, but they distinctly say they will accept arbitration as a means to putting an end to the difficulties with regard to the Newfoundland fisheries, and that, I should think, includes all the difficulties that have arisen. Be that as it may, I sincerely hope, for the reasons I have given, that the noble Marquess will, if the resources of civilisation are not exhausted, impress upon the Government of France the great dangers that are likely to arise if arbitration proceeds piecemeal and if every question is dealt with separately, because it will exasperate public opinion in certain events, and other questions will be pressed to their utmost limits, and the difficulties and dangers arising will therefore be greatly increased. That is all I have to say about the Bill. I am sorry, exceedingly sorry, that Her Majesty's Government intend to pass the Bill through this House. What your Lordships are asked to do by Her Majesty's Government appears to me to be this: to read this Bill a second time now with a view to passing it, on the understanding, as we all know, that the Bill is never to become law.

•LORD KNUTSFORD: Not at all.

•THE EARL OF DUNRAVEN: I understand that the Bill would be dropped if the Colonial Legislation does what is required. When we have the assurance of the Prime Minister and the assurance of the Opposition that the colony will legislate it is not a very strong presumption, I think, that this Bill will never become law. But supposing the Bill does pass through this House, your Lordships will have no opportunity of saying another word about it. Some of your Lordships might feel willing to pass the Bill through its various stages on the assumption that the colony will legislate after what was said the other night; but if the Colony does not, we shall have no further opportunity of considering the Bill. I should think that it would have been a more graceful act to have simply hung the Bill up in its present condition, when we have the most strongly expressed promise on the part of the Prime Minister of the Colony to bring in the necessary legislation, and that the Newfoundland Legislature will pass immediately an Act authorising the modus vivendi. You cannot have a more distinct undertaking; and it appears to me that it would have been a more graceful way of treating the matter if this Bill had not been pressed now. Her Majesty's Government know perfectly well that if the Colonial Government does not legislate in time it could pass this Bill through all its stages in one afternoon, if they chose. I sincerely hope Her Majesty's Government will not insist upon that. I would rather the Bill was left in its present condition and the Debate adjourned, and then, if the legislation was not passed in proper time, to go on with the Bill and pass it through the other House. The noble Lord the Secretary of State for the Colonies has commented upon the fact that for a long period of time the powers of the naval officers was ample, and that there was no occasion for any legislation of any kind; but your Lordships must remember that the powers of the naval officers were ample, because they were never asked formerly to exercise them in the performance of the kind of duties that have fallen to them of late. It is only recently that it has fallen to a naval officer, of his own action, to do anything that would affect property of British subjects on shore. It is perfectly true they conducted their arrangements at sea, which was quite within their function; but it is quite another thing for them to perform duties on shore, and that they were not called upon to do until quite recently. The noble Lord also says that this Bill will not affect the right of the colony to legislate on its own affairs, because it only affects Treaties with a foreign Power. But the peculiarities of this case is that although it deals with a matter affecting a treaty with a foreign Power, it does affect the domestic affairs of Newfoundland, and it does affect most seriously the whole internal development and the whole internal arrangements of the colony. When those Treaties were made, as your Lordships know well, Newfoundland was practically a barren and deserted Island, a mere adjunct to a fishery. Now it is settled: it enjoys a full and responsible Government; it has many industries besides fishing, and it enjoys all the means and appliances of a regularly organised society. Over nearly half the sea-board of the community, owing to the claims of the French, the inhabitants have been deprived of right of legislating in their domestic affairs, and of control over their own territory. They cannot legislate to protect their main industry. They cannot do one single thing to prevent their fisheries from being utterly destroyed; they cannot make wharves upon their harbours, they cannot bring roads down to the sea; they cannot construct railways to the coast; they can do nothing that can ordinarily be done by a civilised community. It is impossible to say that such legislation does not affect the internal arrangements or powers of the colony. It appears to me to affect our own sovereignty; you cannot grant good titles to land over this long strip of coast, you can only grant a right subject to an indefinable something, and that is the rights of France under the Treaty. You cannot grant mining licences, and it is perfectly certain that the ordinary Courts will be, after the passing of this Act, superseded in so far as that naval officers will have the power to interfere with the property of British subjects, without those British subjects having any right to compensation or redress. I do not know what the nature of the proposal of the Newfoundland delegates will be, but I suppose it will be a substitution of some Judicial Authority for the non-judicial authority now exercised by naval officers. I suppose they would wish, when questions are in dispute, that somebody accustomed to take evidence, knowing the country and the locality, and the circumstances, could decide upon the justice and the legality of the matter, and then that the executive power should remain with the naval officer. If that be so, I think that would be a very natural request to make. Consider what the position of the fisherman may be. He may be called upon by the commander of a man-of-war to take up his anchor and go to sea or get out of a particular place. The naval officer need not make any inquiry or take any evidence. It is not necessary in such a case that evidence should be taken. We know from what has been said by the noble Lord that the duties of the naval officers are exceedingly difficult. I should say that he has not said one word that is too strong in recognition of their services; but I should think they would themselves be glad to be relieved of their judicial functions in this matter, and I sincerely hope Her Majesty's Government will consider the possibility of establishing Courts of some kind for this purpose. I do not understand that the promise on the part of the delegates to legislate under Section A is in any way dependent upon Sub-section C. That is another matter altogether. What I understand is that the Newfoundland delegates undertake to pass legislation through the Newfoundland Parliament at once as to the modus vivendi and the award, and desire that the terms of an Act to deal with the Treaty rights should be arranged; but I apprehend that legislation is to go on immediately on the first point, without regard to whether legislation on the second is carried out or not. I have detained your Lordships at considerable length, and I thank you for listening to me with so much patience. I feel very strongly on this subject. I feel that in some respects the colony has been hardly dealt with, and even in the matter of this very Bill. They knew nothing about the Bill. The delegates who came over to protest against the Bill and against the form of it had never seen the Bill until they came to this country. I do not think your Lordships' House was treated altogether fairly in the matter of this Bill. The noble Lord only gave us one clear day after the presentation of the Papers of his intention to call attention to those Papers, and to bring in a Bill, and then he made a most important speech on the First Reading. It would require a superhuman genius to master all these Papers in one day, and it was probably impossible for your Lordships to be present—I know it was physically impossible for me to be in my place to hear the speech of the noble Lord. A whole month elapsed before the Bill was printed, and within one clear day after the printing of the Bill the noble Lord put it down for Second Reading. Whatever may be good in the Bill no one can deny that it contains provisions of a most far-reaching character, provisions which will be most closely scrutinised in every position, in the most distant parts of the British Empire; and I think, in the circumstances, we might have had a little more time and notice given to us to consider the matter. I think the Newfoundland legislators have a right to complain of the fact that Her Majesty's Government never communicated to them either the nature or the provisions of the Bill. It has been urged that the colony ought to have itself legislated; that when it assumed responsible government it took over all the Treaty obligations affecting Newfoundland which had hitherto rested on the Imperial Parliament. That is perfectly true. But if your Lordships consider for one moment the position of Newfoundland, when she accepted responsible government, and her position now, and the enormous difference between the French claims as understood then and as put forward by them now, the enormous difference between the whole conception of what our relative Treaty rights were 50 years ago and now, it is impossible to say that Newfoundland, in accepting legislative Government, accepted the liability to legislate for carrying out the present modus vivendi, or to carry out the Treaty engagements as understood by France. Newfoundland has never objected to carry out her Treaty obligations as understood by us. The Newfoundlanders have always said: "We will legislate to carry out our duties as interpreted by you. What you say are our Treaty rights we are willing to carry out, but we never undertook to carry out the interpretation put by France upon the Treaty or to carry out the modus vivendi." If we consider the grievous effect of these Treaty rights upon the colony I do not think we ought to be surprised that they demurred to giving legislative sanction to anything that may possibly be conceived to mean that they have for one moment recognised the justice of the French claims. I regret that the Colonial Legislature did not legislate to carry out the modus vivendi. From what has been said by the Prime Minister at the Bar of the House, and from what we know he has undertaken, as far as he can, that is that the colony will legislate, I believe that will be done. I sincerely hope that will be so, and I also hope that Her Majesty's Government will not press this Bill through all its stages in this House, but that they will consent to hang it up in order to give the colony an opportunity of fulfilling its obligations itself.

*THE DUKE OF ARGYLL: My Lords, it seems to me this is a Bill which it is extremely unpleasant to vote for, and quite impossible to vote against. It is quite impossible to vote against it because it is proposed to Parliament under the responsibility of the Ministers of the Crown who come down to Parliament and tell us that they have no adequate powers to fulfil our Treaty obligations. Nor can it be denied that that allegation is true, and that circumstances have arisen which seriously impede the existing modus vivendi of a very difficult and complicated nature on the shores of Newfoundland. I think, therefore, it is quite impossible under the circumstances that the House should say "not-contented" to the Second Reading of the Bill; but I hold that in passing the Second Reading, or in assenting to it without further discussion we are not committed to more than its principle, which is that it is the duty of Parliament to place in the hands of the Ministers of the Crown undoubted and complete powers to enforce our international obligations in Newfoundland. My noble Friend who spoke so ably on this side of the House said he hoped that no feeling of irritation or provocation against the colony would interfere with our deliberations, and I think that sentiment was heartily responded to by the noble Lords opposite. My Lords, I go much further, and say that I heartily believe that the feeling and sympathy of this House is entirely with the colonists in the difficult position in which they are placed; by which I do not mean to say that we agree in all they have said in their argument, for I think they overstated their case on several important points; but I think we all sympathise with them in the difficulties in which they are placed with regard to France, and we see the serious impediments which, in the present position of affairs, our Treaty obligations impose upon the prosperity and advancement of that colony. The noble Lord who moved the Second Reading of the Bill said he regretted, I think, something in the tone of the address which was delivered to us at the Bar of the House by the Prime Minister of Newfoundland.

LORD KNUTSFORD: Not in the tone of the address at the Bar, which I spoke of as able and temperate, but of the Petition.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL: I beg the noble Lord's pardon. I thought he alluded to the address. I was going to say that although there are several paragraphs in that address which overstate the position of the colony with regard to our right of initiative in a matter of this kind, a matter of purely Imperial legislation, yet the tone of that Petition was admirable in all respects. It was a recognition of the ultimate responsibility of the Imperial Parliament; and although it was, of course, tinged with that feeling of independent action which is common to all the colonies of our country, I do think that a great deal of what has fallen from the noble Lord (Lord Dunraven) who has just sat down is perfectly true. The irritation of the colonists has arisen mainly from the overstrained interpretation, as it humbly appears to me, which France has put upon our Treaty obligations. If you read the clause in the Treaty of Utrecht which refers to this question, I venture to say that no human being would imagine that the French had any other right on the coast than that of simply landing to dry their fish upon our shores. I daresay many Members of this House have seen the process as I have seen it on the shores of the North American Continent, which is unlike anything that exists in this country.

The Duke of Argyll

They have there a very much hotter sun than we have, and the result is that in the fishing season, having split the fish, they dry them in immense quantities upon the rocks, and, where there are no rocks, upon wooden stages. I have seen the shores of New Brunswick literally white with the split fish being dried in the sun. That is the right which was conceded to the French—nothing more, nothing less. Where, as I have said there are no rocks, they put up stages on the shore. The rocks generally being highly glaciated are used for the purpose; but where there is only shingle or other kind of shore, what they do is to erect wooden stages; but that is only on the foreshore, and there can be no doubt that those who drew up the Treaty of Utrecht were thinking of that practice. It has been made a subject of complaint in the Petition and in the address at the Bar, that the French have claimed not merely the right to dry their fish upon these shores, but the exclusive right to fish along the whole of this coast to the exclusion of British fishermen. There is not a word to that effect in the Treaty of Utrecht. I am told also the French claim a monopoly of the right to use the creeks and harbours which are habitually used by the boatmen and fishermen of Newfoundland. There are certainly words in one of the Declarations connected with the Treaty of Utrecht which speak of competition being limited; but the obvious meaning is, that we ought not to prevent them fishing by ourselves occupying the whole of the shore in such a way as that they shall have none of it, for the purpose of drying their fish; but surely there is, within the limits of the Treaty, room both for the French and the Newfoundlanders to fish. Then, with regard to the question of the lobsters, I think that was a question which had not arisen when the Treaty of Utrecht was drawn up. I have no doubt that nobody knew anything about the canning of lobsters at that time. As to what the noble Lord said, that naval officers should not be entrusted with duties on the land, I apprehend that the duties on land mean duties on the foreshore. The noble Marquess shakes his head; but if the Newfoundlanders have been prevented from making roads down to their own coast, from erecting buildings on their own shores out of the reach of the tide so as not to interfere with any right of drying fish, then I think that is a most undoubted exaggeration of their claims by the French. I think, under all the circumstances, the Newfoundlanders have a great and serious grievance, and I am not surprised that they have found it, practically, very difficult in the state of feeling and irritation in the colony to legislate for themselves. I am not very sure that an Act of Parliament passed by us will not relieve the Government of Newfoundland from a serious difficulty rather than otherwise; but I should be very glad if the promise which they have made should be realised, and if the noble Marquess opposite at the head of the Government should be able to wait until something has been done by the Newfoundland Government to enforce the modus vivendi with regard to the rights of the French. I know it is not in the power of the noble Marquess opposite to force France into a larger and general arbitration on the whole question; and if the Treaty is as I hold it to be I can well understand how the French should refuse to do so. Circumstances have enormously increased their original claims, and their proposal is to enforce those claims. My noble Friend behind me has made some observations upon certain clauses of the Bill which would seem to give the Government greater power than is absolutely necessary in the present emergency. I do not know how far that is true—certainly the clause referred to seems to give them the power of enforcing any new arrangement with France as if it was a new Treaty; and the only check upon that is, that the Order in Council must be laid on the Table in both Houses of Parliament for a month. Perhaps, if the Bill is to be further proceeded with, the noble Marquess will consider how far that clause might be modified. I entirely agree with the noble Lord that the argument at the Bar of this House with regard to the pledge given by Mr. Labouchere, afterwards Lord Taunton, has no bearing upon the question before us now. We all admit that the territorial rights of the colony, which are, in fact, the territorial rights of the Crown, ought not to be altered or abated in any manner without consulting the Local Legislature. But I suppose the noble Marquess does not propose to abate or sacrifice any of the Treaty rights of the Crown; and, therefore, I think the argument on Mr. Labouchere's letter falls entirely to the ground. I am not sure, however, that words of Mr. Labouchere would not cover the case of a new arrangement made such as is contemplated by the 2nd clause in the Bill. I heard with great pleasure from the noble Marquess that there is some hope that the arrangement suggested by the colony may prevent the necessity of going further with this Bill. I believe the Government have been as reluctant as their political opponents could have been to bring in this Bill; but they have been forced into doing it by regard for the interests and honour of the Crown; and I am sure the feeling of your Lordships, as far as the colonists are concerned, is one of entire sympathy with them in their difficulties.

LORD HERSCHELL: My Lords, there has not been, as there could not be, any difference of opinion to-night with regard to the obligations which rest upon the Government of this country to see that the Treaties which are in existence are enforced and fulfilled. The rights, whatever they may be, and whatever their extent, are ancient. They came into existence at a time when there was no inhabitant population upon what is known as the French shore of Newfoundland. The Treaty obligations were not imposed upon any existing community by the wish of the British Government, and the community that has since grown up has come into being subject to the existence of these Treaty rights. I think that is beyond the possibility of question. The liability of the inhabitants of Newfoundland to the burden of these Treaty obligations does not depend upon any connection of the colony with the British Crown. If that link were severed the inhabitants of Newfoundland would be not one whit less under the Treaty obligations; those obligations would be in no degree less binding upon them. I think it is essential this should be borne in mind: that they would then find themselves still subject to the Treaties, face to face with the French nation insisting upon their performance, and they would be subject to the entire pressure of the force existing in the French people. I am quite sure, under those circumstances, the inhabitants of Newfoundland will feel that these ancient Treaty obligations, resting as they do upon us, bring a serious burden, attendant with manifold risks and responsibilities, and that the Government of this country is deserving of consideration at their hands in the difficult position in which they must often find themselves placed when called upon to enforce these Treaties. On the other hand, I am quite sure that the people of England will regard with sympathetic consideration the difficult position in which the inhabitants of Newfoundland are placed. The Treaty presses upon them with a heavy burden, and the conditions which exist at the present time differ most materially and vitally from those which were in existence, or which could have been in contemplation, at the time the Treaty was entered into. At that time the country was comparatively unpeopled; there was no desire to develop its resources—indeed, its resources were unknown. It was regarded as a mere accessory to a fishing ground; but now a population has grown up in this region, possessing settled civil institutions and a small organised system of government. It is a growing population, naturally anxious to spread itself and to develop the resources which undoubtedly exist in the country. Under these circumstances, it is not unnatural that the people of Newfoundland should chafe and murmur under the restraints to which they find themselves exposed by reason of these Treaties, the more so when they conceive that the Treaties are being pressed by the other party to them beyond their legitimate bounds. If, therefore, the people of Newfoundland have sometimes appeared to press their claims unduly, or to have exaggerated their rights, or to have exhibited an over-sensitiveness or jealousy of the action of the Government at home, I am quite sure that the people and Government at home in this country will have every disposition to view their attitude in that respect with the utmost generosity. I certainly feel bound to say that I think they have in one respect somewhat overstated their case. I think it is impossible to contest the position that the Government of this country, bound as this country is to observe the obligations under these Treaties, must have the power, pending the negotiations for a settlement, or while the matter is in train for a settlement, to arrange a modus vivendi which will permit the matter to be discussed and negotiated upon. There is no tribunal to which appeal can be made; in the last resort the arbitrament of war is all that can be relied upon for a decision; and when it is remembered that a war would involve not only this country, but all her colonies and dependencies—that it would be war of a terrible description—surely it cannot be contended that a country thus bound by obligations which in the last resort may lead to war with all its fatal consequences is not to be in a position, even if there be opposition on the part of the colony interested, to arrange a temporary modus vivendi. I am quite satisfied that upon reflection the people of Newfoundland will see that is a position which cannot be maintained, that it would not be to the interest of any colony that it should force such a position upon the Imperial Government which holds its powers in trust not only for the people of this country, but for the colony connected with it. But in entering upon any modus vivendi which becomes necessary, the wishes and views of the colony should be anxiously considered, and as far as possible carefully consulted, and every effort should be made to secure that the modus vivendi agreed upon should be as little unpalatable to the colony and as little burdensome to themselves as it can possibly be made. This further matter I think also is not in conflict. When Her Majesty's Government came to the conclusion that there was no existing power of properly enforcing the Treaties at that moment, it became their duty to see that that state of things should exist no longer. I know there are those who think that having regard to the history of these Treaties, and of the connection of Newfoundland with the British Crown, the Treaties were a part of the conditions upon which the colony obtained its legislative powers, and that it is not correct to say no power exists of enforcing them there. But even if such a view is correct, it can only be ascertained after the lapse of a considerable time, and it would then prove that such means even as existed were of an imperfect and insufficient character. Therefore, I think nobody can blame Her Majesty's Government for endeavouring at once to procure the means of enforcing these Treaties. I will not go over again what has been said by the noble Lord opposite me, but I confess it strikes me, as it did him, that as soon as that conclusion was arrived at it would have been in the highest degree expedient that it should have been communicated to the colony with suggestions on the part of the Government as to legislation by the colony itself and an indication of the kind of legislation which might have been suggested or recommended by Her Majesty's Government. But Newfoundland has a Constitution with a power of legislation upon its internal affairs. I entirely agree that the power of enforcing these Treaties cannot be regarded as a matter merely concerning the internal administration of the colony, because we are bound by the Treaties and under obligation to enforce them; but, still, I think that the enforcement of the Treaties ought to be carried out as far possible under the provisions of the Municipal Law prevailing in the country and in harmony with settled constitutional principles. What is the proposal of Her Majesty's Government in this Bill? It is simply to revive the powers contained in the Act which was passed in the middle of last century, and those powers are certainly of a most arbitrary description. Power is given to any naval officer under the authority only of Orders from the Executive Government of the day to go ashore along the whole of this coast of Newfoundland, and there to take down buildings and generally interfere with the property of British subjects—they can take down buildings, houses, anything that they may have specific instructions to remove, or which they may consider require to be removed within the general instructions which they may receive from the Executive Government of the day. Undoubtedly that is a very serious and arbitrary power; I use the words "arbitrary power" in the sense of one which can be controlled by nothing but the will and discretion and judgment of the Executive. It was not unnatural that the Government, feeling the necessity of a power to enforce these Treaties, and having this method ready to their hand, should have contemplated its adoption; and yet, I think, it was due to forgetfulness of the elaborate conditions, as now existing, from those which existed at the time when this legislation was first adopted by Parliament. There were then no inhabitants on the shore, and no Courts; the country had no settled Institutions; the territory was not brought within the municipal law at all, and probably at that time the course taken was the only one practicable. But now there is a different state of things in all those respects. It is a settled territory, under municipal law, with Courts exercising jurisdiction there, and with a settled organised population. It seems to me that that which in the middle of the last century might have been a proper or even necessary means of enforcing Treaty obligations, ceases to be so when you have this altered condition of things which I have exhibited to your Lordships. The ordinary way of enforcing a Treaty right, when any act is to be done within the territory right, is to make a breach of the Treaty—a breach of your municipal law, to proceed in your Courts for penalties for breach of that municipal law, and giving the right to remove any erections which have been constructed contrary to the provisions (as they would be) of the municipal law. That, I apprehend, is the ordinary proper constitutional method by which the Treaty obligations which have been undertaken are to be discharged, and I can see no reason why that course should not have been adopted on the present occasion. Of course the decisions of the Courts would not be binding on the other Power which is Party to the Treaty, but no more will the instructions of the naval officers be binding on the Power which is the other Party to the Treaty. In the one case, as in the other, remonstrance would be open to them if our part of the Treaty were not being properly discharged. Here let me say that I draw a distinction between acts to be done upon the shores within the bounds, if I may say so, of the Municipal or Local Government, and acts to be done in the territorial waters. As your Lordships, I daresay, may know, there was considerable discussion some years ago with regard to what were known as territorial waters being so, to a distance of three miles around the coast of any country. According to the views of all writers upon international law, there exists a certain dominion, or sovereignty, or power exercisable by the nation whose shores are washed by those seas; but there arose in the case of the Franconia some years ago—where a foreign vessel was sunk in English waters—a question which was very fully discussed as to what were the rights in territorial waters. The majority of the learned Judges were of opinion that the land covered by those waters was not to be regarded as a part of the adjacent territory within its local law, and that we could only deal with any acts done there or treat them as offences by legislation expressly for that purpose. Accordingly in the year 1878 or 1879 an Act was passed which applies not only to the United Kingdom, but to the whole of our colonies, which does make certain offences in territorial waters subject to what is known as the jurisdiction of the Admiral, and triable by the Courts of the United Kingdom; but that Act only deals with certain offences, and would not in the slightest degree affect offences which might arise in virtue of breaches of these Treaties. But the very necessity of the case being, as it seems to me, with regard to territorial waters, would justify making the naval forces do the police duty with regard to these Treaties within those waters. It would be the only practicable means by which the Treaty obligations could be carried out, and any attempt to carry them out by the Newfoundland Government within those waters would be so burdensome and so difficult that I do not apprehend there would be any objection on their part to the territorial waters being dealt with by the naval officers, under instructions from Her Majesty's Government, and I do not think that the question of the propriety of dealing with matters on shore would extend to territorial waters. Therefore, I should be disposed to draw a broad distinction between the two cases. Now, having regard to the circumstances to which I have called attention, do not the proposals of the Newfoundland delegates really afford a basis for the settlement of this matter? I quite agree that such an arrangement as I have sketched out would be a matter of some little complication and difficulty. It would be one which it would be impossible to make applicable at once; and therefore I think, in spite of their objection to the naval officers thus acting upon shore, the Newfoundland delegates indicate that the Newfoundland Legislature would be willing at once to pass an Act giving all the powers which Her Majesty's Government ask under this Bill, notwithstanding their objections to it on principle, as a temporary expedient, until a better plan can be arranged, and they indicate their willingness afterwards to carry out legislation on the subject. That is, I think, briefly the proper constitutional method of enforcing Treaty rights. I cannot help hoping that Her Majesty's Government will endeavour, upon such a subject as this, to come to a settlement of these very difficult questions, and that they will not insist upon pressing forward this measure, even in your Lordships' House, at the present time. I cannot think, having regard to the objections which are entertained to this measure, and the objections to which it has given rise, it would be for the credit of your Lordships' House that the measure should be pressed forward through this House, notwithstanding the strong objections raised to it, and the offer to provide a substitute which Her Majesty's Government, as I understand, admit would be a sufficient substitute for it; because if that is done before a certain stage is reached in the next House, they have intimated their willingness not to proceed with the Bill. Then would it not be better that it should go no further in your Lordships' House, and that we should not seem to pass a Bill overriding the desires and wishes of the people in the colony, when that disagreeable necessity is not to be imposed upon the other House of Parliament. I press this the more because if this Bill is proceeded with, it will obviously be necessary to us to enforce in this House the views I have expressed with regard to the manner of passing this Bill. This would be the actual measure, and if it is passed through this House, we should have no further voice in the matter if the arrangement should unfortunately not be arrived at. We should then have given our sanction to a form of legislation which is without precedent, and which, I feel sure, is likely to excite jealousy and suspicion in the minds of our fellow countrymen in the colony. I feel it our bounden duty, on the grounds which the noble Duke did his best to impress upon the House, to consider the changes which would be necessary to make it such a measure as ought to pass into law. The noble Lord the Secretary of State for the Colonies, in reply to the criticisms of the delegates with regard to the second sub-section of the first clause, which has excited great alarm in the colony, said it gave no powers to the Government to make arrangements with France without the consent of the colonists. I quite agree it does not give them any new power to make a Treaty which they could not make to-morrow. And possibly it may be said it does not withdraw the absolute necessity of laying the matter before Parliament, because an Order in Council must first be laid on the Table in both Houses. But, strangely enough, it does not provide what is to be done in order to pass the measure into law. Looking at the matter practically, it may make all the difference in the world as to a Government entering into a modification of the arrangements without the consent of the colony; whether in order to enforce it they had to come and get the necessary power to make that arrangement, or whether they had only to lay an Order in Council on the Table for a certain time, after which, if not objected to, it passes into operation. The effect is very different, and I do not wonder that the inhabitants of Newfoundland, in view of the promise given them in Lord Taunton's letter, should view this with jealousy and alarm, because it does contemplate the making of an arrangement, which they do not like, easily enforceable. Therefore, my Lords, I hope that sub-section will not be insisted upon. I draw a broad distinction—I think it is a distinction which has not always been kept in view—between an arbitration which merely interprets, and an arbitration which affects our trade rights. In order that you may enforce what is called the result of an arbitration which is merely an arbitration to enforce a Treaty you want no new power. It is the Treaty you are enforcing just as much afterwards as you would have been before.

The parties to the trade have agreed upon somebody to interpret the Treaty for them, but it does not make a new right, any more than a Court in enforcing the terms of an Agreement is making a new Agreement. Therefore in respect of enforcing the Treaty rights it seems to me if you have power to enforce the Treaty you have all the power you need, because the Treaty is the Treaty just as it was before, and you are not enforcing anything else but the Treaty, which is the arrangement between the parties. It is just because it seems to me to be only enforcing the Treaty that I do not think it infringes in the slightest degree upon the assurances given by Lord Taunton. If I thought it were not enforcing the old Treaty that would be a different matter. It seems to me that you are arranging for new rights if the rights you are going to enforce are not enforceable under the old Treaty. I am not going to trouble your Lordships with observations upon the other parts of the case; the hour is late, and I do not wish to detain your Lordships longer. With regard to the desire of the colonists that there should be an arbitration upon all questions, I am quite sure everybody will agree that it is natural, and that it is desirable. I cannot think Her Majesty's Government will, at any time and in any circumstances under which a general solution of the question seems possible, do otherwise than use their best endeavours to secure that result which it is obvious is in the best interests of the country, the colony, and Her Majesty's Government. As regards the present arrangement, I do not understand that there is at present any binding agreement on the Government to refer any question except the question with regard to the lobsters. That is agreed to be referred. As to the rest, though there is a practicability of further references, none of them could be referred except by a new Agreement between both the contracting parties. I confess I sympathise very much with the view of the colonists as to the danger to them of separate arbitrations on a variety of distinct points which do not cover the whole ground, and still leave certain matters unsettled. Of course there may be still some burning question, in view of which, to avoid infinitely serious dangers, you must obtain a solution by arbitration; but putting that aside I quite understand it would be against the interests of the colonists—and they are naturally jealous of it—to have a series of references unless that series of references cover all questions. Therefore I urge upon Her Majesty's Government that before agreeing upon any further arbitration upon any particular point they should consult the colony, should ascertain fully its views, and unless they feel themselves bound from paramount considerations to do so, they should yield to the wish of the colonists not to refer any single question—I mean without the consent of the colonists themselves—unless they could refer them all. I quite feel the difficulty of giving an indefinite pledge as to the future, but all I understand the delegates to ask is an assurance as to the present. Of course this arrangement is not to be kept open indefinitely. It is not to be kept open to either party indefinitely in the future to suggest other matters for arbitration for an indefinite time; and, therefore, I cannot help thinking that Her Majesty's Government might well convey to the delegates of Newfoundland, without, of course, according to their view, the assurance that, unless from some paramount necessity, Her Majesty's Government would not refer individual questions unless they could get such a reference as would cover the whole of the existing controversies. I am quite sure we are all conscious of the evils which are likely to result if this measure be pressed forward into law against the will of the colonists. With all their feelings of antagonism and hostility aroused it will not be easy to carry it out, and we may add to our difficulties instead of diminishing them. But, my Lords, if on the other hand we can carry with us the willing assent of the colonists it would be much better to do so. In enforcing this measure on the Colony of Newfoundland we cannot forecast all the evils which may ensue, though we may apprehend that they will be serious and grave. On the other hand, if we can bring them to a willing mind with us upon some programme or upon some plan which both are able to say is satisfactory and sufficient, then, my Lords, the Colony of Newfoundland, one of our oldest colonies, which has shared our peril for centuries, and which has had its part in our glories, may be, and will be, a contented member of this great Empire.

THE PRIME MINISTER AND SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (The Marquess of SALISBURY): My Lords, as the noble and learned Lord who has just sat down has said, the hour is late for the virtuous habits of this House, and for that reason I should not trespass upon your Lordships at any length. I have another reason for not wishing to do that. I cannot conceive any question upon which it is a more anxious or a more responsible task to speak than the question which is at present under the consideration of the House. We are dealing with a question on which there is the acutest possible feeling, not only on the part of our colonies, with whom we have so deep a sympathy, but also on the part of our neighbours and allies across the Channel, with whom we wish to live in as much harmony as possible. It is therefore an occasion on which I think anybody in an official position may be excused for admiring the proverb which says that "Silence is golden." The general course of the Debate in this House does not seem to call for much observation on my part. It has on the whole been exceedingly friendly. The noble Lords opposite though they demur to some of our proceedings have maintained that spirit of candour which distinguished their speeches when the matter was first submitted to their judgment. The Bill has, on the whole, been received with favour. I believe that in all essential matters there is a strong amount of agreement, and the smaller matters which have been referred to are hardly worth discussing at any length. The Bill itself in its details and structure has been the subject of a good deal of criticism, but I say, though with some hesitation, speaking after so distinguished an authority as the noble and learned Lord, that I cannot help thinking that he has not read the Bill with his usual care. It seems to me that the last sentence of the Preamble must be brought into consideration when you attempt to interpret the peculiar phrases which are found in the rest of the Bill. The words in the Preamble are—

"And whereas differences have arisen between the United Kingdom and France with respect to the Newfoundland fishery engagements, and negotiations are in progress with a view to arrange such differences, by referring the questions in dispute to arbitration, and pending the completion of such negotiations temporary arrangements may from time to time be necessary, and it is expedient to remove the above doubts, and revive the enactments set out in the Schedule to this Act, and apply the same to any temporary arrangements that may be made as aforesaid, and to any permanent arrangement with respect to such differences."

I do not know whether the noble and learned Lord said it, but I think I heard it said that the liberty to confirm temporary arrangements would extend to new and temporary arrangements without any limit of time. It is obvious that the temporary arrangement referred to in that Preamble is that precise modus vivendi which is known to your Lordships, and which is laid upon the Table of the House. It is obvious that the permanent arrangements are the result of the negotiations which were going on when the Bill was introduced, and that these permanent arrangements have exclusive reference to the differences which have arisen between this country and France on the fishery question.

*THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: Differences of interpretation.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: Differences of interpretation, certainly. They are said to be differences. Of course, there are differences of interpretation, but they are differences which, as a matter of public notoriety, are now in existence, and are the subject of negotiations. I do not, however, wish to defend absolutely the drafting of the Bill. It very often happens that a layman accepts the drafting without entirely seeing the mode in which the language used fits in with his ideas, and yet he accepts it with that humility which the laity show to the learned professions. One of the services which I hope from the discussions in this House is that, if there is any ambiguity or any difficulty in ascertaining the precise meaning of the language, the Bill, on leaving this House, will no longer be marked by any such defect. That matter is one which when we come into Committee I hope we shall be able easily to correct if the Bill is at all indefinite in its language. Then there was another very ingenious point referred to by the noble Lord behind me (the Earl of Dunraven) which would have made the Bill an absolute absurdity, but which will be one of the subjects for consideration in Committee -- that is, that the works which we should have a right to order to be removed under an Order in Council are for the purpose of carrying on the fisheries, and we are at this moment contending that lobstering is not a fishery, so that the works would not be for the purpose of carrying on the fisheries, and could not be removed. That, I think, we can correct when we get into Committee. However, I do not regard these criticisms as being of so much importance on the Second Reading as they would be on the Third. The only matter in regard to the conduct of Her Majesty's Government with respect to the Bill which has met with the criticism or censure of noble Lords opposite is that we did not communicate the Bill to the Newfoundland Government before laying it upon the Table of the House. It must be borne in mind that the Newfoundland Government is occupying a position distinctly hostile, and communicating with the Government meant communicating with the Legislature. Is it respectful to Parliament to communicate a Bill to another Legislature before it is communicated to the Legislature through which it will have to pass? I have my doubts on that point. I think, at all events, it is a breach of the ordinary practice and rule of Parliament, which, at any rate in a highly-contested matter, is not easily to be defended. Setting that aside as a question of ceremony and sentiment, there was another reason why we were very unwilling that the Bill should be discussed in the Legislature of Newfoundland before it was introduced here. We did not wish our policy to be misunderstood. We were anxious to have it introduced here with a speech by a responsible Minister stating the grounds on which it was recommended to Parliament. If it had been crudely sent to the Newfoundland Legislature to be subjected to the criticisms which certainly would not have been entirely just, I think our policy would have been put into a very unfair position, and a fair and impartial judgment of the question would have been seriously imperilled. I cannot see that the colony has any reason to complain on this ground. If we had attempted to hurry the matter and to rush the Bill through Parliament, or if we had attempted to take from them the proper time for remonstrance, if there was anything to be objected to, then, no doubt, their ground for complaint would be very just. But that our intention should be communicated in the first instance to the body we serve—that is, the Parliament of England—and not to any one else, does not seem to me to be a matter of censure, but rather the setting of a precedent which it would always be wise to follow. I do not think that there is any other matter on which the noble Earl was disposed to censure us. But both he and the noble and learned Lord who has just sat down made several suggestions on the nature of the jurisdiction which was intrusted to the naval officers by this Bill, and they both indicated a very strong preference, which has also been expressed by the Newfoundland delegates themselves, for some legislation which should place the disposal of the more contested matters, especially upon land, in the hands of a more regular tribunal—the local Courts of Justice. I have nothing to say against that view. It commends itself on many grounds, although it may not be so easy to carry into execution as the existing system; but it commends itself on many grounds. We shall be glad to consider any proposals for that purpose, and very glad if we can hit upon any arrangement which will carry out the essential objects we have in view, and, at the same time, will satisfy the very proper, reasonable, and orthodox scruples about intrusting such large powers to naval officers as are naturally entertained both in this country and in the colony. I think it is clearly understood that it would be impossible to introduce any provisions of that kind into the Bill now before Parliament, because they would necessarily be of a difficult and complicated character, and much time would be required to be spent on their consideration. If any legislation for that purpose is undertaken it must be in a new Bill; but I see in principle no objection to the adoption of such a course, and the judgment we form upon it must entirely depend upon the details of the measure that is proposed. The noble and learned Lord seemed to think that it would be sufficient to enact that the Treaty is to be observed, and to prosecute in the Courts of Law any person who disobeyed that Treaty. Surely the noble and learned Lord must see that that would give to the particular tribunal the task of interpreting the Treaty, and the Treaty is to be interpreted by a tribunal whose moral authority will be high, but whose legal authority will be zero. The arbitrators will determine what is the meaning of the Treaty. France will require—and we have engaged by Treaty that it should be so—that we shall absolutely carry out the decision of the arbitrators, whatever that may be; but if you go into a Court of Law and claim that the Treaty is made a part of the municipal law, and that the person who breaks it is to be punished or to suffer loss for so doing, the Treaty must be interpreted by the Court according to its own lights; and the whole work of the arbitrators will be set aside, and the whole of the diplomatic difficulties with France will be exactly what they are now. I cannot think that that particular mode of dealing with Treaties will be satisfactory. The only other observation on the part of noble Lords to which it is necessary that I should refer is the one which I think they urged with the greatest emphasis, and that is their proposal that we should accept the promise of the Prime Minister of Newfoundland that certain measures should pass the Legislature of Newfoundland, and, accepting that promise, should forbear to pursue the Bill we have in hand. Now, I wish your Lordships to examine the question of time. The fishery begins not later than the end of May. By the time June has arrived there must be power—whether it be conferred here or in Newfoundland—in the hands of the Executive to carry out the modus vivendi. The actual arbitration does not press quite so much; but it cannot begin until the Executive Government has been fortified by the approval of Parliament, and has received the power which is necessary to enable it to carry out its engagements. Therefore, it would be impossible to delay this Bill for any considerable time. The Bill that is to sanction the modus vivendi could not be delayed beyond the end of May. But my noble Friend on my left (the Earl of Dunraven) seemed to say—I think that was the tone of the observation of the noble Lord—"You have the promise of the Prime Minister of Newfoundland; what more do you want?" If he has given that promise, I am sure he has given it in absolute sincerity, and has an entire belief that he can carry it out; and it is the same with regard to the delegates who accompanied him. But is any man in a position to promise absolutely for a numerous Assembly sitting at a distance, subject to other influences than those by which we are surrounded here, and, of course, liable to constant changes in its composition, and to the accidental loss of some influential man, to the arrival of some other influential man having other views, and to a great variety of incidents which may make the Assembly, when a division comes, unwilling perhaps only in some one point—but that an important point—to carry out the engagements which have been made on its behalf? Or it may not understand engagements in the same way; or some one or other of those numerous accidents which may happen in transactions of that kind and prevent the Bill from being passed which has been promised. I do not say they are probable—I do not say that that will be the case. I hope that the Bill will pass, and that no difficulty will arise. But we are bound to consider the case if it should not pass. The modus vivendi would not be in existence; all the liabilities to conflict would be as vigorous as ever, sharpened by the discussion which has taken place, and by the attention which has been drawn to them; and all the dangers of leaving this question open, which were so eloquently dealt with by the noble Earl opposite, would be as acute as ever. Therefore, it appears to me to be more prudent to go on with this Bill, as far as this House is concerned, with the distinct understanding that if by the time the House of Commons comes back after the Whitsuntide Recess the other Bill is passed in Newfoundland no further efforts will be made to pass this Bill before the Imperial Parliament. My noble Friend opposite also suggested that we might put aside the consideration of this Bill in this House, reserving to ourselves the right, if difficulties arose, of passing all its stages at one sitting.

I do not think that would be a satisfactory proceeding. The very acuteness with which he proceeded to point out the defects of the Bill shows that it is necessary that the measure should go through the ordinary consideration of the House, especially on the part of those great legal authorities we have in this House, in order that if, unhappily, such a Bill is necessary, it may be at least a Bill which will do the greatest amount of good and the least amount of harm, of which such a Bill is capable. I do not think we should be justified in passing such a Bill, as it were, at a day's notice and without some consideration, and, therefore, I prefer to recommend your Lordships now to read the Bill a second time, and then to send it for consideration to the Standing Committee. Then if, as we all hope, the Bill is not necessary, I do not think that there is very much harm done, either from the point of sentiment or from any other point of view, in consequence of the needless labour to which your Lordships have been put. But if, unhappily, the Bill is wanted, it will be in a condition fit to pass into law, and we shall be able to go to the House of Commons with a better hope that they will take notice of the exigency of the circumstances. On those grounds, though I cannot accede to the request that we should not go on with the Bill now, I do most earnestly join with the noble Lords opposite in expressing the hope that the Newfoundland Legislature will take this matter into its own hands, and will pass the measure necessary. I believe that in doing so we shall give an infinitely greater chance of a peaceable and effectual execution of whatever the arbitrators decide to be the Treaty than could be the case if the obedience to the Treaty is imposed, as it were, from without. I entirely accept what the noble and learned Lord said of the anxiety which this Government must feel that if there is any further reference to arbitration all the contested points should be submitted for decision, that it is very undesirable that the matter should be hung up, and very desirable that we should know exactly where we stand. But, as he observed with the greatest justice, there is a great difference between the arbitration which interprets a Treaty and the arbitration which decides a right. We must not misunderstand the position of the French in this matter. I do not think that the French will shrink from arbitration which decides what the documents mean; but they do shrink from any arbitration which shall decide their general rights in Newfoundland, and whether the Treaties shall stand upright or not, whether they are obsolete or not, and whether or not they have a right to enforce them. They have again and again said they will not carry into arbitration their international rights in this respect, and I think it is because such extreme demands have been made in Newfoundland that the French have this dread of carrying the arbitration too far. I do hope that as time goes on that reluctance will be overcome, and that we may be able by this arbitration to remove all those difficulties which have done so much to imperil, not only our relations with our old ally, but also the industry and prosperity of the colony, whose well-being we value so highly.

QUESTIONS.

ORANGE LODGES IN HER MAJESTY'S ARMY IN INDIA.

MR. T. D. SULLIVAN (Dublin, College Green): I beg to ask the Secretary The Marquess of Salisbury of State for War whether, in view of the fact that the existence of Orange lodges in Her Majesty's Army is forbidden by the Regulations of that Force, he will inquire whether such a lodge exists in the 2nd Battalion of the King's Own Yorkshire Light Infantry, now or recently stationed at Quetta?

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (MR. E. STANHOPE, Lincolnshire, Horncastle): There is no information on this subject at present at the War Office, but the Commander-in-Chief in India has been requested to make inquiries.

MR. T. D. SULLIVAN: If I give the right hon. Gentleman fuller details and particulars in reference to the matter—in confidence, of course—will he cause an inquiry to be made?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: Certainly, Sir; I shall be very glad to cause inquiries to be made if the hon. Gentleman will give me any details on the subject.

MR. JOHNSTON (Belfast, S.): Does the right hon. Gentleman think that a Roman Catholic Nationalist is likely to know anything about an Orange lodge?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: I shall be glad to receive information upon the subject from whatever source it may come.

THE REV. HANDLEY BIRD, MISSIONARY AT CORINBATORE.

SIR J. KENNAWAY (Devon, Honiton): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether his attention has been called to a sentence passed upon the Rev. Handley Bird, a missionary, at Corinbatore, on 12th March, of six months' imprisonment, by the Brahmin District Munsiff, for alleged breach of an injunction, in respect of a convert, to convert one Appu Row, who was in his house, which sentence was confirmed and made binding by Mr. Irvine, the District Judge, who, as stated in the Eastern Star of 28th March, absolutely refused to listen to arguments of the defendant's counsel, but abused him, and called him a born idiot, and emphasised his opinions of the plaintiff, his counsel, and missionaries in general; and whether the facts are as stated in the Eastern Star; and, if so, whether he will take speedy measures for remission of the sentence?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (SIR J. GORST, Chatham): A Report has been received from the Government of Madras. It appears that the guardians of a Brahmin boy obtained an injunction in the Munsiff's Court forbidding Mr. Bird to remove the boy from the jurisdiction of the Court pending the result of a trial as to his custody. The boy disappeared, and the Munsiff committed Mr. Bird to prison for contempt of Court. The District Judge, however, while upholding the committal, released Mr. Bird on his undertaking to produce the boy; and the boy having been produced, the order for committal was quashed. Mr. Bird was actually in gaol for one night only.

SIR J. KENNAWAY: The right hon. Gentleman has not answered that part of the question which relates to the language alleged to have been used by the District Judge. Was such language used?

SIR J. GORST: No, Sir. I am unable to give any information upon that point. The Government of Madras have not telegraphed the exact language used by the District Judge.

THE STRAITS SETTLEMENTS.

LORD HENRY BRUCE (Wilts, Chippenham): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies why the War Office and Colonial Office combined have increased the yearly payments of the Straits Settlements from 236,600 dollars to 615,000 dollars; whether the increased garrison, promised to the colony in return, is proportionate to the increased payment demanded; whether his attention has been drawn to the statement of Governor Sir Cecil Smith, K.C.M.G., in his Despatch to the Secretary of State for the Colonies, dated 19th February, 1890—

"I found myself wholly unable to conscientiously support the justice of all the claims which Her Majesty's Government had made, and the same views which I held were shared in by every Member of my Council. My instructions, however, were perfectly clear, and I had to require each Member of the Executive Council to vote against his conviction in support of the claims of Her Majesty's Government"; and whether the Government, when apportioning the just contribution the colony should pay towards the Mother Country, will take into consideration the fact that it is an important Imperial coaling station, and of Imperial vitality to Great Britain?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Baron H. de Worms, Liverpool, East Toxteth): The recent decision to increase the military contribution payable by the Straits Settlements was not that of any particular Department, but of Her Majesty's Government. It is not admitted that 236,600 dollars was the full sum formerly payable. The increase has been from £50,145 to £100,000. The force paid for by the colony under the Agreement of 1871 was one wing of an Infantry regiment and one battery of Artillery, or about 561 of all ranks, while the force on which its present contribution is calculated is about 1,500 of all ranks, exclusive, in each case, of staff and departments. The increase of the force charged for has, therefore, in the view of Her Majesty's Government, been about 167 per cent., while the increase in the contribution is only about 100 per cent. I have, of course, seen the Despatch referred to by my noble Friend. The amount of military contribution to be paid by the Straits Settlements has been already decided by Her Majesty's Government, and he will find the material facts and arguments on the subject set forth in the Papers recently presented to Parliament (C. 6,220.)

METHYLATED SPIRITS.

MR. O'NEILL (Antrim, Mid): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he is now prepared to state what steps are to be taken to prevent the use of methylated spirits as a beverage?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. Goschen, St. George's, Hanover Square): The Board of Inland Revenue intend to render methylated spirit sold by retail more nauseous in character. They also intend, when there is reason to believe that methylated spirit is being purchased from any retailer for potable purposes, to cause such retailer to keep a stock account, giving the date of sale and quantity sold on each occasion, together with the name and address of the purchaser, and, if any such purchaser be known to be using the methylated spirit as a beverage, the vendor will be warned that proceedings will be taken against him for recovery of the fine of £100 under Section 130 of the Spirits Act, 1880, if he continues to sell methylated spirit to the said purchaser. I can assure the hon. Member that every possible precaution will be taken to put a stop to the practice.

THE SASINE OFFICE, EDINBURGH.

MR. FRASER-MACKINTOSH (Invernessshire): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether he is aware that certain of the engrossing clerks in the Sasine Office, Edinburgh, complain of exclusion from the benefits of the Act of 1879, although holding appointments prior to its date; and whether he will lay upon the Table Copies of the Correspondence on the subject which took place in the years 1879 and 1880, between the Treasury and the Keeper of the Register of Sasines, and the Report of the Committee appointed in 1888, which reported favourably on the claims of these clerks?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. JACKSON, Leeds, N.): Engrossing clerks in the Sasines Office, Edinburgh, are temporary copyists paid by the folio. They are allowed to compete, with a special addition of 10 years to the maximum limit of age, for vacancies on the permanent establishment. They are not excluded from any benefit which the Act of 1879 was intended to grant them. I cannot consent to lay on the Table the Departmental Correspondence relative to the organisation of the Sasines Office. The Report of the Committee of 1888 is confidential; it is addressed to the Secretary for Scotland, and not to the Treasury.

LUNACY REPORTS.

DR. FARQUHARSON (Aberdeen, W.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether it will be practicable for the Commissioners in Lunacy to append to future issues of their Reports a table showing the causes of death of all lunatics dying in all lunatic asylums, public and private, in registered lunatic hospitals, and in workhouses in England and Wales?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. MATTHEWS, Birmingham, E.): I am informed by the Lunacy Commissioners that no Returns are made to them as to deaths of lunatics in workhouses, and they have no power to call for them. They have considered, and will again consider, whether they can, and how soon, insert tables showing the causes of death in lunatic asylums, registered hospitals, and licensed houses; but this would involve much additional clerical work, and the existing staff is already hard pressed owing to the great increase of work cast upon it by the operation of the Lunacy Act, 1890.

PLEURO-PNEUMONIA.

MR. LENG (Dundee): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Agriculture whether he is aware that Dr. Wray, a representative of the United States Bureau of Animal Industry in this country, has disputed the alleged cases of contagious pleuro-pneumonia in American cattle landed at Deptford, and asserts that eminent British authorities agree with him that the animals were only suffering from catarrhal pneumonia, and whether any further information can be given to the House respecting these cases?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. CHAPLIN, Lincolnshire, Sleaford): I am not aware that Dr. Wray, a representative of the United States Bureau of Animal Industry in this country, has disputed the cases of pleuro-pneumonia landed at Deptford, and asserted that eminent British authorities agree with him. I have no information upon the subject beyond an extract from a New York paper, which the hon. Member has been good enough to send me himself. I do not know that I can add anything to what I stated in reply to the hon. Member for Forfarshire a week ago. I may mention perhaps that, in addition to the experts at the Board of Agriculture, the lungs have been seen by Professor Walley and Professor M'Fadyean, both of them being eminent authorities and members of the Edinburgh Veterinary College, and also by Mr. Holmans, an officer of the Board at Deptford, who has had over 30 years' experience of the examination of foreign cattle, and none of these gentlemen, I am informed, have the slightest doubt on the subject.

LONG HOURS OF WOMEN'S WORK.

MR. J. WILSON (Lenark, Govan): I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether the attention of the Secretary for Scot land has been called to recent statements made in the public Press of Glasgow regarding the long hours during which women, other than domestic servants, are compelled to work in restaurant kitchens, the sanitary conditions under which they work, and the consequent injury to their health; and whether their case is covered by the Factory Acts, the Workshops Acts, or any other existing legislation of a like character; and, if not, whether the Government will consider the advisability of introducing legislation to meet their case?

*THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. P. B. ROBERTSON, Bute): The Secretary for Scotland has no knowledge of any such statements as are referred to in the question. Restaurant kitchens are not workshops under the Factory and Workshops Act, but any complaint as to their sanitary condition may at present be dealt with under the Public Health Acts. I do not, therefore, see any necessity for introducing legislation on the subject.

OCCASIONAL LICENCES.

SIR W. LAWSON (Cumberland, Cockermouth): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he is aware that lately six licensed victuallers applied to the Paignton Magistrates for occasional licences to sell intoxicants at the Paignton Hunt Races, and, having failed to obtain licences from the Bench in open Court, subsequently obtained them from Lord Churston acting independently of the Bench; and whether he will consider the expediency of legislating to prevent Magistrates acting in this isolated manner?

MR. MATTHEWS: I have seen a newspaper report of this case, from which I gather that the two Justices who composed the Bench could not agree, and the licences accordingly were not granted. The solicitor for the applicants informs me that before leaving the Bench the Chairman said that if the applicants could obtain the signature of another Magistrate, he should raise no objection. The Legislature has recently provided, by 26 & 27 Vict., that the consent of one Justice of the Peace only, instead of two, shall be necessary for these occasional licences, and I do not think it would be for the public convenience to go back to the former provisions of the law.

JUSTICES' CLERKS.

MR. COBB (Warwick, S.E., Rugby): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he is aware that the Justices for the Ross Petty Sessional Division of Herefordshire have recently appointed a debt collector, who is not a lawyer, as their clerk; and that the new clerk so appointed served for 14 years as assistant to the former clerk; whether the appointment has been made in consequence of "special circumstances," under the 7th section of "The Justices' Clerks Act, 1877," and, if so, what such special circumstances are; whether he is aware that the Magistrates who are in the habit of attending the Bench are exclusively, or almost exclusively, clergymen or military men, but none of them lawyers, and that such appointment of the new clerk has caused dissatisfaction, and even indignation, among the inhabitants in the district; and whether he will represent to the Chairman of the Bench that it is desirable that the clerk should be a trained lawyer.

MR. MATTHEWS: I have made inquiry into this matter, and I am informed that the recently-appointed clerk was not a debt collector, and that he has been continuously employed for upwards of 20 years in attendance at Petty Sessional Courts, and for 16 years as assistant to the clerk of a Petty Sessional Division. The appointment was made under the 7th section of the Act quoted. The Justices inform me that they have always found him an excellent legal authority, and considered him much to be preferred to any other applicant. There is only one clergyman on the Bench, and he is a County Magistrate of long standing, and I am assured that the appointment has met with general approbation in the district. I am not aware of any circumstances which would justify me in making any representation to the Chairman of the Bench on the subject.

MERCHANDISE MARKS ACT.

MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he is aware that Mr. Herbert John Greenhalgh, who was found guilty, in December, 1888, on the prosecution of the Extra Hard Cotton Spinners' Association, of having, with intent to defraud, and contrary to the provisions of "The Merchandise Marks Act, 1887," sold goods marked outside with a mark which signified that there were a greater number of yards of yarn contained in the parcels thus marked than were contained, is at present a Justice of the Peace at Mansfield, and sits on the Bench, and administers justice; and whether it is the intention of the Lord Chancellor to take any steps with regard to this Magistrate?

MR. MATTHEWS: I am informed by the Lord Chancellor that he has no knowledge of the circumstances referred to; but if the hon. Member will be good enough to inform me where the trial took place, and where a report of it can be found, I will communicate that information to the Chancellor, who will, no doubt, make inquiry into the matter.

SAMOA.

SIR T. ESMONDE (Dublin Co., S.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs if it is true that the United States Government have ordered an additional warship to proceed at once to Samoa; if any British warship is at present stationed there; and if he can state how many German war vessels are at Apia?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Sir J. FERGUSSON, Manchester, N.E.): According to our latest information, there are no British, United States, or German men-of-war at present at Samoa. The hurricane season is only just over, when it is dangerous to keep ships there.

DOMINICA.

SIR T. ESMONDE: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies if he will state what was the answer made by Her Majesty's Government to the protest of the Elective Members of the Dominica Assembly against the carriage, by the Governor's casting vote, of the Motion for the further loan of £10,000 for public works, in July, 1890; and what was the explanation offered by the Governor to the Secretary of State for the condition of the public works of the island as summed up in that protest?

*BARON H. DE WORMS: No answer was made by Her Majesty's Government to the protest of the Elective Members of the Dominica Assembly, referred to in the question. The Governor, in a message to the Assembly immediately after the protest, gave a full explanation of the condition of the public works of the island. The explanation is too long to be embodied in an answer in the House, but a copy of the message can be seen by the hon. Baronet at the Colonial Office.

MEDIUM POSTCARDS.

SIR G. CAMPBELL (Kirkcaldy, &c.): I beg to ask the Postmaster General if he is doing anything towards introducing a medium postage card, such as is used in all other countries, instead of the very thick and very thin cards hitherto used in this country?

*THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. RAIKES, Cambridge University): Postcards were sold originally of one thickness only, and the stouter card was introduced to meet the demand for a second and better quality. I am not at present contemplating the introduction of a card of medium thickness, but I may mention that the present stout card—sold in packets of 10 for 6d.—is growing in favour, and is, to some extent, taking the place of the thin card. It therefore seems scarcely necessary to introduce a new variety thinner than the favourite card.

FUNDED DEBT, &c.

SIR W. HARCOURT (Derby): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will state what are the figures for 31st March, 1891 (1) of Funded Debt; (2) of Capital Value of Terminable Annuities; (3) of Unfunded Debt; (4) Exchequer Balances; (5) Aggregate Net Liabilities of State; in accordance with the form of National Debt Return, No. 343?

MR. GOSCHEN: The figures asked for by the right hon. Gentleman are as follows:—(1) £579,472,082; (2) £68,496,365; (3) £36,140,079; (4) £6,370,897; (5) £679,922,370.

PREFERENTIAL TREATMENT TO COLONIES.

MR. HOWARD VINCENT (Sheffield, Central): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether France, Germany, Spain, Portugal, and Holland, as a rule, admit the productions of their several colonies on better fiscal terms to the Home market than the goods of foreign nations; and whether their colonies also receive the products of the Mother Country upon equally advantageous terms?

SIR J. FERGUSSON: As regards France, Spain, and Portugal, the answer to both questions is in the affirmative. In Holland there is no Import Duty upon sugar and coffee coming from any quarter, and these are its chief colonial staples. We have no information as to the German treatment of colonial produce.

BERLIN LABOUR CONFERENCE.

SIR W. HOULDSWORTH (Manchester, N.W.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether, in view of the fact that a Bill to carry out the recommendations of the Berlin Labour Conference is at present before the German Reichstag, and that draft Bills for the same object have been prepared and published in Spain and Austria, he will cause further inquiries to be made as to measures of the same kind being contemplated in other countries which were represented at the Conference?

SIR J. FERGUSSON: Despatches have already been addressed to Her Majesty's Representatives in the sense desired.

PORTUGAL AND SOUTH-EAST AFRICA.

MR. BRYCE (Aberdeen, S.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether he can state what is the present position of the negotiations pending between Her Majesty's Government and the Government of Portugal with a view to the averting of collisions such as have recently occurred in South-East Africa between Englishmen and the Portuguese authorities, and to the adjustment of the territorial claims of the two countries?

SIR J. FERGUSSON: A draft Convention was recently submitted to the Portuguese Government, counter proposals have been received from them, and are under consideration by Her Majesty's Government. The Portuguese authorities, having been instructed not to offer any opposition to communications between the East Coast and the interior, there does not appear to be any danger of further collisions?

MR. BRYCE: Am I right in saying that the modus vivendi expires in about a fortnight?

SIR J. FERGUSSON: Yea, Sir; I think on the 15th of May.

THE BLOCK IN THE LAW COURTS.

MR. KIMBER (Wandsworth): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury when he expects to be able to announce the conclusions of the Government as to the appointment of an additional Judge or Judges, or as to what other means they will take to obviate the grievous delays, and consequent losses and anxieties, in obtaining justice to which suitors are exposed?

*THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster): It is no doubt a very general opinion, in which the Government are disposed to concur, that an additional Judge is required in the Chancery Division, but I am not prepared to say at what time the state of Public Business will enable the Government to submit a Motion on the subject. Meanwhile, efforts are being made to diminish the pressure of causes by the assistance of Judges of the Queen's Bench Division, where lists are in a satisfactory condition.

THE IMPRISONMENT OF MR. WALSH.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.) I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that Mr. Walsh, of the Cashel Sentinel, on the expiration of his four months' sentence, was re-arrested outside Tullamore Gaol on a warrant which the police withheld executing for four months; that Mr. Walsh was conveyed to Clonmel Gaol, and, after six days there, re-conveyed to Tullamore to undergo his first sentence of three months; that he was then treated as if he were beginning a new term of imprisonment not consecutive on the previous term, and put on the plank bed; and whether this interpretation of Rules 19 and 36 of Prison Rules was sanctioned by the Government?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): I am informed that it was the case that the prisoner was re-arrested on the expiration of the first sentence. The second warrant could not be executed before, because the prisoner was at the time undergoing imprisonment for another offence. The General Prisons Board report that the prisoner has been treated in the manner described in the last part of the first paragraph of the question, that treatment being strictly in accordance with prison rules.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): If it had been one sentence of seven months' imprisonment instead of two, one of four months', and the other of three, would not Mr. Walsh have been entitled to some relaxation? Will the right hon. Gentleman take into consideration the hardship of treating this gentleman as if there were two offences?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: There were two separate investigations and two separate sentences.

DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid): Was not the second sentence pronounced against Mr. Walsh during the time he was in prison upon the first sentence?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I cannot answer that question.

MR. SEXTON: My point is, that after a certain term of imprisonment, a man is entitled to relaxation. This man having suffered one term of imprisonment is entitled to relaxation now upon the second sentence.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I understand that he was convicted of two separate offences, each of which was independent of the other.

MR. FLYNN (Cork, N.): May I ask why Mr. Walsh was conveyed to Clonmel Goal instead of Tullamore?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The hon. Member must give notice of that question.

PRESENTING A REVOLVER.

MR. BLANE (Armagh, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that a man, named Malcolm Turkington, presented a revolver at a number of people on the public road near Lurgan on the 20th instant, and afterwards presented a revolver, on the same day, at a woman, named Mary Hendron, and that, although she complained to the authorities at Lurgan, and requested informations against Turkington, her request was refused; whether Turkington had a licence to carry firearms; and if he would inquire into the matter?

Mr. T. M. Healy

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I understand that this man's defence is that he was attacked by a crowd, was twice struck with stones, and was obliged to draw a revolver in self-defence. The Magistrates did not refuse Mary Hendron's request, but granted permission to her to take out a summons, and the case will be investigated on the 5th May. Pending that investigation, it would not be proper for me to enter into any particulars.

MR. BLANE: Is it a fact that Turkington had no licence to carry firearms?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I cannot enter into details.

LABOURERS' COTTAGES IN ATHLONE.

MR. DONAL SULLIVAN (Westmeath, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that an inquiry was held in the Athlone Workhouse on the 9th of last March, in connection with the erection of labourers' cottages; that since then all the necessary forms required by the Act for the building of those dwellings have been completed; what is the cause of the delay in their erection; whether the Local Government Board would put pressure on the Guardians to compel them to give immediately to the labourers the small plot of ground attached to each cottage, so as to enable them at once to till their ground and sow their little crop; and whether he is aware that, up to the present, not a single labourer's cottage has been erected in the Athlone Union?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am informed that it is the case that the Guardians of Athlone Union have presented a Petition for the confirmation of an improvement scheme under the Labourers' Acts. The matter is in the hands of the Local Government Inspector for report. Action on the part of the Guardians must await that Report. I believe that up to the present time no cottages have been erected under the Acts in the Union.

PIER AT HOLYWOOD.

MR. M'CARTAN (Down, S.): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade with reference to the proposed pier at Holywood, County Down, whether, considering the default of the late undertakers, he has fixed any period of time within which the present purchasers of the pier are obliged to put it into repair; and whether he is aware that, notwithstanding the lapse of almost two years since the purchase, no steps have yet been taken in the matter?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Sir M. HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.): I am aware that, during the period of nearly a year and a half which has elapsed since the purchase of the pier, nothing has been done by the purchasers, although their attention has been called to the matter by the Board of Trade. I have no authority to compel persons who obtain powers under Provisional Orders, or their successors, to exercise the powers conferred on them, and I therefore could not fix a period as suggested. It may, indeed, be a question whether, having regard to Section 12 of the General Pier and Harbour Act of 1862, the powers to repair the pier, given by the Order of 1882, have not now expired.

LAND COMMISSION—BELFAST.

MR. M'CARTAN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he will state how many appeals were disposed of by the Land Commission during its last sitting at Belfast; and in how many cases were the judicial rents fixed by the Sub-Commission confirmed, reduced, and increased respectively?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Land Commissioners report that there were 110 appeals listed for hearing at their last sitting in Belfast, which were disposed of as follows:—Judicial rents affirmed, 52; ditto raised, 22; ditto reduced, 4; dismisses affirmed, 3; Sub-Commission decisions reversed and originating notices dismissed, 5; Sub-Commission decisions reversed and fair rent fixed, 2; again referred to Sub-Commission to fix fair rent, 4; withdrawn and settled, 15; adjourned, 3—total, 110.

LAND COMMISSION—WEXFORD.

MR. J. BARRY (Wexford, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that the Chief Land Commission has appointed 3rd June next to hear appeals from the decisions of the Sub-Commission for County Wexford; if he is aware that there are upwards of 100 appeals listed from the Poor Law Union of Wexford alone; and whether, considering the enormous expense and inconvenience of bringing the tenants and their witnesses to Dublin, he would suggest to the Land Commission the desirability of hearing these appeals in the Assize town of Wexford?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Land Commissioners report that their present arrangement to hear appeals from the County Wexford is as stated in the first paragraph. No cases have yet been listed, the papers being in the hands of the Court Valuer. So soon as the list is formed the Commissioners will carefully consider whether, having regard to their other public engagements and the number and character of the holdings concerned, it would be for the public convenience to have a sitting in Wexford.

BELFAST GOAL.

MR. SEXTON: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he can state what decision has been arrived at with reference to the alterations at Belfast Gaol?

SIR E. HARLAND (Belfast, N.): I beg also to ask the right hon. Gentleman if anything has yet been decided as to the removal back or otherwise of the portion of new wall in front of the prison in Belfast?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The matter is still engaging the careful attention of the Government, and they are not without hope that the question at issue will be settled by the acquisition of more land.

MR. SEXTON: Will the right hon. Gentleman bring the power of the Irish Executive to bear upon the matter, and have it determined in one way or the other before the Vote comes on.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: It is not so simple a matter as the hon. Gentleman supposes. My attention has been drawn to the subject by the Prisons Board; but there are many difficulties in the way of settling it offhand. I have taken great pains about it.

LAND PURCHASE BILL.

MR. J. MORLEY (Newcastle-on-Tyne): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he will lay upon the Table of the House a statement of the number of holdings of different classes in Ireland to which Clause 6 of the Land Purchase Bill will apply, and on which he has formed the estimate that £95,000,000 would suffice for their purchase?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Probably the right hon. Gentleman will have gathered from an answer which I gave on a previous occasion that the data which I have been able to obtain are not of such an authentic and certain character as to make this a proper subject of Parliamentary Return. I did give conjectural information in answer to a question, but I do not think it would be proper to put it into a more definite shape.

THE PENNY POSTAGE JUBILEE.

SIR T. ESMONDE: I beg to ask the Postmaster General when the letter carriers of the Dundrum, County Dublin, Post Office, will be allowed the day's leave and the day's pay promised last year to the post boys of the United Kingdom in commemoration of the Penny Postage Jubilee?

*MR. RAIKES: I find that, through a misunderstanding on the part of the Local Authorities, only a part of the letter carriers at Dundrum have been granted the Jubilee Holiday. The misunderstanding has now been corrected, and those who have not had the holiday already will have it granted them without further delay.

OTTER FISHING IN LOUGH DERG.

SIR T. ESMONDE: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he is aware that persons have been earning their livelihood for the past 25 years upon Lough Derg, County Tipperary, by "otter" fishing, without the authorities taking any steps to prevent them; that no other kind of cross fishing is possible on Lough Derg; and that no notice was given this year prior to the issue of licences of any change of the old custom; and whether, under the circumstances, the authorities will allow the continuance of "otter" fishing, or else refund the money paid by the fishermen for the licences?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Inspectors of Irish Fisheries are not aware that any persons have been earning their livelihood by "otter" fishing on Lough Derg; but they state that it is the case that the practice of taking out licences for crosslines and using the "otter" has existed for upwards of 20 years. It is, however, not the case that no other kind of cross fishing is possible.

FINANCIAL RELATIONS BETWEEN IRELAND AND GREAT BRITAIN.

SIR T. ESMONDE: I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer when the Committee of Inquiry into the financial relations between Ireland and Great Britain will sit?

*MR. GOSCHEN: So far as the Government are concerned, and some of the right hon. Gentlemen opposite, we are perfectly ready for the appointment of the Committee in question, and have been ready for some time. There is no reason why the Committee should not be appointed as soon as the Members for Ireland give notice through the ordinary channel of the names to be appointed.

MR. SEXTON: I presume that the right hon. Gentleman is sensible of the inconvenience of the delay arising from the non-appointment of the Committee.

*MR. GOSCHEN: We have been ready for some time; but I understood that the matter was mainly in the hands of the hon. Member himself. I will put the Committee on the Paper.

MR. A. O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.): Will all the information promised by the Treasury be furnished before the Committee meets?

*MR. GOSCHEN: Yes, Sir; that will be done; but it would be irregular to circulate any information on the subject before the first meeting of the Committee. A meeting will have to be held pro forma, to authorise the circulation of the information.

FEVER IN RANAFAST.

MR. A. O'CONNOR: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, with reference to his statement on Thursday last, that fever does not exist in Ranafast, and that, though an outbreak of scarlatina had occurred in the Dungle Dispensary District, it was practically over on the 25th March, whether he is aware that the dispensary doctor did attend 11 cases of fever in Ranafast on the 21st instant, eight of them being scarlet fever cases; and that two brothers from a neighbouring townland, who died suddenly of scarlatina, were buried on the 21st instant; whether, seeing that his previous information was incorrect, he will cause further inquiry to be made through fresh channels; and whether he requires to see the doctor's certificates in confirmation of the above statements?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: My reply of the 16th inst. referred to in this question was in accordance with a Report dated 13th inst., and correctly represented the facts at that time. The later cases of scarlatina, which were 10 in number, exclusive of the two deaths on the 19th, were visited by the dispensary doctor on the 21st inst. for the first time. In addition to these, he found three cases of fever of a mild type, believed to be influenza. It is also understood there is one case of some months' standing, which has developed into typhoid fever. There appears to be no ground to suggest that these cases of illness were in any way connected with distress.

MR. A. O'CONNOR: Will the right hon. Gentleman cause further inquiry to be made as to the allegation that the official sent down instead of visiting 11 houses to which his attention had been specially drawn confined his visit to two of them which were convenient to the high road?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The information which I have given was derived from the dispensary doctor.

DR. TANNER: Arising out of the right hon. Gentleman's answer, are we to understand that the dispensary doctor has asserted that a case of scarlatina absolutely developed into typhoid fever?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The hon. Member must only understand what I said.

MR. MAC NEILL (Donegal, S.): Does the dispensary doctor say that these cases of typhoid fever are unconnected with the distress which exists in the locality?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I do not profess to be a medical expert; but I have always understood that scarlatina and typhoid, or any other kind of fever, were altogether independent of distress.

THE LABOUR COMMISSION.

DR. TANNER: May I ask whether it will be practicable for the Royal Commission on Labour to meet on Wednesday next, or when?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I have no information on the subject, and the matter has passed entirely out of my hands.

ADULTERATED MANURES.

MR. CHANNING (Northampton, E.): I wish to ask the President of the Board of Agriculture when he proposes to bring in a Bill to deal with the question of adulterated manures?

MR. CHAPLIN: I am unable to answer the question at present.

MR. CHANNING: Will it be before Whitsuntide?

MR. CHAPLIN: I cannot say.

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Motion made, and Question proposed,
TEA.

"That, towards raising the Supply granted to Her Majesty, the Duties of Customs now chargeable on Tea shall continue to be levied and charged on and after the first day of August, one thousand eight hundred and ninety-one, until the first day of August, one thousand eight hundred and ninety-two, on the importation thereof into Great Britain or Ireland (that is to say) on—

Tea the pound . Four Pence."
—(Mr. Goschen.)

(4.15.) SIR W. HARCOURT (Derby): In the long and very interesting speech which the Chancellor of the Exchequer addressed to us on Thursday night in introducing his financial proposals for the year, the right hon. Gentleman touched upon a large number of subjects which, no doubt, were fully deserving of the attention and inquiry of the House, and upon one or two of those subjects, as well as upon the general scope of the right hon. Gentleman's financial system, I would ask leave now to make a few observations. Before I go into any general matters I wish to draw the attention of the Committee and of the right hon. Gentleman to one statement that he made, which is so surprising that it appears to be impossible to reconcile it with the figures contained in the official Returns relating to the subject—I mean the statement with reference to what has been done in the way of the reduction and extinction of Debt. The right hon. Gentleman said that he had made large reductions in the Debt during his administration—much larger reductions, he proceeded to prove, than had been effected by his predecessors in office. Well, of course, the right hon. Gentleman ought to have made large, and even very much larger, reductions than his predecessors, for this reason—that, by the operation of the Sinking Fund, the sum payable for interest becomes less year by year, while the margin of Revenue applicable for the redemption of the Debt becomes larger. It must also be remembered that, in consequence of the right hon. Gentleman's successful operations in connection with the conversion of the Debt, the annual interest on the Debt has been reduced by £1,500,000. And that is not all. In addition to that, the right hon. Gentleman has had enormous sums, amounting in the whole to something like £8,000,000, due to the old Sinking Fund, which arose from the realised surpluses of his estimates. The sums derived from these various sources which were applicable to the reduction of the Debt have, therefore, enabled him to make a very considerable reduction in the amount of the Debt.

*THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. Goschen, St. George's, Hanover Square): There has been an increase of balances.

SIR W. HARCOURT: I am not going into the question of balances; but in olden times the balances were entered as an asset to be taken against the Debt. I always thought that that was an unsound principle of calculation, and I was fortunate enough to convince the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who decided that they were no longer to be taken as a balance of Debt, but were to be put in a separate column by themselves. The balances may come into the reduction of Debt next year by anticipation; but I only mention the matter by the way. The Chancellor of the Exchequer has stated that during the last five years, quite apart from the operation of the Terminable Annuities, he has effected a reduction in the Debt of £37,000,000. Upon that point I must ask the right hon. Gentleman to give the Committee some explanation of the figures upon which he bases that statement, because it is certainly not supported by any figures contained in the official Returns, and it would be a serious matter to have a conflict as to the National Debt in the Budget and the Debt shown in the Returns. In making his calculations the right hon. Gentleman quite fairly omitted the years 1885-86 and 1886-87, seeing that there was exceptional military expenditure in those years, and that he himself was responsible for the Estimates in the latter year. The right hon.

Gentleman took the four years before and the four years after the exceptional period; but he ought not to have taken the year 1880-81 for the reason already stated, that the arrangements of 1881 were those made by Sir Stafford Northcote before the Dissolution. The Chancellor of the Exchequer ought to have begun with the year 1882, and have taken the four years up to and including 1885. In the earlier four years the right hon. Gentleman says the total was £27,200,000; and the difference was £3,600,000 in favour of the present year. There is in existence a means of testing these statements. Two or three years ago I was anxious to have fuller Returns respecting the National Debt than any the House then possessed, so that it might be seen exactly what has been done from year to year, and particularly how much Debt has been wiped off, and how much created. The Return was prepared in the most careful way by Mr. Edward Hamilton and Sir C. Rivers Wilson; and I will take from it the figures for the two sets of years, and see how they tally with those of the right hon. Gentleman. The figures show that the net reduction of Debt was—for 1888, £5,225,000; for 1889, £6,428,000; and for 1890, £8,200,000. For 1891 the amount does not appear upon the Return, but it can be ascertained from the figures the Chancellor of the Exchequer has just given, and the amount is £6,100,000. The total for the last four years was £25,953,000, or, in round numbers, £26,000,000. This is the amount which the Chancellor of the Exchequer puts at £30,800,000. For the earlier four years the figures of the Return are as follows:—1882, £6,940,000; 1883, £6,776,000; 1884, £8,900,000; 1885, £7,273,000; total, £29,889,000, or, in round numbers, £30,000,000, as against £26,000,000. The comparative result is exactly the reverse of that stated by the right hon. Gentleman, and so far from showing £3,600,000 in his favour it shows £3,600,000 in favour of the former Government. Unless these figures are erroneous, so far from the right hon. Gentleman having, with enormously greater resources and with a diminished interest to pay, done more for the reduction of the Debt than any one else under the system established by Sir Stafford Northcote, he has done less by the amount of £3,600,000. The resources referred to are the under-estimates of Revenue through which the old Sinking Fund in these four years have amounted to £8,000,000, which means that he has raised £8,000,000 more than was wanted. In the former four years the excess was £1,500,000 as compared now with £8,000,000, or a difference of £6,500,000; and if this has been raised it ought to be shown in the Debt operations; but it has disappeared. May I ask how and where it has disappeared? The Budget speech was a long speech—I do not say that it was too long—but it was necessarily long under the new patent system of finance which has overthrown all the old English traditions. It is not one Budget giving an account of Imperial finance for the year, which raised the money for the year and closed the account at the end of the year; but the right hon. Gentleman had to deal with three Budgets—first, what may be called the old English Budget; next, the new-fangled Continental “Extraordinary” Budget; and lastly, the Local Subsidy Budget. These are new things, and even those most familiar with the subject find it impossible to understand the Public Accounts and Public Finance at the present time. The great security for economy and sound financial administration has always in this country been that you provide the money you think you would want for the Services of the year; at the end of the year you closed the account, and if there had been more money raised than was required, you returned it to the Exchequer. In short, you closed the account, and began a fresh account the next year. That was the great security of English finance, and it was one which had been carefully built up by great masters of finance. It has been jealously guarded by the appointment of the Auditor General and other officers, who see that the principle is observed; whenever that principle has been departed from the departure has been severely attacked, and the departure has been condemned in past days by none more severely than by the present Chancellor of the Exchequer. The first effect of the present multifarious system of accounts is confusion, and, if the Chancellor of the Exchequer will excuse me for saying so, considerable difficulty in explaining the accounts. I have endeavoured to follow the right hon. Gentleman's figures in the House and in print, but I confess that the difficulty of understanding them becomes greater the more they are explained. The right hon. Gentleman has delivered paper after paper, not one of which it is possible to reconcile with the other. I have endeavoured with my friends, the right hon. Members for Wolverhampton (Mr. H. H. Fowler) and Bradford (Mr. Shaw Lefevre), who are very familiar with these subjects, but we cannot make any one of these accounts square with the other, and it is necessarily so. The Chancellor of the Exchequer has created four accounts—the Australian Establishment Account, the Imperial Defence Account, the Naval Defence Fund, and the Barrack Fund. Every one of these Funds has been raised out of different sources, to be paid at different times on money borrowed on different conditions. The extraordinary part is that the expenditure was to take place at certain times, and has not so taken place; the money has not been provided in the manner intended; if anybody endeavours to make head or tail of the Expenditure he will fail, and I doubt whether even the Chancellor of the Exchequer understands it. Some of the right hon. Gentleman's statements certainly cannot be made to correspond with the Papers he has delivered. I do not say that the right hon. Gentleman has endeavoured to hold anything back, still less that he has endeavoured to misrepresent anything. With the greatest courtesy the right hon. Gentleman has endeavoured to give all the information in his power. It is the system he has introduced which has created such confusion that he himself is not able to clear it up. I am extremely sorry to have seen this departure from all the principles on which English finance has hitherto been governed—principles of action and of account which were established by Sir Robert Peel, Sir George Lewis, and by my right hon. Friend the Member for Mid Lothian. [Mr. W. E. GLADSTONE: We have now changed all that.] It is an extremely dangerous thing in an old-established firm to alter its system of book-keeping, and to begin to proceed upon new-fangled principles altogether. We have seen some consequences of that sort of thing lately in the City, and I would be sorry to see the same principles tried upon the old firm of the English Treasury. All these things are very ingenious, but ingenuity is not what is most wanted in dealing with finance. You do not want a number of small devices for escaping the fact that you are spending more money than you have got; and, instead of wrapping up the fact that you require to spend more than you have, you should come forward and say so, borrowing the money upon the ordinary credit of the English nation. That is the process which has before been followed, and it ought to be adhered to, instead of saying when £2,500,000 is wanted, "We are not borrowing it; nobody will have to pay for it; nobody will feel it; we will put it some years hence upon the proceeds of the Suez Canal." This is a process which has hitherto been unknown to English finance, and the Economist, a paper not unfriendly to the right hon. Gentleman, says that he has "Descended to arts which are humiliating to English finance, and which belong rather to the finance of bankrupt South American Republics."

The right hon. Gentleman says that £2,500,000 will not come out of the taxes. I should not have thought that a man with the logical capacity of the right hon. Gentleman would have descended to so transparent a fallacy as that. If, instead of putting it upon the Suez Canal, he had put it upon the increased value of the leases upon the Crown estates when they fall in, can it be said that nobody would have felt the burden? Does not everybody see that five years hence, when £500,000 a year comes in from the Suez Canal, the people of that time will have to pay £500,000 more in taxes than they would had this mortgage not been made upon them? Having added this extraordinary Budget to the old English Budget, the right hon. Gentleman has added a new head of "local subsidies." The first observation I would make upon those subsidies is that they add immensely to the confusion of the public accounts. The right hon. Gentleman has removed the confusion in one respect, but it is impossible to make out what is the real produce of the taxes. But there is a much more serious consequence than that. The right hon. Gentleman has diverted from the Exchequer a stream which would have filled his reservoirs with £4,000,000, which he has given away. I said he had given it in relief of rates. We have it on the authority of the Minister of Agriculture that the relief of rates in the rural districts all went to the landlords. I admit that the Chancellor of the Exchequer told us that he had not settled quite in his own mind how much of the relief in urban districts went to the occupier and how much to the owner, and I do not pretend to settle that point. But what might the Chancellor of the Exchequer have done with this £4,000,000 if he had kept it? He might have taken 1d. off the Income Tax; have removed all, or nearly all, that remains of the Tea Duty; and he might have taken off what remains of the Inhabited House Duty. All this would have been a relief to the landowner, who would have been more benefited by 1d. reduction in the Income Tax than by all he gets from the rates. Towards the end of his speech the other night the Chancellor of the Exchequer asked, "Am I to have a surplus?" From the many principles known to English finance, the answer ought to have been in the negative. A surplus in any given year is an excess of receipts over payments, of Revenue over Expenditure. If your Revenue exceeds your Expenditure you have a surplus, but if your Expenditure exceeds your Revenue you have a deficit. Now, what was the situation of the right hon. Gentleman this year, and what was it last year? Did his Revenue exceed his Expenditure? No; his Expenditure exceeded his Revenue, and he had had a deficit last year, and the right hon. Gentleman's Expenditure this year is to be, as I will show, in excess of the Revenue he has got, and neither last year nor this year has he, or will he have, a surplus. How did the right hon. Gentleman get this surplus last year? By the figures the right hon. Gentleman has given it is easily made out; he borrowed between £3,000,000 and £4,000,000 of money last year. The Unfunded Debt is increased by £4,000,000. The right hon. Gentleman borrowed £3,500,000 last year in order to obtain a surplus of £1,750,000; if he had not borrowed he would have had a deficit of £1,500,000. The old Sinking Fund is operated upon in a way which I will call the Chancellor of the Exchequer's "new way of paying old debts." What is the right hon. Gentleman going to do this year? He is going to borrow something like £3,000,000; he has got an Expenditure beyond what he provided for in the Revenue of the year. The right hon. Gentleman has said that £2,140,000 would be spent on naval defence. I think that the First Lord of the Admiralty would be very much surprised if that is all he is to get to spend on naval defence.

*MR. GOSCHEN: All that is borrowed.

SIR W. HARCOURT: The right hon. Gentleman did not say that in his speech.

MR. GOSCHEN: I thought I had stated with absolute clearness that I was speaking of money which was borrowed.

SIR W. HARCOURT: Nothing could be further from my desire than to misrepresent the right hon. Gentleman; but I think that if we substituted the word "borrowed" for the word "spent" in the Chancellor of the Exchequer's speech we might make something of it. Having borrowed £2,000,000 the right hon. Gentleman will have a surplus of £2,000,000; if he had not borrowed it he would have a deficit of £1,000,000. That is the way of getting a surplus in in this new-fangled mode of English finance. It is like getting a banker to put £1,000 to one's account in order to pay Christmas bills, and then treating that £1,000 as a surplus, whereas the money has been borrowed, because without it the account would have been overdrawn. That is what I would call not salvation finance, but the milder term of post obit finance. All these systems are ingenious shifts to make people believe that the finances are in a very flourishing state. In order to pay our way we are obliged to borrow £3,500,000 at a time when the Revenue is in a condition of prosperity such as has not been enjoyed for a long time. I maintain that this system of finance is extremely mischievous, and tends to hide from the people what is the real condition of things. It is mischievous in its present effects, and in my opinion it is much more mischievous in its future consequences; because we may depend upon it that this easy going system of finance, which, in the time of Mr. Hudson, was known as "making things pleasant," is an encouragement to every species of extravagance; it teaches people that they may spend what they like, as tradesmen tell young gentlemen they need not pay now, they can pay at some future time. How has the right hon. Gentleman obtained the surpluses of which he is so proud? Of course, he has been greatly aided by the prosperity of the time, and he has been largely aided in concurrence with that prosperity by the magnificent opportunity of which he has taken so able and skilful advantage, in the Conversion of the Debt. But with all this assistance, out of what have the surpluses been made? The first has been made by cutting down the fund for the reduction of the Debt; the second by borrowing £3,500,000; and the third is made by borrowing £3,500,000 again. At this time of piping prosperity that is the way in which the right hon. Gentleman makes his surplus. How is it, with all these advantages of good trade and reduced interest on the Debt, that the right hon. Gentleman has no money to give away in reduction of taxation? Well, the right hon. Gentleman has impeached his colleagues who sat beside him as the robbers of the Queen's Exchequer. But the right hon. Gentleman himself is one of that long firm; he is the colleague who carries the bag, and without his consent and participation this burglary could not be effected. It often happens that it is the domestic servant who opens the door for the plunder of the house; and that is the situation which the Chancellor of the Exchequer must have been content to fill in this matter. Of course, the first cause why the right hon. Gentleman has nothing to give away is the enormous increase in the Naval and Military expenditure of this country. The right hon. Gentleman has increased this expenditure not upon the Estimates of the Liberal Government, but upon his own, by £3,000,000 a year since 1889; that is the ordinary increase under the Naval and Military Estimates, besides £17,000,000 extraordinary. That is the real ground and foundation of the financial situation; it is all nonsense talking about a Sinking Fund and paying off debt when we are borrowing. Lord Beaconsfield talked of "bloated armaments." I wish we could get back to the bloated armaments which Lord Beaconsfield used to denounce. Are these swollen Estimates the result of the experience and judgment of the Government itself? I know that hon. Members opposite go up and down the country saying that if there is an increase it is due to those miserable Liberals who have run down those establishments. How has the money been spent? When the Chancellor of the Exchequer came into office in 1887 he had full knowledge of how things stood. In 1887, in his Budget speech, the right hon. Gentleman said that the extra charge was due to that which is commonly known as the naval scare. The right hon. Gentleman did not expect at that time that he was going to have a naval scare by which £17,000,000 would be added to the ordinary expenditure. The right hon. Gentleman said in his speech in 1887 that the House had agreed to an extra expenditure of £3,000,000 on ships, and £1,600,000 on the Army. The right hon. Gentleman went on to say that the Estimates had been increased temporarily, and that he hoped that at the end of the financial year they would have effected a large diminution in the heavy charges which had been made on the taxpayers owing to exceptional circumstances. Only three years ago he said—

"There is good reason to hope and believe that the time is not far distant when the Navy Estimates will not require to be swollen by exceptional items, such as these, which have fallen as heavily on the taxpayer of the last few years."

Our expenditure then was, in fact, exceptionally heavy, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer expressed confidence that in the future it would be lighter. That was only three years ago. Let the right hon. Gentleman now go to the country and say that the present increased expenditure is due to the running down of the establishments by the Liberal Government, and see what answer he will get. He said three years ago that the expenditure of the Governments which preceded him had been exceptionally large, owing to the naval scare, but he pledged his opinion that the Navy Estimates would in the future be much lower. For a time he reduced the Estimates to the extent of nearly £1,000,000. Yet it is said that this present great increase is due to the fact that we ran down the establishments, which he himself subsequently depleted to the extent I have mentioned. The statement is absolutely untrue, and I hope it will not be repeated. The Government may think that the extraordinary expenditure they have demanded is necessary, and they may think that the country supports them in it. Then, if so, why do they not prove it by asking the country to pay for it, instead of doing, as Sir Stafford Northcote did—namely, “spreading” it, for which he was denounced by the present Chancellor of the Exchequer as a cowardly financier. By the system under which the Chancellor of the Exchequer is now dealing with these matters, it is quite impossible to check the accounts year by year—to ascertain accurately what is received and spent in any one year. For the first time we have unexpended balances carried over from one year to another, a practice which our whole system of finance was intended to prevent. The result is that various matters are mixed up which ought to be kept separate, and it is impossible to trace the accounts satisfactorily—to tell how much has been paid, or for what, or how much has been borrowed. As to the statement that you are borrowing for permanent works, I deny it, for, in fact, you are borrowing for things of comparatively brief duration. The cost of sites for post offices you have the courage to liquidate every year. You do not borrow for them. The right hon. Gentleman was determined to have a surplus, whether he had the money or not, and it is for this reason that he has introduced the novelty of unexpended balances into English finance. But if these things are done in the piping times of prosperity, what is going to be done in hard times? If such things are to be done in the fat years which the Chancellor of the Exchequer has had, what will be done in the lean years? That is a consideration which I think the Committee ought to bear in mind. How has most of this money been obtained? By borrowing, and the Unfunded Debt has been increased by £4,000,000. I do not leave out of consideration the reduction in the Funded Debt. I fully recognise that; but the right hon. Gentleman, I believe, shares the objections I feel to a great increase of the Unfunded Debt of the country. It has always been the resort of lax finance, the Unfunded Debt has always been a resource to weak financiers. Now, in the Budget of 1887, the right hon. Gentleman said the Treasury bills which already existed were, to his mind, on too large a scale, the Floating Debt then being £15,000,000; yet in the past four years the debt has been increased by £20,000,000, and now stands at £36,000,000, according to a Return which I received this morning from the right hon. Gentleman. I am aware that a considerable portion of the sum is in the hands of the Public Departments or the National Debt Commissioners; but with the £3,500,000 which the Chancellor of the Exchequer will borrow the Unfunded Debt will be no less than £40,000,000 at the end of the present year, a sum which it has never reached during the past half century. What was the position of the Unfunded Debt in 1874? When the Government of Lord Beaconsfield came into office in 1874 the Unfunded Debt stood at £4,000,000; when they left office it was £27,000,000. Sir Stafford Northcote at that time thought the sum inconveniently large, though it was £10,000,000 less than at present. He therefore began to reduce it by means of terminable annuities, and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian afterwards funded a portion of it. It was thus reduced to £14,000,000 or £15,000,000, but has now been increased, as I have said, to £36,000,000. I know that in relation to the conversion operations a considerable portion of the money has been raised, but that does not do away with the objection of this great weight of Unfunded Debt. I think the right hon. Gentleman will admit that this is not a desirable state of things. It is not because you have to pay more interest; very often you have to pay less, but I think the right hon. Gentleman has had a somewhat different experience during the last 12 months. In my time I have got money for $1\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. I doubt very much if he has been able to get it at less than $2\frac{1}{2}$. I object, however, that a large Floating Debt of this kind, especially upon short terms like the Treasury bills, makes the Chancellor of the Exchequer a money dealer in the Money Market, thus placing him in a position which he never ought to occupy. The right hon. Gentleman has let the cat out of the bag on one point. Why, instead of using the money of the Sinking Fund to pay off the Floating Debt, did he use it by preference to pay the Consols? Because Consols are so low, he says. He is evidently a little tender on that subject, and I assure him I will consult his feelings. He is the godfather of the new Consols, they go by his name, but, like many other infants, they have not fulfilled all that was promised and vowed in their name. The right hon. Gentleman told the people who took the Consols that they would be worth par, and by a certain amount of adroit manipulation they were kept at par for a time during the period of conversion, but they very soon fell below, and for the simple reason that nothing can for any length of time be kept up above its real market value. That is briefly the reason of the present price of Consols. The right hon. Gentleman may say that they have fallen in the commercial distress, or because there has been such a number of sales of Consols. He has said, moreover, that Trustees will not invest in Consols, and he addressed to them a touching appeal. He talked of those patriotic Consols which their forefathers desired to be a provision for their daughters. But these patriotic Consols are the old Three per Cents. Our forefathers never considered the condition of Consols reduced, if I may so describe it, to a vulgar fraction. Sydney Smith talked of the "sweet simplicity of the Three per Cents.," but now that they are reduced to $2\frac{1}{2}$, ultimately to sink to $2\frac{1}{2}$, it is difficult to calculate what their value may be here or hereafter. All the sacredness and simplicity has departed from Consols, and the unfortunate daughters, who one day will become old maids, will look rather to a solid debenture which will give them a permanent 3 per cent. than cling to Consols reduced to a vulgar fraction. That is really the reason why the right hon. Gentleman is so afraid of being obliged to put Consols on the market which he thinks the market is not likely to absorb. I was very glad to hear the right hon. Gentleman say he is going to undertake the restoration of light coin. But the Chancellor of the Exchequer told us last year that he had impounded the profit which he got on the silver, and that he had made a permanent fund for that purpose. He got £600,000 for it last year, and he has got £400,000 this year; and I should be glad if the right hon. Gentleman will tell the Committee that he means to appropriate both those sums for the purpose. I think it will cost nearly £1,000,000 to accomplish the task. There is one subject I feel more delicacy in addressing the Chancellor of the Exchequer upon than even Consols, and that is the brewers. With regard to the right hon. Gentleman's argument against taking the tax off the brewers, I can assure him that the argument addressed to the Opposition side of the House was not necessary; as far as I can see, to the brewers it was not satisfactory. The brewers are disappointed, and no wonder. Why, what was his argument when the Opposition fought him on the compensation proposals? It was said he was going to compensate out of the taxation of the people. He replied, "No such thing; we are going to compensate out of the money of the brewers;" and he used that argument in his Budget speech. We on the Opposition side thought at the time that that was a perfectly unsound financial argument. We said that money paid by the brewers or anybody else was money that belonged to the Exchequer, and that it could not be ear-marked as belonging to a particular class. Therefore, to talk of the money being paid out of the fund of the brewers was entirely a financial error. I am very glad that we have converted the Chancellor of the Exchequer, because he has adopted our argument in contradiction of his own. He says—

"It is argued that this additional tax falls not on the consumer but on a particular and limited trade; but I am unable to admit that plea, because if that were so I think we should never be able either to reduce or increase the tax."

That is a complete contradiction of his argument when we were battling with him on the compensation clauses. The right hon. Gentleman, in calculating the future progress of the Revenue, used a rather singular phrase, to which I must demur. He said that last year the House entered into a partnership with him as to the taking of low Estimates.

The House enters into no partnership with the Chancellor of the Exchequer upon Estimates of Revenue. The House has no means of forming an opinion upon the subject at all. I will go even further, and say that the Chancellor of the Exchequer can not himself form an Estimate of the Revenue. Those Estimates are formed by the experienced officers of the Department, who form them just as a surveyor forms an estimate of the value of land, and that is the only foundation of the Estimates of Revenue. But the right hon. Gentleman, who is not content unless he is innovating in everything, has produced a new system for estimating Revenue. He lays down a certain percentage for increase of population, which is to form a sort of rule of thumb standard, applicable to each article of Revenue—a thing unheard of before. Now, it is a remarkable fact that in his Budget of 1887 the right hon. Gentleman founded his claim to cut down the Sinking Fund applicable to the reduction of the Debt on the experience of the last 10 years, which showed that there was no elasticity in the Revenue. He drew a dismal picture of what had been, and what was likely to be, and his special ground was that the growth of Revenue anticipated by Sir Stafford Northcote was absent, and that it did not now rise in proportion to the increase of population. The Estimate of the Revenue ought to be founded upon the expectations of the particular year and nothing else, and to lay down a rule that we are to give any percentage to increase of population is in my opinion, thoroughly unsound. I protested at the time against the right hon. Gentleman's dismal prognostications and against his reduction of the Fund. From the moment he began reducing the Sinking Fund the Revenue rose, and the right hon. Gentleman still keeps on reducing the Fund although the Revenue has risen. The Estimates must be taken on the responsibility of the Chancellor of the Exchequer alone. We cannot enter into a partnership with him, as we have no means of forming a judgment on the matter. As to the destination of the surplus, all I can say is I am extremely pleased, from whatever source it comes, that it should be bestowed on free education. I am one of those who stood by my right hon. Friend the Member for West Birmingham in the election of 1885. I stood by the programme of free education. I can say no more upon that subject until I see the Bill, and until I know what is to be done, and how it is to be done. What I desire, apart from the correction of erroneous statements, is to call attention to the extraordinary innovation which the right hon. Gentleman has made in the financial business of this country, to the extreme revolution he has made in all those safeguards which have been considered most essential to secure the solidity of the finance of the country. I desire most earnestly to protest against the financial policy of shifts and devices of the character which the right hon. Gentleman has adopted. Will the right hon. Gentleman forgive me if I allude to one other criticism made by the Economist newspaper? They say, and they say truly, that the pretext upon which this extraordinary Budget has been founded has broken down; and so it has. The pretext was that a great expenditure was suddenly required, and the money must be instantly found, and that therefore the payment must be spread over a long period. What is the fact? In June last my right hon. Friend the Member for Bradford asked how much money the Navy were going to spend upon contract ships. A Parliamentary Paper was delivered, stating that they were going to spend £5,500,000, whereas as a fact they spent little more than £3,000,000. They could not spend the £5,000,000 that they pretended and doubtless intended to spend. The right hon. Gentleman said that we had misrepresented the transaction. How could we when we had the official document stating that £3,000,000 out of the £5,500,000 had been spent? What does this show? It shows that the pretext of the necessity for suddenly raising money was utterly unfounded. I consequently entirely concur in the criticism that the pretext on which this extraordinary Budget was founded has entirely broken down. This system of finance is unfortunate, and we ought to protest against it in order, if we can, to prevent it in the future. The right hon. Gentleman protested against something of the sort 12 years ago, and I protested with very great force, and, I hope, with some effect. At that time there was far more excuse for what was done than that which the right hon. Gentleman now possesses. The foreign policy had involved the Government of Lord Beaconsfield in great difficulties, and Sir Stafford Northcote proposed to spread a very small sum of money, as the right hon. Gentleman is now proposing to spread a very large sum of money. And what did the right hon. Gentleman say as to the action of Sir Stafford Northcote? The right hon. Gentleman said then, what I say now. He said—

"The fact is that the House has lost power as to the expenditure of the country through the introduction of this distinction between ordinary and extraordinary expenditure. While they hunted with the hounds they ran with the hare; and after singing 'Rule Britannia' at Conservative dinners all over the country, they came down and talked of public economy. He would turn from the Budget of the right hon. Gentleman to his financial policy. Fortunately it would be described in a very few words. It simply postponed the excess of expenditure liability over income to a future date; it renewed bills, it prolonged liabilities. The right hon. Gentleman told the House that he had put these liabilities not entirely out of sight because it would be unheroic and mischievous, but so far out of sight that they need not look at them unless they liked. It might be an unpopular thing to say, but it was better for the cause of economy and for the good of the country that we should pay off our burdens by taxation and not stave off payment to a future day. Cheerfulness on the part of the country to make the necessary sacrifice would prove patriotism most valuable to Her Majesty's Government, while to impose taxation would have shown what confidence they had in the resources of the country. But the Government had shrunk from that test. There was an exhibition of an apparently strong policy carried out by a weak man; he did not mean a man intellectually weak, but wanting in the nerve and courage to face unpopularity. They had shown want of confidence in the willingness of the country to bear the burdens which were the result of the policy of the Government."

Later on the right hon. Gentleman said—

"I know the state of commercial gloom. I know what pinching there is in many households but I hope, and still believe, you are willing to bear your share of the burden, to uphold old English principles, and to say—'Do not let us be financial cowards, but let us pay our way like men.'"

The right hon. Gentleman said that the country was willing to bear its burdens, and he declared against financial cowardice, and in fact the right hon. Gentleman protested, as I protest, against this shabby, flabby policy. Ought I to read the last extract from the speech? It shows, at all events, that we were at the time entirely in accord. The last words were—

"To use the witty expression of my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Oxford, peace with honour on tick is not a policy for an English statesman to adopt."

These were the financial proposals and policy against which the right hon. Gentleman protested in 1879, and it is against the same policy that I protest in 1891.

*(5.36.) MR. GOSCHEN: I rise with a chastened spirit, having listened to the speech of the right hon. Gentleman. I appreciate the right hon. Gentleman's authority in these matters. He has been Chancellor of the Exchequer, though not for very many months, and he distinguished himself by proposing to suspend two little Sinking Funds to meet a deficit of £500,000. That is the unique performance of the right hon. Gentleman. I shall be prepared to meet the speech of the right hon. Gentleman; but, having occupied the time of the House at great length on Thursday, I do not wish to inflict myself again at too great length, or too often, on the attention of the Committee. But I had notice some time ago that a far superior authority than the right hon. Member for Derby intended to arraign my finance. In the celebrated speech of the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian (Mr. W. E. Gladstone), at Hastings, he said—

"There is much more to be said with regard to finance than I intend to say on this occasion."

I hope that if the challenge is to be fought out at all, it will be fought out now, and, as I am the person challenged, I should prefer to follow the right hon. Gentleman rather than to be followed by him.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE (Edinburgh, Mid Lothian): I do not know to what words of mine reference is made by the right hon. Gentleman. In my speech at Hastings I made certain references to finance, and I said, also, that there was much more that might be said on the finance of the right hon. Gentleman. If the allegations I made at Hastings are contested I shall defend them. I never gave any indication at Hastings as to any course I intended to pursue on the present occasion. I have listened to the speech of my right hon. Friend, and my impression is that the Chancellor of the Exchequer need not go far afield, for there is a pretty tough business before him in meeting the statements of my right hon. Friend.

*MR. GOSCHEN: I hope, then, that I may understand that, as I was the attacked party in the speech of the right hon. Gentleman, which has been repeated, travestied, and burlesqued on many platforms, I now know the worst from the right hon. Gentleman. If, then, the right hon. Gentleman considers that all has been said that is necessary, I will proceed to the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby (Sir W. Harcourt). The attacks which he has made are on small points, on details, and on principles. The right hon. Gentleman appears to gloat over the reduced price of Consols, and he has never ceased to harp upon that. The Member for Mid Lothian has with greater magnanimity never tried to diminish the value of the conversion to the country, or to affect its credit by holding up to Consol-holders that their prices have fallen, but the right hon. Member for Derby has five or six times tried to irritate them, pointing to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, as if to say, "It is he that is your enemy and has done you this bad turn." I do not consider that to be a device of one really interested in the finance of the country. The right hon. Gentleman must know, as every man of business knew, that the fall was to a great extent temporary. Does he not know that all securities had fallen? The right hon. Gentleman referred to the price as 96, but they stood at 98 for a very long time after the conversion. Is not all this done to weaken the effect of that great operation for which the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian had always been willing to give the fullest credit to Her Majesty's Government? This is a kindred point to another which was made by the right hon. Member for Derby, namely, the question of the Funded and Unfunded Debt. The right hon. Gentleman talked about the "gross extent" to which the Unfunded Debt had been increased; but no embarrassment can be caused to a Government when a very large portion of the Unfunded Debt is held by the National Debt Commissioners. To say that the Unfunded Debt has been increased from £15,000,000 to £36,000,000 is to create a false impression; because from £7,000,000 to £8,000,000 is the whole increase of the Floating Debt held by the public; and, on the other hand, we have paid off £24,000,000 of Consols in cash. Was it not worth while to incur this slight increase in the Floating Debt as a means of paying off £24,000,000 of Consols in cash? The right hon. Gentleman has remarked that the circumstance of the increase in the Unfunded Debt is a proof of weak finance.

SIR W. HARCOURT: My objection to the increase in the Unfunded Debt is to that portion of the increase that has been incurred this year.

*MR. GOSCHEN: The right hon. Gentleman has attacked me, in the first place, for borrowing the money, and, secondly, for the method in which the money has been borrowed. The right hon. Gentleman, in dealing with the second point, has asked why the money has been borrowed on Treasury bills instead of in the ordinary way. I have borrowed the money in the way I have done because I am anxious to repay it as soon as possible. If I had borrowed the money for a temporary purpose by means of Stock I should have been open to the very opposite charge, namely, that I had increased the Debt without making any provision whatever for paying off the increase. Certainly it is one of the first duties of a Chancellor of the Exchequer to make provision for paying off any increased Debt. The right hon. Member for Derby spoke throughout, and, in his eloquent peroration—borrowed from myself—to which, however, the right hon. Gentleman lent an additional charm, as if everything had been raised by loans and no efforts put forth or appeal made to the patriotism of the people of this country to meet the increased expenditure upon the Army and Navy out of the taxation of the year. The right hon. Gentleman, however, appears to take no notice of the very strong point that the ordinary Estimates have been largely increased, and that Her Majesty's Government up to the end of the year 1889 asked the taxpayers to pay more in each year than was actually spent. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian has characterised the surpluses of 1888, 1889, and 1890 in the first place as fraudulent, and subsequently as fictitious; but year after year there have been satisfactory and perfectly genuine surpluses—a fact, perhaps, which was not very agreeable to the right hon. Gentlemen opposite.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: I spoke of the surplus of last year only.

*MR. GOSCHEN: But it has been stated all over the country that the right hon. Gentleman charged the Government with having fictitious surpluses in the plural, and I can assure him that I greatly prefer that attacks should be made upon my financial policy in this House, where I can answer them, than elsewhere, where misapprehensions cannot be so readily corrected. I now am to understand, therefore, that the epithet "fictitious" was applied not to the surpluses of 1888, 1889, and 1890, but merely to that of 1891. In listening to some of the speeches that have been delivered by right hon. Gentlemen opposite people might suppose that the system of extending the re-payment of money borrowed over a lengthened period had never been countenanced or adopted until the unfortunate individual who now fills the office became Chancellor of the Exchequer; but I may say the Barracks Bill is an exact copy of the Localisation of the Forces Act, which was passed when the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian was Prime Minister. The principle of not paying off the whole of the expenditure incurred within the year is the same in both cases, and if the surplus of 1890-1 is fictitious because I have adopted that principle, the surpluses which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian dealt with in former years were equally fictitious. Would anyone who heard the speech of the Member for Derby believe that the taxpayers of the present year are actually paying for an amount of money borrowed in former times by a Government of which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian was a member? If I had created "converted annuities," what would have been said of the phrase?

and yet there are some £600,000 of these converted annuities chargeable to the taxpayers for expenditure incurred for the fortification loans of many years ago. It has been established by precedent that it is lawful, Constitutional, and not unusual that expenditure on certain works of a permanent character should be postponed over a certain number of years; and though I bow humbly to the strictures of the right hon. Gentleman, I think if he had appealed to precedent I should have been relieved from the charge of having introduced a fresh system in this matter. I come now to the question of the Imperial Defence Loan, where the Suez Canal Shares are expected to find money three or four years hence. When I read the Economist of Saturday, I said to myself "I know now the exact speech which will be made by the right hon. Gentleman." I have not been disappointed. The speech was an expanded and eloquent version of the article, but still it is that article. Although I often agree with the Economist, I must say that the language it has used on this subject is absurd, because it speaks as if the Suez Canal Shares interest were hypothecated in the sense of being offered to the holders of the bills separately as a pledge, as if it were necessary for the security of the transaction. If the editor had referred to the Act he would have seen that that is not the case: and, indeed, it is almost absurd to suggest such a thing as probable. It appears to me to be perfectly legitimate to deal with the future interest of this windfall, for it is a windfall, and it has been an extremely valuable one.

SIR W. HARCOURT: I thought it was a great act of policy.

*MR. GOSCHEN: The buying of the shares was an act of policy, and the windfall is that they have become so much more valuable than was anticipated. It was not believed at the time that the shares would be so valuable, and I say it is no more contrary to good policy to say that the interest upon them should be devoted to extinguishing Debt so many years hence, than it is to say the same with regard to the annuities that have been created by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian in accordance with the constant method of Imperial finance. If I had personally introduced some of this complicated system of annuities — deferred, postponed, and rolling — I wonder what the right hon. Gentleman would have said? What we have done in the case of the Suez Canal shares is a simple operation, and it is perfectly defensible. All that has been done is that an Act has been passed providing that the future interest to be received shall be devoted to the extinction of this Debt. There is very little room for difference of opinion on the matter, and certainly no cause for censure. Coming to the Naval Defence Act, the right hon. Gentleman seemed to be perfectly incapable of understanding what we mean by the policy we have adopted. I conceive that the right hon. Gentleman is not a good accountant. He has many excellent qualities, but he gets hopelessly befogged occasionally when he gets amongst figures. What has been the origin of the fog into which some right hon. Gentlemen have got with regard to these Naval Defences? The origin of the difficulty was a Return moved for by the right hon. Member for Bradford (Mr. Shaw Lefevre) in as confused a form as could possibly be conceived. There was some difficulty in agreeing to the form in which the right hon. Member desired to have it, because it was one that was certain to lead to every kind of confusion. The right hon. Member for Derby has just said that very frequently Returns do not agree with each other; and the reason is that Members who move for them have got, I will not say facts, but views to which they desire to give effect. They accordingly move for Returns in conflicting forms. The Government weakly gives way rather than be charged with desiring to conceal something; and then it is said that the Returns do not agree with each other. What was this famous Return of the right hon. Member for Bradford? It was a Return of Expenditure divided into various items so as to show the Expenditure out of Revenue and the Expenditure out of borrowed money. In quoting some of the items the other evening, I did not always use the phrase "out of borrowed money," as I ought to have done in order to avoid misapprehension. I thought I had been clear enough; and I hope that if I did mislead the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby, it was only for a moment.

SIR W. HARCOURT: The Expenditure given in the Returns of my right hon. Friend the Member for Bradford is the actual estimated Expenditure. It cannot be meant to be the estimated Expenditure from borrowed money. It is £2,000,000 in excess of the Estimates altogether.

*MR. GOSCHEN: I see that the right hon. Gentleman does not yet understand the Return. On the first page you have the whole Expenditure both from borrowed money and from income. The right hon. Gentleman does not understand the form of the Return, because he read an amount of estimated expenditure without observing whether it was to be out of borrowed money or out of other money. And now as to the substance—this is a point upon which I ask careful attention—a point of substance. Here we estimated that a large amount would have to be paid for contract ships. But, says the right hon. Gentleman, "You ought to have spent the whole of that out of revenue." That is the gravamen of his charge—

SIR W. HARCOURT: Spent out of revenue? Paid out of revenue you mean.

*MR. GOSCHEN: Paid out of revenue. The gravamen of the charge is, we ought to have paid the whole of that Estimate out of Revenue. Well, if that had been proposed what would have happened? The right hon. Gentleman must know that a Chancellor of the Exchequer cannot always estimate this expenditure with accuracy. The Admiralty makes the best Estimate they can. They had 70 contracts out and they estimated as well as they could what they would have to pay on them in the year. I believe in all these cases delivery will have to be made by a certain date; therefore, although they have paid less in the course of the last financial year, that does not prove that the ships will not be delivered at the date they have been contracted for. This is an important point. What would have happened if we had not taken the power of spreading the expenditure over a certain number of years? According to the right hon. Gentleman we ought to have provided out of taxation the whole of the expenditure set out in this Return.

SIR W. HARCOURT: No, the amount you spend within the year.

*MR. GOSCHEN: But you want to know what you are going to spend within the year. Let us clear up this point. The Return was made in June, my Budget is brought in in April. I had notice from the Admiralty that a certain amount would probably be spent on contract ships during the course of the year, and according to the view of the right hon. Gentleman it was unheroic for us not to ask the people to pay for this from taxation. Whether he says "Yes" or "No," that is the charge made—we ought to pay the expenditure of the year out of the taxes.

SIR W. HARCOURT: Just the same may be said of dockyard work, it is the same thing there.

*MR. GOSCHEN: The right hon. Gentleman has been a short time at the Exchequer, but he has not been at the Admiralty, and he does not know the difficulty of making Estimates as to work put out to contract. The Estimate is made before the beginning of the year, and in the case of the Admiralty there must be a very large margin for the uncertainty connected with contracts. The case of work in the dockyards is not in point. Ought we to have asked the House of Commons to pay over the total amount which, according to the best view the Admiralty could take at the time, would be required for contract work during the year? If we had done so we should have had to ask the people for £2,500,000 which would not have been required, and which would have gone into the Sinking Fund at the end of the year. Does that commend itself to the view of the right hon. Gentleman? At all events we know where we are. Is the charge against us that we have been remiss in not asking for money because we did not take from the pockets of the people £2,500,000 more than would have been required? We did not ask for money which it turns out was not wanted and could not be spent in the year. The right hon. Gentleman says, "You must not carry over," and that is another of the grave charges he has preferred. It is quite true that the Government have carried over a balance on the dockyards. If we had not carried over that balance, what would have been the result? In the past, when a certain amount of money has been voted to the Admiralty, an attempt has been made to spend it in the year, and the great difficulty has been to keep the Department to spending as much money upon fresh construction as the House intended to devote to it. According to the old system, if the money voted was not spent on fresh construction, the Admiralty said, "We had better spend it on repairs—the ships are sure to be wanted." This has been the experience of all Boards of Admiralty in the past. But now the Admiralty are so tightly held that if they do not spend the money upon construction they have to pay it over, so that it may go to reduce the cost of construction in the following year. That appears to me to be a very businesslike mode of proceeding, and one which, although it is new, has tended to economy in the work of the dockyards. The right hon. Gentleman shakes his head, but I say it is unwise to give a certain amount of money for the use of a Department with such elastic duties as the Admiralty, putting them under the temptation, I may say, of spending within the year money which they do not require, and a large amount of which we should have to provide out of taxes. Now I turn to another point. The right hon. Gentleman and others seem to ignore the fact that we did impose additional taxation under very trying circumstances to meet increased demands for the carrying out of our naval programme, and when the right hon. Gentleman says we have been "flabby and shabby," one would think we had not done anything in the way of imposing taxation. When we established our naval programme we imposed taxes by spreading annuities over seven years, and no person will have to pay more taxes in respect of those annuities except those upon whom this new taxation has already been placed. We have practically raised by taxes the whole amount required for our ship building programme. Where, then, is the charge of the right hon. Gentleman that we have done nothing but borrow? We have raised from the people as much as we thought necessary for the purpose, throwing the expenditure over a limited number of years, and arranging that the balance shall be so carried forward that there shall be a certainty of the wishes of Parliament being carried out. The result has justified our expectations. The dockyards have built what was intended to be built, and the money has not been uselessly raised to pay to contractors instalments which have not become due. With regard to the general increase in the Army and Navy Estimates—and that is a battle which we have fought before—I hold that the necessities for the defence of the country and the cost of the Services cannot simply be argued by a given standard, but must depend upon the political situation, and a vast number of other considerations. In 1888 we submitted a programme to the House: it was generally approved by Members, including a good many Members on the other side; and of all the charges levelled against the Government, the one to which in fairness they are least exposed is the charge of attempting to hide their expenditure. The right hon. Gentleman has acquitted me and my colleagues of any intentional design of the kind; but it has been said by another right hon. Gentleman opposite that it is better to spend £5,000,000 than to hide the expenditure of £1,000,000.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: I never spoke of the intention of the right hon. Gentleman and of the Government. I spoke of the fact. My opinion is that in the mode of proceeding there was a multiplication of the accounts and a complication of the arrangements which had the effect of withdrawing the fact from the cognizance of the House and of the public.

*MR. GOSCHEN: We now know precisely what is to be understood, but if the right hon. Gentleman will do what I know is very disagreeable, if he will read his own speech over again, he will see that the whole passage in question conveyed to his hearers, though against his intention, that the Government were deliberately attempting to hide away a portion of their expenditure. Such words as "fraudulent" lend themselves to such a suggestion. The right hon. Gentleman did not say that? "No," he said, "I would say fraudulently obtained, but that I do not want to be personal."

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: I applied it to the circumstances.

*MR. GOSCHEN: Now I understand the view of the right hon. Gentleman that we are entirely acquitted of a desire to hide the expenditure. We never had any motive for hiding it. Last year I defended the expenditure of the Government, and it is the last thing we should wish to withdraw from the cognizance of the Committee. If the accounts are too complicated, then I am willing to devote every possible attention to the simplification of the accounts. I agree with the right hon. Gentleman the member for Derby that there is nothing more to be desired than the simplification of the accounts, and if there is anything further to be done in that direction, I will undertake it. The right hon. Gentleman said the pretext of the Budget has broken down.

SIR W. HARCOURT: For the extraordinary Expenditure.

*MR. GOSCHEN: The Budget instead of breaking down has been abundantly justified, because when so large a sum has to be spent among so many contractors it is impossible to say how much will be spent each year, and it is equalised over a certain number of years. The right hon. Gentleman has again twitted the Government with regard to their local subsidies in relief of local taxation. I suggest to the right hon. Gentleman that it is right that the public should know how much money is given to the Local Authorities. Under the old system it was not known at all. The money was given away in the Estimates and was never discussed. We ran up million after million in these local subsidies, but they were never brought before the eye of the House; and far from having complicated the situation, I have simplified it by introducing a system which makes it necessary that it should be stated how much has been given to, and is received from, Local Authorities. We have given £3,000,000 or £4,000,000, not only to the rate-payers, because there are a certain number of other objects—Technical Education, Free Education in Scotland, Police Superannuation, and a number of other matters, which have been accomplished within those £4,000,000. That the right hon. Gentleman omitted to state, although he must know that the House has over and over again pledged itself—I admit, against the views of the right hon. Gentleman and others—that the ratepayers should be assisted. It was a legacy we inherited, and I am perfectly certain that the great bulk of hon. Gentleman opposite would have joined in any Vote that would have emphasised the neglect of the poorer ratepayers in towns if we had not proceeded in the direction we did. But I think that on the whole it is too late in the day to discuss that question. Now, having disposed of the more formidable charges, I come to what the right hon. Gentleman has said about the framing of Estimates. The right hon. Gentleman has strongly protested against the House being supposed to associate itself with the Chancellor of the Exchequer in his estimate of future Revenue. Now, I think the right hon. Gentleman might have remembered that it was more in a humorous than a serious vein that I spoke of the House having associated itself with me by a responsive cheer, and I think the House understood the attitude I took. Of course, I was not pressing home the partnership to the extent the right hon. Gentleman has suggested. When I spoke of partnership, I did not speak of partnership in a particular Estimate, but of association in the view that Estimates should be framed with caution. We frame our Estimates upon the view that the situation shows a tendency to be stationary, or that the Revenue will advance or will recede, and upon this view of the situation, the House of Commons is capable of forming a judgment. The right hon. Gentleman has never ceased to attack me for putting my Estimates too low in order to get an artificial surplus, although at the same time he knows that the Chancellor of the Exchequer is guided, to a very great extent, in framing the Estimates by his responsible permanent colleagues and advisers. Nevertheless, there is, I presume, always a certain amount of cross-examination of the data upon which they proceed, and that comes within the duty of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and upon his view of the prospects of the country, the increase or the decline in its prosperity, are the Estimates considered and revised in one direction or the other. Every man in the position of Chancellor of the Exchequer gets a large amount of information from various quarters, of which he would be foolish if he did not avail himself in submitting his Estimates. The right hon. Gentleman said that it was a new-fangled procedure to take 2 per cent. all round as a standard of increase. I have pointed out that, as a whole, it will come up to 2 per cent., but if the right hon. Gentleman will look at the details he will see that it does not always come out at 2 per cent. in the separate items. What I wanted the House to understand was that 2 per cent. increase really meant stationariness with regard to expansion. There is 1 per cent. for population and 1 per cent. for the three days. I, therefore, made use of 2 per cent., which represents the normal increase on the year generally, but, speaking generally, I have allowed for little increase on the year calculated apart from that normal increase. I maintain that I have proceeded on the lines upon which we have always gone, and it was the fault of my explanation if I conveyed an opposite impression. Then I come to the point the right hon. Gentleman touched upon at the commencement of his speech when he spoke of the figures I gave the other night. Now, as regards the £37,000,000, the right hon. Gentleman said I spoke of this sum apart from terminable annuities. That is not how I find it in my notes.

SIR W. HARCOURT: It is so in the Times.

*MR. GOSCHEN: I am aware that it is so reported in the Times. The reporters are extremely accurate, and I cannot be certain whether I used the words or not; but, looking at my notes from which I was reading at the time, I can say that I could not have suggested that amount as having been paid off without the assistance of annuities; it would have been absurd, and the right hon. Gentleman himself has recognised that it would have been absurd. The right hon. Gentleman has here failed to do me justice, failing to understand the force of my argument the other night. I had been speaking at one time of the total reduction of Debt, but at another time I had been dealing with the amount paid out of taxes. What is the charge to which I have, practically, been replying? That I have not paid the money out of taxes, but have got a fictitious surplus by other means. But I want to show, and I did show, that, notwithstanding the withdrawal of a certain amount from the permanent charge devoted to the extinction of Debt, we were, nevertheless, applying as much out of the taxes as had been applied by the previous Governments. I had not been saying that we were doing so much better than our predecessors, but was replying to the charge that we were doing nothing; I said that we had paid £12,600,000 more in our five years out of taxes than had been paid in the previous five years; more by £3,600,000 in four years than in the previous four years. These are actual figures; and if they are doubted, I can lay Papers before Parliament to show this is so.

SIR W. HARCOURT: What I want the right hon. Gentleman to show me is an authoritative statement that within latter years—that is, within the last four years—there was paid off £30,200,000; for that was his statement.

*MR. GOSCHEN: No; that £30,000,000 had been devoted out of taxation to the payment of Debt.

SIR W. HARCOURT: Without counting money borrowed?

*MR. GOSCHEN: Quite so.

SIR W. HARCOURT: We did not understand that.

*MR. GOSCHEN: I had been speaking of the total reduction of Debt and then of the amount paid off by taxation. When I spoke of the reduction of Debt in the last year I mentioned about £6,000,000, and when I spoke of the amount voted out of taxes for reduction of Debt I spoke of £7,500,000. The right hon. Gentleman wishes to fasten on me a statement that is not justified by the language used, and which I did not intend to convey. I am charged with not paying off Debt, but with having filched money which belonged to the payment of Debt, and I said that, notwithstanding all that has been done during the four years which I took of the present Administration, as much money has been devoted out of the taxes to the payment as in the four years of the former Administration.

SIR W. HARCOURT: What we understood the right hon. Gentleman to say was that in the last four years the present Government had been paying off £3,000,000 more of Debt than had been done by the last Government. That is what the right hon. Gentleman has been understood in the country to say, and that has been commented upon in every newspaper as a satisfactory demonstration of the right hon. Gentleman's finance. If the right hon. Gentleman says that is not so, that it is an exaggerated statement, I am quite satisfied.

*MR. GOSCHEN: It is the exact opposite. The right hon. Gentleman is trying to evade the most substantial point by putting the controversy on another footing. The amount of Debt the Government have paid off is immense, but this particular point with which I had been dealing was the amount paid out of taxes at one period as compared with the other, and I expressed myself plainly on that point.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: The right hon. Gentleman has dealt not with the simple question of how much the Debt has been reduced, but has dealt at one moment with how much it has been reduced, and at another moment with the totally different question as to the amount devoted to the reduction of the Debt out of taxes, which has involved the whole subject in inextricable confusion.

*MR. GOSCHEN: But the right hon. Gentleman should not begin by charging me with not having paid sufficient out of taxation for the reduction of Debt, for that was the charge, not that we had not reduced Debt sufficiently. But even without reference to the conversion, where money has been paid out of taxation for the reduction of Debt, though it does not reduce the amount of Debt on paper—even on the figures of the right hon. Gentleman himself this is established, that after all the charges which have been made against us, we have reduced the liabilities by a net reduction of £26,000,000. I have excluded a year for which right hon. Gentlemen opposite were responsible; if I had taken that year into calculation the comparison would have been much better for the Government. I do not know, however, whether it is profitable to pursue this matter any further. The argument which I hope I have established is that we have paid off more than the Administration—if it is to be a question of Administrations—of the right hon. Gentleman opposite. I think I have now dealt with all the main points which have been raised, and if I have omitted any I think it probable that I shall be reminded of them. At all events, if right hon. Gentlemen do not agree with much of my reply, I trust they will admit that I have endeavoured to meet the points they have raised.

*(6.46.) MR. H. H. FOWLER (Wolverhampton, E.): Although I am sure the right hon. Gentleman has endeavoured to explain this matter as fully as he thinks necessary, he must not be surprised to hear that Members on this side of the House have utterly failed to understand him. It may be our fault, but I venture to say that the confusion in regard to the Budget is now worse confounded than when the right hon. Gentleman sat down on Thursday night. The right hon. Gentleman now draws a distinction between what he calls net reduction of the Public Debt and sums appropriated out of taxation to that purpose; but the inference drawn from his speech the other night is that the reduction is wholly effected out of taxation; and although he said he did not intend to give the matter a political character, it has already assumed that character in every election now going on in the country. The statement is being made that while the Government of 1880 to 1885 reduced the Debt out of the taxes by only such an amount, the present Government has done so by a very much larger amount. Now, the true test of sound finance in regard to the reduction of Debt is how much is applied year by year out of the Income of the year to the purpose. There are, as we know, large sums which come automatically and go to the reduction of the Debt—sums which do not depend on either the wisdom or folly of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, but I repeat that the true test is the amount applied to the purpose out of the Income of the year. There are two ways of reducing the Debt—by means of Terminable Annuities, under the operation of the new Sinking Fund, or by means of the old Sinking Fund, which is the surplus of the income of the year over the Expenditure of the year. Taking the Chancellor of the Exchequer on both those grounds, I will draw his attention to a Return which has been laid before Parliament, and which was carefully prepared under my direction when I was at the Treasury. I will not in the comparison reject the year 1881, but will take the four years which the right hon. Gentleman gave in his Budget Speech—1881, 1882, 1883, and 1884—as representing this side of the House, and 1887, 1888, 1889, and 1890 as representing the Government side. Now, in the former four years the Chancellor of the Exchequer of that day out of the taxes appropriated to the payment of Debt the sum of £27,128,000, of which only £1,586,000 was surplus. In the four years under the Administration of the right hon. Gentleman the amount so appropriated out of taxes was £27,600,000, of which a little over £7,000,000 was surplus. In presence of these figures, then, what ground is there for the right hon. Gentleman to contrast his own Government in such glowing terms with the preceding Government? The truth really is, with reference to the payment of the National Debt, that the credit is not due to this or to that Chancellor of the Exchequer. The credit was due originally to the principle of the Terminable Annuities established, I believe, to a great extent by my right hon. Friend the Member for Mid Lothian (Mr. Gladstone) and Lord Sherbrooke, and largely developed in 1885 by my right hon. Friend the Member for South Edinburgh (Mr. Childers). For the Chancellor of the Exchequer to take credit to himself for paying off Debt with those millions was as if an engine-driver driving a passenger train across the Forth Bridge took credit for building the bridge. The means were already at his hand, and he could do no other than reduce the Debt with them. I think the figures remain precisely where my right hon. Friend the Member for Derby (Sir W. Harcourt) left them. With reference to other points on which the Chancellor of the Exchequer had spoken, I am bound to confess that I cannot understand his defence of the accounts relating to the Army and Navy. I was much surprised to hear the right hon. Gentleman state that it was impossible at the commencement of the year for the Government to estimate what the expenditure for the year on public works or contracts would be, for such a statement strikes at the very roots of our finance. The one great point which has long distinguished English from foreign finance—and especially French and German finance—is that in England the year's Expenditure is met by the year's Income, and that the accounts are kept strictly within the year. But the present Chancellor of the Exchequer has introduced quite another system. He told the Committee the other night, for instance, that his Estimate for the Navy and Army for this year was £31,750,000. Now, an ordinary every-day man of business would certainly understand that that amount was to be the expenditure this year on the Army and Navy together. Not at all. The Chancellor of the Exchequer has himself said that he is about to put another Return on the Table, in which he states that he estimates the Army and Navy Expenditure for this year, not at £31,750,000, as announced in his Budget Speech, but at £36,907,000.

*MR. GOSCHEN: The figures of that Return were also in my Budget Statement.

*MR. H. H. FOWLER: Well, Sir, we did not understand that. I am not charging the right hon. Gentleman with keeping back in that sense of the word, but I say he is introducing a new system of finance altogether. He does not put before the country the Expenditure of the year in the shape the country understands it. He does not go to the country and ask that the sums he needs should be raised by taxation, but he proposes to borrow money to meet them. If I wanted to answer the Chancellor of the Exchequer on this very point, I should go to the speech, with which I have no doubt he is now very familiar, which my right hon. Friend has already quoted. The First Lord of the Treasury of these days was the First Lord of the Admiralty of that day, and the First Lord of the Admiralty of that day had very much the same views as to Navy Expenditure that the Chancellor of the Exchequer has now. The Chancellor of the Exchequer would not accept the statement of his right hon. Colleague, and let me read what he said in reply to him. He said—

"The First Lord of the Admiralty had presented a comparison based on ordinary and extraordinary expenditure. Let him ask the House to understand how this matter really stood. There were two kinds of extraordinary expenditure—that was using the language of the Government and not that of our old finance, namely, that which was used for a distinct purpose, and that extra expenditure, which was merely spent in our own dockyards, increasing our ordinary quantities of supply stores and ships. So much of the extra expenditure as was expended at home on dockyards in increasing the number of ships remained, and the House would see that it ought to fall, and it must fall, on the ordinary Estimates of the year."

There is one other point the Chancellor of the Exchequer raised on which he seems to think no one impugns his action. I would do so, and I would say that all the financial sins with which the Chancellor of the Exchequer may be charged in future the greatest, I think, will be his anticipation of a possible contingent profit on the Suez Canal shares six years hence. That is a profit which does not exist, and which is a matter for the discretion of a future Parliament. It will be for the taxpayers and the Parliament of 1894 to say how they will appropriate that money. And I think the sum has been considerably exaggerated. If I understand the thing aright, there will only be a profit of £370,000 on the shares. We are now receiving £200,000, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer estimates that in 1894 he will receive £570,000, and he is now mortgaging the contingent profit between the £200,000 and £570,000.

*MR. GOSCHEN: I would point out that that £200,000 profit now received is applied to the diminution of Debt.

*MR. H. H. FOWLER: Yes; to the payment of the Terminable Annuities created for the purchase of the shares. Passing to the general finance of the Budget, the Chancellor of the Exchequer seems to think himself justified in his Expenditure. Whether he justifies it or not the House of Commons ought not to pass the enormous increase in our Expenditure which the Budget proposes without some criticism. The right hon. Gentleman in the course of his speech said he had beaten the record with regard to the payment of Debt. That, I think, we have disputed and disproved, but nobody, I think, can dispute or disprove that the right hon. Gentleman has beaten the record so far as Expenditure is concerned. The Budget of last Thursday night was the highest Budget ever submitted to the House of Commons in time of peace. We have reached a £100,000,000 Budget. I admit that a considerable proportion of that is to be appropriated in the shape of local subventions—for that is the real character of the local taxation, not grants in aid—with all the vices of the old system, with no advantage in the shape of control or economy; but practically we have to raise a Revenue next year of something like £100,000,000. The Chancellor of the Exchequer has anticipated where he will be exposed to criticism, and he has made reference to his Military and Naval Expenditure. I should like to quote one or two figures to show how this expenditure is increasing, and increasing in time of peace, and for reasons which the right hon. Gentleman said were of a political nature, of which we have no cognisance. The year 1879-80 was not a particularly peaceful year. The ordinary Expenditure of that year, which was the last year of the Beaconsfield Government, was £25,250,000; it is now estimated at £32,750,000. For this side of the House I can repudiate all partnership with the Chancellor of the Exchequer in that Expenditure.

*MR. GOSCHEN: Then vote against it.

*MR. H. H. FOWLER: We have voted against it until we have become tired of voting against it. We have no wish to impede Public Business; but if the Chancellor of the Exchequer desires us to have protracted disputes in Committee of Supply, we may, perhaps, be inclined to gratify him. The gross figures as to the Army and Navy and Civil Service Expenditure are misleading, because they include gross amounts from which there are considerable receipts. In the Return I have referred to, we have the net Expenditure, which shows that it is not £100,000,000 or £90,000,000, but some £77,000,000, and of this Expenditure I want the House to contrast three or four items and see where the difference is, both as to where we are spending less and where we are spending more. Ten years ago we appropriated for Debt and interest £28,000,000. The House will remember the glowing picture the Chancellor of the Exchequer drew of the enormous increase in our national wealth and prosperity and prospects; but in spite of that increase, last year we only spent £24,750,000 on the D-bt. Ten years ago we spent on our Army and Navy £25,750,000; last year we spent £32,750,000. Ten years ago the Civil Service cost £15,000,000; last year, including the discontinued grants, it is only £17,000,000; and on the collection of Revenue there is a reduction of from £2,750,000 to £2,500,000. Therefore, you see where the shoe pinches. You are increasing steadily and enormously the Military and Naval Expenditure, and you are decreasing the provision for the payment of Debt. If the House of Commons with its eyes open allows that to be done no one has a right to complain; but I entered my protest against the system as unsound and objectionable. The Chancellor of the Exchequer says he has levied a tax in order to provide for the extra expenditure on the Navy—the Estate Duty. The right hon. Gentleman did not tell us what were the receipts of that tax and the sources from which the money would be derived. I assume that if taxation is to be put on the country for military or naval purposes, all classes should share in it and be equally benefited. When he put on the Estate Duty, we told him on this side of the House that the duty was being unfairly assessed. I do not know—the Chancellor of the Exchequer knows—what was the result last year. But I do know from the Report of the Commissioners of Inland Revenue what was the result of the first year of the Estate Duty, and I think the House of Commons will be interested to know what are the proportions in which the duty is paid by real and personal property. In the first three quarters of that year the total produced from personal property was £780,000, and the total produced from real estate was £9,776.

*MR. GOSCHEN: The right hon. Gentleman should remember that one is paid in cash down, and the other only in instalments.

*MR. H. H. FOWLER: Yes; in four instalments, payable in eight years.

*MR. GOSCHEN: Nine years.

*MR. H. H. FOWLER: Even so, and taking it at £72,000, I say that is an unfair proportion of a tax that is producing £800,000 from personalty. The right hon. Gentleman appropriates £7,000,000 to local taxation; but when he introduced the scheme only three years ago, it was not a scheme of £7,000,000, but of £5,500,000. He is now going to give Local Authorities £1,500,000 more than he proposed to give them (including the Horse and Wheel and Van Tax).

*MR. GOSCHEN: The right hon. Gentleman is confusing the items.

*MR. H. H. FOWLER: I have gone through these matters very carefully, and am satisfied that what I have stated is correct. The right hon. Gentleman said—

"We consider that these proposals meet, and adequately meet, the demands of those who have been called the reformers of local taxation. We have got no further plan behind us. We have shown you our hand."

But he now goes further, and puts on an additional £1,500,000.

*MR. GOSCHEN: That is not so. Will the right hon. Gentleman show me how he arrives at his figures? I imposed the Beer and Spirit Tax, which takes the place of the Wheel and Van and Horse Tax. That would have amounted to £700,000. If there is anything more, it is the £700,000 that represents the Police Superannuation and the grant for technical education.

*MR. H. H. FOWLER: The right hon. Gentleman may sub-divide it as he likes. I say that last year he gave for local taxation over £7,000,000. The abolished grants were £2,600,000, or £2,900,000 if you like. That leaves upwards of £4,000,000, and I say the original scheme did not come to within £1,500,000 of that amount.

*MR. GOSCHEN: No, no.

*MR. H. H. FOWLER: Well, what I want to do is to protest not only against the principle of the subventions with regard to local taxation, but against the unfair manner in which they are divided, which is becoming worse and worse every year. The figures with regard to the grants to London, to county boroughs, and counties show how unfairly the money is divided. The rateable value of the Metropolis is £31,500,000, that of the county boroughs £30,000,000, and that of the administrative counties £90,000,000. The local taxation of the country in round figures is, deducting the poor rate proper, £19,000,000, or £5,000,000 in London, £4,500,000 in the county boroughs, and £9,500,000 in the counties. Now, if the Committee will bear these figures in mind, they will see what is the injustice of the plan of the Government. London last year received from the local taxation account £815,000, the county boroughs £1,056,000, and the counties £2,933,000. That shows how unfairly the money is divided, and the relief should be given in proportion to the amount raised. That is an appropriation of public money which ought not to pass without some serious discussion. The appropriation of the surplus meets with my entire approval. But the true hero of the Budget is the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham. When we remember what occurred in 1885 as to free education, and when we see that the Member for West Birmingham is able to compel a Tory Government, through the mouth of the present Chancellor of the Exchequer, to announce the adoption of free education, I think it will be admitted to be one of the most marvellous political triumphs of the time.

*(7.5.) THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster): Sir, I congratulate the right hon. Gentleman that he has given us the assurance that the appropriation of the surplus meets with his entire approval. It is gratifying that there is one topic on which he is in absolute agreement with the Government. I shall give the right hon. Gentleman the earliest opportunity of showing how cordially he will support the Government. The right hon. Gentleman has spoken of sound principles in English finance. I agree with him that the Expenditure of the year should be met by the taxation of the year. But there is one other principle which has been lost sight of in the past—and that is, when an Expenditure is deliberately recognised as necessary, provision should be made for it in the future as well as at the moment it is passed by the House. What is the objection that is made? It is that the Government, recognising the defenceless condition of the country, so far as the Army and Navy were concerned—armaments, coaling stations, and ships—felt themselves bound to make arrangements for the completion of the work they undertook, so that the Expenditure of one year should not be wasted through the omission to vote the money in the year after. There has been a singular deficiency of soundness in years gone by in that respect. Ships have been kept on the stocks for five or six years without being completed. There was a waste there, and waste of interest on the money already expended. If a man enters into a contract for the building of a house he generally sees his way to the completion of the contract into which he enters; he makes financial arrangements so that the work shall be carried through to a successful issue. The whole objection to the policy of the Government is that we recognise this responsibility to the country; we have made financial arrangements for the completion of the work we have undertaken, and have not left it to the uncertainty of the future. Objection is taken that the total of £6,800,000 for what is called extraordinary expenditure is put down and only £4,708,000 actually expended. I think we ought to take credit for that. Is it not, however, too late to object to those proposals two or three years after they have been sanctioned by Parliament? The right hon. Gentleman, however, has been discussing them as if the Bills embodying them were now before the House. The right hon. Gentleman has objected to the appropriation of the income derived from the Suez Canal shares held by this country to meet any particular branch of expenditure on the ground that that income forms part of the general Revenue of the country. On this point I have to say that when Her Majesty's Government came into Office they found that there was a great cumulative deficiency of provision for the safety and the protection of the country, and we thought that it would be hard upon the taxpayers of the day to ask them to pay off in four, five, or six years the whole charge which has to be incurred in consequence of those accumulations of deficiencies which are the result of many years' failure to provide for the safety of the country. It is to meet this Debt, which is due to the action of past Chancellors of the Exchequer, past Houses of Commons, and past taxpayers, that the income derived from the Suez Canal shares has been appropriated for a limited number of years. No one could have anticipated, when Lord Beaconsfield purchased the shares in 1875, that the investment would realise so large a profit for the country, and it is only right that the proceeds of this successful investment of the national funds should be appropriated for a term to providing for the safety and the security of the country. The right hon. Gentleman has objected that the contributions from the Imperial Exchequer in aid of local expenditure are not under Imperial control, and suggests that in such circumstances there is no security that the contributions will be expended in an economical manner. But if the Local Authorities, who are the representatives of and are responsible to the ratepayers, are to be trusted to expend the local rates economically, why should they not be equally trusted to spend the Imperial contributions economically when it is clear that those contributions merely represented an equivalent amount of rates? It cannot be contested that the economical expenditure of these contributions must result in a diminution of the rates. I do not suppose for a moment that the right hon. Gentleman would seriously propose that the Imperial contributions in aid of local burdens should be put an end to, with the result that the rates would have to be raised to a corresponding extent. Then with regard to the rate of the repayment of the Debt. I should like the right hon. Gentleman to go to the country on the question whether the Debt should be repaid at the rate of £9,000,000 or £10,000,000 a year, instead of at the rate of £6,000,000 a year, with the result in the former case that the taxation would have to be increased by £3,000,000 or £4,000,000 a year. I should not like to go to the country with a proposal of that kind, and to ask it to pay taxes to the amount of £9,000,000 or £10,000,000 a year instead of the £5,000,000 or £6,000,000 for which provision is now made. I believe the present system is one by which the Debt is paid off with sufficient rapidity to give security and stability to the finances of this country; and to call upon the taxpayers to find so large a sum as £9,000,000 or £10,000,000 yearly by organised taxation, apart from occasional services, would be a monstrous demand, and one largely in excess of what any Government ought to propose.

(7.41.) Mr. SYDNEY BUXTON (Tower Hamlets, Poplar): I think the right hon. Gentleman entirely misapprehended what fell from the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton, who objected that under the system introduced by the Chancellor of the Exchequer Imperial and local finances were now so mixed up that it was very difficult to distinguish one from the other, and that too large an amount was now given to local finance in view of what the Chancellor of the Exchequer originally said would be a fair sum. In regard to the last point raised by the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury as to whether the country would desire to vote an additional £3,000,000 a year towards the reduction of the Debt, that is a question which cannot possibly arise, thanks to the action of the Chancellor of the Exchequer himself. The real point is not whether we are prepared to vote this additional £3,000,000, but whether the right hon. Gentleman was justified three or four years ago in reducing the Sinking Fund by £2,000,000, and invading its principle by taking out a further £1,000,000. It so happens that the Revenue has increased since then. We are very glad of it, for the right hon. Gentleman has been able to reduce a larger amount of Debt in consequence of the unexpected surpluses he has received; but our complaint is that still more would have been paid off if he had not invaded the Sinking Fund. In regard to the question of spreading the Expenditure, the First Lord seems to think our chief complaint is of the large outlay which is unfortunately being made on the Army and Navy. I agree with the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton in his remarks on that, but the point we are discussing is not the actual amount of annual Expenditure under the Act, but the mode in which it is carried out. The Government proposed to spread the Expenditure over seven years, and our complaint, which has since been proved to be well founded, was that it was not possible so long ahead to frame accurate estimates of such Expenditure. The First

Lord seemed to think it to be to the credit of the Government that they had spent a much less sum than was originally estimated for, but it appears to me that this miscalculation is the best possible condemnation of the policy they pursued. Another of our complaints was not that they had borrowed a certain amount of money, but that they made no effort to meet the outlay out of current income. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby made some trenchant remarks on the action of the Chancellor of the Exchequer in "spreading" the Expenditure, and pointed out how the right hon. Gentleman strongly condemned the practice when adopted by one of his predecessors. The Chancellor of the Exchequer, in his reply, while he defended his policy, might have pointed out that in the previous years of his Chancellorship he had given £4,000,000 of annual Revenue to the Income Tax payers, that he had reduced the Debt by £2,000,000, and that in the same year he increased the Estate duty and practically reduced the Sinking Fund by £1,000,000. In the last year, too, he was able to reduce the taxation by another £3,000,000. I cannot consider it heroic finance while reducing the taxation £7,000,000 to add £1,000,000 a year to cover expenditure which ought to have been met in the year in which it was incurred. The right hon. Gentleman said we on this side of the House do not understand the matter, and that the Return he has given to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford is totally misleading. Now, no one in this House was able to trace in any published account how the money was being expended and how it was being provided, and hence the Return was asked for. It was only obtained under great pressure from the Front Opposition Bench, and it does seem strange that the Chancellor of the Exchequer should now say it is misleading, and that we do not understand it. But I need not enter on that point further. In conclusion, I should like to say that many of us on this side of the House hail with satisfaction the proposals contained in this Budget, because we desire to support the application of the surplus to the abolition of school fees. When the Bill is introduced, if it is not in a satisfactory shape, we shall endeavour to improve it; but I hope we shall not fall into the course evidently desired by the Government—to judge from the utterances of their supporters—and so oppose the Bill as to induce them to withdraw it. I hope we shall accept it, whether satisfactory or not, keeping ourselves free at some future time to deal with the whole educational question in a more satisfactory way. It seems very likely that we shall have to support the Government rather than oppose it, to judge from the way in which the proposal was received the other night by hon. Gentlemen opposite. Their reception of it was certainly ominous of trouble and of the fate of the Bill. It seemed as if hon. Gentlemen were not quite so ready to throw over all their past professions and past pledges in regard to the question of free schools as the right hon. Gentlemen on the Front Bench; that they are not quite willing even just before a General Election to offer free education as a sort of bribe, seeing that they have opposed it in the past. Hence they are not quite prepared to follow the Government in this matter. But we believe in the principle of free schools, we believe in the abolition of fees, and therefore we shall do our best to save the Government from their own friends.

(7.51.) MR. ROWNTREE (Scarborough): I hope the statement of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton as to the inequitable distribution of the grants in aid will receive more attention from the Government, for it is exciting a good deal of notice in the country, and marked dissatisfaction is becoming apparent. The right hon. Gentleman spoke of the large amount which county areas were receiving from the grants in aid as compared with the county boroughs and the Metropolis. I think the matter ought to be pressed further, for the argument might be extended with great force, because the smaller Corporations in the county area are receiving very much less than they ought to in proportion to their area, population, and rateable value. May I give one illustration? The Chancellor of the Exchequer in his Budget speech stated that £3,100,000 had been appropriated to grants in aid of local taxation in England alone. If so, surely every Corporation in the country and every area of population should have received some decided and considerable benefit from this large sum; but, as a matter of fact, there are unfortunately some Corporations which have practically received no benefit at all. The borough I represent has received only £47 in addition to the grants it received previously. No doubt it will be urged that negotiations are pending with regard to the main roads, and that when completed further sums will come to the boroughs; but admitting that, I doubt if we shall get anything in the way of arrears, or if we shall even get a fair share in the future. To show how important this is, I will illustrate the case of Scarborough. If I take the basis of population, they are entitled to £3,600 out of the £3,100,000 of the grant in aid; but if I take their rateable basis, they will be entitled to £4,400 annually. If I take a third alternative—the basis of the previous payment or amount raised within the town as far as we can estimate towards that taxation—our share would be £4,130. Yet we have only received £47 in addition, and assuming we do receive that which apparently we are entitled to receive in the future from the County Councils, we shall only have £1,250, or about one-third of the proportion due to us. I believe this case can be paralleled by the cases of other towns; and I respectfully submit that the smaller boroughs—giving, as many do, much attention to the sanitary requirements of the town, and anxious in every way to promote the well-being of their people—are as much entitled to their proportion from these grants in aid as larger boroughs within county areas. I ask the Government to give some attention to this matter, and enable these boroughs if they are in error to see exactly where that error is, because it appears that they are under considerable difficulty in bringing forward figures so fully as they would wish to do. I particularly appeal to the Chancellor of the Exchequer to allow Returns to be prepared giving by way of illustration a certain number of towns showing the effect of the new system on smaller Corporations, on the non-county boroughs, as well as on larger ones. In December last the Chancellor of the Exchequer's Secretary wrote showing exactly the position of the county borough of Halifax under the new system; and I should be glad if the Government would prepare a Return showing what they claim to be the beneficial effect of the system on some of the smaller towns. We may be mistaken; but at present we believe we are being unfairly dealt with and prejudiced by the new system. At present, the figures show that taxation is being raised from the small boroughs to be expended in the adjoining counties, and we are not receiving any relative advantage from it. We feel this to be a great grievance. I wish to say, in conclusion, that as far as possible moneys granted in aid of local rates in the future should not be ticketed and allocated to some particular fund, and that the Local Authorities should be trusted more in the actual distribution of these funds. The right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the House has spoken of trusting the representatives of the Local Bodies. We ask that they should be trusted in the actual distribution of these sums. The finance of towns is being made much more intricate and difficult to understand; because different sums come into the financial accounts which are earmarked for certain purposes, and which therefore do not go through the balance-sheet as a whole, but form a variety of separate accounts. Such a state of things lessens the responsibility of the representatives of the different Local Bodies, and makes the local balance sheet much more intricate and difficult to understand. I trust that, in view of the great interest which is felt in the application of the grants, we shall have some assurance that the money will be granted equitably and justly to all the different Corporations and all the Local Bodies concerned.

(8.2.) THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. RITCHIE, Tower Hamlets, St. George's): The hon. Member has more than once urged upon me that Scarborough, the borough he represents, does not get that share of relief which he considers it ought to get, either in proportion to its rateable value or population. The hon. Gentleman has told us to-night that the whole sum which has been received by Scarborough up to the present was something like £47—

MR. ROWNTREE: In addition—

MR. RITCHIE: In addition to the discontinued grants. I presume the hon. Gentleman has not included the amount which has been paid to the Union in which Scarborough is, in aid of the poor rate.

MR. ROWNTREE: That comes to about £700; but, on the other hand, we have had to pay to the county rate a like amount. I balanced the one against the other.

MR. RITCHIE: Then, of course, Scarborough has something to receive in respect of main roads. I am quite prepared to admit that Quarter Sessions boroughs, which previously made no contribution to the county at all, are in a somewhat different position to ordinary non-county boroughs. Parliament decided that it was necessary that Quarter Sessions boroughs—all boroughs below a certain population—should, in future, become part of the county; and in order to meet what was considered a just demand on the part of the Quarter Sessions boroughs, which had no main roads, but which contribute to the county main roads, it was determined that there should be a re-consideration of the streets of the boroughs, and that such of them as were main roads should be declared main roads, and be repairable by the county. I do not dispute that there may be cases in which, perhaps, the adjustment may not be so satisfactory to the borough as all desire. In connection with the declaration of main roads in Scarborough, I have considerably extended what was considered necessary and recommended by the Local Government Inspector who went down, but I have not been able to meet the wishes of the hon. Gentleman or of the borough of Scarborough. I feel there is some ground for the complaint on the part of Scarborough that it has not benefited so much by the relief under the Local Taxation Account as some other boroughs, which do not possess the exceptional position that Scarborough has, and if I can give a Return such as the hon. Gentleman desires I shall be glad to do so. I am sorry the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton has left the House, because I desire to take advantage of this opportunity to make some remarks with regard to the figures he quoted in comparing the position of the counties, the county boroughs, and the Metropolis, so far as the relief of local taxation is concerned. The right hon. Gentleman said that under the complete scheme London would receive £280,000, the county boroughs £700,000, and the counties about £2,000,000. Those figures are not, however, accurate. My own calculation at the moment is that London will receive something approaching £500,000, the county boroughs £600,000, and the administrative counties £2,000,000. The right hon. Gentleman stated the figures in order to draw a comparison unfavourable to the towns. He said the benefit derived by the counties was very much larger than that conferred on the Metropolis or the county boroughs. Now, my point is that the relief to the Metropolis is 3·5d., as against 4·9d. for the counties and 5·4d. for the county boroughs. Thus, though the Metropolis gets a very large sum, the actual amount of relief is not so great as in the cases of the counties and county boroughs. This is explained by the fact that the amount collected for licences in London is considerably less than in other parts of the Kingdom, and consequently London does not receive so much in relief. I do not think that the inhabitants of London have any very strong ground of complaint. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton drew a comparison between the relief to the country and that to the towns, and contended that the relief in the latter case was less than it ought to be. But what are the facts? While the relief given in the county boroughs in England and Wales is 5·4d., the counties have only benefited to the extent of 4·9d.

MR. STOREY (Sunderland): Will the right hon. Gentleman give us the comparison of the existing rates in boroughs and in counties? A reduction of 5d. in a 4s. rate would be very different to a reduction of 4d. in a 6d. rate.

*MR. RITCHIE: I maintain that that would not be a fair basis of comparison. If it be true that the towns have heavier rates, they have got value for their money. There can be no question about that. They have spent large sums on water supply and drainage, and other matters, which contribute greatly to the comfort of the inhabitants, and it would be an entirely erroneous method of calculation if this money were to be distributed and relief given on the basis of money spent. If the rates in towns are high the inhabitants reap the benefit in the shape of the increased value of their property. I contend that, on the basis of rateable value, the towns have not fared so much less well than the country, for, from a statement before me, I find that whilst the county boroughs will be relieved by 5·4d. in the £1, subject to the equitable adjustment, the complete effect of which we do not yet know, the administrative counties have received relief by about 4·9d. The amount of difference is not great, but whatever it is I say that it is in favour of the towns. The right hon. Gentleman complained that Wolverhampton had not fared well in the distribution. I think it has benefited considerably above the average of county boroughs throughout the United Kingdom, for it has received the equivalent of 6d. in the £1, whereas the average of county boroughs is 5d. I, therefore, do not think it has any reason to complain on that score.

(8.15.) MR. STOREY: I accept the right hon. Gentleman's figures for the present, although Parliament has not been furnished with the means of testing them. I understand him to say that London has received, through the operation of these subventions in aid, a reduction of 3d. and a fraction in its rates—[MR. RITCHIE: Nearly 4d.]—3·7d. He tells us that county boroughs have received a reduction of 5d. and that counties received practically about 5d. We understood that this was to be a relief of those who needed relief most, but the basis upon which the right hon. Gentleman and the Government have gone has been such that those have got most relief who were least heavily burdened, and who therefore needed least. Take the case of a county where the rate is 1s. in the £1. If the county had got a saving of more than 4d.—nearly 5d.—in the 1s., it is very evident that the reduction in the rates would amount to 33 per cent. Take the case of a borough which may happen to be within the county though not of it. That borough has secured a reduction of rates of 5d. The rates are probably 4s. in the £1, and in some cases more. It is evident that a reduction of 5d. upon a 4s. rate is a very different thing to a reduction of 4d.

upon a 1s. rate. We, in Sunderland, have secured such an amount of money through these subventions as has enabled our Poor Law Guardians to levy a lower rate this year than we have had for several years past. But whilst we are large enough to secure a reduction of our rates by something like 2d. in the £1, which is about one twenty-fifth of our total rate, in the county immediately adjoining they have been able to secure a larger reduction—indeed the reduction has been of such an amount that practically their rates have been reduced to next door to nothing at all. When the Local Government Act was passing through the House the contention was that there were certain areas and certain descriptions of property that were so heavily rated that it would be convenient and advantageous to apply general taxes to alleviate the burdens upon those properties, and we allege that the operation of the right hon. Gentleman's method has been that the relief has mainly gone to the owners of land who least needed it. The relief which we in boroughs were led to expect would be very important and very considerable, has been, as a matter of practice, found worth very little at all. I have no disposition to pursue the other points raised to-night, because I do not think it is really worth while debating them at all. But this particular point the right hon. Gentleman well knows has not come up now for the last time. It will come up, I hope, again and again, until we are able to secure some much more equitable division of the relief as between boroughs and counties.

(8.24.) MR. ROWNTREE: I have Papers here referring to many other towns where the grievance to which I have called attention is as strongly felt as in Scarborough. I am sure there would be a feeling of great satisfaction if the right hon. Gentleman could see his way to present a Return which would enable the towns to judge of the actual result of the new system.

MR. WATT (Glasgow, Camlachie) was inaudible in the Gallery.

(8.30.) MR. STOREY: I desire to ask a question with respect to the House Duty. Last year a reduction was made in the Inhabited House Duty, and we contended it should apply to tenement houses. We understood that that condition had been acceded to, and that tenement houses which were occupied by two or more tenants, though there was a common door, would be exempt. A case occurred in Sunderland, in which a woman applied to the Inland Revenue authorities to be relieved from the Inhabited House Duty on the ground that the house was a tenement house, occupied by two tenants, neither of whom paid £20 a year. The Local Commissioners took a common-sense view, and exempted the woman from the duty; but the authorities in London have appealed against the act of the Local Commissioners, and are putting the poor woman to considerable expense in legal proceedings. Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman will explain to us how the matter stands. (8.33.)

*(9.5.) MR. MORTON (Peterborough): I do not wish to detain the Committee beyond a very few minutes, and have merely risen to call the attention of the Chancellor of the Exchequer to a matter upon which I spoke last year. But I may say, on the general question, that I am very glad to think that the Government propose to redeem their promise and give the people free education. So far as I am concerned, I am glad to accept as much free education as they will give us, not troubling whether denominational schools benefit by it or not. I know there are some persons, both inside and outside the House, who believe that the Whisky and Beer Duty should be reduced; but I am bound to say that, having the choice, I should have no hesitation in preferring free education to free whisky. I hear something said about free education being accompanied by popular control of denominational schools, and that may be necessary by-and-by. Meantime I, for one, do not care to destroy the denominational schools at once, and am satisfied that it would be no benefit to the rate-payers; but if it is found by-and-by that it is impossible to work a system of free education with denominational schools, then an element of popular control may be provided in the management—

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order!

*MR. MORTON: I do not wish to go beyond what you, Sir, consider the limits of the present discussion, and will say no more on this matter. But I do trust that we shall have free education introduced as soon as possible, and I am sure it will be a benefit to the people of this country. The particular matter upon which I rose to say a word or two has relation to the assessment of House Duty and Income Tax. Last year I called attention to the matter, and I am aware that it has often been referred to in previous Sessions of this and other Parliaments. But we shall not be satisfied with simply calling attention to it; the system should be altered to a uniform system of assessment for rates and taxes. At the present moment the rates are collected on what is called the rateable value. This is in accordance with the Act of Parliament, which says that the rateable value shall be the value, after deductions from the gross rent, of certain charges. Income Tax and House Duty, however, are collected on the gross value. Now, what is wanted is that both should be collected on the same basis. They cannot both be right, and one or the other should be adopted. I do not, of course, mean that it is legally wrong, but it is morally wrong, to collect the Income Tax and the House Duty upon the gross value. Of course, the matter has occupied the attention of successive Chancellors of the Exchequer, and has been considered by Parliament, and Parliament has said that local rating shall be on the net value. The question of fair value has also been before the Law Lords of the other House, and in 1883 they decided that the gross value was not the fair value, but unfortunately they did not decide what was the fair value. In the case of assessment for the water rate they declared that the gross value was not the fair value. In 1885 Parliament decided on the same question by passing an Act, declaring, in regard to these Water Companies, that the fair value was the rateable value, so I think we have good authority for saying, in regard to this matter, that whether it be legally right or not, so far as we can get any declaration, it is that the true value is the rateable value. Of course, I am perfectly aware I can hardly expect the Chancellor of the Exchequer to do anything during the present year, for the alteration means a reduction in the Revenue, and we can only expect this when a Chancellor of the Exchequer has a surplus to dispose of. On ways of dealing with the subject I will not now dwell; all I want to know is, whether the Chancellor of the Exchequer is considering the matter, and if he proposes to do anything in regard to it? In the course of a short discussion I initiated last Session, the right hon. Gentleman said "It was a matter of great importance, and it would continue to occupy his attention, not without some hope that it would be possible to deal with the matter some day." Now, "some day" is a vague expression, and I had hoped it might have come this Session, and, at any rate, I should like to know if the right hon. Gentleman yet sees his way to do anything in the matter, which will not be settled until a uniform system of assessment is adopted for rates and taxes. There is another matter, to which I called the right hon. Gentleman's attention earlier in the year, and that is this. In the collection of local rates a deduction is allowed to landlords on property of a certain rateable value if they pay on their houses whether empty or let and during the whole of the year. I am told that the overseers find that it saves them a good deal of trouble, and that they do not find there is any loss by making these allowances, it being convenient to both landlord and tenant. I should like to know whether the right hon. Gentleman could not do the same thing as regards House Duty and Property Tax, allowing a certain discount on property up to a certain rateable value where the landlord and not the tenant pays the taxes? I am sure if that could be arranged it would save a great deal of trouble to collectors, tenants, and landlords, and I do not think there would be any loss to the Revenue. I will not detain the Committee longer, but I trust the Chancellor of the Exchequer will be able to give me an answer a little more favourable than that he gave me last year in regard to the assessments; and I trust the time is not far distant when we shall have the alteration made, because it must be wrong to collect the taxes upon what the House of Commons has declared an unfair value. You might as well collect the Income Tax on a man's income, deducting nothing for expenses, as to collect the tax on house property, allowing nothing for outgoings.

*(9.16.) MR. CHANNING (Northampton, E.): The present Budget proposals are the most remarkable we have had for many years, and remarkable in two ways: in the first place, in offering to the people of this country, perhaps the greatest, the most important, and most urgently desired remission of taxation—for I consider free education to be a remission of taxation—that has been offered for many years past. But I think the Budget is equally remarkable in that it has given rise to a discussion which has been an explosion and an exposure of the Chancellor of the Exchequer's method of finance. The whole of the right hon. Gentleman's long speech he gave us the other day might be summed up in one sentence—that he felt very severely the strictures passed upon his financial methods by one of the most eminent authorities on finance (Sir Thomas Farrar), and the whole of his speech was an elaborate apology for his financial administration, based on the charges made against that administration by Sir Thomas Farrar. Now, I do not propose to deal with the question which has been so thoroughly threshed out to-day; but, at least, this may be said: that the support which the Chancellor of the Exchequer gets to his proposals by saying that the burden will not come upon the taxpayers because of the Suez Canal shares, is founded on a fallacy absolutely transparent. With regard to the Naval Defence Act, he has bound the hands of Parliament and future Chancellors of the Exchequer so that they cannot interfere with Expenditure without the consent of the House of Lords, which we know will not be given. But with regard to the Suez Canal shares, while there is no consent of the House of Lords necessary, then there would be no difficulty, supposing a Radical Parliament elected at the next General Election, and a Radical Chancellor of the Exchequer proposed it, in appropriating the whole of that windfall to some other purpose for the public advantage, instead of that for which the Chancellor of the Exchequer destines it, still, in that case, too, there is practically an anticipation of income, depriving the taxpayers of a fund which they might apply to other uses. But the whole financial administration of the right hon. Gentleman has been tumbled down like a house of cards by the criticisms of my two right hon. Friends, and I will not therefore occupy the time of the Committee in dealing with the subject, but I have something to say as to what may be called the Local Budget of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. The £4,000,000 of money issued from the Consolidated Fund as grants in aid to County Councils are not only a violation of those principles of finance laid down by Chancellors of the Exchequer and all who have thought out local finance administration, but contrary to his own contention which, with all eminent authorities, has been that you should give aid to local finance in the form of taxes, which can be raised by these Local Authorities, and for which Local Authorities should be primarily and directly responsible, and in the economical raising and spending of which Local Authorities have a peculiar and direct interest. In issuing these subsidies from the Consolidated Fund, the violation of principle involved is made all the worse by what has been admitted by the Minister of Agriculture with regard to agricultural districts, that reduction of rates is ultimately for the benefit of landlords, so that, practically, the whole of these £4,000,000 do not go to relieve industry, but will fall into the lap of the landed interest. I refer to this because I wish to say a word upon the financial side of free education. £1,000,000 is to be devoted to that purpose this year, and £2,000,000 in future years, and all who are interested in education and in the welfare of the poorer working classes who send their children to elementary schools must be perfectly satisfied with this appropriation of national funds. But what I wish to point out is this: in the first place, that we are pledging the resources of the future; of that I do not so much complain; but then these £2,000,000 annually will be granted out of the Consolidated Fund, while there is no attempt made to revise the incidence of Imperial taxation on land and realised capital. You are adding £2,000,000 a year to the outgoings, while you have not introduced a graduated Income Tax, or revised the Death Duties, or placed direct taxation upon ground rents and ground values. These matters are left to the remote future, and the Government are giving this grant out of the pockets of commerce and enterprise and industry and labour, and out of the pockets of those men and women whose precarious incomes depend on their own faculties, and for whom the Chancellor of the Exchequer has no remedy or relief in the immediate future. I wish to emphasise the point that we are having a great gift made to the people of the country without placing a fair share of the burden upon realised property. I know it would be out of order to enter into the details of the proposal of free education. I would only say with regard to this that every Liberal and Radical on this side of the House, and every Liberal and Radical in the country, will in one sense thank Her Majesty's Government from their hearts for having made this great concession to the people of the country. But we consider it a victory of Radicalism and Liberalism over Tory prejudice and Tory protest. At the beginning of this Session, when this question was mentioned, the only Conservative Members who spoke on it condemned the whole proposal. How has it come about? We Radicals gave the franchise to the county electors, and nobody opposed its extension to them more persistently than the Chancellor of the Exchequer, but it is the fact that the county electors have a vote and will shortly be able to exercise it, and not sympathy with the principle of free education that has induced the Chancellor of the Exchequer to make this boon to the people of the country. I hope the measure will be promptly brought by Her Majesty's Government before the House. As far as those who have sometimes worked with me on educational questions in the House are concerned, I am sure we shall give the warmest and heartiest support to this proposal, while we shall not shrink from asserting in some practical form those conditions which we consider to be essential to the true and genuine carrying out of the measure of free education. But, subject to that, we shall give the right hon. Gentleman's proposal our heartiest support. If there is a section of the followers of the Chancellor of the Exchequer who are anxious to avail themselves of the exigencies of Parliamentary time to enable the Government to escape from the carrying out of their pledge, we Radicals shall not let them off, but shall insist on the prolonging of the Session sufficiently to carry this proposal into effect, and shall not leave the poor men we represent in the counties subject to this tax one instant longer than we can. We shall insist upon the carrying out of the pledge which makes the Budget of this year so memorable.

*(9.29.) SIR R. FOWLER (London): The hon. Member has made a great attack on the landed interest. I do not happen to be largely connected with that interest, but I sit and live amongst those who are, and I know they are taxed to an extreme point, and that an increase of the taxation upon them would be equivalent to the imposition of the last straw that breaks the camel's back. I have already expressed my great satisfaction with the general principles of my right hon. Friend's proposals. I think he is entitled to the gratitude of the country for them. There is one particular point, however, to which I desire to draw attention. My right hon. Friend has proposed, and I think unjustly proposed, to throw a very heavy burden indeed on the Straits Settlements, namely, no less an amount in future than £100,000. per annum. Now, the Crown Colonies are not in the position of self-governing colonies like Australia and Canada; they have no Representative Institutions, and therefore depend for their ruling and for justice, to a large extent, on legislators appointed by the Home Government. I think they have a right to look to this House in a sense in which the self-governing colonies do not look to it. As regards the Crown Colonies, the effort which has been made to put increased taxation on them is very hard upon them. The reason for what has been done, particularly in Singapore, is that it is a most important naval station—a coaling station. It has been thought advisable by the Government to expend a large sum in fortifying the position; and I contend that, as the work is for Imperial purposes, the cost should be borne by Imperial, and not by local, finance. In Hong Kong the expenditure of the Government is £200,000 a year; at present the colony provides £20,000 a year, but in future it is to be called upon to contribute £40,000. In the Straits Settlements the expenditure of the Government is only £136,000 annually, and yet this colony is asked to vote upwards of £100,000 of that amount. The burdens are not only all unfair in themselves; but in the case of the Straits Settlements, the proportion demanded is particularly unjust, and it is a burden forced upon it in violation of the votes of the Local Council entirely, because the Crown nominees are in a majority. I maintain that this is a great grievance, and I appeal to the Chancellor of the Exchequer to carefully re-consider the matter on grounds both of justice and of policy. I appeal to him to do this as a statesman who has sat in a good many Cabinets. He is not only acquainted with the Exchequer, but he has been First Lord of the Admiralty, and has filled other positions in Governments. He can, therefore, take an all-round view of the question. I believe that this has been suggested to the Treasury.

*MR. GOSCHEN: No, no.

*SIR R. FOWLER: Well, I believe they have looked into it. No doubt the duty of the Treasury is to raise money by all the means in their power; but I would appeal to the Chancellor of the Exchequer to regard the matter from the point of view of statesmanship, and not from the narrow point of view of the Treasury.

*(9.38.) SIR T. SUTHERLAND (Greenock): This is an important question to the Crown Colonies concerned, and I can speak with some authority on it, because I happened to be a member of the Legislative Council of Hong Kong at the time the first Imperial contribution was imposed on that colony. I listened with some surprise at the manner in which the Chancellor of the Exchequer appealed to the patriotism of the Crown Colonies with respect to the new and much larger impositions in the future. To my mind, his attitude was something like that of an amiable fish-monger, who, having skinned an eel, suggests that it should be as obliging and patriotic as possible. The course of procedure in such cases is that a Minister, or an official representing the Government of the day, having discovered that a Crown Colony has a Revenue and no representative Institution, decides to appropriate a portion of that Revenue for Imperial purposes. In the case I am familiar with, a message was sent out to the Governor to bring in a Bill, and the official members of the Council were required to vote for it, and in all cases the official Members are in a majority in Crown Colonies. In the particular instance to which I refer I had the audacity to oppose the contribution on what I believed to be just and equitable grounds, and one or two of the official members ventured to take a similar view; but, subsequently, a Despatch was received from the Secretary of State, in which it was practically stated to the official members of the Council that it would be as much as their places were worth if they voted against a measure advised by the Home Government, and brought forward by the Governor for the purpose of filling the Exchequer of the Home Government. That is not at all an exaggerated statement of the facts as they occurred a few years ago, and I venture to say that it will be found, on investigation, that a similar course has been pursued in regard to the recent enormous levies on the Straits Settlements, Hong Kong, and Ceylon. I need scarcely say that if these colonies possessed representative Institutions, the Government would never have tampered with their independence in the way they have done; for, as has been stated, the great bulk of the expenditure referred to is for Imperial, and not for local, purposes, and ought to be borne by the Home Government. I do not know how the Crown Colonies intend to deal with this question, but I trust they will not allow it to remain in its present unsatisfactory position. I am not, perhaps, sufficiently experienced in matters of this kind to advise them as to what would be the proper course to pursue. Whether they should follow the example of Newfoundland and ask to be heard at the Bar of the House may, perhaps, be an open question. I would, however, venture to suggest to the Chancellor of the Exchequer an intermediate course—one which he might judiciously adopt in the interests of the Home Government and in the interests of a good understanding with the colonies—and it is that he should allow a grave matter of this kind to be submitted to a Committee of the House, before whom representatives of the colonies might be allowed to attend and show cause against the course pursued by the Government. I have no doubt the Chancellor of the Exchequer will be able to give an elaborate, add even a plausible, answer to the observations of my hon. Friend and myself on this question, but I venture to say that the matter will not rest on the present Budget discussion. Passing by the question with which I have been dealing, I cannot but congratulate my right hon. Friend on being one of the most cautious and fortunate Chancellors of the Exchequer who has handled the finance of this country for a very long time. I uphold entirely the financial method which the right hon. Gentleman has adopted on the important questions with which he has had to deal. No wiser or more sensible thing was ever done by a Government than, having entered on a most important and necessary programme in connection with the naval and military defences of the country, that they should have determined to allow the Departments concerned more or less a free hand in carrying out the great work, instead of confining them to the narrow limits of the Estimates of each succeeding year. It is utterly impossible for any Admiralty or any Naval Department to devise a scheme by which they can lay down exactly how much of the £21,000,000 which the House sanctions for naval construction can be expended in one particular year. At the same time, I think the accounts which the Chancellor of the Exchequer placed before the House at the time he introduced the Budget might be of a clearer and more comprehensive character. There is a great deal of mystery, especially with regard to these outside running accounts, which might be cleared away if a different system were adopted. I would suggest that the Chancellor of the Exchequer should have a printed Financial Statement issued from the

Sir T. Sutherland

Treasury in the same way as is done by the Admiralty and the War Department. Such a statement would greatly facilitate Members in addressing themselves to the question of the national defences, and also lessen the labours of the Chancellor of the Exchequer in his Budget Speech. I should like to allude to the amount of the Floating Debt vis-à-vis to the amount of our Consolidated Fund; and, so far as I am concerned, I entirely approve of the idea of the Chancellor of the Exchequer in desiring to maintain Consols at the lowest possible amount, even at the cost of speculating somewhat in regard to the Floating Debt. I do not know whether in the voluminous Returns given to the House from time to time the information is afforded as to the cost to the Treasury of financing the Floating Debt; but I should be extremely surprised to hear that the cost of that financing during the last 12 months has been equal to the rate of the limited interest paid on the Consolidated Fund. Even if the expense were greater, I should still be an advocate for, as far as possible, avoiding the necessity of increasing the actual amount of our Consols. As to the price of that Stock, all the Members of the House are responsible. When the reduction in the interest was effected, investors rushed out of Consols into Railway Preference and Debenture Stock, and the consequence was that the latter have advanced something like 20 per cent., while Consols fell into a state of suspended animation to some extent. There can be no hostile criticism of the Chancellor of the Exchequer with reference to their existing value, for no one voted against the reduction of the interest. I must bear my testimony as a shipowner to the advantage the country has derived from the possession of its interest in the Suez Canal. The shipping interest of this country is under a deep debt of gratitude to those who had the happy inspiration of obtaining for this country a voice, and an important voice, in that control of that great undertaking which is so vital to our interests and welfare, and the interest on the shares could not be easily devoted to a better purpose than that to which it is applied by the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

*(10.5.) MR. SHAW LEFEVRE (Bradford, Central): Sir, the hon. Member behind me has complimented the Chancellor of the Exchequer for giving way to the great military Departments, but for my part I must protest against such doctrines, and if they were carried out to the full extent they would open floodgates of Expenditure in all directions. I protest against the doctrine that there is any financial pedantry in criticising the plans by which the Chancellor of the Exchequer meets the demands of the Naval and Military Departments. The Chancellor of the Exchequer ought to act as a check on any imprudent Expenditure by those Departments, and if the Chancellor of the Exchequer finds himself able to reduce taxation by postponing payments for ships and works or by borrowing money for the purpose, practically all check upon Military and Naval Expenditure will be removed. It is no answer to say that precedents can be found—one in the fortification scheme of Lord Palmerston and the other in the scheme for the localisation of the forces. We all know that a great amount of money was wasted upon the fortifications, and the localisation of the forces was not a wise precedent. The Chancellor of the Exchequer and the present Government have not contented themselves with a single case or two, but they have adopted the principle of borrowing in five distinct operations—for the fortification of our home ports, for the fortification of the coaling stations, for the Australian ships, for ships built under the Naval Defence Act, and for barracks. One of the chief evils of this system of finance is the concealment it enables of the Military Expenditure of the country. [The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER: Enables.] It has the effect of concealing the Expenditure of the country. Last year the Budget had to be discussed without any information whatever about the extraordinary Expenditure then incurred on behalf of the Army and Navy; the only information then given was that contained in the ordinary Army and Navy Estimates, and there was no other source from which information could be gathered as to what the real Expenditure was. I ventured to call attention to the fact and to hazard a guess as to what the real Expenditure was, but my figures were disputed by the Heads of Departments. Some weeks afterwards I obtained the Return to which allusion has been made. If it be of a confusing character, that is not my fault, because I was ready to adopt any form which would give the figures in a reasonably clear way. The form was approved of by the Treasury, and therefore it is not for the Chancellor of the Exchequer to complain. The Return showed that over and above the Army and Navy Estimates for the year there was a contemplated expenditure at that time of something like £7,000,000. It now turns out that that Estimate was excessive by £2,000,000. It is not the intention of the Opposition to find fault with the spending of the money, but if it had been necessary to take a Vote for the extraordinary Expenditure within the year a much more careful Estimate would have been submitted. Omitting these £2,000,000, the actual Expenditure last year over and above that voted in the Estimates was £5,058,000. Of this, £1,428,000 was charged on the Consolidated Fund; £1,155,000 was the unexpended balance of the previous year, which otherwise would have gone in reduction of debt; £405,000 was supplied by the Budget surplus; £350,000 was provided by Supplementary Estimates this year; and £1,719,000 was borrowed under various Acts of Parliament, by which the repayment is spread over different periods, namely, £696,000 was borrowed under the Naval Defence Act, £780,000 under the Imperial Defence Act, and £243,000 was borrowed under the Imperial Defence Act for expenditure on Australian ships. These were the statistics for last year, and I now come to the current year, for which the Treasury has produced a Return which is not yet in the hands of Members. In the course of his speech the Chancellor of the Exchequer told the Committee what would be borrowed; he used the terms "spent" and "borrowed," sometimes one and sometimes the other: but he did not tell the Committee what was the actual sum to be expended on the Army and the Navy within the current year. The Return now on the Table will point this out, but it is even more confused than that of last year.

It shows that beyond the ordinary Estimates of £31,750,000, £5,227,000 will be expended within the current year. That amount the right hon. Gentleman provides for in this way—charged on Consolidated Fund, £1,428,000; Budget surplus, £500,000; unexpended balances on previous years, £447,000; to be voted in next year's Estimates, £181,000; to be borrowed under Naval Defence Act, to be repaid by 1896, £2,119,000; to be borrowed under Imperial Defence Act and repaid out of surplus, £550,000; making a total of £5,225,000. Of this sum £1,928,000 is provided for in the year, £3,116,000 borrowed as money which will go in reduction of Debt, and £181,000 out of next year's Votes. My objection to these schemes of the Chancellor of the Exchequer is that they entirely destroy the effective control of the House of Commons over the Expenditure of the Army and Navy, and that they conceal the real amount of that Expenditure from the country. They also enable the Chancellor of the Exchequer to claim a surplus when in reality there is a considerable deficit, while they throw the Estimates for the Army and Navy into complete confusion, and render them useless for comparison. The statement of the First Lord of the Treasury as to the extent and the effect of the delay in the building of ships was greatly exaggerated, and in my opinion such delay as has occurred in the past has frequently resulted in our obtaining ships of a better type. The action of the Government in increasing the normal Expenditure upon the Army and Navy by £3,000,000 a year, in addition to the extraordinary Expenditure of £17,500,000, has resulted in the whole saving effected by the Chancellor of the Exchequer's conversion scheme being swallowed up.

*MR. GOSCHEN: How do you show that?

*MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: I understand the saving effected by the right hon. Gentleman's conversion scheme amounts from £1,500,000 to £2,000,000 per annum, whilst the increase in the normal Expenditure upon the Army and Navy amounts to £3,000,000 per annum. It is a very doubtful question whether that increase will ever be reduced; it is not easy to reduce Estimates again when once they have been increased, so I do not think I exaggerate when I say the normal increase of the Estimates for the two great Services swallows up the saving on the conversion of Consols. In addition, there is the authorised extraordinary Expenditure under loan to the extent of £17,500,000.

*MR. GOSCHEN: Some of that is paid off already.

*MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: That is, undoubtedly, the case; but, nevertheless, it was extraordinary Expenditure, and did not come under the £3,000,000 to which I have alluded. Such is not, I think, an untrue statement of the result as regards the Army and Navy. Then I have to allude to the expenditure in another Department, where the complaint is not that too much, but too little is spent, I mean the Post Office. The Chancellor of the Exchequer alluded to the Post Office in the course of his Budget speech, and appeared to take credit to himself during the last year for having spent some increased amount upon it. Now, last year I called the attention of the House to the expenditure upon the Post Office, and I complained that during the four years the Government have been in office they had starved and stinted the Post Office, and had discouraged improvements in that Department. My figures were on that occasion denied; they were stated to be unreliable. But during the interval between last Session and the present time, a Return of the Expenditure and Receipts of the Post Office has been laid upon the Table, showing the net surplus of revenue each year during 20 years. That Return fully bears out the statement I made last year. It shows that during the five years that the late Mr. Fawcett presided over the Post Office, there was a net surplus revenue derived from the Post Office and received by the Treasury, of about £2,800,000 annually. The amount remained about the same each year during the five years Mr. Fawcett presided over the Department. My hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff stated the other night, what I believe is perfectly correct, that Mr. Fawcett on taking office under my right hon. Friend the Member for Mid Lothian in 1881 came to an understanding with my right hon. Friend that he should be allowed a free hand in respect to Expenditure at the Post Office, or, at all events, that any sums beyond the normal amount paid into the Treasury as net revenue for the Post Office, should be under his control. And what I would call attention to is that the five years during which Mr. Fawcett held the position of Postmaster General was the period during which the greatest improvements were effected in the Post Office, and when the demands of the public were satisfied to a remarkable degree. In spite of this, during that period the net revenue for the Post Office remained stationary, amounting year by year to £2,800,000. I speak of the Post Office, and do not include the Telegraphs. As the result of this policy when Mr. Fawcett left the Department it was one of the most popular of the Services under Government, and there was general contentment among the employés. I think I am fully justified in saying that no Department of the State gave greater satisfaction to the public. What is the state of things since that time? I pass over the two or three years when the office of Postmaster General was held by myself and two or three others for short periods, during which there was practically no change; but I take the four or five years during which the present Government has been in Office. During this period the net revenue from the Post Office has risen from £2,800,000 to £3,450,000 in the year 1888-89, an increase of revenue of £650,000.

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. JACKSON, Leeds, N.): Does that include the Packet Service?

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: I include the Packet Service. And during these five years of increasing revenue from the Post Office there have been increasing complaints on the part of the public. I know the net revenue has been somewhat reduced last year, 1890-91, by a sum of £130,000, owing to the increases in salaries; but in the Estimate of the coming year I find in the Budget speech that the net revenue is expected to be the same as in the present year. As the revenues of the Post Office have been habitually underestimated, I think we may assume that it would be at least £3,400,000.

MR. GOSCHEN: I can reassure the right hon. Gentleman upon that point. The possible increase in the revenue will certainly be largely diminished by the possible increase of Expenditure. One site for instance for a new Post Office is likely to cost £125,000.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: That is not included in the Estimate for the year, and of course I cannot speak of things which are in the mind of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, but which have not reached the stage when they can be mentioned in Estimate or in Budget speech.

MR. GOSCHEN: The right hon. Gentleman was speaking of a possible increase upon the Estimates, and I only wished to point out to him that unforeseen Expenditure is likely to be as large or larger than unforeseen increase of revenue. I do not mention this by way of controversy, but for the satisfaction of the right hon. Gentleman.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: Naturally I only dealt with the figures as I find them, and it is not fair to have this new figure started when it has not been mentioned in the Estimate or in the Budget speech. But even if we make allowance for that, I am perfectly certain that the net revenue in the coming year will at least be equal to the past year, and I shall be surprised if it is not £100,000 in excess. Taking the net average revenue of the Post Office during the five years when Mr. Fawcett presided there, I think I am justified in my contention that the Government have raised a constantly increasing net revenue from the Post Office, and that during the whole of the time improvements have been discouraged or refused on the part of the Treasury for the sake of getting this increased revenue for the Department. I do not say that the Postmaster General is to blame. The fact is, as everybody knows, the Postmaster General is the humble servant of the Treasury. If the Treasury desires to increase its revenue, the Postmaster General must give way, for the Treasury is master of the position—that is to say: the Chancellor of the Exchequer. The increase of revenue can only be effected at the expense of the Postal Service. And now we find that what six years ago was one of the most popular Services under Government, has become one of the most unpopular Services. I might go further and make reference to pay, but inasmuch as improvement has been effected in the present year I will not dilate on this matter. My own belief is, that if the Postmaster General were allowed a free hand to deal with questions as they arise—if he had not to consult the Treasury upon every possible occasion—then many of the complaints might have been dealt with at a much earlier period and probably the ultimate charge upon the Government would not have been so great as now it proves to be. I will undertake to say that the result of drawing this increasing revenue from the Post Office has caused the Department to be unpopular in the sense that people have felt that improvements were neglected and discouraged by the Government while the Government has continued to derive increasing revenue from the Post Office. The Chancellor of the Exchequer will not, I think, deny the relations he has described between himself and the Postmaster General. Speaking to the London Chamber of Commerce last year the right hon. Gentleman said—

"I can assure you that when the Post Office falls short of its duty it is on the Treasury that the responsibility should be laid rather than on the Postmaster General. The Post Office is an ambitious and a capable Department; its capacity is equal to its ambition, and its ambition is, I am bound to say, equal to its capacity. Let it never be thought that the Post Office is content to remain behind the measures or the systems of any Foreign or Colonial Governments."

The conclusion I have arrived at is that, while the Chancellor of the Exchequer has listened to the demands of the great Military Departments and given them what they wanted, he has starved and stinted the Post Office with the view of deriving from it a gradually growing income. I look upon any policy of starving that Department as unwise. My belief is that it would be a wise policy to give the Postmaster General a free hand in regard to the Service, though I would not carry that beyond the point of securing to the Government a considerable revenue, which I would put at £3,000,000, any excess beyond which should be devoted to the improvement of the Service. In conclusion, I again protest against the continual increase on the one hand of the Army and Navy Estimates, while a Department like the Post Office is being starved for the purpose of giving the Government an increased net revenue.

*(10.38.) MR. JACKSON: I have listened to the speech of the right hon. Gentleman with amazement and very great pain. The right hon. Gentleman has charged the Treasury with having starved and stinted the Post Office, and with having prevented from time to time great improvements in that Department. He has charged the Treasury with paying no heed to the public interest, but only desiring to extract as much out of the Department as they possibly could. I venture to tell the right hon. Gentleman that there is not the smallest foundation for that charge. Nor has the right hon. Gentleman brought forward a single instance in support of that most monstrous charge. I should have thought that if my right hon. Friend the Postmaster General, by good administration, shows an unexpected balance, that is rather matter for congratulation than condemnation. The right hon. Gentleman had spoken about starving and stinting the Post Office. If he were cognizant of the facts he would know that within the last 12 months the Treasury has sanctioned an increase of staff and an increase of pay to the staff which will not amount to less than £400,000 a year. I know what the amount is, the right hon. Gentleman does not—

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: I alluded to increase of salaries in the past year, and the Postmaster General a few nights ago, I think, put the figure at £220,000.

MR. JACKSON: I have listened to the right hon. Gentleman with extreme disappointment. The right hon. Gentleman has filled the position of Postmaster General himself, and no one therefore can be in a better position to know what mischief exaggerated statements made in this House by men in his position are calculated to effect in the Service. I am sorry to have spoken with some warmth, but I know that these charges levelled against the Treasury are entirely without foundation, and I must say when they are made they ought to be supported by some evidence. It has ever been the duty of the Treasury since I have been there, and I think I may say the same of my predecessors, to sanction every improvement which was calculated to add to the public convenience proposed from time to time by the Postmaster General. I am quite sure if my right hon. Friend the Postmaster General were here he would repudiate the statement the right hon. Gentleman opposite has made.

*MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: I spoke mainly of improvements in the Service in the public interest. I did not speak of salaries.

*MR. JACKSON: But the right hon. Gentleman said starving and stinting.

*MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: This is not the first time I have dealt with the subject. I dealt with it last year. I never alluded in any way to the question of the staff. In alluding to the starving and stinting of the Service I meant solely to refer to improvement in the public interest.

(10.43.) MR. STOREY: I do not wish to enter into this dispute. I wish to recall the attention of the Chancellor of the Exchequer to a matter of infinitely more importance to the taxpayers. I spoke early in the evening, when the House was empty, and I wish to convince the Chancellor of the Exchequer that the remedy he proposed last year with regard to Inhabited House Duty has been futile in the extreme. Last year he admitted the grievance, and when I tell the House that that grievance involves the interests of many scores of thousands of citizens—

MR. JOHNSTON (Belfast, S.): Is it in order, Mr. Courtney, for an hon. Member to make the same speech over again?

MR. STOREY: As the hon. Member did not hear the last—

MR. JOHNSTON: Unfortunately, I did.

MR. STOREY: And as he has not heard the present speech, I think his attempt to convince the House that it will be the same speech is, at any rate, premature. I am not going to make the same speech, but I will make a better

VOL. CCCLII. [THIRD SERIES.]

one. The subject is of importance to my constituents, and, I think, to many Members of this House. What the right hon. Gentleman did last year was to admit the grievance as to the levying of House Duty on tenement houses which were never intended to be included within the scope of the impost. After defeating the remedy we proposed from this side of the House, the right hon. Gentleman proposed a remedy himself, and it is contained in the 26th clause of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act of last year. I wish to assure him, on behalf of the householders throughout the country, that his proposed relief of the grievance has turned out to be futile in the extreme. He proposed to relieve these tenement houses and, as a matter of fact, he has not done so. The right hon. Gentleman has himself stated that, whilst he expected his modified Inhabited House Duty to yield £1,460,000, it has, as a matter of fact, during the past year yielded £1,570,000, and I want to state that in my judgment the excess of £110,000 is altogether or mainly due to the fact that the poor owners of tenement houses have, owing to the peculiar drafting of the measure and to the difficulties thrown in their way by the public officials, failed to secure the relief we anticipated they would secure. I will give the Chancellor of the Exchequer the concrete instance on which I found this allegation. In Sunderland applications were made on behalf of the tenants and householders for relief from House Duty, and a test case was presented to the local Commissioners. That case related to a house of two storeys, with one front door, but with two tenants, one on the lower and the other on the upper floor. It was admitted before the local Commissioners that the house had been originally built many years previously for the purpose of accommodating two tenants, and that it had continued to be used as the habitation of two tenants up to the date of the application. The owner produced the certificate of the Medical Officer of Health that the House was in a proper sanitary condition. The local Income Tax Commissioners agreed that the house came within the Statute, and that the owner should not be liable to Inhabited House Duty. There we hoped the matter would have ended, and that the local Officers would have given effect to the decision in the test case and relieved all the different applicants in the town. The local Officer, however, wrote up to London and, under guidance of the Somerset House authorities, appealed to a Court of Law against the decision of their own Commissioners.

*MR. GOSCHEN: They are not their own Commissioners.

MR. STOREY: I know they are not their own in the sense of being paid Commissioners, but I know also that they are local persons who are appointed to deal with these matters because they are independent and reasonable persons. I want to know on what grounds the authorities in London put this poor owner to the cost of going to law on a matter of this kind? I have been looking at the Act, and I cannot conceive on what ground the Chancellor of the Exchequer will defend the action of the Board of Inland Revenue. This House is in precisely the same position as two cottages, except that, instead of the two tenements being side by side, they are one above the other. The only answer the Chancellor of the Exchequer can give is that there is one front door. This very question of a separate entrance was raised last year. An hon. Member asked whether it was to be understood that there was to be a separate entrance, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer said—

"The hon. Gentleman will see that there are no such words in the clause."

The hon. Member then asked—

"Will there have to be a separate entrance?"

And the Chancellor of the Exchequer said—

"Why should the hon. Member wish to have the words? I believe, as I propose to amend it, the clause will meet the views of the Committee. It will be for the Sanitary Officers to decide whether the houses are properly adapted."

Therefore, I say that if the Sanitary Officer has decided that this was a sanitary dwelling, the mere fact that it has a common stair is not sufficient to exempt it from the operation of the Act. This, as a single instance, may seem extremely trivial, as it only involves a question of a few shillings a year. But these few shillings are to be multiplied by hundreds of similar sums in my own town, by thousands in the North of England, and by hundreds of thousands throughout the country. There are scores of thousands of instances in the large towns of tenements perfectly sanitary, inhabited by the working classes, and possessing a common door. There may be three or four instead of two tenants, but each set of rooms is to all intents and purposes a separate tenement. The purpose aimed at by the Committee last year, and conceded by the Chancellor of the Exchequer was that all these people should be relieved from Inhabited House Duty. An examination of the Debates that took place when that duty was first established shows that it was never intended that tenement houses, where the tenements were let for less than £20 a year, should come under the operation of the law at all. The object of the duty was to obtain an additional tax from people who were rich enough to own and to occupy a house with a value of more than £20 a year. It was never intended that the Inhabited House Duty should be exacted in the case of a house that was inhabited not by a single well-to-do family, but by several small families. I hope the Chancellor of the Exchequer will give us some assurance that he and his associates in London will not press the law in opposition to the Statute, as I think they are doing now, for the purpose of trying to justify an unjust impost. By frankly giving way in this matter and accepting the view the Government agreed to last year, he will give sensible relief to many thousands of persons throughout the country, and carry into effect that which was the intention of Parliament last year.

(11.0.) MR. J. M. MACLEAN (Oldham): Hon. Gentlemen opposite have not had the courage to make any direct attack on the Budget. Very few of them have attempted to criticise it in any of its details, but most of them have made haste to express their agreement with the manner in which the Chancellor of the Exchequer proposes to dispose of his surplus. But through all the speeches of hon. Members there ran a tone of general disparagement of the great and splendid financial reforms which the Chancellor of the Exchequer has achieved during the four years in which he has been in office. The right hon. Gentleman has accomplished three great reforms. The first is the great conversion of the National Debt, by which he has relieved the taxpayers of the country from the payment of £2,000,000 a year. Hon. Gentlemen opposite do not dare to say that that is not a great and successful work, but they have done their utmost to minimise its value by referring to the present prices of Consols, and trying to make out that the Chancellor of the Exchequer has not devoted so much money as their Ministry did to reducing the corpus of the debt. I was struck by one remark of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton. The right hon. Gentleman said that no Chancellor of the Exchequer can take any particular credit for the reduction of the debt, as the matter is, for the most part, automatic. If that is so, what becomes of the elaborate attack made by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby, who challenged the figures of the Chancellor of the Exchequer and tried to make out that the reduction of debt has not been so great as that made by the Liberal Administration? Another reform achieved by the Chancellor of the Exchequer is the putting upon a permanent footing the relations between Imperial and local taxation, an object long desired by Members on both sides, but which no one hitherto have had the courage or skill to accomplish. I gather from the speech of the Member for Derby that he complains that the Chancellor of the Exchequer has given £4,000,000 or £5,000,000 a year out of Imperial taxation for the relief of local taxation, and I drew the inference from the right hon. Gentleman's speech that when he came into power—may the day be long distant—he would make it his first duty to take away the grants from the local bodies and apply them to the reduction of the Income Tax and the abolition of the duty on tea. I commend that programme of the Front Opposition Bench to the attention of the County Councils and other Local Bodies who now enjoy such great aid from the Imperial Exchequer. The third great work accomplished by the Chancellor of the Exchequer is the provision for the naval defence of the country. There have been many dissertations on the offence the right hon. Gentleman is supposed to have committed in hypothecating some of the resources of future years in order to provide for a loan by which to raise the necessary money to place the Navy of the country in a state of efficiency. If we accept the doctrine that it is necessary to raise the Navy of the country to a certain standard, I cannot conceive any object for which it is more fitting for the Ministry of the day to draw largely on the future resources of the country. Are not our own resources mortgaged to an enormous extent by the National Debt? What was the object of that drawing upon the resources of posterity? It was to secure the independence of this country and the liberty of Europe, and the money was well invested, for the expenditure has given us 80 years' peace and commercial supremacy. When the Navy has once been raised to a proper standard it is easy to maintain it at a moderate expense from year to year. I desire to say a few words about the finance of the present year. When I listened to the Chancellor of the Exchequer the other night I was struck with one thing, which has not been much noticed in the present Debate, and it is that the expenditure of the country is increasing at an alarming rate. I cannot sufficiently express the admiration I feel for the Chancellor of the Exchequer when he denounced with noble wrath the policy of buying in the cheapest market, and said the Government would purchase both their material and labour at a fair price. That is a great change to undertake in the policy of the country. I admit that the Chancellor of the Exchequer is yielding to a very strong and irresistible feeling on the part of the people that the Government ought to be a model employer, and ought not to buy its material and labour as cheaply as possible, but should take care to get the best article and pay labour at a fair price. The people are the masters; they pay the taxation, and they have a right to say how their money shall be employed; but the new policy has led to a considerable increase in the Estimate of the year. Increase in wages is being demanded in every branch of the Civil Service, and if the demand is granted there must be a very considerable increase of expenditure. If that is the case, I have some misgiving as to whether the splendid surpluses of the last few years will be continued in years to come. The revenue is not likely to increase in anything like the same proportion—in fact, the Chancellor of the Exchequer admitted the other night that we are now probably at the top of our prosperity. The surplus this year is very largely accidental, and I do not think it should be allowed to go forth to the country that the surpluses of the future will be sufficient to provide for the very excellent purposes which all have in view. If we are to carry out our policy it will be necessary for the country to prepare itself for some very great act of self-sacrifice in regard to the payment of fresh taxation in future years.

*(11.10.) MR. GOSCHEN: I am obliged to my hon. Friend who has just sat down for the manner in which he has spoken of my general finance. I am not sorry that the hon. Member has laid some stress on the tendency to increase expenditure; but I think he somewhat exaggerated that portion of my speech which dealt with the fact that the country had given us the cue not to buy in the cheapest market but the best. I trust that my hon. Friend will continue to pay some attention to the increase of expenses in all Departments of the State. The right hon. Member for Bradford (Mr. Shaw Lefevre) censured the Government for meeting the wants of the Military and Naval Departments while they are so economical with regard to the Treasury. The right hon. Gentleman would prefer that we should starve the Army and Navy in order to be extremely generous to the Post Office. He appears to attach more importance to a parcel being sent cheaply than to a war ship being built to defend our coasts. But, if the accounts are not so simple as before, a great and successful effort has been made to strengthen the Navy. I will not, however, say anything with regard to what the right hon. Gentleman calls complicated shifts and devices for meeting the Naval Expenditure. Before we lay down the seals of office we shall have paid off a considerable portion of the loans, and if we have produced some complexity in the accounts, which are certainly not so simple as formerly, our successors, whoever they may be, and whenever they may come into office, will find a stronger and a better Fleet than this country ever possessed before. I turn now to answer one or two of the minor points raised. I am glad to see that the hon. Member for Sunderland has returned to his place, and I must say I think it is a compliment to the Budget that amongst the many topics which might have been opened by the hon. Gentleman one of his chief attacks has been upon the decision of some of the local officials of the Inland Revenue Office at Sunderland. Still, I think the hon. Gentleman would have done better if he had not introduced such a very local topic into a discussion on the Budget.

MR. STOREY: The right hon. Gentleman forgets that I spoke to him on the point some weeks ago, and he failed to give me a satisfactory assurance.

*MR. GOSCHEN: I can only now say that further investigation will be made into this matter, and if there are any cases of hardship I shall be glad to look into them, as the Government desire to do justice in this matter. We have proved our desire to do that by sending down an Inspector. The hon. Member for the City of London has spoken of the colonial contributions. Now, I put it to the Committee that if our colonies are progressing in wealth, population, and every other attribute of prosperity, it is but fair that they should in some fixed proportion bear the increased cost of defence. I believe that that is a self-evident proposition. Fortunes are made in our colonies by firms which pay no Income Tax upon their profits, and seeing the advantages they derive from the protection of this country, it is only fair to the British taxpayer that the colonists should bear their fair share of the increased and increasing costs of defence. I do not wish to say one word which would bear hardly upon the colonies, but I think I have made out my case on that point. It has been suggested that a Statement of Accounts should be prepared and printed with the Budget, just as the Statements of the Army and Navy are printed. That is a matter worthy of consideration, but I may point out that all these Parliamentary Papers and Returns are not always read by the great public at large, and therefore it is the duty of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, in his annual statement, to introduce a very full explanation irrespective of the Returns, so that the public, which has not the same facilities of access to the printed Returns, may understand the position of affairs. Since I addressed the House last I have had an opportunity of looking into the figures suggested by the right hon. Gentlemen the Members for Derby and Wolverhampton. There is not a single figure in the Budget Statement by which I am not prepared to stand. I have refreshed my memory as to the exact method by which the £37,000,000 I have given with respect to the payment of Debt is made up. It is constituted of the amount paid inside of the permanent charge during five years, with the addition of the surpluses secured during that period. There is no doubt whatever on the subject. The amount within the permanent charge is £26,600,000 and the amount of the surpluses £10,900,000. These together make the £37,000,000. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby has not broken down a single figure given in the Budget statement. The figure with which the £37,000,000 was contrasted by me—the £24,000,000—was constituted of £27,550,000 paid off within the permanent charge by the Governments of the period, less a deficit of £3,000,000. These figures are absolutely correct, but it is true that if one very unfortunate year, in which large expenditure was incurred, had been left out, the contrast would not have been so great. Then with regard to the other point raised by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby, namely, that the present Government have only paid off £27,000,000 while I have claimed £30,000,000—I have claimed the larger sum as having been devoted from the taxes to the payment of Debt, because I added to the £26,800,000 actually paid an item of £2,000,000 paid in connection with the conversion expenses. This was money spent in the reduction of Debt as much as the rest of the £30,000,000. It is clear that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby has not had sufficient time to study the figures, but he ought not to have rejected so readily the figures given in the Budget statement.

*(11.27.) MR. H. H. FOWLER: I do not propose to resume the controversy at this moment, but I will ask for a continuation of the Return asked for by my right hon. Friend as soon as possible. I may at once admit, as far as my own figures are concerned, that the Chancellor of the Exchequer was not credited in the amount paid for the reduction of Debt with the £2,000,000 spent on the expenses of Conversion. But I still adhere to my statement that in the years 1881-85 the amount paid out of the taxes in the reduction of Debt was £34,000,000. If the right hon. Gentleman will give us the Return asked for, the House will be able to judge for itself.

*(11.29.) MR. MORTON: The right hon. Gentleman has not replied to my question as to the Income Tax Assessment.

*MR. GOSCHEN: I beg the hon. Member's pardon. I admit there is considerable force in the argument that the Income Tax should be paid on the net instead of the gross value. But this reform must be taken in hand with many other changes in the Income Tax, and though I am not so pessimistic as the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian, who thinks the re-construction of the Income Tax would take a century, still I agree that the reform would take a considerable time, and more time than the First Lord of the Treasury will be disposed to allow me this year.

*(11.30.) SIR E. J. REED (Cardiff): I must say I am unable fully to sympathise with the remarks made by my right hon. Friend near me with regard to the naval policy of the Government, for I believe that every day we derive great benefit in our relations with other States from the fact that we are a strong Naval Power. If I thought that the Naval Expenditure made no return to the country I should be one of the first to offer opposition to it. But believing, as I do, that there is no portion of our expense from which the country derives anything like so great a national benefit, I think it is a pity that this Expenditure on our naval power should be depreciated on so many occasions. I have thought it right to say that, although in saying it it must not be taken that I assent to the particular methods adopted by the Government to meet the Expenditure. I was rather surprised on this point at the speech of the hon. Member for Oldham. That hon. Member made a powerful speech on the Naval Defence Act when it was before the House.

MR. J. M. MACLEAN: It is quite true I did express some doubt as to the absolute necessity of the proposed addition, but the policy having once been accepted by the House, it resolved itself into a financial operation. The raising of the money by loan was perfectly legitimate. That constitutes quite another question.

*SIR E. J. REED: I noticed with some apprehension the ambitious criticism on the finances of the State from this side of the House to-night, but I do not think I need follow them up. I am sorry the Secretary to the Treasury is not in his place. I heard with surprise the attack of the Secretary to the Treasury on my right hon. Friend the Member for Central Bradford, who stated that the Postmaster General was unable, as a rule, to carry out improvements in the Postal Service because of the interference of the Treasury with the proposals. I listened with astonishment because I have always believed that if there is anything connected with public finance which is not only admitted but proclaimed, it is the doctrine that the Postmaster General is practically a subordinate of the Treasury and is controlled by that Department. He quoted words of the Postmaster General himself to the effect that the Post Office was never in a position to give effect to its promises without consulting the Treasury.

MR. JACKSON: My objection was that the charge was made without the smallest evidence in support of it.

*SIR E. J. REED: My right hon. Friend quoted from a Parliamentary Return the detail on which he rested his case. I think the Secretary to the Treasury mistook altogether the meaning of my right hon. Friend. On a recent occasion, when a Motion with reference to the Post Office was under discussion in this House, my right hon. Friend was good enough to tell me he could take no part in the Debate if it took the form, as it seemed likely to do, of instigating a claim for an increase of salary on the part of officers of the Department. Therefore, I do not think the Secretary to the Treasury was justified in the attitude he adopted towards my right hon. Friend. As to the general subject of discussion to-night, I do not think that the Chancellor of the Exchequer has a right to complain of any undue anxiety on this side of the House to have the national finance closely watched and carefully criticised. It seems to me of the utmost importance that the House should carefully watch such questions as contributions from Imperial Funds to local purposes in dealing with which endless confusion might arise, and especially the question of providing for the Public Service by means of loans falling on the future. It has been said that the extraordinary Naval Expenditure need not entail increased Naval Expenditure in the future. I am afraid, however, that the increased Naval Expenditure is being applied to purposes (I do not complain of them) which will necessarily entail increased Naval Expenditure in the future. In the first place, it is being applied to the production of ships of enormous size, and, judging from the experience of the past, those ships will entail the maintenance of an enormous crew and staff of officers. The increase of expenditure is being applied also to small vessels, which require separate officers and crews, and I believe it will be found that we must have a considerable increase in the number of officers with a view to the future constitution of the Fleet. The First Lord of the Treasury and the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who have both presided over the Admiralty, are aware how important it is to keep down the Naval Lieutenant's List, which otherwise will go to swell very much the cost of pensions. I can only say, in conclusion, that I sincerely hope—in the interest of national finance and the well being of the country—that the Government, while indulging in this large increase of Expenditure, will do everything it possibly can to secure a concurrent reduction of cost in the less important branches.

*(11.42.) MR. W. H. SMITH: I venture now to appeal to the Committee to give the Government the Resolutions. If further opportunity is required for discussing the finance of the year and the interesting topics raised by hon. Members opposite, it will be afforded on the Second Reading of the Bill. It is obvious that the taxes imposed by the Resolution ought not to be held in suspense.

(11.43.) MR. ILLINGWORTH (Bradford, W.): The hon. Member for Cardiff has very properly warned the Committee and the country that these spasmodic efforts to increase the strength of the Navy will involve an increased annual charge for its maintenance. I do not wish to condemn the proposals of the Government all round. The Chancellor of the Exchequer has turned round on himself, and acceded to the universal feeling on this side of the House in favour of free education, and I wish to discriminate, therefore, between the proposals of the Government. I confess that I have no confidence whatever in the idea that increased security has been given to this country by the increase of the Navy. What has been the result of this increase of our Navy? The result has been that every country in Europe is hurrying to follow in our track.

*SIR E. J. REED: I deny that Italy and Austria have followed our example.

MR. ILLINGWORTH: If they are not developing to the extent that our spasmodic increase would require, it is only because they have not the finances. But the disposition is there; and there is not a Minister of Marine in any Cabinet in Europe who does not urge the necessity of further development on his Parliament because of what has been done in this country. I protest against its being supposed that we are doing anything for the increased safety of the country by this increased Expenditure. Are we sure that the increase of the Navy is not coupled with an engagement on the part of the Government to defend Italy in certain contingencies? I think Her Majesty's Government would have been more usefully employed in setting on foot some system of arbitration; and I hope on another occasion to join with others in pressing on the Government to give ear to the appeals which come to us from America in this direction.

(11.50.) MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): I think it would be convenient that the Irish Members, before they agree to the proposal to hypothecate Irish resources, should know what proportion of the sum to be given to free education is to be applicable to Ireland, and also whether the Chancellor of the Exchequer will consider the suggestion to improve the salaries of the Irish National School teachers out of the sum so allocated. It would be convenient to the Irish Members to have some intimation of the intention of the right hon. Gentleman before we part with the clauses of the Land Purchase Bill, as the final form those clauses may take may to some extent depend on the Budget proposals. I would also ask the right hon. Gentleman that before he finally makes up his mind on these matters he should take care to inform himself as to the views of the Irish Members.

*(11.52.) MR. GOSCHEN: The hon. Member should remember that while it is my duty to find the money, it is not for me to consider its precise application. The question of the hon. Member should be addressed to the Chief Secretary for Ireland. On a former occasion I assured the hon. Member that considerable weight would be attached to his suggestion, and further than that assurance I could not go.

MR. SEXTON: What will be the probable amount allocated to Ireland?

*MR. GOSCHEN: If £1,000,000 is in question, probably £100,000 will be the amount; if £2,000,000, the probable amount will be £200,000. I cannot speak positively to a few thousands more or less. I think the figures would not be quite so large as I have stated.

(11.54.) COLONEL NOLAN (Galway, N.): I trust the right hon. Gentleman is not going to withdraw from the intimation he gave on the Budget night to the effect that a portion of the money will be disposed of in Ireland, in a similar way to that in England—that is to say, in relief of school fees. That would have a beneficial effect on the salaries of the teachers, though not so much in regard to class salaries.

*MR. GOSCHEN was understood to say that he would consider the point.

Question put, and agreed to.

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! The hon. Gentleman is not speaking to the Amendment.

DR. TANNER: I was endeavouring to lead up to the Amendment, Sir.

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! The hon. Member is trifling with the House.

DR. TANNER: The Amendment in question is, as far as I can read, in pages 1 and 2, to leave out Clause 2. I wanted to ask how it came to pass that on an important measure of this sort, when the House will recollect that the other evening we objected—

SAVINGS BANKS BILL.—(No. 88.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

*THE SECRETARY TO THE BOARD OF TRADE (Lord BALFOUR of BURLEIGH): My Lords, I need not detain your Lordships more than a very few minutes in moving the Second Reading of this Bill. Its object is to amend some of the provisions of the Act of 1863, which is the principal statute relating to trustee savings banks at the present time. The operation of that Act was the subject of a somewhat lengthened inquiry extending over two years by a Committee of the House of Commons. That inquiry was undertaken in consequence of the public mind being agitated by some serious failures of trustee savings banks that had taken place. Although this is an amending Bill, yet it does not amend the provisions of the Act of 1863 in any material point. Its main purpose is to provide means whereby the rules and regulations of the Act of 1863 can be efficiently carried out. I do not know that anyone finds serious fault with the provisions of the Act of 1863, and the conditions that are therein laid down for the management of savings banks. But it is obviously useless to lay down the most valuable provisions that can be devised if no authority is provided to see that those rules are carried out. Now, that is the case with regard to the Act of 1863. In it there are most valuable provisions and regulations laid down which everybody who cares for the prosperity of savings banks will, I think, admit to be in themselves salutary, but there is no power enacted to ensure that those provisions and regulations shall be properly carried out. The failures to which I have alluded of some of the savings banks arose, I may say, not from the insufficiency of the regulations, but because those regulations were disregarded. The leading provisions of the Bill provide for the appointment of a Committee—the Members of which are named in the Schedule—and that Committee is to draw up rules for the future guidance of trustee savings banks, and for the future guidance of a permanent Committee which is to be appointed to see that those rules and regulations are carried out. The drawing up of those rules and regulations may probably take some time, and require a certain amount of skilled knowledge. The names of the gentlemen mentioned in the Schedule will, I think, afford a sufficient guarantee that they will perform the work well. When the rules and regulations have been framed they are to be laid down before both Houses of Parliament, so that Parliament may have the opportunity of sanctioning or refusing to sanction them. If the rules and regulations laid down by the Committee are not properly carried out by the savings Banks, the National Debt Commissioners, with whom the money to be lodged in the savings banks is to be invested, and who are to pay interest upon it, may, if they think fit, close the accounts of the Trustees of any savings bank. The indirect, or rather the tolerably direct, effect of that would be that in those cases the savings banks could not be carried on. Another point in which the Act of 1863 is to be amended, and in this respect to be made a little more stringent, is this: At the present time it is the practice of some savings banks to publish lists of names of well-known individuals who act either as Trustees, or Chairmen, or Presidents, or in some way or other are connected, or supposed to be connected, with those savings banks, but whose office is purely honorary, who know little or nothing about the business of their banks, and pay little or no attention to it. That practice operates in this way: the depositors are lulled into a false security by the existence of those lists of names, but, as the owners of those names pay no attention to the business of the bank, they afford no real ground for the feeling of security and confidence which the publication of their names gives rise to. One of the provisions of this Bill is to the effect that if during a specified period no act is performed by the gentlemen whose names are so published they are to cease to hold office, and their names are to be no longer published in connection with the bank. One other point of sufficient importance for me to mention it to your Lordships is dealt with and altered in this Bill. At the present time neither in a trustee savings bank nor in the Post Office Savings Bank can the total amount deposited by anyone exceed £150, but interest may accumulate upon money so deposited up to £200, and no further. This provision has given rise to considerable confusion and difficulty. Supposing a depositor puts in £145, and his money then accumulates beyond £150, may he or may he not deposit the £5 necessary to make up his capital deposit to £150? That is one difficulty. Then a great deal of confusion and difficulty

have arisen in keeping accounts of savings banks in distinguishing whether the money lying in depositor's names above £150 has really been deposited as capital or accumulated as interest. Accordingly, the Bill proposes to sweep away the distinction between money which has been deposited as capital and money which has accumulated as interest, and to allow any depositor to have in his name as much as £200, whether it is deposited as capital or whether it has accumulated as interest, but no interest will be allowed on any deposit beyond the sum of £200. There is one provision which is not in the Bill, which, in pursuance of a pledge given in the other House of Parliament, the Government will propose to insert in the Bill during its passage through this House. At the present time no one may deposit in the Post Office Savings Bank more than £30 in any one year, and hardship has arisen under this provision. Supposing, when some emergency arises, the owner of a deposit withdraws a sum for use in that emergency; when the emergency is past he cannot re-deposit in the savings bank, if he has the money, more than the £30. Supposing he has withdrawn for some purpose £50 from his account, he cannot, until the expiration of the year which is then current and the commencement of the ensuing year, re-deposit the whole of his £50; he can only deposit £30 in one year, and must wait until the next year to re-deposit the balance. That operates in some cases as a distinct discouragement to thrift, and the problem to be solved is how to give permission to a depositor who has really only withdrawn his money for a temporary emergency to re-deposit such an amount as he may wish without at the same time giving rise to the belief that these savings bank accounts may be treated as ordinary current accounts from which money may be withdrawn, and into which money may again be deposited, as if it was an ordinary current account with a bank. The object of the Amendment which I shall propose at the proper time will be to endeavour to draw a distinction between those two cases. As this, and indeed almost all the provisions of the Bill, are so much more matters for consideration in Committee, being merely upon details, I propose to say no more in moving the Second Reading now, except that I propose to take the Committee stage in the House on an early day, and then to allow a reasonable time before putting down the Bill for consideration by the Standing Committee, so that the details of it may be fully considered by your Lordships. In these circumstances, I beg now to move the Second Reading of the Bill.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^a."
—(The Lord Balfour of Burleigh.)

LORD DENMAN: My Lords, it is clear from the statement of the noble Lord who has just spoken that this is a Money Bill, and that there are Amendments to be proposed which, of course, would not be accepted in another place. As a Trustee of a savings bank, I very much object to the whole of the powers of the Commissioners of the National Debt being transferred to a few individuals who are named in the Schedule to the Bill. The danger of the savings banks is that the interest allowed to them being rather below the Post Office rate of interest, gives the Post Office Savings Bank such an advantage that everybody is likely to go there and to desert the other savings bank. But your Lordships must reflect that in imposing all this additional trouble upon the Post Office it will be necessary to increase the staff of clerks, and the gratuitous services of managers, trustees, and others will be entirely disregarded. I think that this is a very dangerous Bill, and though I am generally in a minority, without a Teller, I hope I shall not be so on this occasion, and I beg to move that the Bill be read a second time this day 10 months.

Amendment moved, to leave out ("now,") and add at the end of the Motion ("this day ten months.")—(The Lord Denman.)

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY: My Lords, before asking the question which I desire to put, I should like to say that I am very glad to hear of the two important reforms in regard to savings banks which the noble Lord proposes in this Bill—that is to say, as to increasing the limit of deposits from £150 to £200, and as to giving powers for the purpose of allowing persons who may have withdrawn money for emergencies, or for merely temporary purposes, to replace it, notwithstanding the £30 annual limit. What I want to ask the noble Lord is whether the Government will either move or accept amendments for increasing the maximum amount of deposits which may be made in any one year? At present it is only £30 in this country, while in France and Belgium the amount is as much as £80 which may be placed in one year upon deposit. That is undoubtedly an encouragement to thrift. No doubt the limit of £30 has been fixed in the interest of the small banks; but as the Chancellor of the Exchequer has lately disregarded the licensed victuallers, I hope he will be able to disregard in this matter the clamour of the small banks.

On Question, whether ("now") shall stand part of the Motion, resolved in the affirmative: Bill read 2^a accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Tuesday next.

CAUSES BILL.—(No. 103.)
COMMITTEE.

Order for the House to be put into Committee, read.

LORD HERSCHELL: My Lords, before the House resolves itself into Committee, I should like to ask my noble and learned Friend who has charge of this Bill for an explanation of its object—that is to say, at whose instance the change proposed is to be made. I unfortunately omitted to observe the Bill yesterday in the Orders of the Day for Second Reading. I would remind your Lordships that some years ago, owing to the Report of the Royal Commission upon these matters, the trial of all causes, whether arising in the City or in the County of Middlesex, was transferred to the new Law Courts, and the sittings for the trial of causes which used to take place at Guildhall were abandoned. It was thought at that time to be to the public advantage that the trials of causes which used to take place in the City Courts, as well as those in the High Court, should all be conducted under one roof. I want, therefore, to ask my noble and learned Friend the Lord Chancellor at whose instance this proposed change is to be made? When I first saw that such a proposal was on foot, a proposal which

I may say, as far as I can learn, was never explained in the House of Commons—I believe that the measure passed through the other House without any explanation at all, and that it was passed through all its stages very rapidly—I addressed myself upon the matter to those who were likely to know, thinking that perhaps the solicitors practising in the City, and who are engaged largely in commercial cases, had applied to my noble and learned Friend to make such a change. Now, as far as I can learn, there is no keen desire at all on their part for this change, or any pressure for a return to the old system of trying these cases at the Guildhall. I do not know whether the proposal proceeds in any way from the Incorporated Law Society. So far as I am aware, it does not, nor from the mercantile community generally. Therefore, I desire to ask my noble and learned Friend, before the Bill goes further, who is it that desires this Bill should be passed; what representations have been made to him on the subject; and whether he has consulted such bodies and persons interested in the matter, as those to whom I have alluded; and, if so, what information he has received from them?

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: In answer to the questions put by the noble and learned Lord, I will explain that the necessity for the Bill arises from the fact that by an Order in Council it was arranged that no sittings of Judges of the High Court should be held in the City of London. My attention has been called by a great variety of persons to the diminution of City causes—that is to say, what are generally called commercial cases, and I have been told that one great objection to the present arrangement is the inconvenience it causes to business men in the City. It is stated that business men will not, if they can avoid it, go out of the City in business hours. I am not aware of any particular magic accompanying the trial of causes in the City of London, and it is rather the inconvenience which has been called to my attention that I have endeavoured to obviate and remedy. The noble and learned Lord acting with me and myself have agreed that, with that object, sittings in London should be tried as an experiment. Then our attention was called to the result of the Order in Council, that all trials should take place in the Royal Courts. One inconvenience is that when all the Judges are able to give full attention to their judicial work in the Royal Courts, there are not Courts enough for them, which naturally has extremely inconvenient results to suitors and parties concerned. Another great disadvantage at present is that it is difficult to ascertain precisely when causes will be heard; but if these trials were to take place in the City Courts proper, those who are engaged in commercial cases would know when they were coming on. I may say that I had a great variety of information given to me upon the matter, the details of which I am unable to give at this moment; but I came to the conclusion that at all events it was desirable to try, as an experiment, whether this would not remove the block of commercial causes, which is alleged now to be so great that people will not go to trial with their actions, and they do not like to go to arbitration. In the circumstances, I think it will be seen that the experiment is, at all events, a very desirable one to try, and it is in order to give the opportunity of trying the experiment that the introduction of the present Bill has become necessary.

House in Committee (according to order).

Clause 1.

LORD HERSCHELL: I must say I cannot regard the answer of my noble and learned Friend as in the slightest degree satisfactory. It seems that a certain number of unnamed persons, in whose views my noble and learned Friend professes absolute confidence—

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: Not absolute.

LORD HERSCHELL: Well, I omit "absolute," and I will say that it seems a number of persons, in whom my noble and learned Friend, for the purposes of this Bill, places confidence, have told him that they consider that City causes will become more numerous, and the disposal or administration of them more popular, if this change is made. Now, surely the persons who are best able to judge in such a question as that are the solicitors who are chiefly engaged in these commercial causes. They know best whether the reason which the noble and learned Lord has given for the diminution in the number of these causes is really that which he suggests, namely, the inconvenience of the present place of trial. I am informed by those who are as competent to advise on the matter as any of the persons who, I suppose, have been giving information upon it to my noble and learned Friend can be, that that is not really the cause of the diminution of City cases, that the reason for it has nothing whatever to do with the place of trial, and that to transfer them to the City for trial is not likely to add to their number, while it has still more obvious disadvantages. I should have thought that upon such a question as this the noble and learned Lord would have considered it right to consult the Incorporated Law Society, or those members of that body who are more especially conversant with such a subject as this. One would like to know, too, whether he had made any inquiries, or had received the views of the Bar upon the subject. I do not, of course, for a moment suggest that the views of either of those bodies, as representing the legal profession, should be taken as conclusive in such matters affecting the public interest generally—I hope they never will be—where any question with regard to the conduct of litigation is concerned; but I would submit to your Lordships that if a change of this kind is to be made without an opportunity being afforded of ascertaining what their views are, the House will be legislating in the dark, especially when we are not even told who those persons are whose authority has been quoted, but whose names, whose means of knowledge, whose situation and calling in life are absolutely undisclosed to us, although they seem to have convinced the mind of my noble and learned Friend.

THE PRIME MINISTER AND SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (The Marquess of SALISBURY): My Lords, the observations of the noble and learned Lord open up rather a wide vista of new constitutional practice. This Bill comes from the House of Commons. In the House of Commons there sit two Members for the City of London. I presume they know something of what their constituents desire. In the House of Commons there sit a considerable number of solicitors, who are probably at least as able as other members of their profession, and I presume it may be taken that they would have found out any objections to the measure if they had existed, but the solicitors were silent. The Attorney General sits there as head of the Bar; and if the Bar were strongly averse to this measure, probably he would have had something to say to it. But the Bill has passed through the House of Commons with absolute unanimity. I must say the noble and learned Lord who has just spoken is calling for a large amount of that faith which we are, I am sure, always desirous of putting in him when he asks us upon his own authority simply to dispel this cloud of witnesses by whom the Lord Chancellor has considered himself justified in being persuaded, having also, I believe, consulted the heads of the law, and having, as I have said, satisfied himself with the authority of persons whose evidence he believed. The noble and learned Lord seems to have consulted nobody; and not having fortified himself with the authority of anybody, asks the House now, upon the ground that he has not had the opportunity of doing anything to refute the testimony of all those persons whom I have enumerated, not to accept this measure. Last night we were a good deal blamed because we had not, before introducing a Bill into this House, laid it before another Assembly; but the doctrine is going further, and apparently we must not introduce Bills into this House until we have laid them before the Incorporated Law Society in order to obtain its

LORD HERSCHELL: I protest against the noble Marquess putting into my mouth words which I have never used. The noble Marquess says I have proposed a new principle of constitutional practice; but it is a new principle to me that, because a Bill has passed the House of Commons without discussion, your Lordships should pass it without a sufficient explanation from the noble and learned Lord who has introduced it into your Lordships' House. My noble and learned Friend has, I submit, introduced it without giving the reasons upon which it is founded, and without showing that it is a measure which is called for, and is likely to work well. That was what I asked for, and what I think one has a right to ask for in this House; because one knows this perfectly well, that frequently at the present time measures which are of a character not gravely controversial pass through the other House without any discussion whatever. Owing to new Regulations which have been made, measures of this description are not discussed—there is no opportunity of discussing them, and they pass through without discussion. I think it not unreasonable, therefore, that when those measures come before your Lordships' House it should not be taken for granted that there is nothing to be said on the subject. Very often it happens that the only information which the public obtains that such a measure is in progress is when it comes before your Lordships' House, and then it is sometimes seen to be open to grave objection, even by Members of the other House, who may have allowed it to pass, when it comes to be considered here. Therefore, I cannot assent to the proposition of the noble Marquess, that when a Bill passes through the other House without discussion, we ought not to discuss it here. The fact that it has so passed is a reason why one should hesitate much before asking your Lordships to reject it; but it does not prevent one asking for a statement of the reasons for the measure, which I must confess in this case do not appear to me to be overwhelming.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: My Lords, I do not think we need discuss this Bill at greater length. The noble and learned Lord has, I think, exaggerated the nature and effect of the Bill. It is a very little one, consisting only of two clauses in a few lines, and is, as I have explained, simply for the purpose of enabling these causes to be tried in the City of London; which, I may say, had, until the recent change, always been done in my experience. It enacts that sittings may be held in the City of London by Judges of the High Court under commission issued for the trial of issues or inquiries in cases at Nisi Prius. It is desired that this experiment should be made, and, after all, the responsibility of asking for power to try the experiment must be upon the Minister who introduces the Bill. I do not deny that my noble and learned Friend is entitled to ask for explanations, and I have given him such information as I thought right, without giving the names of people who would not be at all desirous to have a discussion raised about them as to whether they were fit or competent persons upon whose information to act. If the experiment is not found to be successful, I do not think there would be any desire on the part of Her Majesty's Government, or anybody else, that it should be continued. But I think, my Lords, it is desirable that it should be tried.

PRIVATE BUSINESS.

NORTH BRITISH RAILWAY
(WAVERLEY STATION, &c.) BILL
[LORDS].—(by Order.)

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
"That the Bill be now read a second time."

(2.15.) DR. CLARK (Caithness): I beg to move as an Amendment that the Bill be read a second time on this day six months. I oppose the Bill on two grounds—first, because I think the North British Railway Company can get all they want better and cheaper in another manner; and, secondly, because they propose to take away a portion of the Princes Street Gardens in Edinburgh, and to make the line in that particular locality more odious than it is at present. I think that the company ought not to be permitted to take any further portion of the gardens so long as there is plenty of other land belonging to private individuals in the immediate neighbourhood to which they may go for the extension of their line. Edinburgh occupies a singular position, and in opposing the Bill I am animated not only by a sentimental feeling against the destruction of one of the prettiest streets in Europe, and probably in the world, but by a firm opinion that the passing of the Bill will have a very detrimental effect upon the City of Edinburgh itself. Lord Moncreiff, who was long a Member of this House, and is now a Judge upon the Scottish Bench, in a speech delivered in 1875, said—

"The City of Edinburgh, of which we are all so proud, and of which Scotland and Britain has good reason to be proud, if it has not the wealth, nor the manufactories, nor the commerce, that are the boast and glory of other cities in this country, has at least one quality in which it stands unrivalled. That is its wonderful beauty—its natural beauty, from the position in which it stands, and the many objects of interest by which it is surrounded. I can only say for myself, that although I have not been a great traveller in my day, I have seen something of other lands and cities, but I have never anywhere seen anything equal to the beauty of 'mine own romantic town.' That is not mere sentiment. The truth is, the beauty of Edinburgh is one of its most important material advantages. It attracts strangers; it delights our eyes every day that we walk its streets, and anything which destroys or mars it, is not only a sentimental, but a practical evil or grievance."

This Bill will do much to destroy the beauty of Princes Street, and if we give the Railway Company these powers they will ask for more, until the whole of Princes Street Gardens will be in their hands, and will become nothing but a big railway station. Lord Cockburn expressed similar views to those of Lord Moncreiff as to the ruin which the encroachments of the Railway Company may inflict upon the amenities of Edinburgh. He said—

"A scheme is now afloat, which, if carried into effect, will very greatly injure the west half of the North Loch, and worse than ruin the east half. It is proposed to bring the Glasgow Railway along the whole valley, tunnelling under the Mound, and joining other railways under the North Bridge. The result will, in time, practically be, that the whole of that beautiful ground will be given up to railways, with their yards, depôts, counting houses, and other abominations, at least on the east side, which will ruin the peculiarity of the valley between the old and new towns, and by rendering the preservation of the open space less important, will possibly lead to building on the south side of Princes Street. Could a Judge agitate, I should raise the very stones against this project."

There is a danger of the words of Lord Cockburn coming true, that the company will, bit by bit, get the whole of the Princes Street Gardens into their hands, unless some determined effort is made to stop the encroachments. Section 12 of the Act of 1884 prohibits the use of the East Princes Street ground as a depôt for materials of any kind or for unloaded waggons not in use on the railway; but that section is not observed, and the line is constantly crowded with unloaded carriages and waggons. Bit by bit, as Lord Cockburn predicted, the beauty of the gardens is being destroyed. I believe that there is plenty of room at the present moment for the traffic or for any extension that may be required in the next 20 years, if the whole of the station were used for the accommodation of passengers. I am told that the company are, even at this moment, fencing some of the land to the east, and that shops are being built upon it and let. It would thus seem that they are selling land for their own purposes, and are, nevertheless, seeking to encroach upon the public land. Statistics have been drawn up by the opponents of the Bill, comparing the Waverley Station with the great stations in London, and they show that the Company have 12,000 feet of space for passenger platform accommodation in connection with 455 trains in and out daily; whereas at King's Cross Station there are 3,550 feet for the accommodation of 664 trains; Charing Cross 2,350 feet for 413 trains; Cannon Street 4,475 feet for 468 trains; and at London Bridge 4,100 for 496 trains. This demand for an extension of the station has arisen since the opening of the Forth Bridge; but a shrewd man—Mr. Mortimer—wrote a letter to the Times in August, pointing out that the mismanagement of the traffic which occurred last year had some connection with the promotion of the present Bill, than private land. To the east of this station there is land which is an eyesore to the city. It is occupied by gas works and manufactories of that kind, but it would suit the purposes of the company just as well as the land they propose to take, except for the fact that they would have to pay more dearly for it. Therefore, they propose to take a large slice of this beautiful land in the centre of Edinburgh. If the Bill goes to a Committee I hope that the Committee will scrutinise its provisions very narrowly, and take care not to sacrifice the principle that a Railway Company should be required to take private land in preference to public land.

Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed.

CHITTAGONG-ASSAM RAILWAY.

MR. MACLEAN (Oldham): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India what steps are being taken to construct the railway from Chittagong along the North-Eastern frontier of India to Assam, which would facilitate the transfer of troops and stores to Manipur; when it is probable that the works of this railway will be commenced; and how long it will take to complete them?

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Sir J. FERGUSSON, Manchester, N.E.): In the absence of my right hon. Friend, I will answer the question. A concession has been granted to the promoters of a company for making the line in question; but its commencement and time of completion depend upon the ability of the company to raise the capital. Their concession lasts till November next.

SIR G. CAMPBELL (Kirkcaldy, &c.): Has any guarantee been given?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: I am not sufficiently aware of the facts to be able to answer the question.

THE ARGENTINE REPUBLIC.

ADMIRAL FIELD (Sussex, Eastbourne): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether his attention has been called to the report in the Standard of 18th April, stated Sir G. Campbell to have been telegraphed from Ottawa, as under:—

"The sealing schooner Maud, just arrived in British Columbia, reports having called at Good Success Bay, near Cape Horn, on voyage from Halifax, and there discovered a number of shipwrecked British sailors, who had been impressed by the Government of the Argentine Republic into service at a life-saving station; they had tried to escape, but were closely watched and were subjected to cruel treatment; they wanted their case reported at Home."

And whether he will cause inquiry to be made into the truth of said report; and, if confirmed, will application be made to the Admiralty for a ship of war to be sent from the South American Station to ascertain the facts and rescue the men?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: No further information has been received; but the Governor General of Canada, who has been communicated with by telegraph, is endeavouring to obtain particulars. Her Majesty's Minister at Buenos Ayres has been instructed by telegraph to mention the report to the Argentine Government, and request them to make immediate inquiry, and should the report prove true to liberate the men. Arrangements are also being made for one of Her Majesty's vessels to visit the spot at an early date.

REFORMATORY AND INDUSTRIAL SCHOOL SHIPS.

ADMIRAL FIELD: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he will cause a Circular to be addressed to the various Petty Sessional Benches, as proposed and promised in the discussion on 23rd March, on reformatory and industrial school ships, requesting Magistrates not to commit any children under 12 years of age to such ships?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. STUART WORTLEY, Sheffield, Hallam): No Circular has as yet been issued. I am considering whether the same object cannot be secured in some more direct way. I will communicate with my hon. and gallant Friend in due course the nature of the steps taken.

GOVERNORSHIP OF EASTERN ROUMELIA.

MR. LEGH (Lancashire, S.W., Newton): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs if any agreement has been arrived at with reference to the Governorship of Eastern Roumelia?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: So far as Her Majesty's Government are aware, no Power has raised any question as to Prince Ferdinand's continuance in the Governorship of Eastern Roumelia.

FRANCE AND NEWFOUNDLAND.

MR. STAVELEY HILL (Staffordshire, Kingswinford): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether the Correspondence in the Foreign Office discloses any claims made by the French Government upon the British Government with reference to establishments or settlements upon the Western Coast of Newfoundland between the years 1783 and 1834; and if there should be any such Correspondence, if he will lay the same upon the Table of the House?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: As a matter of fact, there are not to be found in the Foreign Office Correspondence any claims made by the French Government with regard to establishments or settlements on the western coast between the years 1783 and 1834, but there are records of such claims in the Colonial Office Correspondence made by the French Naval Commandant to the Governor in 1784. There is Foreign Office Correspondence in 1789 as to the exclusive right of fishery, and in 1831. With regard to presenting them to Parliament, it is not thought desirable to make a preliminary and partial publication of Papers which it will probably be necessary shortly to lay before the arbitrators.

CIVIL SERVICE WRITERS.

MR. KELLY (Camberwell, N.) postponed until Thursday a question—To ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether he will take into consideration the desirability of promoting some of those Civil Service writers who were recommended for promotion under the Treasury Minute of December, 1886, and could not be promoted, to a permanent junior class in such an office as the Education Department, where, owing to the great increase of work, the present staff must necessarily be shortly augmented?

STATE OF THE COMMITTEE ROOMS.

VISCOUNT CRANBORNE (Lancashire, N.E., Darwen): I beg to ask the First Commissioner of Works whether it is possible to prevent the objectionable draught, owing to badly-fitting windows, which the Members of the Standing Committee on Trade have to endure in the room where that Committee meets?

MR. H. T. KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN (Kent, Faversham) also asked a question on the same subject in reference to the accommodation and comfort of the representatives of the Press.

THE FIRST COMMISSIONER OF WORKS (MR. PLUNKET, Dublin University): The windows of the room mentioned in the question have been seen to, and I hope that no further inconvenience in that way will be felt. My attention has not been called to the matter referred to by the hon. Member for Faversham (Mr. H. Knatchbull-Hugessen), but I will make inquiry.

THE RAILWAY COMMISSION.

MR. KING (Hull, Central) postponed until Thursday a question—To ask the President of the Board of Trade whether his attention has been called to a meeting, on 10th April, 1891, of the Parliamentary Committee of the Railway Companies' Association, at which it was decided to represent to the Board of Trade the importance of selecting for the office of Railway Commissioner, in the place of the late Mr. W. P. Price, a gentleman in whom the Railway Companies would have confidence, and to the further Resolution that a Sub-Committee, to consist of Lord Stalbridge, Viscount Cobham, the Honourable R. H. Dutton, and Lord Colville, with the general managers present at the meeting, should be appointed to select and submit to the President of the Board of Trade for his consideration the names of such gentlemen as they considered qualified for the position; and whether, in making his appointment, he will take care, in the interests of the trading community, that no nominee of the big Railway Companies be appointed?

RURAL POSTMEN.

MR. ATHERLEY-JONES (Durham, N.W.): I beg to ask the Postmaster General is there a rule now operative permitting rural postmen and postmen in country towns to have occasional holidays on condition of providing and paying for an efficient substitute; and, if so, what steps have been taken to let postmasters and others controlling the men know of the rule, and what amount of such holiday is in ordinary cases considered fair and proper?

*THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. RAIBES, Cambridge University): There is no rule to the effect suggested by the hon. Member. Country postmen, both town and rural, have a prescribed number of holidays in the course of the year, and no others are recognised. If on any other day a postman is relieved from duty on his providing an efficient substitute, this is an indulgence which he owes to the local postmaster, who is vested with a discretion to grant such relief on good cause shown. I am happy to say that I have during the last year or two made provision for substitutes on alternate Sundays on a great many of the rural walks. This is, however, not an occasional, but a regular service.

CYPRUS.

MR. A. O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.): I had intended to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether Her Majesty's Government intend to adopt the measures recommended, after careful experiments, by the Commissioner of Paphos, for the improvement of sericulture in Cyprus; and whether, having regard to the poverty of the peasants, and to the languishing condition of that industry (which in prosperous times afforded remunerative employment for female labour throughout Cyprus), the Secretary of State will recommend that a grant be voted from the Consolidated Fund to be expended under the orders of the High Commissioner of Cyprus for the improvement of the cultivation of silk in that island? At the request of the right hon. Gentleman, I beg to postpone the question until Thursday.

TELEGRAPHIC COMMUNICATION IN SELKIRKSHIRE.

MR. THORBURN (Peebles and Selkirk) postponed until Thursday a question—To ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether the Government have come to any decision in response to the urgent desire expressed by all classes of the community in Selkirkshire for increased telegraphic communication in that county; whether he is aware that there is at present only a few miles within the confines of the county which enjoys telegraphic communication; whether he is aware that in many parts of the county it is necessary, in cases of illness, to send distances ranging from 10 to 20 miles, and in some cases greater distances, for a doctor; and whether, looking to what Government is doing for the Highlands and Islands in Scotland in the way of telegraphic facilities, the Treasury will consider favourably the claims of Selkirkshire to increased telegraphic communication?

ARMY NON-COMMISSIONED OFFICERS AND THE CIVIL SERVICE.

SIR H. HAVELOCK-ALLAN (Durham, S.E.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he is aware that in several cases lately deserving and meritorious discharged non-commissioned Officers of the Army have been rejected for small posts in the Civil Service (for which they were otherwise thoroughly qualified) for being over 40 years of age; whether he is aware that an old soldier, to have served his full time of 21 years, and to be discharged as a non-commissioned officer of high character, must almost necessarily be more than 40 years old; and whether, with a view to the important bearing of this matter on the recruiting of the Army, he will take into consideration the advisability of making a considerable relaxation of the age clause, say to 45, or even to 48 years, in the case of meritorious non-commissioned officers who have spent their whole life in the service of their country?

*THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster): I quite sympathise with the object the hon. and gallant Member has in view; and so far as the Departments under the immediate control of the Treasury are concerned, I shall suggest that the rules as to age for minor posts for which Army and Navy pensioners would be suitable candidates should follow the same lines as the rules governing open competition, which are to the effect that candidates may deduct from their age any years passed in Her Majesty's Service. This relaxation will more than meet what is now asked, but I must

PURCHASE OF LAND AND CONGESTED DISTRICTS (IRELAND) BILL.—(No. 111.)
COMMITTEE.

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 3.

(3.5.) Mr. SEXTON (Belfast, W.) moved the omission of the 1st subsection, which names grants—

"For rates and contributions in lieu of rates on Government property in Ireland" as part of the contingent portion of the fund. The hon. Member said: I ask upon what principle this and other grants have been selected to bear the brunt of the guarantee? They are called "local grants," but it would have been more correct to call them Imperial grants in aid of local expenses, seeing that they apply in a large porportion to Admiralty buildings, barracks, and so forth. There is a considerable area of choice, and the Government ought not in the first instance to take the money which they owe to the rating authorities. The Government have seized the money designed to prevent the spread of disease among human beings, but they have left free that which is given to prevent the spread of disease among cattle. The Bill takes all the money for National Schools in Ireland, but this money is not a "local grant" in Ireland. In Ireland primary education is not a subject of local taxation; it has never been a charge upon local funds; therefore the grant for education is not a grant in aid, and on that account it ought to be struck out. The best thing to do is to strike out all these "grants," and to substitute the charge for the Irish Constabulary, or perhaps one-half or two thirds of it, which would be enough.

Amendment proposed, to leave out lines 13 and 14.—(Mr. Sexton).

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the clause."

(3.10.) THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): I have listened to the remarks of the hon. Member with surprise and disappointment, because on Friday the hon. Member made a lengthened statement as to Amendments which he desired to introduce respecting these guarantees. After discussion, it was stated that the Government would make certain concessions, with which the hon. Member expressed himself satisfied. It was, therefore, anticipated that, so far as the hon. Member and his friends are concerned, this clause might pass almost sub silentio. Now, however, the hon. Member has made distinctly different proposals, and he asks the Government to remodel the Bill in respect of these Guarantee Funds. If attempts to meet the views of hon. Members are to be responded to in this way, there is little inducement for the Government to endeavour to get through the Bill in harmony with hon. Members opposite below the Gangway. The most important suggestion made on Friday was that the grant for pauper lunatics should be struck out, and that has been conceded; but now the hon. Member proposes to strike out the grants for education and Industrial Schools, and to substitute the grant in aid of the Constabulary. That may be a good proposal or a bad one, but it is entirely different from that made on Friday. In selecting these grants I purposely and deliberately omitted everything connected with law and justice. It appears to me that these are necessarily and essentially part of the work of the Central Government, but the objects selected have never been so considered either in this country or in Ireland. The Central Government have come to the aid of the locality, and sometimes largely, but it has always been considered a matter for the localities themselves in the first instance to deal with such questions as education, pauper lunatics, and poor relief. The hon. Member says that the whole cost of national education is borne by the State, and it has never been regarded as a local charge.

MR. SEXTON: I said that it is not a subject of local taxation.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I admit that it is not, but I do not admit that it is primarily and essentially the duty of the Central Government, as distinct from the locality, nor has it ever been so regarded in Ireland. The authorities who set the system in operation are the School Managers, and the Central Government comes in to relieve them from the burden of the cost. I cannot hold out the slightest hope or expectation that the Government will depart from the line they have taken in the Bill, and the idea of substituting the grants for the Magistrates and the Constabulary for those named in the clause is one that I cannot entertain.

MR. SEXTON: The expenditure of the National Education Board is strictly Imperial expenditure, because the system of education maintained in Ireland is one the people do not accept. The right hon. Gentleman's argument does not show that the adoption of my suggestion with regard to the Constabulary grant would cause either interruption or danger to the Public Service.

(3.20.) MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): I wish to point out that by the 2nd Schedule, Dublin, Cork, Belfast, Limerick, and Londonderry are excluded from the operation of the Bill, but it is to those very cities that the largest proportion of the Government grant is given in relief of rates. The Government contribution, as it at present exists, is a swindle on the ratepayers. If Dublin Castle and such places paid rates, as they ought to, the ratepayers would get 20s. where now they only get 14s. Now the Government propose a second swindle on the ratepayers by depriving them of the grant, which is itself insufficient.

(3.25.) THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. MADDEN, Dublin University): I must remind the hon. Gentleman that Clause 8, Sub-clause 3, provides that—

"Nothing in this Act shall apply to a county of a city mentioned in the 2nd Schedule to this Act, except that it shall be entitled to the same share in the Exchequer contribution and the Irish Probate Duty grant as if the Act applied."

That very comprehensive expression excludes the operation of the clause to which the hon. and learned Gentleman refers.

(3.27.) MR. T. M. HEALY: There are two points. First, assuming the Government to be right in the interpretation they put on Clause 8, Sub-clause 3, it is not fair that, having made a composition with the ratepayers which is a "bankruptcy" composition, they should further hypothecate that composition, such as it is. The first was an act of scoundrelism, and the second is an act of meanness. Take the case of Kilkenny, where there are barracks for Cavalry and Infantry. Those barracks ought to contribute 20s. in the £1 to the local rates, but you have only paid 15s. in the £1. Having done that, you now turn round and take away your own bankruptcy contribution. The proposal to capture the contribution in aid of rates is neither honesty nor good government. The second point is that if the towns named in the Schedule ought to be excluded from the operation of the Bill on the ground that they do not share in the benefits under it, many other large towns in Ireland ought also to be excluded. The Corporation of Dublin will be hit under the Bill as it stands, and there is no remedy in a Court of Law. I submit that there is a strong case on behalf of the Irish taxpayer for the omission of this sub-section.

MR. SEXTON: Nothing would be easier than to insert words to say that the share of these cities in the local grant shall be preserved.

(3.30.) MR. A. J. BALFOUR: With regard to the last suggestion, my right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General for Ireland will see whether it will be expedient to insert words to this effect later on in the Bill; but we are certainly of opinion that the Bill as it stands meets the case. I would point out that when the Government gave up the right of not paying rates on their property it was considered as an immense boon, and was given and accepted as such. Then comes the question whether such rates should be taken or not for the purposes of this Bill. It is said that the sum is small; but it amounts to £30,000, which capitalised means something like £800,000 or £1,000,000, and I cannot consent to withdraw such a large capital sum as £800,000 from the Bill. It has been stated that these cities have no interest in land purchase. The Government had to draw the line somewhere, and they have drawn it at the five big cities, whose interest in land purchase is relatively remote. But on the other hand, to say that any ordinary county town throughout Ireland is not dependent upon the condition of the agrarian question is to ignore the whole conditions of Irish life. The one industry of Ireland, outside the five great cities, is agriculture; the smaller towns will share in the benefits arising from any great reform in the agricultural question, and therefore, in the opinion of the Government, they ought to pay some share of a possible burden. I hope the hon. and learned Member will not press his Amendment.

(3.40.) MR. T. M. HEALY: May I ask why the Chief Secretary should not pay rates for his lodge in Dublin, just the same as I pay rates for my residence in the same city? The right hon. Gentleman contracts himself out of the obligation by an Act of Parliament.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. and learned Gentleman is altogether wrong as to the facts. He is also speaking irrelevantly.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I did not know, Mr. Chairman, that you would supply us with debateable matter; but I accept your ruling. The Government are now proposing to take advantage of their own wrong. Having already made a mean contribution to local rates, which they describe as a boon, they now propose to capture it. I am not aware that any barracks or police station in England is exempt from local rates. To first of all relieve yourselves by Act of Parliament from the ordinary burdens of other people, and then to describe your conduct in only paying one-half or three-fourths of the rates as a boon, and finally to turn round and capture the whole, is really pushing things to an extreme. It is most unfair, and I know of no instance in which the unfairness is more exemplified than in this sub-section. Of all the proposed inclusions in the Bill it is the one which we may most fairly ask the Government to abandon. It is most unfair that persons living in towns, who can get no benefit from land purchase, should have to contribute towards the default of others; and great soreness will be caused in Ireland.

(3.45.) MR. SEXTON: I shall test the question of the propriety of this sub-section by taking a Division.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 163; Noes 106.—(Div. List No. 155.)

Amendment proposed, in page 3, line 16, to leave out Sub-section (ii.)—(The Attorney General for Ireland.)

Question proposed, "That Sub-section (ii.) stand part of the Clause."

MR. A. O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.): It is exceedingly difficult for any private Member to ascertain how the Bill will work in regard to any particular county. As the Bill is to be worked by counties I presume that the Government, before drafting it, marked out how it would affect the different counties. I think it is necessary that we should have that information, and I would therefore ask the Chief Secretary if he will lay on the Table a Return showing how any particular county is affected; taking for instance an almost purely agricultural county, such as Queen's County, or King's County, showing the estimated advance, and the mode in which the Government anticipate that the payments will work out, so that we may judge what is the particular amount of risk involved to any of the funds it is proposed to hypothecate? Without that information we are altogether in the dark.

(3.59.) MR. T. M. HEALY: What will the effect be in regard to Dundrum Lunatic Asylum? It is put outside the City of Dublin, and you have declared that the City of Dublin is not to be included in the Bill. There is to be a kind of in and out running in regard to these local contributions. I have to ask the Government have they considered this question of the Dundrum Asylum, and the lunatic asylums outside nearly all the other leading cities of Ireland?

MR. MADDEN: The sub-section leaves the point perfectly clear.

MR. A. O'CONNOR: The right hon. Gentleman has not answered the question I put to him.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Return which we last produced, and which lies upon the Table, gives a general outline of our scheme.

MR. A. O'CONNOR: This is only a link in the chain. My position is this, that it is perfectly impossible for a private Member, however carefully and patiently he may go through the statements, to realise how the scheme is likely to operate with regard to any particular amount. The Government is aware how much money is expended under different Services, which are classed under the total "local grants." What I suggest to the right hon. Gentleman is that he should select any county which would suit him, and he could then show the amount available for land purchase, the rate of repayment within the county, the amount available for securities, marshalled in different classes of securities, in order of priority, so that we may be able properly to see what is the amount of risk attaching to each class of security.

(4.10.) MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I do not see how any information is to be given other than that already in the possession of the House. There is the Return dated the 17th April last year. That shows in every county in Ireland the amount of Exchequer contributions, the Imperial grants for local purposes, the amount available for land purchase, and so forth. I find the total amount of the cash portion of the Guarantee Fund last year was £248,950. The contingent portion of the Guarantee Fund was £584,509, and the capitalised total amount available for the County of Donegal at that time was £833,459. That is the information which the hon. Gentleman has already before him. He asks us to give further information. I have no means of knowing what the course will be in each county, and unless one makes an arbitrary hypothesis of the essential factors, it is impossible to lay on the Table of the House a Return showing the operation of the Act.

MR. A. O'CONNOR: What I propose is that the right hon. Gentleman should take a county in a congested district—not like the County of Dublin, but an agricultural county like Kilkenny, Kildare, Queen's County, or Tyrone, and show us not only the amount which is to be available for land purchase, but the repayment and so forth. I believe the right hon. Gentleman could not have projected a scheme like this without having made calculations with regard to some specimen county. If the Government have not made such calculations, then they are taking a leap in the dark.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Take King's County. The amount available for land purchase there is £424,175 capital value. The hon. Gentleman asks how much will be taken for land purchase, and what are all the varied circumstances upon which an investigation could be made. I can assure him if I could foresee the future I would lay the Return on the Table, but with the limited means at my disposal, I do not see how I am to make the Return.

(4.20.) MR. SEXTON: I move to insert, in Sub-section 5, the words "model schools." The model schools are quite as local as national schools, the only difference being that the former are much more costly and a great deal less useful.

Amendment proposed, in page 3, line 28, after the word "headed," to insert the words "model schools and."—(Mr. Sexton.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. MACARTNEY (Antrim, N.) I hope my right hon. Friend will not agree to the Amendment, which would throw a peculiar burden on Ulster, where there are a number of model schools. I find that out of the 25 model schools in Ireland, 14 are situated in Ulster. It is perfectly evident that the religious denominations outside the Roman Catholics attending the model schools, would have to bear more than two-thirds of their share of the burden.

MR. KNOX (Cavan, W.): I hope the argument of the hon. Member for North Antrim will not cloud the eyes of the Committee. This Amendment does no injustice to Ulster, our only object being to get for Ulster a larger amount for land purchase. I think the amount available under the Bill for Ulster is not as large as we would like to see it.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.): The hon. Member is not pledging the payment to teachers of model schools, he is pledging those salaries for the purposes of land purchase, and I should be very glad to see an increase of the amount available in Ulster, where there will be no default.

MR. FLYNN (Cork, N.): I object to the argument being confined to Ulster, and these invidious distinctions should be dropped by Members on both sides of the House. The hon. Member has said there will be no default in Ulster. I presume there will be no default in other parts of Ireland, unless the rate of purchase is too high.

(4.24.) MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Amendment can only possibly affect those counties in which there are model schools, and therefore the part of Ireland which would be most affected would be Ulster. It is perfectly true that the model schools are specially used by the Presbyterians in the North of Ireland; but if these schools did not exist education for the children would have to be found in other schools. Further than that, I believe that in the accounts of the National Board of Education modern schools are included under the head "national schools."

MR. SEXTON: I think if the right hon. Gentleman will refer to the Estimates he will find model and national schools under separate heads.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I was referring to the accounts of the National Board of Education. Although by a slip in the draft Bill model schools are not included in this sub-section, I believe they must be treated as if they were included. On the whole, I do not think it would be fair to the North of Ireland to exclude from the contingent portion of the Guarantee Fund so important a part as that which was devoted to the support of the model schools. Putting it at the most modest estimate, the grant for these schools is about £20,000 a year.

MR. SEXTON: £30,000.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: That figure includes other schools. The actual sum for district model schools is £19,239, and no doubt there are one or two other items to be added. That will free exactly £500,000; and it would be very hard on the province of Ulster that it should not be allowed the advantage of this £500,000 of grant.

(4.27.) MR. T. M. HEALY: I think this argument shows the necessity for some power of appeal from the decisions of the Lord Lieutenant, say, to the Privy Council.

Question put, and negatived.

Amendment proposed, in page 3, line 24, after "1878" to insert—" (v.) in aid of the cost of maintenance of pauper lunatics in district asylums in Ireland."—(The Attorney General for Ireland.)

Agreed to.

(4.31.) MR. S. KEAY (Elgin and Nairn): The object of the next Amendment which stands in my name is to prevent either the present or any future Government from enlarging the total amount of capital to be advanced under this Bill beyond the sum which is at the present moment named by the Government, and more or less contemplated by Parliament and the country. I have also another object equally in view, and one which should enlist the sympathies of Irish Members, and that is that the Amendment will have the effect of permitting future increases in the amount of the Imperial grants to Ireland, provided that the needs of the country—owing, perhaps, to famine—should demand them, without what I think would be a perfect atrocity, i.e. increasing the advances to landlords by 25 fold the additions to the grants. It will be observed that there is no fixed maximum named in this Bill. The Chief Secretary talks of it as a £30,000,000 Bill, but it is only by a detailed examination of each clause, and by a constructive method, that one arrives at the conclusion not that it is a £30,000,000 Bill, but that the capitalised amount of the Imperial grants to Ireland last year represents £30,000,000. That seems to me a most unsatisfactory way of framing a Bill of this nature. Some months ago I ventured to put a question on this subject to the Chancellor of the Exchequer. I asked him if it were the case that if the Imperial grants were doubled, and amounted to £2,400,000 instead of £1,200,000, it would be the case automatically that the original sum thereby made available for advances to landlords under the Bill would be £60,000,000 instead of £30,000,000. The right hon. Gentleman's very frank reply was that as the Bill stood no doubt the maximum amount might be increased in proportion as the Imperial contributions increased. But he added that he did not think the suggestion that the Government would double the amount of Imperial grants to Ireland came within the range of practical politics. Now, that is not surely the manner in which such an important matter should be dealt with by the Government. By this Bill the amount made available for advances is left absolutely unsettled; and this is, in fact, an insidious method of obtaining larger advances in the future than the present House of Commons would be willing to allow. The explanation is that the Government believe that the grants to Ireland will be increased and the country will perhaps find 10 years hence that much more than £30,000,000 has gone out of the Treasury to Irish landlords. This is a very real danger. In the House of Lords there are 121 Members who own in the aggregate an acreage of land in Ireland which produces a rent-roll of £2,250,000. Hence it will not be long before the £30,000,000 contemplated in this Bill is exhausted, and then pressure will be brought to bear on the Government for further advances by those who have not benefited by the first advance. The noble Lord the Member for West Down so far has not sold the estates under his control, with a rent roll of £100,000 a year; I believe that the family of the Marquess of Downshire will require at least £3,000,000 of the £30,000,000. The only way to checkmate the tortuous policy of this Bill in placing no limit on the amount of the advances is to adopt my Amendment. What, I repeat, will be the result if this clause passes as it stands? There will be two classes of persons who will put pressure on the Government to increase the Imperial contributions to Ireland from time to time, and neither class will have the faintest interest in the aims and objects of the other. You will have the friends of Ireland in times of famine and distress praying the Imperial Government to enlarge the limit of its contributions to local finance, and you will have a body of Irish landlords, the hungrier Members of the other House, who could not get any of the first £30,000,000 urging the Government to increase the contributions solely in order that more money may be available for advances under the Bill. Some time since I asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he could quote any precedent under which Parliament had ever authorised the borrowing of money on the elastic principles embodied in this Bill without naming a definite sum. The right hon. Gentleman replied that he had had no time to examine the point raised, so a few days later I repeated the question, and he replied that on several occasions Parliament had authorised the State to make loans without naming the amount. I consider that that reply was one of the most ridiculous character.

MR. SYDNEY GEDGE (Stockport):
No.

*MR. KEAY: I contend it was not a straightforward answer. I asked if there was any precedent for Parliament allowing the Treasury to borrow money without fixing the amount, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer replied that there was a precedent for Parliament lending, without naming the amount, monies which had been already borrowed. The Chancellor of the Exchequer declared, on the 3rd February, that it would be open to any future Parliament to limit the advances if the contributions from the Treasury are increased. But why is not that limiting put in the present Bill now by this Parliament sitting in this Committee? If in a future Parliament an attempt is made to impose a limit, hungry Members in the other House will negative it, and no limit will be imposed. I ask the Government for an explicit statement of the reasons for the adoption of this ingenious and tortuous system of satisfying the greed of Irish landlords.

Amendment proposed,

In page 3, line 22, after "schools," to insert, "Provided that the whole amount paid to the Guarantee Fund from the Imperial and Local grants mentioned in this section shall not exceed one million two hundred thousand pounds in each financial year."—(Mr. Keay.)

(4.50.) MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I think that the hon. Member who has just sat down would be a more useful Member of the Committee if he would avoid going back upon his past speeches, the past questions he has put to the Government, and the past replies that have been made to him. The hon. Member has got into his brain that this is "an ingenious, tortuous Bill introduced for the purpose of satisfying the greed of Irish landlords." I can assure the hon. Member that it is nothing of the kind, and that its main object is to benefit the small tenants in Ireland. I have not been fortunate in my past attempts to convert the hon. Member, nor can I hope to be successful now, but he may rely upon it that whatever the demerits of the Bill, it is not open to the particular kind of objection which he is so fond of raising. The hon. Member suggests that I have deliberately concealed from the House the real character of the Guarantee Fund. I have in no way concealed the character of the Guarantee Fund. We never intended to limit the amount available for advances; instead of desiring that the sum available for carrying out the objects of the Bill should be limited, I should be glad to see it increased. The difference between the hon. Member and myself is this—that the hon. Member desires to limit the operation of the Bill and I do not desire so to limit it.

(4.54.) MR. SEXTON: I only wish to say that I am quite unable to accept the argument of the hon. Member for Elgin. I agree with the Chief Secretary that the amount devoted under this Bill to land purchase will prove extremely inadequate. We are all desirous that it should be increased.

Amendment negatived.

In page 3, after line 99, to insert "and the several sums constituting the cash portion and the contingent portion respectively of the Guarantee Fund shall be applicable to the purpose of that fund in the order specified in this section."—(Mr. Sexton.)

(4.56.) MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am aware that the hon. Gentleman opposite thinks that the Government have assented to this Amendment, and if anything I said has given rise to that impression, far be it for me to withdraw in any way from that position. But I would suggest that it is inexpedient to adopt it, because it will be better that the loss, if any, should be distributed. It might, I think, be distributed over the various funds without real injury to the undertaking to which the Government grants are devoted. I will not, however, labour the point. I hope the hon. Member will see on reflection the inexpediency of his proposal.

(4.57.) MR. SEXTON: I take it the right hon. Gentleman is of opinion that the point is not important as respects the cash portion of the fund.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: That is so.

MR. SEXTON: And that it only becomes conceivably important with regard to the contingent portion. If he looks at the sub-section as it now stands he will see it is pretty obvious that one sub-head may as well be exhausted before proceeding to the next. Furthermore, let me point out that the Government will possess an important discretion as to the order in which the items in each sub-head shall be dealt with.

(4.59.) COLONEL NOLAN (Galway, N.): I do not see why the Chief Secretary should not adopt this Amendment. It cannot make the slightest difference as to the order in which the Contingent Fund items are exhausted. If the Government contributions for any purpose are seized, the locality will have to make up the money somehow.

Amendment agreed to.

*(5.0.) MR. KNOX: My three Amendments are designed to make clear the meaning of the clause. My hon. Friend the Member for West Belfast and the Government differ in their interpretation of it, and I think these words will make plain the intentions of the Government.

Amendment proposed, in page 3, line 31, to leave out "in any financial year."—(Mr. Knox.)

(5.1.) MR. MADDEN: My right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary has promised to bring up words on Report so as to make it clear there shall be no unnecessary delay in the allocation of the funds. I hope the Amendment will not be pressed.

*(5.2.) MR. KNOX: If I remember aright a similar difficulty arose on the English Local Government Bill, and gave rise to considerable dispute in the Courts of Law. I think it would be more convenient now to insert the necessary words; but, in view of the promise to do so on Report, I will not press the Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

(5.3.) Amendment proposed, in page 3, line 32, after "shall," insert "subject to the provisions of this Act with regard to the county per-centage."—(Mr. A. J. Balfour.)

(5.4.) MR. SEXTON: What is the meaning of this?

MR. MADDEN: It is simply an Amendment necessitated by alterations made in Clause 2.

Amendment agreed to.

(5.5.) MR. SEXTON: In the absence of my hon. Friend (Mr. M. Healy), I beg to move the Amendment which stands next in his name. His object is to secure that the five cities referred to in Section 8, Sub-section 3, shall not be deprived of their share in the Exchequer contribution and the Probate Duty grant by the operation of the Bill. I see that the Attorney General for Ireland has an Amendment lower down on similar lines. Perhaps he has the same object as my hon. Friend?

Amendment proposed, in page 3, line 33, after "shall," to insert "(subject to the provisions of Section 8, Sub-section 3)."—(Mr. Sexton.)

MR. MADDEN: My Amendment is not with the same intention.

(5.6.) MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Of course, the position in the Bill by which the share of the counties and cities in the Exchequer contribution and Probate Duty grant is placed as it is, was adopted deliberately by the Government; but I do not say that the matter is of great importance one way or the other. But, on the whole, it appeared to us that this very small and almost insignificant aid we ask from the great towns is a sacrifice they might well be called upon to make. It is only until £200,000 have been carried to the Reserve Fund that any call is made upon the cities, and as soon as that amount is accumulated they will get their full share again of the grants; nor will any call diminish that unless some great Irish calamity should diminish that fund, causing it be drawn upon, and then the amount will have to be built up again to £200,000, and the five cities would be asked to make their contribution. But I do not think that in the face of such a calamity the cities would object to this. On the whole, I am disposed to leave this part of the frame-work of the Bill untouched.

(5.8.) MR. SEXTON: I understand that if the Amendment of my hon. Friend were adopted the five cities would be entitled to have paid over to them their part of the Exchequer contributions and their proportion of the Probate Duty. It appears they would suffer nothing by having the clause carried as it stands, but the whole of the £40,000 put into the Reserve Fund. That sheds a little light upon the argument we had lately. We were rather in doubt whether the cities would suffer in respect to the local grants. Now it appears that the cities would not be affected, and that by reason of the language of the Sub-section

A they are deprived of part of the Exchequer contributions to which in the ordinary course they would be entitled, and when the Exchequer grant comes to be divisible it will be divided as the Probate Duty grant, except in a remote contingency, and in that event they will be entitled to a share in the £40,000. The contention of my hon. Friend is that they are entitled to it from the first. But I am not disposed to press the point. I think the cities might well assent to this.

Other Amendments made.

Amendment proposed,

In page 8, line 87, after the word "and," to insert the words "the residue shall be divided between the counties as nearly as may be in the proportion of the shares of the counties in the Irish Probate Duty Grant, and such residue shall be applied towards the cost of providing labourers' cottages in the several counties under the Labourers (Ireland) Acts, 1883 and 1886, on such terms and conditions and subject to such regulations as the Lord Lieutenant thinks expedient, save that where it appears to him, on the representation of the Local Government Board, that the whole or any part of such residue applicable to any county cannot with advantage be so applied, he may order the same to be applied as if it were a share of the county in the Irish Probate Duty Grant. Provided that the entire amount applied towards the cost of providing labourers' cottages under the present and the last preceding section in any year shall not exceed as regards any county the share of the county (calculated according to the above proportion) in the sum of forty thousand pounds, and any surplus over and above that share shall be applied as if it were part of the Irish Probate Duty Grant; and."

—(The Attorney General for Ireland.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

(5.12.) MR. T. W. RUSSELL: It is quite impossible for anyone to understand this. Is this carrying out the arrangement made the other night as to the application of money for labourers' cottages?

MR. MADDEN: Yes.

MR. MAHONY (Meath, N.): The sum of money dealt with here, and under Clause 2, has now reached a very large amount. If the Attorney General for Ireland accepts the further Amendment in my name, it will reach the sum total when the £30,000,000 are expended of no less than £119,000 every year. Now, it will not be contended that in many towns in Ireland the dwellings of the working people do not require very considerable improvement, and every single town in Ireland, except the five exempted cities, will have to contribute towards the guarantee under this Bill; and as the Bill stands at present no single town can possibly derive any direct benefit from the Bill. The Government have conceded no inconsiderable benefit to agricultural labourers in agricultural districts under the Bill, and quite legitimately so, because they contribute towards the guarantee. Now, I ask the Government to extend that benefit towards working-class dwellings in towns, and to give them an advantage under the Bill, seeing that they, in common with other ratepayers in Ireland, will have to contribute directly in case of default. I do not think I need say more in support of my Amendment, which I hope will be accepted.

Amendment proposed to the said proposed Amendment, in line 4, after the words "cost of," to insert the words "improving or erecting artisans' dwellings or."—(Mr. Mahony.)

Question proposed, "That those words be inserted in the proposed Amendment."

(5.15.) MR. SEXTON: Under the 2nd section the Government have agreed that in cases where the Lord Lieutenant thinks a portion of the county percentage may be usefully so employed, it shall be applied to providing cottages under the Labourers (Ireland) Acts, and under Clause 3 they have now agreed that a portion of the Exchequer contribution shall also be so applied, after discharging the functions of guarantee, at the discretion of the Lord Lieutenant. The entire amount will be £115,000, I think. Now, the Attorney General for Ireland proposes to introduce a limit of £40,000, but I am disposed to press him not to insist upon this. There is no doubt whatever that in many of our towns there is a great deal to be done on grounds of decency and health for the improvement of dwellings occupied by artisans, and, indeed, I may say by agricultural labourers, who, by reason of the cruel policy of former years, have been driven to reside in the slums of our towns, though they really belong to the rural population. Now, seeing that the discretion of the Lord Lieutenant is made supreme in the 2nd clause, it would be an ill compliment to the Lord Lieutenant to impose this restriction here. Does the right hon. Gentleman mean to say that the Lord Lieutenant would spend more money in Ireland in the year than is necessary? I would suggest that the amount applicable from this source should stand as in Clause 2, and let the Lord Lieutenant determine how much should be applied. Let the Attorney General look at this in a broad and statesmanlike spirit, and tell us, that, as many of the agricultural population have to find their homes in towns, he is willing to apply the full sum available under the 2nd clause, subject to the discretion of the Lord Lieutenant always as to how far it may be usefully employed towards the housing of agricultural and artisan labourers in towns, and I think that will give general satisfaction in Ireland.

(5.18.) MR. PARNELL (Cork): I trust that the right hon. Gentleman will see his way to grant this concession suggested by the Amendment. It may be truly said that there are, perhaps, no people in the world, certainly there are none in Ireland, whose dwellings stand more in need of improvement than those of the artisans and labourers in Irish towns. It is also true that there is perhaps better opportunity of improving the condition of the labouring population in small urban communities in Ireland, than that which exists in respect to any other class in that country. There are sites in these towns and ruined habitations which could be purchased cheaply and made tenable for the wants of the class the Amendment seeks to benefit. It may be said, and it is capable of proof, that a little expenditure of money would go further in the direction of ameliorating the condition of people in towns than the same amount of money spent under any other circumstances for our country districts. The argument also that a great many of our agricultural labourers live in towns is a very forcible one. As the Bill stands, these are precluded from the benefits of legislation for agricultural labourers by the twofold fact of their living in towns and not being constantly employed in agricultural labour. It is impossible that they can obtain the advantages that labourers in rural districts can receive, they cannot have little plots of land which they can cultivate. These arguments have force in favour of the Amendment of my hon. Friend, and I trust that the Government will agree to put these classes of men in country districts and in towns, to this extent, in the same position.

(5.24.) MR. FITZGERALD (Longford, S.): I cannot see any tenable ground on which this Amendment of the hon. Member for Meath can be refused. The demand is a moderate one on behalf of the artisans as they are called, though they are really labourers dwelling in towns. This Bill provides that the rate-payers in the towns shall contribute towards the Guarantee Fund, and they share the risk of having to make good any default that may arise among the agricultural tenants who may purchase, and surely they cannot fairly be denied the benefit that may accrue to men in a like position in the rural districts. I noticed during the course of the discussions on the clause relating to labourers in Ireland, that a good deal of trouble was taken to qualify labourers, and I think we may call those whom the Amendment of the Attorney General is intended to deal with, "labourers proper"; and, indeed, the other night hon. Gentlemen from Ireland determined to push home this qualification by voting against the Amendment of my hon. and gallant Friend (Colonel Nolan), which was intended to extend the benefit of the clause to all under a £15 valuation. They went so far as to drag their friends below the Gangway into the Lobby to vote against the principle of a graduated Income Tax. It is a qualification I do not recognise, and everybody who knows anything about Ireland in this connection, knows that the position of this class with which the Amendment deals is that of labourers. These are simply agricultural labourers who have been pushed into towns by lack of work, and they are what are called handy men; they having taught themselves simple trades with which they eke out a livelihood when agricultural work fails. Everyone familiar with Irish towns knows that the houses in which this class of labourers dwell are a disgrace to local administration, and, indeed, to humanity; and the Government will but do an act of justice in accepting the Amendment which should specially commend itself at this time when we are approaching the end of the septennial period, when these artisans and labourers become the prey of political partisans. As the hon. Member for Cork has said, a much-needed reform in this direction can be carried out with little expenditure.

*(5.28.) MR. KNOX: I support the Amendment, but, at the same time, I would suggest that the words will not carry the intention of the Amendment into practical effect. It is obvious that the authorities who would have to carry out a provision of this kind would have to act under some Statutory provision in providing labourers and artisans' dwellings. It would be impossible for Local Authorities to adequately provide such dwellings unless they were endowed with compulsory powers to acquire proper sites and to provide for the erection of suitable dwellings. A most useful purpose to which such an Amendment could be applied would be the removal of insanitary dwellings and erecting others on the site. Now, a most useful Act was passed last year, after mature consideration, by the Law Committee, the "Housing of the Working Classes Act," and I think practical effect would be given to this Amendment if it were adapted to the working of that Act. Therefore, I would suggest to the hon. Member for Meath that he should consent to the amendment of his Amendment in this manner. It is not, I think, a matter that need lead to much controversy; the Act I mention is a codification of existing Acts in relation to the subject of providing dwellings for the working classes.

Amendment proposed to the proposed Amendment to the proposed Amendment, to insert, after the word "dwellings," the words "under 'The Housing of the Working Classes Act, 1890.'"—(Mr. Knox.)

Question proposed, "That those words be inserted in the proposed Amendment to the proposed Amendment."

(5.33.) MR. BLANE (Armagh, S.): With respect to the Amendment of the hon. Member for Meath, I would point out that in most of the towns in Ireland the lighting watching, cleansing, and sanitary work is carried out under the Statute 9 Geo. IV. cap. 87. Therefore scarcely a single artisan would have a vote for Commissioners in these towns, as they live in houses rated at less than £5, and therefore they would not have the slightest voice in the enforcement of the Act of 1890. I think, therefore, that the proposed Amendment of the hon. Member for Meath would have no practical effect.

(5.35.) COLONEL NOLAN: I hope the Government will accept the Amendment of the hon. Member for Meath. I like the use of the word "improving" in the Amendment, for that will allow of much to be done at a small expenditure of money. As to the last Amendment proposed, I think it would be rather rash to limit the application to a single Act. I do not know whether the Act applies to the ordinary sanitary authorities, the Boards of Guardians, and I think it would be better to postpone the Amendment to the Amendment, so that we may consider the matter a little more, and it may be revised on the Report stage.

*(5.37.) MR. KNOX: I wish to give the Amendment of the hon. Member for Meath operative effect. If that Amendment is carried in its present form there will be a certain amount of money devoted to erecting and improving artisans' dwellings in towns; but no man could tell who is to provide these dwellings, or how the money is to be applied. As to the suggestion of the hon. and gallant Gentleman, I may say it would be better to insert my Amendment now, and if on further consideration it should appear that further Amendment is necessary, let that be taken in hand on Report. As to the objection of relying upon a single Act, I may mention again that the Act of 1890 is a codification of all previous Acts dealing with artisans' dwellings, and authorities under it exist in every part of Ireland urban and rural. Although I agree that the franchise in Irish towns is not on that popular basis we desire, yet I am bound to say it is preferable to the Boards of Guardians, which contains so many *ex officio*s. I certainly think the Amendment is necessary to give practical effect to the Amendment of the hon. Member for Meath.

Question put, and agreed to.

Question proposed,

"That the words 'improving or erecting artisans' dwellings under 'The Housing of the Working Classes Act, 1890,' or ' be inserted after the words 'cost of,' in line 4 of the proposed Amendment."

MR. SEXTON: The Amendment of the hon. Member would leave it open to the Lord Lieutenant to spend the money either in erecting or improving artisans' dwellings or in erecting labourers' cottages.

(5.42.) MR. MAHONY: The Amendment is an important one, and would involve, on the Report stage, the introduction of a similar Amendment of Clause 2, so that the whole of this sum might be made available for the purpose of providing dwellings.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: No doubt, the hon. Member for Meath has been well advised in accepting the Amendment to his Amendment, so as to get it in a workable form. We are all agreed, in whatever part of the House we sit, in desiring to see the artisans' dwellings in the towns of Ireland improved; they need improvement beyond question. The hon. Member for Cork appears to be of opinion that under the Labourers' Dwellings Act, 1886, it would be impossible to provide houses except for agricultural labourers who are in constant agricultural work, or who at least do such work for the greater part of their time. I think the hon. Gentleman must have had in view some of the earlier editions of this Act. There were three Bills, and in each case I think the definition of "agricultural labourer" has been relaxed, until in the last form of the Labourers' Act it is that agricultural labourer means "a man or woman who does agricultural work for hire at any season of the year on the land for some other person or persons," and includes "handloom weavers and fishermen doing agricultural work." It appears, therefore, that if a man does a day's work on a farm, or if ever so little time be devoted to agricultural work, he comes under the definition of an "agricultural labourer," and it would be possible under the Act of 1886, as supplemented by this Act, to build him a cottage—and, be it noted, whether that cottage is to be built in the country or in a town. Some hon. Gentlemen appear to be of opinion that because an agricultural labourer resides in a town, he will thereby be precluded from receiving relief under the Act of 1886. That would not be the case. It matters not where the man resides. If he does agricultural work to the extent I have described, it will be possible to build him a cottage in a town or out of a town as may be most convenient, according to the view of the Local Authority. The class which in the towns will not be affected by this Bill is relatively a limited class. Broadly speaking, throughout Ireland, the great mass of the poorest of the labouring population consists of agricultural labourers, according to the wide definition contained in the Act of 1886, and therefore I conceive that the provisions we have introduced will go a long way towards meeting the views expressed by gentlemen opposite. Now, I would ask the Committee whether it is quite fair to the Government to ask them to graft on to a Bill for land purchase in Ireland so novel and so wide-reaching a proposal, and one that would involve the employment of funds contributed by the British taxpayer for the erection of artisans' dwellings in the Irish towns? I make no comment or criticism on the Irish Labourers' Acts. But it is a very strong order indeed to ask us, in addition to the provisions of those Acts—against which, though I fully acknowledge their merits, a very large number of arguments might be urged—in the middle of the Land Purchase Bill, to make an entirely new precedent for devoting the money of the taxpayers not only to the construction but to the improvement of the dwellings of labourers in towns. Without discussing a policy which is entirely novel, it is enough for me to ask the Committee to absolve me from the enormous duty of embodying in a Land Purchase Bill so new and far-reaching a proposal.

(5.50.) MR. MAHONY: The first part of the right hon. Gentleman's argument was directed to proving that this proposal would not effect any great change in Ireland, but in the second part of his speech he went on to describe it as a novel and far-reaching proposal, and said it was not fair to ask the Government to introduce it into a measure of land purchase. I would ask the right hon. Gentleman why he himself introduced into a Land Purchase Bill a clause giving power to erect dwellings for agricultural labourers in Ireland? What have they to do with land purchase? This is a Bill for advancing money to Irish tenants, to enable them to buy their farms from their landlords. The labourers are brought into the matter for the sole and simple reason that they are asked to contribute to this guarantee, and if a novel and far-reaching proposal has been grafted upon the Land Purchase Bill it has been done by the Chief Secretary himself. We are now asking the right hon. Gentleman to extend these provisions so as to make them apply to the labouring population dwelling in towns. We have purposely excluded five cities from the Amendment, but have included all the other towns in Ireland, and I say we have an unanswerable case, because the labourers dwelling in the towns will have to contribute towards the guarantees. In asking the right hon. Gentleman to extend the proposal, so that some small benefit may go to those who are asked to give guarantees under this Bill, we are not making any unreasonable demand on the right hon. Gentleman, and we are making one which is supported by the consensus of opinion on the part of the Irish Representatives.

(5.55.) COLONEL NOLAN: The right hon. Gentleman spoke about the interests of the British taxpayer, but I do not see how the British taxpayer is affected at all by this Amendment. It is of no consequence to him whether the money is applied to this or some other purpose. It seems to me that it would be well worth while to enable a Sanitary Authority to give £5, £10, or £15 to make a man's house habitable without going to the expense of building a new one. This proposal would for the first time introduce the principle of improving existing dwellings. You generally see a fringe of poor wretched houses when you drive in or out of a town, and these are the houses that might be improved under this Amendment.

(5.56.) MR. SEXTON: I really think the case is worthy of re-consideration by the right hon. Gentleman. I would point out, in the first place, that these towns, which are outside the excepted cities, are liable for defaults. The farmers buy; they get a reduction of rent, and then, if they fail to pay what they owe to the State, these towns, as well as the rural communities, will have to bear the brunt of the default. What do the towns get under the Bill? I am not aware that they get anything, and I think equity suggests that if a benefit of this kind were conferred on the towns it would not only make the Bill a more beneficial social instrument, but would bring its provisions more into harmony with the dictates of fairness. We are dealing here with the Exchequer contribution. What is the origin of that contribution? It is a sum paid out of the Imperial purse to compensate Ireland for the local taxation, licences. I say, that instead of £40,000, we ought to get £186,000. But, leaving that aside, under the Labourers' Acts the labourers cannot be dealt with in the towns in a satisfactory manner. The hon. and gallant Gentleman below me (Colonel Nolan) has pointed out that under the present law existing dwellings cannot be improved. The Labourers' Acts are very cumbersome and costly. They necessitate cumbersome local inquiries, shorthand notes, the production of maps, plans, and so forth. My impression is that under those Acts you cannot give a man a house without land. That is exceedingly awkward. I think it is worth while considering whether the Government might not engraft the Motion upon the Bill.

*(6.1.) SIR J. COLOMB (Tower Hamlets, Bow, &c.): This is really a proposal for making the Exchequer contributions available for improving town landlord's property. The hon. and gallant Member for Galway (Colonel Nolan) talks about giving assistance towards improving labourers' cottages in towns. But this is a proposal not to give it to the labourers but, as a rule, to the landlords. My observation goes to show that the cumbersome machinery which has been referred to with respect to labourers' cottages is really very necessary. We are too apt in Ireland to be lavish in giving public money here and public money there, but I myself shall certainly vote against the Amendment, on the ground that to my certain knowledge it would operate simply as a means of using public money for the improvement of the property of town landlords.

(6.3.) MR. FLYNN: This is an Amendment supported by Members from Ireland on both sides of the House, and we hope the Government will give further consideration to it. We cannot congratulate the right hon. Gentleman on his knowledge of the social condition of Ireland. He says these dwellings are more required in the exempted towns than in the small rural towns. But he forgets that in the exempted towns there are authorities which possess sufficient powers already to erect artisans' dwellings. As a matter of fact, such dwellings are being erected in Dublin, Cork, and Belfast with great rapidity. The hon. Member opposite (Sir J. Colomb) tried to show that this money would be utilised for the purpose of improving landlords' property. That is certainly not the intention of those who support the Amendment. Let me, however, point out that it might be possible for Town Commissioners to buy up old dwellings—and I am sure they could acquire them at a very low price—for the purpose of improving them. I hope the Chief Secretary will listen to the very strong recommendations that have been made to him in favour of the Amendment.

(6.8.) MR. MAHONY: I would ask the Chief Secretary to say what is to become of the money if it is not applied in this way? It is to go to the relief of the Poor Rate and the County Cess in Ireland. That is a matter concerning the Irish people only, and up to this moment not one single Member representing Ireland has raised a single objection to the Amendment I have proposed. In addition to this, the whole case is safeguarded by the fact that if the Lord Lieutenant is of opinion that it is not requisite to spend any money in this way in Ireland he may give directions accordingly. The whole discretion rests with him. Under the circumstances, I make a final appeal to the right hon. Gentleman to grant some concession on this point, for the benefit of the labourers.

(6.9.) MR. PARNELL: I hope the right hon. Gentleman will re-consider this matter. I was hoping that we should have had some intimation from the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland on the point that has been raised as to whether a house can be built under the Labourers' Act in Ireland without a plot of ground being attached to it. That point has been raised to meet the argument used by the Chief Secretary that a considerable portion of the labouring population of these smaller towns do come under the provisions of the various Labourers' Acts. I am in doubt as to whether the definition has been so extended by the Act of 1886, but it appears that it has been made extensive in the direction indicated by the right hon. Gentleman, and I want to know why the provision has not been used in the small towns for the purpose of acquiring sites which abound, and of replacing the tumbledown dwellings with suitable ones. If the Boards of Guardians have power to build houses in the smaller Irish towns, apart from plots of land, why do they not do it? I am not aware of any case where it has been done by any Board. Certainly it would be an enormous improvement if they could do it, but I doubt very much if they have the power, unless they have been given such powers by one of the various Amendments in the Act of 1886. I doubt whether they have the power to build a house separate from a plot of land or without a plot of land. Section 6 of the Act of 1883 says the schemes should provide for the erection of a sufficient number of labourers' cottages, so as to provide for the accommodation of the labouring classes in suitable dwellings, with the requisite approaches, with proper sanitary arrangements, and should also provide for a plot or garden, not exceeding half a Statute acre, being attached to the dwelling. It appears to me that that section, looking at it at first sight, supplies us with the cause of the failure of the Act, so far as the smaller Irish towns are concerned. If that is so—if the section is as I interpret it—it throws an entirely new light on this question. The Chief Secretary admitted that there is this want and grievance in the towns, and he pointed out that the definition of an agricultural labourer has been extended by the Act of 1886, so as to admit of provision being made for the building of houses in the smaller Irish towns. But if my interpretation of this section of the Act of 1883 is correct, it is evident that the Act does not contain practical provision for meet-himself introduced into a Land Purchase Bill a clause giving power to erect dwellings for agricultural labourers in Ireland? What have they to do with land purchase? This is a Bill for advancing money to Irish tenants, to enable them to buy their farms from their landlords. The labourers are brought into the matter for the sole and simple reason that they are asked to contribute to this guarantee, and if a novel and far-reaching proposal has been grafted upon the Land Purchase Bill it has been done by the Chief Secretary himself. We are now asking the right hon. Gentleman to extend these provisions so as to make them apply to the labouring population dwelling in towns. We have purposely excluded five cities from the Amendment, but have included all the other towns in Ireland, and I say we have an unanswerable case, because the labourers dwelling in the towns will have to contribute towards the guarantees. In asking the right hon. Gentleman to extend the proposal, so that some small benefit may go to those who are asked to give guarantees under this Bill, we are not making any unreasonable demand on the right hon. Gentleman, and we are making one which is supported by the consensus of opinion on the part of the Irish Representatives.

(5.55.) COLONEL NOLAN: The right hon. Gentleman spoke about the interests of the British taxpayer, but I do not see how the British taxpayer is affected at all by this Amendment. It is of no consequence to him whether the money is applied to this or some other purpose. It seems to me that it would be well worth while to enable a Sanitary Authority to give £5, £10, or £15 to make a man's house habitable without going to the expense of building a new one. This proposal would for the first time introduce the principle of improving existing dwellings. You generally see a fringe of poor wretched houses when you drive in or out of a town, and these are the houses that might be improved under this Amendment.

(5.56.) MR. SEXTON: I really think the case is worthy of re-consideration by the right hon. Gentleman. I would point out, in the first place, that these towns, which are outside the excepted cities, are liable for defaults. The farmers buy; they get a reduction of rent, and then, if they fail to pay what they owe to the State, these towns, as well as the rural communities, will have to bear the brunt of the default. What do the towns get under the Bill? I am not aware that they get anything, and I think equity suggests that if a benefit of this kind were conferred on the towns it would not only make the Bill a more beneficial social instrument, but would bring its provisions more into harmony with the dictates of fairness. We are dealing here with the Exchequer contribution. What is the origin of that contribution? It is a sum paid out of the Imperial purse to compensate Ireland for the local taxation, licences. I say, that instead of £40,000, we ought to get £186,000. But, leaving that aside, under the Labourers' Acts the labourers cannot be dealt with in the towns in a satisfactory manner. The hon. and gallant Gentleman below me (Colonel Nolan) has pointed out that under the present law existing dwellings cannot be improved. The Labourers' Acts are very cumbrous and costly. They necessitate cumbrous local inquiries, shorthand notes, the production of maps, plans, and so forth. My impression is that under those Acts you cannot give a man a house without land. That is exceedingly awkward. I think it is worth while considering whether the Government might not engraft the Motion upon the Bill.

*(6.1.) SIR J. COLOMB (Tower Hamlets, Bow, &c.): This is really a proposal for making the Exchequer contributions available for improving town landlord's property. The hon. and gallant Member for Galway (Colonel Nolan) talks about giving assistance towards improving labourers' cottages in towns. But this is a proposal not to give it to the labourers but, as a rule, to the landlords. My observation goes to show that the cumbrous machinery which has been referred to with respect to labourers' cottages is really very necessary. We are too apt in Ireland to be lavish in giving public money here and public money there, but I myself shall certainly vote against the Amendment, on the ground that to my certain knowledge it would operate simply as a means of using public money for the improvement of the property of town landlords.

(Sitting)

(6.3.) MR. FLYNN: This is an Amendment supported by Members from Ireland on both sides of the House, and we hope the Government will give further consideration to it. We cannot congratulate the right hon. Gentleman on his knowledge of the social condition of Ireland. He says these dwellings are more required in the exempted towns than in the small rural towns. But he forgets that in the exempted towns there are authorities which possess sufficient powers already to erect artisans' dwellings. As a matter of fact, such dwellings are being erected in Dublin, Cork, and Belfast with great rapidity. The hon. Member opposite (Sir J. Colomb) tried to show that this money would be utilised for the purpose of improving landlords' property. That is certainly not the intention of those who support the Amendment. Let me, however, point out that it might be possible for Town Commissioners to buy up old dwellings—and I am sure they could acquire them at a very low price—for the purpose of improving them. I hope the Chief Secretary will listen to the very strong recommendations that have been made to him in favour of the Amendment.

(6.8.) MR. MAHONY: I would ask the Chief Secretary to say what is to become of the money if it is not applied in this way? It is to go to the relief of the Poor Rate and the County Cess in Ireland. That is a matter concerning the Irish people only, and up to this moment not one single Member representing Ireland has raised a single objection to the Amendment I have proposed. In addition to this, the whole case is safeguarded by the fact that if the Lord Lieutenant is of opinion that it is not requisite to spend any money in this way in Ireland he may give directions accordingly. The whole discretion rests with him. Under the circumstances, I make a final appeal to the right hon. Gentleman to grant some concession on this point, for the benefit of the labourers.

(6.9.) MR. PARNELL: I hope the right hon. Gentleman will re-consider this matter. I was hoping that we should have had some intimation from the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland on the point that has been raised as to whether a house can be built under the Labourers' Act in Ireland without a plot of ground being attached to it. That point has been raised to meet the argument used by the Chief Secretary that a considerable portion of the labouring population of these smaller towns do come under the provisions of the various Labourers' Acts. I am in doubt as to whether the definition has been so extended by the Act of 1886, but it appears that it has been made extensive in the direction indicated by the right hon. Gentleman, and I want to know why the provision has not been used in the small towns for the purpose of acquiring sites which abound, and of replacing the tumbledown dwellings with suitable ones. If the Boards of Guardians have power to build houses in the smaller Irish towns, apart from plots of land, why do they not do it? I am not aware of any case where it has been done by any Board. Certainly it would be an enormous improvement if they could do it, but I doubt very much if they have the power, unless they have been given such powers by one of the various Amendments in the Act of 1886. I doubt whether they have the power to build a house separate from a plot of land or without a plot of land. Section 6 of the Act of 1883 says the schemes should provide for the erection of a sufficient number of labourers' cottages, so as to provide for the accommodation of the labouring classes in suitable dwellings, with the requisite approaches, with proper sanitary arrangements, and should also provide for a plot or garden, not exceeding half a Statute acre, being attached to the dwelling. It appears to me that that section, looking at it at first sight, supplies us with the cause of the failure of the Act, so far as the smaller Irish towns are concerned. If that is so—if the section is as I interpret it—it throws an entirely new light on this question. The Chief Secretary admitted that there is this want and grievance in the towns, and he pointed out that the definition of an agricultural labourer has been extended by the Act of 1886, so as to admit of provision being made for the building of houses in the smaller Irish towns. But if my interpretation of this section of the Act of 1883 is correct, it is evident that the Act does not contain practical provision for meeting the case of these labourers. These labourers, agricultural or not, cannot be placed in the country districts, because you cannot remove them from the main source of their occupations, which is in the towns, and, although they may come under the Act of 1886, they will undoubtedly be shut out from its beneficial provisions, owing to the impossibility of providing plots of land near their houses, and it would be useless to provide plots of land at a distance from their houses. I wish to appeal to the right hon. Gentleman to re-consider this question. The right hon. Gentleman went to the West of Ireland recently for the purpose of studying the condition of the smaller tenant farmers in that country, and for the purpose of seeing what could be done to improve their condition, at all events temporarily, and in order to provide them with work. I think the right hon. Gentleman's experience, and the works that have been undertaken as the result of that experience, have been beneficial, and have carried out, to a considerable extent, in a beneficial way, the intentions of the right hon. Gentleman. I think these works were desirable with a view to affording work for the enormous population who most required it. The Chief Secretary went for the purpose of studying the conditions of the smaller tenant farmers—persons who live outside the towns—and probably he had not the same opportunity of seeing the condition of the labouring classes in the small towns. At all events, his mind was not at all directed to this question; but I am convinced of this fact: that had his mind been directed to the question, had he seen what the condition of these poor people is, and what an immense improvement the adoption of the Amendment of my right hon. Friend would effect in their condition, the right hon. Gentleman would not be opposing this Amendment. I wish to point out to the right hon. Gentleman that this Amendment gives the power to the Lord Lieutenant. He can spend all the money, if he likes, upon agricultural labourers' dwellings outside these towns. It gives him simply the power to supply a want which I think I have pointed out exists in the Labourers' Act regarding the welfare of the agricultural labourers or those who come under the definition, in the Act of 1886, of agricultural labourers; and that being so, I trust the Chief Secretary will take power from the Lord Lieutenant to supply this want and to relieve these hardships and grievances, if the Lord Lieutenant should think proper to do so.

(6.17.) COLONEL WARING (Down, N.): I shall await with some anxiety to hear the reply of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary on this question, to know whether the Labourers' (Ireland) Act gives power to grant cottages without allotments or not. If it be true that the clause pointed out by the hon. Member for Cork has failed, and precludes the possibility of the Labourers' Act being taken advantage of in the small rural towns, I shall not be able to vote against the Amendment. I hope some arrangement will be made by which this difficulty will be got over; but I think an amending clause would be a cumbersome addition to this Bill, and ought to be added to the Labourers' Act, which is shortly to be renewed.

*(6.19.) MR. KNOX: The hon. and gallant Gentleman is mistaken when he thinks the Housing of the Working Classes Act does not already apply to Ireland. It is, I believe, being practically enforced in several parts of Ireland, such as Cork and Dublin. I would urge on the right hon. Gentleman that, after all, this is not a very large question. The question of the housing of the working classes is a very large question, but the amount of money that it will be possible to use under this provision will be very small. One private individual has recently given in the City of Dublin a larger sum for the benefit of the working classes than can be given under this provision for the benefit of the working classes all over Ireland—I refer to Sir Edward Guinness. It is hardly worth while further preventing progress by resisting the Amendment.

(6.20.) MR. A. J. BALFOUR: It is with the greatest reluctance that I oppose an Amendment, moved, I am sure, in perfect good faith, and with a sincere desire to benefit the poorer classes of the community in Ireland, and pressed on me, I admit, by gentlemen representing various interests in Ireland, who do not always agree on every question. But I think I can show the Committee that there are serious objections to the course proposed. The hon. Gentleman who has just sat down tells us, and tells us truly, that the operations under this measure will be very small. But that is one of my objections to the Amendment—that for a very small benefit to the class concerned the Committee is asked for the first time to swallow an enormous principle never before discussed upon any Bill brought before the House, and which ought not to be decided in Committee on a Land Purchase Bill. Let us observe this: The Act for providing agricultural labourers with cottages is a very exceptional one; but, then, it is admitted that the condition of the agricultural labourers in many parts of Ireland is exceptional, and that there is no analogy between their condition and that of the agricultural labourers in England and Scotland. But when we come to the towns, can we make out any distinction whatever between the urban population of Ireland and the urban population of England or Scotland? And we must altogether exclude from our view those town labourers in Ireland who gain part of their livelihood by agricultural work, for as I have already pointed out they are provided for by existing legislation. Excluding those from our purview, I would ask is there any real distinction to be drawn between the Irish artisan and the Scotch or English artisan? If there is no distinction to be drawn, would the Committee for a very small and insignificant Amendment be justified in accepting so wide, so novel, and so far-reaching a principle? I respectfully submit that it would not. The hon. Member for Cork pointed out that the provisions of the Labourers' Dwellings Act of 1883, which requires that a small plot of land shall be attached to the houses of the agricultural labourers, prevent those houses from being built in towns. But in the villages and small towns in Ireland there is no difficulty whatever in obtaining small plots at the outskirts, and if it is thought that labourers' houses should be built without small plots of land attached to them, the proper way would be to amend the existing Labourers' Dwellings Act. That could be done without much difficulty. The hon. Member for West Belfast, in the able argument he put before the Committee, told us that while this £40,000 we are now concerned in is paid from licences, under the Bill as it at present stands and without the Amendment of the hon. Gentleman, the money will be applied mostly to rural districts which have contributed nothing to it. I do not say there is no force in that objection to the Bill as it now stands. That objection could not be taken to the Bill, as I introduced it, because the £40,000 was not only distributed for labourers' cottages, but with the Irish Probate Duty grant. If hon. Members are of opinion that towns in Ireland will be deprived of the benefit of this £40,000—and I do not think such will be the case—by the Amendment I introduce, I think the proper course would be either now or on Report to introduce some Amendment which will restore to the towns the benefit we withdraw from them. For myself I do not think such a course is necessary, and I do not press it on hon. Members. My reading of the Labourers' Act leads me to believe that the case of the great majority of that part of the population who live in "agricultural towns," as they are called in Ireland—"villages" as they would be called in England—can be adequately met under the Labourers' Cottages Act. But my main objection to the Amendment is that we should not introduce into a Bill intended to deal with land purchase so new and extraordinary a principle as that the money of the British taxpayer shall be applied not merely to the construction, but to the repair of artisans' dwellings in towns.

(6.27.) Mr. MAHONY: I just desire to point out that this matter is not so trifling as the right hon. Gentleman seems disposed to make out. When the £30,000,000 is spent under the Land Purchase Act this fund will amount to £115,000 a year, and if that for 49 years is an insignificant sum—

Mr. A. J. BALFOUR: There are other objections to applying the fund as it increases in amount to the purpose indicated in the Amendment, but I did not think it worth while delaying the Committee by entering into them. I confined myself to the £40,000.

Mr. MAHONY: Then I will not press that point. The right hon. Gentleman objects to my proposal as novel, and says that if this principle were applied to Ireland it could with equal justice be claimed for England and Scotland. But I would point out that all we want to do is to provide a certain sum of money, which is Irish money and not British money, and which will go to Irish taxpayers and not to British taxpayers, for the carrying out of an Act which is not a new Act, but one that already is in existence, and that applies to Great Britain as well as Ireland. The only novel part of the thing is the provision of the money. As to attempting to amend the Labourers' Act, we know how easy it is for a single Member to prevent a Bill from passing through the House. I would ask the right hon. Gentleman this question—and I will then no longer stand between the Committee and a Division—if he will not consent to an alteration of the Labourers' Act to such an extent as to give power under it to build these dwellings or improve existing dwellings without adding plots of land, will he give those powers in the present Bill so that we may be assured of their passing through the House?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I cannot consent to an Amendment that I have not seen.

MR. MAHONY: No, no. I ask that the right hon. Gentleman should bring forward such an Amendment himself.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: That I must consider.

(6.30.) The Committee divided:—Ayes 78; Noes 261.—(Div. List, No. 156.)

(6.43) MR. SEXTON: If the further Amendment is adopted it will give the Lord Lieutenant discretion.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: We accept the Amendment as to the Lord Lieutenant's discretion so as to include the whole amount.

Amendment amended, by leaving out the words—

"Provided that the entire amount applied towards the cost of providing labourers' cottages under the present and the last preceding section in any year shall not exceed as regards any county the share of the county (calculated according to the above proportion) in the sum of forty thousand pounds, and any surplus over and above that share shall be applied as if it were part of the Irish Probate Duty Grant; and."

Amendment, as amended, agreed to.

Mr. Mahony

Question proposed, "That Clause 3, as amended, stand part of the Bill."

MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): Really we have not had an opportunity of saying a single word on this clause. I have listened to the friendly conversation taking place between my hon. Friend and the Secretary for Ireland and I have not raised my voice, because I did not precisely see where the English taxpayer was concerned in it.

It being ten minutes to Seven of the clock, the Chairman left the Chair to make his report to the House.

INTOXICATING LIQUORS LICENCES (ENGLAND.)

MR. LEA (Londonderry, S.): I desire, Sir, in reference to the notice of Motion standing first upon the Paper, to ask you a question on a point of Order. There are at the present time three Local Veto Bills on the Order Book of the House, referring respectively to Ireland, Scotland, and Wales. These Bills deal with the question of giving local control over the licences within the several districts, and matters in relation to licences with which this Motion deals, and the question I wish to ask is whether my hon. Friend would be in order in submitting such a Resolution applicable in its terms to the countries I have mentioned; and whether he should not confine his Motion to England, the Local Veto Bill for England having been withdrawn?

*MR. SPEAKER: The Resolution as drawn is in very general terms, and as it stands it applies to the whole United Kingdom—England, Scotland, Wales, and Ireland. A few days ago there were four Local Veto Bills before the House, but the Bill for England has been withdrawn so as to enable the hon. Gentleman to proceed with his Motion. As the Resolution stands, however, if affirmed by the House, it would prejudice the consideration of other Bills, and especially of the Irish measure. It would, therefore, be convenient if the hon. Member were to confine the terms of his Resolution to England, and this may be done by the insertion of the words "in England." That would not only obviate every objection on the ground of anticipation, but the Motion would not then prejudice any other Bills on the Paper that the House may have ordered to be read on a future day.

*MR. J. E. ELLIS (Nottingham, Rushcliffe): I had hoped, Sir, that any difficulty in the way of the Motion had been surmounted, but I am obliged to my hon. Friend for indicating the difficulty, and to you, Sir, for the suggestion I gladly accept.

(9.2.) Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; House counted, and 40 Members being found present,

*(9.5.) MR. J. E. ELLIS: I desire first to acknowledge the courtesy of my right hon. and hon. Friends which enables me to bring forward this Motion. My right hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton (Mr. H. H. Fowler) has kindly deferred to another day a notice of Motion in which he is interested in order that my Motion might be brought on, and for the same purpose my hon.

Friend the Member for the Holmfirth Division has withdrawn the District Veto Bill, which had reference to England. I am at the outset very anxious to make it clear that as the matter now stands, and especially as far as this Resolution goes, the question of licensing reform lies outside the ordinary lines of Party strife, and certainly I shall avoid saying anything to bring it within the sphere of such controversy. For my own part, I heartily welcome the efforts of any man in the direction of temperance reform whatever his political opinions on other subjects may be. It appears to me it is needless to go into the past history of this matter. On the 29th of April last year we listened to one of the most remarkable speeches ever delivered in this House—the one from the noble Lord the Member for Paddington (Lord Randolph Churchill) when he unfolded his proposals for a Licensing Bill. The noble Lord then recited the history of this matter, so far as Parliament is concerned, and I venture to think that any hon. Member who desires to look at this aspect of the case will find a concise repertory of the facts in that speech of the noble Lord. Nor do I intend to dwell on the magnitude of the evils involved in this question, for I think that is admitted on all hands. I come at once to the Resolution I have the honour to lay before the House. Two points are really raised by this Resolution, and it is on these I ask the judgment of the House to-night. In the first place, I propose a large reduction in the number of licensed houses; and in the next place I declare that it is desirable there should be further powers of control over issue of licences, and in respect to the houses to which they are attached. Now, to my first declaration—as to the necessity of reducing the number of public houses—I imagine there will be pretty general assent. The hon. Member for West Ham (Mr. Forrest Fulton) has placed on the Paper notice of an Amendment to my Resolution, indicating the nature of the obstacle—the barrier, if I may use the expression—he would desire to place in the way of a reduction in the number of licensed houses. Certainly I should have thought, after the Debates of 1888 and 1890 and the decision given at the other end of the corridor on March 20, of the present year, in the case "Sharp v. Wakefield," the particular aspect of the question presented by this Amendment would hardly have been brought forward to-night. But I am very glad indeed to have the opportunity for a fair and square Debate on this proposal for compensation; and I suppose we shall hear some reason why the judgment of the highest Court in the land should not apply to the matter. Although, as I have said, the declaration in favour of a reduction in the number of licensed houses is one that I anticipate will command general assent, still, its importance is so great in my eyes that I propose to dwell on it for a few minutes. Now, what is the state of the case? In the year 1889 a Return was granted, on the Motion of the hon. Member for West Manchester (Sir W. Holdsworth), which gave some interesting figures as to the number of public houses in the country in the previous year. There were in boroughs one licensed house to every 173 of the inhabitants, and in counties one to every 219, or a general average of one public house to every 202 people. These are the figures for England and Wales. When we come to look at particular places, that is to say, particular boroughs and licensing divisions in counties, we find an enormous disparity. In one particular borough there is a no less number than one public house to every 66 persons, whereas in another borough the proportion is one to every 480 persons. Again, in counties, I find the proportion is in one instance one to 89, and in another one for every 490 of the population. Now, whatever may be the circumstances of particular localities, I am sure there can be no reason for such inequalities as these. No sufficient reason, I am sure, can be shown why in one locality the proportion of licensed houses to population should be six times as great as in another locality. In the Bill introduced by Mr. Bruce (now Lord Aberdare) when he was Home Secretary in the Government of 1868, we find a scale of proportion, and if this scale in Clause 7 of that Bill had been carried into effect, the licensed houses would have fallen in the boroughs from 48,229 to 8,356, and in the counties from 80,279 to 29,362—that is to say, the total number of licensed houses would have fallen from the total in 1888 of 128,508

to 37,718. I think it will be agreed such reduction would be an enormous boon. I remember perfectly well at the time, though I did not then take much interest in public affairs, that there was considerable regret among friends of temperance that the Bill introduced by Mr. Bruce did not pass into law. There were reasons, no doubt, why it did not, but if we had had that Bill in operation since that time, certainly there would have been an enormous improvement in the direction I am advocating now. It is almost impossible adequately to realize what these figures mean. It is a moot point what is the precise relation between the number of licensed houses and drunkenness, but there must be a certain connection within certain limits. Let anyone walk or drive through four or five miles of streets in the City of London any evening and watch what is going on, and when he sees those many yawning sepulchres, and the class of wretched creatures entering the doors, I think he will be willing enough to agree to a proposition to reduce the number of such places by one-third or by one-half, or better still, by three-fourths, and he will allow that such a reduction must produce an enormous effect upon the evils we all deplore. Since my Motion appeared on the Paper I have had letters from several quarters pointing out localities where within 40 or 50 or 100 yards there is quite a ridiculous number of those places luring people to their destruction. On the other hand, I am acquainted, and have for 30 years been intimately acquainted with a place where the population has grown from 2,000 to 13,000, and where, owing to the prevalence of strong temperance opinions, and with the co-operation—except on one occasion—of the Bench of Magistrates, we have succeeded in keeping the number of public houses down, while the population has increased until, at this moment, there are hardly more houses than there were when the population stood at 2,000; and certain I am that this keeping down of the number of houses has had an enormous effect on the proportion of wages spent in drink, and on the general sobriety and well-being of the population. I leave this aspect of the matter with one quotation from the speech of the noble Lord the Member for Paddington, to which I have alluded. The noble Lord said on the occasion to which I have referred—

"Now if, as I hold, the number of public houses is largely and grossly in excess of the legitimate wants of the people, what does that mean? I hold that it brings responsibility home to all of us in this House, and it means that Parliament and the State by allowing such a condition of things to exist, force upon the people the consumption of alcoholic liquor which, without such pressure, would not be consumed."

This is strong language, but not, I think, out of place. Now I turn to the second part of the Motion, which declares that further powers of control should be intrusted to Local Authorities, and here I am anxious at the outset to remove a misconception which has arisen—a misconception which I am afraid has given some trouble to hon. Members as regards communications they have received on this subject. I have received copies of resolutions passed by different bodies in the country condemning this proposition of mine as inimical to the true interests of temperance reform. I know that from the Grand Lodge of the Good Templars Association at Birmingham a circular has been issued inviting hon. Members not to support this proposal. Now, this Association is perfectly within its rights in expressing its view; but when it goes on to speak of the National Temperance Federation, and to quote the view of the Church of England Temperance Society, of which I see some adherents in the House, it certainly goes beyond its authority. As a matter of fact, the Church of England Temperance Society has issued a circular asking Members to support the Resolution; and the National Temperance Federation has certainly expressed no opinion in the matter at all. Therefore, this Good Templar circular, in so far as it goes beyond the expression of the view of the Grand Lodge, may be put aside. Now, the misconception to which I allude has arisen in this way: It has been assumed that anyone who votes for the Resolution will be committing himself to the assertion that it is desirable to give further powers of control to Local Representative Authorities. Well, I know I am not a master of phraseology, and I may have ill-expressed my meaning, but in putting in the words Local Authorities I was not desiring in any way to commit myself or anybody. Under this Resolution there are three courses open. Further powers may be given to the present Licensing Authority; or they may be given to an elected Representative Body, and the latter again may be of two kinds: they may be elected ad hoc, or they may be elected in accordance with Lord Melbourne's proposal in 1835 and the Local Government Act, 1888. To my mind, the machinery by which further powers of control should be carried out is a subsidiary point, I do not dwell on it; and I have come to no final conclusion as to which of the courses I have indicated is the best. That is one of the points that demands the fullest and freest discussion. I may be followed by Members, by my right hon. Friend (Mr. Morley), who seconds this Resolution, or others who may express a decided opinion; but so far as the Resolution goes, I do not consider that anyone voting for it is pledging himself to any of the three courses I have indicated. And now I pass to a much more important and a vital matter—the powers of control. And, here again, I desire to make my position perfectly clear. The Resolution is not in substitution of, and is not in competition with, any other proposal for lessening the evils arising from drink, such as the power of direct veto. I want to make it perfectly clear that it encroaches on no ground that is covered by any proposal now before the House. The case stands in this way. If the Bill for establishing a local veto in England were to receive the Royal assent to-morrow, I am sure everyone will agree with me there would be large areas throughout the country that would not be affected by it, large areas in which the majority could not be obtained for carrying the provisions of the Bill into effect. If that is granted, then we must, therefore, continue the Licensing Authority in the districts that, by the hypothesis, a Local Veto Act would not affect, and I am anxious that in such a case, on the principle that half a loaf is better than no bread, further powers of control should be obtained at once without waiting for the operation of direct veto. Therefore I submit with the utmost confidence that this Resolution does not encroach, or traverse, impede, or hinder the principle of which I, myself, fully adopt of direct popular veto. It is only supplemental, it will only come in where there is not that happy state of things where there is a majority in favour of closing or largely reducing public houses. It proposes to confer further powers of control, and to this end a reform eminently desirable is a codification and simplification of the law. There are two principal Licensing Acts at this moment, the Acts of 1872 and 1874, and these have 108 sections. When cases arise under these Acts, the state of chaos, the "confusion worse confounded" is discovered. The first point of reform then would be—and it is an absolute necessity—a simplification of the law. Under the Act I have mentioned, and 22 subsidiary Acts, there are 12 different kinds of licences. I see the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board is in his place. I do not know whether he is inclined to again try his hand at licensing reform; but certainly there is an excellent field for his abilities in a codification and simplification of the licensing law. I am sure a Bill with that object, if referred to the Grand Committee on Law, would be received most sympathetically. Then I pass to the next point of reform which relates to the structure of the houses to which these licences are attached, and here I propose to meet an objection frequently raised. I agree that a mere reduction in the number of licences will not be sufficient; it ought to be laid down by law that the licence granted attaches to the particular structure as it was at the time the licence was granted. This point is illustrated and supported by Clause 16 in the Bill of the noble Lord (Lord Randolph Churchill.) He made it one of the laches for which a licence was to be forfeited, the surreptitious making of external communication in the building. There should be no alteration in the structure of the building or the tenure upon which the house is held after the licence has been granted. Then I come to a fruitful cause of evil—the system of "tied houses," that is, houses which are the property, or partly the property, of great brewing firms. I might say that they are entirely opposed to the old idea of what constituted a licensed victualler's house. In former days a licence was granted to a person who was known to be of good character, and who offered to the public the accommodation and the legitimate attraction of an old English inn. People went to houses kept by such persons for the purpose, not of sitting and soaking, but of obtaining legitimate refreshment. Tied houses, on the other hand, are managed by weekly or monthly servants, upon whom no responsibility rests, while every effort is made by the great firms or companies to which such houses belong to stimulate trade by inducing excessive drinking, and one of the consequences is, I am informed, that the quality of the liquors supplied has deteriorated. By the absurdly enhanced price given by the brewer for the premises the rental is unduly raised, and illegitimate methods of business are stimulated in order to make the requisite financial success. The result is that the character of such houses becomes lower and lower. There is a descending plane of conduct as control diminishes. It is a monstrous, a portentous, development, which ought to be checked by new legal provisions. The whole system connected with such houses is a vicious one, and requires that the licence should be attached to the person as well as to the premises. The latter portion of my Resolution adverts to the times during which houses should be open. In this and in other respects, on which there is not now time to dwell, a free hand should be given to Local Authorities, so that the public opinion of their localities may be accurately reflected by their action. In conclusion, I wish to advert to the present position of this matter. It is admitted on all hands that there must be some reform. The proposals made by the Government in 1888 and 1890 were on a par with this. Many of us on this side of the House opposed those proposals. I opposed them because I shall always oppose the putting into the Bill of any words which seem to me to increase in any degree whatever estate or interest there may be in a licence. Since this Resolution first appeared on the Paper—on the 20th of March last—a very important event has taken place. The decision has been given in the final appeal in the great case—as it will, I believe, hereafter be called—of “Sharp v. Wakefield.” The Judges of the House of Lords, the highest Court in the land, have declared in unmis-subtakable terms what is the law on the ject. I am told that some people say there is no alteration in the law. I admit that entirely. It is very much what we said on this side of the House in 1888 and 1890. The Solicitor General (Sir E. Clarke) advised the Government differently and the Government based their policy on his advice. The Solicitor General has publicly admitted in a letter which I think does him very great credit indeed, that he was mistaken. However, the policy of the Government having turned out to be wrong, the ground is now clear on their side. They have made a mistake and are no longer bound by the position which arose out of that mistake. On the other hand, I, for one, admit that our destructive attitude in 1888 and 1890, successful as it was, places on us a burden of responsibility, and that we are bound to depart from it whenever we have the opportunity of doing so. That opportunity seems to me now to have come. What, then, is the method of procedure we should adopt? I think the only successful way towards licensing reform will be to lay down at the outset a few broad principles on which men who are in earnest in all quarters of the House are agreed. If we can do that I think the details might be fairly threshed out in some of the conferences that are going on up and down the country, and possibly, in another Session, we might find ourselves much nearer agreement. I am not sure that the time has come for actually crystallising into the shape of a Bill, the proposals that are regarded as necessary. To show the kind of conferences I mean, I may say that in the Leeds Mercury of to-day there is a most interesting account of an important conference which took place in that borough yesterday, and I am glad to say that the first letter I received this afternoon when I came down to the House was one containing a resolution from that representative conference thoroughly endorsing the Motion I am now moving. It is because it is my strong conviction that this Resolution would, if it were adopted, be a solid step in the progress of this great question of licensing reform—a question which I have throughout my life been convinced lies at the root of the social wellbeing of the people of this country—that I have the honour most respectfully and earnestly to ask its adoption by the House.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

“That this House is of opinion that a large reduction in the number of houses in England licensed for the sale of intoxicating liquors is desirable, and that Local Authorities should be intrusted with further powers of control over the issue of such licences and with respect to the days and hours during which the licensed houses should be open.”—(Mr. J. E. Ellis.)

*(9.42.) MR. FORREST FULTON (West Ham, N.): I must congratulate the hon. Member who has just sat down upon the moderate character of his speech. I entirely agree with that portion of his speech in which he laid stress on the fact that all Parties in this House are agreed that there is an excessive number of licensed houses. For my own part, I also entirely concur with him in the opinion I understood him to express that the excessive number of public houses does produce excessive drinking. As to the hon. Member's proposal that the granting of licences should be subject to local control, I must point out that he did not in any way indicate what was the nature of the local control he desired to establish. For my own part, I think that licensing questions have always been dealt with by the Licensing Justices with conspicuous wisdom, fairness, and moderation. At the same time, I am fully conscious of the fact that there has been growing up for a long time past among many who differ on other questions a belief that the licensing question should be handed over to some Local Authority. I certainly think it is incumbent upon those who seek to take the licensing power away from the Justices to show what is the nature of the Local Authority they propose to substitute for the Licensing Justices. If the hon.

Member had expressed himself in favour of handing over the control of licences to the County Councils I should certainly have opposed such a suggestion, because I believe that to take that step would be to throw an apple of discord among them, and to render it difficult for Local Government to be carried on in the harmonious manner in which I am glad to think it has hitherto been carried on under the Act introduced by my right hon. Friend the President of the Local Government Board. If we are to have a Local Authority at all which is to deal with licensing, I would prefer that it should be a Local Authority elected solely ad hoc. I think I may maintain that I am on this point in advance of my hon. Friend, who somewhat trembles on the brink of his own Resolution, and has not had the courage to declare what is the Local Authority he would wish to set up. I will now pass to the Amendment of which I have given notice, and I may claim that I have a very clean record on this question. I have always entertained the opinions to which I have just given expression, and have always adhered to the belief that whenever the licensing question comes to be settled it can only be settled if Parliament is prepared to adopt some system of equitable compensation. The hon. Member frankly admitted that it was a great misfortune that Mr. Bruce's Bill did not become law many years ago, and he drew attention to the beneficial results which would by this time have accrued if that measure had passed into law. I would remind him that the reason why it did not pass was that it was opposed by those who call themselves advocates of temperance in this House. My hon. Friend says he is very much astonished that anyone should come forward in the month of April, 1891, and suggest, after the experience of last year and previous years, that there is any ground for saying there should be any compensation given for the reduction of licensed houses. The Resolution proposes that there should be a large reduction in the number of houses, and my hon. Friend says we are now at a particularly favourable moment for dealing with the question, because the House of Lords has declared in "Sharp v. Wakefield" that Licensing Justices have power to take away any licence at the end of the ensuing year.

*MR. J. E. ELLIS: I did not quite say that. What I meant to convey was that we were in a favourable position because the attitude of the Government in 1888 and 1890 had by the admissions of their Solicitor General turned out to be mistaken.

*MR. FORREST FULTON: I understood him to suggest that the decision in "Sharp v. Wakefield" was a great turning point in the question of licensing reform, and that it enabled us to approach the question from a satisfactory standpoint. Well, speaking of the licensing proposals of the Government last year I ventured to express an opinion that the previous decisions of the Courts on that point were perfectly accurate. To my mind there never was any doubt whatever that the licence was granted for a single year, and that if the Justices chose to take away that licence for any reason—or even without any reason—there was no further question of law which could be discussed. But, then, my friend forgets, and all temperance reformers forget, and all temperance speakers and agitators forget, one fact, which I venture to bring forward, and that is this: that while the decision in the case of "Sharp v. Wakefield" establishes the fact that Licensing Justices may in certain cases take away licences if so advised, it leaves untouched the incontestable circumstance that there exists a large number of licensed houses (and it is highly important that the attention of the House should be directed to them) which have had conferred upon them an absolute vested statutory right of renewal every year. I refer to the beerhouses licensed on the 1st May, 1869, and I desire to express my great regret that when last year this question was raised in this House, and gave rise, as we all remember, to so much heat and acrimony, the Government, in proposing to allocate £350,000 to the extinction of licences, did not propose to limit this appropriation to those houses which undoubtedly possess a statutory vested interest. As to the number of these houses the Return of 1870 throws light on this point. In the year 1869 beer-houses were brought under the control of the Magistrates for the first time. Prior to that date their licences were derived simply from the Excise. In the year 1869 the Legislature conferred upon Justices of the Peace the control of such houses, but it was provided specially that all—

“‘On’ licences of beerhouses existing on the 1st May, 1869, should have an absolute right of renewal, provided that the licence-holder showed himself to be a man of good character, and the house was of a certain rateable value.”

On the 26th of April, 1870, on the Motion of Mr. Locke, a Return was ordered, and it appears from this Return that at that time—1870—there were 63,419 fully-licensed public-houses in England and Wales—apart, that is, from the Metropolis which was dealt with separately—and 45,203 “on” beer-houses, so that no less than 44 per cent. of the licensed houses of the country had in 1870 an absolute vested right to renewal. Coming to London, I find that the number of fully licensed houses was 5,950, and of “on” beerhouses 3,927 so that here again a very large proportion of the total number of licensed houses had an absolute vested right to renewal. Now it will be said—and it was said in the course of the Debate last year—that these figures do not show the numbers in regard to the licensed houses at the present time; to a certain extent this is true. But, fortunately, a Return was obtained by the noble Lord the Member for South Paddington, which showed that there was no material difference between the number licensed on the 1st of May, 1869, and of those licensed subsequently. What I desire to point out is this, that anybody acquainted in any way with the subject of licensing knows perfectly well that during the intervening period it has not been the general practice of Justices to grant any but full licences—except in the case of restaurants and other places where eating takes place—so that the number cannot really be very different from that of the Return of 1870. According to the Return of 1870, Birmingham, for instance, with the district immediately surrounding, had 867 fully-licensed houses, and 1,432 beer houses; Bolton, 1,724 fully-licensed, and 2,503 beer-houses; Gloucester, 771 fully-licensed, and 770 beerhouses; Halifax, 1,037 fully-licensed, and 1,558 beerhouses; Manchester, 1,384 fully-licensed, and 3,877 beerhouses; Warrington, 1,648 fully-licensed, and 1,850 beerhouses; Bristol, 631 fully-licensed, and 1,057 beerhouses; Liverpool, where for some years there was free trade in drink, 2,020 fully-licensed, and 881 beer-houses; York, 1,166 fully-licensed, and 367 beerhouses; and Bangor, 1,080 fully-licensed, and 105 beerhouses. According to the Return of the noble Lord the Member for Paddington, in 1890 the figures were—Bristol, 429 fully-licensed, and 542 beerhouses; Manchester, 494 fully-licensed, and 1,640 beerhouses; Derby, 253 fully-licensed, and 97 beerhouses; Gloucester, 119 fully-licensed, and 97 beerhouses; Birmingham, 655 fully-licensed, and 1,030 beer-houses; Bolton, 128 fully-licensed, and 265 beerhouses; West Ham 141 fully-licensed, and 113 beerhouses; Yorkshire (West Riding), 2,129 fully-licensed, and 991 beerhouses; Gloucestershire, 741 fully-licensed, and 638 beerhouses; Kent, 1,617 fully-licensed, and 1,065 beerhouses; Middlesex, 4,364 fully-licensed, and 2,056 beerhouses; and Essex, 1,140 fully-licensed, and 691 beerhouses. The House will see that the question of compensation will always face them whenever they come to deal with the licensing problem, unless they are prepared to adopt a policy of confiscation and to break a Parliamentary compact solemnly entered into in 1869. When the matter comes to be dealt with, it will be found that these beerhouses licensed on the 1st of May, 1869, have an undeniable claim to compensation if their licences are refused renewal. That is the point to which I invite the attention of the House. Either you are going to compensate the owners of these houses whose licences are refused renewal, or you are not. If you are not, you will be practising sheer confiscation. If you are, you will be compensating the owners of the very class of houses which by universal testimony it is most desirable of all others to extirpate, and which form the enormous proportion of 44 per cent. of the licensed houses of the United Kingdom. Then, again, apart altogether from the question of what is due in particular to these beerhouses, though I have never had any doubt myself as to the power of the Justices to refuse the renewal of licences, yet, on the other hand, I have not the least doubt that a person possessing a licensed house has an equitable property in his licence which may not be injured and destroyed by non-renewal without compensation unless there is reasonable ground for such a proceeding. The Act of 1872 expressly provides that a licence shall not be taken away unless there have been three recorded convictions under the Act in the case of the house in question, and it gives to the owners of the licence the right of appeal in the case of each of these convictions—stipulating that, on the second conviction, the owner shall have due notice of the fact that his property is in peril, in order that he may take the needful steps to defend it. Now, it is inconceivable that such provisions as these could be inserted in the Act unless they are intended to imply that some form of property does appertain to a licensed house. Further, the Legislature was careful to enact that even if, after three recorded convictions, the licence is not renewed, the licence-holder shall not be disqualified for more than five years, or the premises for more than two years. In the year 1874 an Amendment to the Licensing Act was made by the introduction of what are called provisional grants. It had been felt to be a grievance that persons about to erect expensive houses, to be used for the sale of intoxicating liquors, could not be certain whether, after they had expended their money, they would be able to get a licence. Accordingly the Act of 1874 provided that persons might lay before the Licensing Authority plans of houses intended to be erected, and obtain a provisional grant of a licence for the premises when erected in accordance with those plans. They could ask the Justices to give a licence in advance for a house which they contemplated erecting; and, having obtained this provisional licence, could set to work and build their house, confident that, provided it was erected in compliance with the plans laid before the Justices, they would obtain for it a licence when completed. Can it be believed that the Legislature, in making this provision, intended that in the case of such premises there should be no rights of property? Certainly no man in his senses would think of investing money in such a building if he knew that it was in the power of some Local Authority to decline, without any reason, to renew the licence required. Therefore, I think it is clearly a consequence of the Act of 1872 that no licence ought to be taken away, except for some good reason, without equitable compensation being given to those pecuniarily interested in the licence; and it is because I hope and believe that Parliament will never sanction such a proposal as that contained in the Resolution, unless accompanied by equitable compensation to persons having a pecuniary interest in the licences dealt with, that I now beg to move the Amendment that stands in my name.

Amendment proposed, after the first word "That," to insert the words "provided equitable compensation be given."
—(Mr. Forrest Fulton.)

CAPTAIN BETHELL (York, E.R., Holderness): I beg to second the Amendment.

*(10.10.) MR. J. MORLEY (Newcastle-upon-Tyne): The hon. and learned Gentleman who has moved the Amendment has stated the grounds of it with great fairness and moderation. The hon. and learned Gentleman, I am glad to know, agrees with those of us who support this Motion in its first proposition—that there is an excessive number of public houses, and in the further proposition that that excess in public houses must give rise to excess in drinking. The man who does not believe that, is capable of believing anything. He went on to controvert the second proposition in the Motion, which is that control ought to be conferred upon the Local Authorities over the issue of licences. Although the hon. and learned Member agrees that there is an excessive number of public houses, yet the commends the conspicuous wisdom and success of the Magistrates who are responsible for that state of things.

ADMIRAL FIELD (Sussex, Eastbourne): No, no!

*MR. FORREST FULTON: May I remind the right hon. Gentleman that the number of licensed houses is due to a condition of things which existed at least 20 years ago, for which certainly the present Licensing Justices are not responsible?

*MR. J. MORLEY: The hon. and learned Member cannot deny they are mainly responsible for that very excess which he condemned. Then the hon. and learned Member repeated the argument he brought before the House last year in connection with the beer licences existing on May 1, 1869. There was an answer made to that argument then which, I think, holds good now. He has given us the figures of 1870, but he has given us no proof whatever that the figures of 1870 are still the authentic figures on the subject. I have been supplied with figures for which I am not personally responsible; but I see no reason to doubt that they are as good as those given by the hon. and learned Gentleman. According to my figures, there are now in existence only some 38,000 "on" beer licences. The hon. and learned Member went on in what is, after all, the most important part of his speech to make very extraordinary assertions with a view to minimising the effect of the decision in "Sharp v. Wakefield." I know that the hon. and learned Gentleman has a knowledge of licensing matters such as few other Members of the House have; but, in spite of that, I must prefer to believe that the decision of the Courts below in the first place, and of the House of Lords in the second, is even of superior authority to the opinions of my hon. and learned Friend. He has, in fact, only repeated the arguments used before the House of Lords by the learned Counsel who has since been made a Judge. If, therefore, the House of Lords, having heard all the arguments that have now been adduced, yet decided against the proposition which the hon. and learned Gentleman asks the House to accept, the House will not be wrong if they assume that the House of Lords, in confirming the judgment of the Court of Appeal, knew what they were about. We may, therefore, assume that the propositions of the hon. and learned Gentleman cannot be sustained; and I will undertake to say they will never again be endorsed by a lawyer speaking from the Front Ministerial Bench with the official responsibility of a Law Adviser of the Crown. The hon. and learned Gentleman said, "Here is property, how can we destroy it?" But the House of Lords has decided that there is no property. I will not go through the various propositions he laid down, because I think the sense of the country has already appreciated the full force of that judgment, and confirms the position taken up by the Mover of the Resolution, that it marks a critical turning point in the whole question of licensing. We may hope that this great social and moral cause is being lifted out of the region of mere Party strife; but I must say that this Amendment, being in exact conformity with the utterances of the Prime Minister and the Leaders of the Conservative Party, does make one doubt whether it will be possible in the future course of the question to keep it outside of Party. I do not in the least object to the Amendment being moved; on the contrary, I am rather glad of it, because it cannot be denied that this Amendment does raise a direct issue with the Motion. It is not a mere rider upon the Motion, but it raises a direct issue with it. In spite of its innocent and equitable pretensions, the Amendment is intended, or at all events it is bound, to bring to nought both the propositions of the Mover. If you insist upon the proposal to pay compensation in all the length and breadth which the hon. and learned Gentleman laid down, then it is of no use to say that a large reduction in the number of licences is desirable, and it is of no use saying that it is desirable to transfer the control over licences to Local Authorities. If you accept the hon. and learned Member's views as to compensation, you will have to go on with your excessive number of public houses, and you will not be able to transfer the control of them to Local Authorities. As far as compensation goes, I frankly confess I have never left out of sight those equitable considerations which ought to guide us, and to weigh with us, in dealing with great interests which have grown up during the prevalence of a natural belief that an existing legislative policy would endure. I believe even the hon. Baronet the Member for Cockermouth has himself voted for a compensation Resolution.

SIR W. LAWSON (Cumberland, Cockermouth): Equitable.

*MR. J. MORLEY: That is quite true. But the decision in "Sharp v. Wakefield" makes a great difference. What the Mover called, the monstrous and portentous growth of the tied house system—that, too, makes a great difference. Parliament never contemplated that brewers, or syndicates of brewers, should own vast numbers of tied houses, and I hope it never will. There is a huge distinction in morals—and it must be when the time comes that the Legislature will recognise it—between those owners of great numbers of tied houses, and the licensed victualler who carries on a trade in his own house. Now, in either class, a claim to money compensation can only arise in case of a change being suddenly made. Notice makes all the difference. Even with regard to an individual publican carrying on his own house, it will not be possible much longer to maintain that he has not had, and is not every day having, notice. The judgment in the Over Darwen case was notice; the decision in "Sharp v. Wakefield" is notice; the great tide of public opinion which was so strong in 1888 and 1890 that it would even have destroyed the Government if they had not yielded to it, that again was notice. The vote on the Welsh Veto Bill was notice. And when we read in the Return presented last year the astonishing facts connected with tied houses, it is impossible to maintain that a great change will have been suddenly made. I do not believe, upon any principle of equity with which I am acquainted, it will be possible in the face of these circumstances to contend for compensation. Prophecy has been described as the most gratuitous of all forms of mistake, and, therefore, I will not exactly prophesy; but I will express my doubt whether any Minister will ever again stand at that box and propose compensation by way of money payment. My own impression is that if the doctrine of compensation be entertained at all, it will be carried out by some arrangement of time by which a man actually in a public house may, by a certain period of enjoyment, have all reasonable expectations satisfied. Anyone who watches closely the signs of the times, and the enormous rapidity with which this question has gained its hold upon public opinion, must be aware that the sands in the glass are running out, and that even this time limit will, as the discussion proceeds, become shorter and shorter. There is one point in the decision in "Sharp v. Wakefield" which I should be sorry to overlook, because it has an immediate bearing on what is going to be done before the end of this year in Licensing Sessions. The Lord Chancellor said—

"It is not denied that, for the purposes of the original grant, it is within the power, and it is even the duty, of the Magistrates to consider the wants of the neighbourhood with reference both to population, the means of inspection by authorities, and so forth."

Mark, it is not merely within their power, but it is their duty. According to this decision, of which the hon. and learned Gentleman opposite makes so light, it is as much the duty of Licensing Magistrates, at their forthcoming Sessions and at all future times, to cancel unnecessary licences as it is within their power to grant necessary licences. They are not merely empowered; they are in duty bound to reduce licences. The hon. and learned Gentleman may dispute that reading of the judgment, but I do not believe any other reading is possible. The Amendment is fatal to the propositions of the Resolution. As to Local Authorities, no doubt the term, standing baldly by itself, needs explanation. We all agree that the number of public houses is excessive; the licensed victuallers agree in that; the President of their Defence League said not long ago—

"The trade as a body have for long believed that there is a very large number of houses which might be reasonably dispensed with, and that some thousands of existing licences might advantageously be cancelled."

We are all agreed, too, I think, both in this House and outside it, that there ought to be popular control over the issue of licences. ["No!"] Someone opposite said "No." That is very extraordinary, because the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board will not dispute, I think, that the policy of the Government was based upon that assumption. ["No!"] It must be so; everybody must feel that the control must be removed from a nominated and irresponsible body to a body answerable to public opinion. My hon. Friend the Mover of this Resolution said there were three courses open, and he included among them the maintenance of the licensing power in the present hands. For my own part, I banish that last course from my contemplation. I do not think that public opinion will tolerate it. The whole opinion of the times is in favour of transferring the control of these matters to Representative Bodies. Therefore, you have two courses. You must either transfer the control of the issue of licences and other licensing matters to Municipal Bodies in the boroughs and to County Councils in the counties, or else you must transfer these powers to bodies created ad hoc, just as the School Boards were created for educational matters. Whichever of these two Local Authorities you choose, whichever seems best calculated to attain the ends we all have in view, the question of the nature of the Local Authority becomes a secondary question, if you admit the principle which my hon. Friend the Mover of this Motion contended for, and which I contended for in dealing with the Welsh Local Veto Bill. I say that the question of the nature of the Local Authority becomes secondary if you admit the principle of direct popular veto. Whether you intrust your licensing power to Municipal Councils, or to Licensing Bodies created ad hoc, does not matter—though I have a strong preference—provided you submit to the ratepayers for their decision the three questions which were put in the Welsh and the Scotch Bills. That is to say, you must ask them—if a sufficient number require the question to be put—whether they will prohibit licences altogether, or whether they will reduce the number of licences, or whether they will prevent the granting of new licences. I put it to those very advanced temperance reformers who find fault with the Motion before the House, whether the nature of the Local Authority matters from their point of view, provided that you have this means of obtaining directly the real wish of a preponderant majority of the ratepayers on these crucial questions. I know that some advanced temperance reformers object to any elective authority whatever interfering in this matter. They object to what they regard as a partnership and a complicity in an obnoxious and wicked traffic. I perceive the full point of that objection, but I do not share it or sympathise with it; and whatever view may be taken by the advanced temperance reformers, I only express my own conviction that, as far as I can read the signs of the times, it is absolutely certain that, sooner or later, these powers will be transferred to a Local Authority. And all that I can hope for and work for is that that Local Authority shall have the guidance of a direct popular vote on the three questions that I have mentioned. Then as to the choice between transferring these powers to Municipal Councils and to Licensing Authorities created ad hoc, the arguments in favour of entrusting the powers to Municipal Bodies were stated by the noble Lord the Member for Paddington (Lord R. Churchill) when he brought forward his Motion last year. It is said that these bodies are of great weight and authority; that, having much other business in hand, they are less affected by trade interests on the one hand, or by what is called temperance fanaticism on the other hand; that they are not likely to go too far ahead of public opinion; finally, that this proposal would meet with less resistance in this House. I think the last argument is rather a lazy and indolent argument. But, apart from that, it seems to me, after consulting with many gentlemen who have had great experience in Local Government, and who are almost unanimous on the point, that, as I ventured to say in discussing the Welsh Local Veto Bill, no greater disservice could be rendered to that cause of Local Government to which, mark you, we are giving such enormous powers, and which is destined more and more to affect our political and social system, than to mix up with it a business which, like the temperance question, cuts deep into so many interests and rouses so many strong and even violent passions. If you gave control of the liquor question to Municipal Councils, one of two things would happen. Either it would overshadow all other questions, which would be a great evil, or else it would recede entirely out of sight and be forgotten, which would also be a great evil. I do not know which would be the greater evil of the two; but either would, in my judgment, be most injurious to Local Government. Then as to Boards elected ad hoc. It may be in the recollection of some Members of the House that in 1876 Mr. Joseph Cowen, then a Member of this House representing the City that I have now the honour to represent, brought forward for the first time a proposal that licensing powers should be entrusted to a Board elected by the ratepayers, and, I rather think, that Mr. Cowen suggested also another kind of Board, not elected directly by the ratepayers for licensing purposes, but composed, for dealing with licensing questions, of two representatives from the Boards of Guardians, two from the School Boards, and two from the Municipal Councils. However, it is not worth while to go into details of that kind. They do not affect the principle that was then first brought before us. Nothing more clearly indicates the enormous growth of opinion and the extent to which popular control over licensing has now got hold of the mind of Parliament, than the reception which that proposal met with in 1876. My hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Sussex (Sir Walter Barttelot), whom we all regret not to see amongst us, who moved the rejection of Mr. Cowen's Bill, said that it was the most extraordinary Bill brought before the House of Commons for years. At that time the proposal was ignominiously thrown out. Another Bill in 1885, promoted by the Church of England Temperance Society, proposed a Board to be composed of four Justices, and of twice as many elected members. This Board was to be trusted—it was before "Sharp v. Wakefield"—with absolute discretion in what they should think most expedient in the interests of the districts they represented. Of course, the Bill had a compensation clause in it. I saw the other day a new set of proposals for Licensing Boards. According to these proposals, the Board in counties was to contain the representatives of the areas, plus an equal number of members elected by the county Magistrates within the division. In the municipalities the Council was to be the Board, plus a number of Justices acting within the district. I have only one comment to make upon all proposals of that kind, and that is a comment with which most gentlemen in this House will, I think, agree. They will feel that all devices of this kind are expedients by persons—however well-intentioned they may be, and I am quite sure that they are well-intentioned—who do not know their own minds. While they want to appear to trust the people, they do not in their hearts trust the people; and, while professing to give to the community the power of protecting itself against the evils of excessive public houses, they will not screw their courage to the point of allowing the people to say plainly yes or no to the question whether they will have public houses, or whether they will have few or many of them. I entirely disbelieve in the efficacy, either for the temperance cause or for good government, of these half-and-half Boards, just as I disbelieve in the expediency of handing licensing powers over to Municipal Councils. I do not wish to weary the House by reciting the provisions which have been adopted in the colonies for licensing control; but for those who desire to watch the drift of public opinion in this country, it is important that they should not overlook the doings in those countries whose political system, though newer than ours, is, after all, very much the same as ours. There have been, I admit—and all temperance reformers in the House know it—enormous fluctuations of opinion as to the machinery of licensing, both in the United States and in our own colonies. But what do those fluctuations show? They only show the intrinsic difficulty of the subject with which we are dealing. They also show that in democratic countries temperance and social reformers will not be content, and rightly, until some means have been adopted—and the final means can only be arrived at after many experiments—for giving to localities a direct and effective voice in the matter. There is the last Colonial Act—the Ontario Act of 1870, amended in 1890. The proposal, which I am sure everybody would like to see incorporated in the English Licensing Code, is that no new licences should be granted and no old licences should be transferred, if the majority of the electors should petition against it. If the House will consider the enormous percentage of transfers every year, this clause alone would place immense power in the hands of the community to get rid of the worst houses. Then there is this clause in the Ontario Amending Act of 1890—

"The Council of every city may pass bye-laws for prohibiting sale by retail of liquors in any tavern, inn, or other house or place of public entertainment, and for prohibiting altogether the sale thereof in shops or places other than houses of public entertainment, provided that the bye-law has been approved of by the electors of the municipality in manner provided."

This shows how backward we are in this country relatively to some of our own kinsfolk; but it cannot be denied that we are growing less and less backward exactly in proportion as public opinion finds means of expressing itself. The reduction of the franchise and the redistribution of political power have been followed by louder and louder voices in favour of the kind of control which we are advocating here to-night. The more clearly you hear the popular voice, the more loud and distinct is that voice in favour of legislation of this kind. I do not know why we should wonder at it. Would anybody in this House like to have near his own door a flaunting gin-palace with its noise, its reek of liquor, its scenes of disorder? Would he like to have even a well-conducted house? Why, then, should we be surprised that workmen, with wives, and sons, and daughters, object as vehemently as we should to the proximity of these centres of annoyance, disorder, and disturbance? I believe that feeling was at the root of the indignant and, I may say, the fierce cry against compensation in 1889-90. Workmen who have suffered all the annoyance springing from these houses, that are a standing nuisance to their daily lives, cannot understand why they should have in order to abate the nuisance to put their hands into their pockets and buy out the men who have been the means of tormenting them. Whether we like it or not, and whatever we think of it, this tide of opinion is certain to go on and swell. Lord Salisbury said in 1886, and said most unwisely, that the demand for this legislation was a temporary craze, and, like all other crazes, would pass away. I think that was a most unfortunate piece of misjudgment. It is not a temporary craze. It is a rational demand on the part of the community to protect themselves. It is not a temporary craze, because the more clearly you gather the popular voice, the more distinctly you perceive the determination of the people to get the power to protect themselves against what is admitted now on all sides to be the greatest curse that can afflict a community.

*(10.52.) MR. MILVAIN (Durham): It is admitted, I think, on both sides of the House that there is an excess of public houses, and that it is desirable that the number should be decreased, but there seems to be some uncertainty as to what means are to be adopted in order to bring about that decrease. It seems to me that the spirit of the age will hinder people of small capital from investing in licensed premises, and will induce people already in the trade to get out of it as soon as they possibly can, and on the best terms they can. But I came down to the House this evening to hear what means were to be proposed by the Mover of the Resolution for reducing the number of public houses. I came to hear what Local Authority the hon. Gentleman proposed to create in order to bring about this decrease. I was unfortunate in not hearing the speech of the hon. Member who moved the Resolution, but I did hear the speech of the hon. Member who supported it; and I regret to say that after the speech to which we have just listened I am left as uncertain as I was before I came to the House as to what was to be the Local Authority in which these powers are to be vested. We have had a great deal of speculation and theory as between County Councils, Municipal Authorities, and Authorities elected ad hoc; but, for my own part, I cannot help thinking that if the authority is to be elective, no authority would be satisfactory to deal with licences which has not the administration of the rates. I am one of those persons who professing a faith prefer to hold on to it until a better one is set up in its place; and I have not—at least this evening—heard of a better authority than that which now exists. That authority is the Magistrates, and I must say that, so far as my personal experience is concerned, it has discharged its duties exceedingly well. I do not think anyone can seriously find fault with the Magistrates for not having discharged their duties equitably and fairly. That being so, I prefer to leave the licences to the Magistrates until a better authority is set up in their place. I have heard to-night—and I quite expected it—that there is a turn in the principle which ought to guide the granting of licences caused by the recent judgment in the case of “Sharp v. Wakefield.” I hope the right hon. Gentleman who supported the Amendment will not take objection if I say that the “Sharp v. Wakefield,” judgment is a declaration of the existing law upon a certain set of facts. It is not a reversal of a generally acknowledged principle. Therefore, it becomes necessary to see what is the existing law. I cannot alter a single word I have ever said in this House or elsewhere on this point. There is vested in the Justices discretionary power to refuse absolutely the continuance of a licence, but they have no power absolutely to deprive a licensee of his licence. If they do so they may be compelled to state their reasons for it. This discretion is followed by a condition which has to be exercised judicially. A refusal must be for valid reasons. That there are too many licensed houses in a certain district may be a valid reason, but the guiding principle is the character of the licence holder, and of the premises licensed. I admit that these are not the only principles that ought to guide the Justices, but they are the most important and generally accepted principles. The right hon. Gentleman has quoted from the case of “Sharp v. Wakefield,” and I, too, will quote it—I will quote the judgment of Lord Esher, which is not dissented from by the House of Lords. He said that if this discretion I have alluded to is not exercised with the greatest care irreparable injury, perhaps injustice, may be done. I say, therefore, that the Magistrates have not an absolute discretion. They have a discretion which must turn on certain guiding principles which are well laid down and recognised—which are that so long as a man's character is good, and there is no valid reason for the discontinuance of his licence, he has a vested interest in his licensed premises. Now, I admit that the occupation of the publican is not one that I would choose myself. It is a question of taste; but the individual who selects that occupation selects an occupation which is recognised by the law. It is safeguarded to some extent by the Legislature. To deprive the publican of his occupation through no fault of his own, without giving him some compensation for the outlay he has made in his premises, or of such interest as he may have in his licence, would certainly be an injustice to which I can be no party.

(11.0.) Mr. STOREY (Sunderland): Of all the Resolutions I have heard during the last 10 years, the present seems to me the most innocent and the least open to criticism. The hon. Member opposite (Mr. Forrest Fulton) admitted that the number of public houses is excessive, and so accepts the main contention of this Resolution. Is there any hon. Member who will deny that the number of public houses, especially in the manufacturing districts, is excessive? In the large towns and industrial centres of the country they have been productive of infinite mischief to the body politic.

The second contention of the Resolution of my hon. Friend is that the Local Authorities should be entrusted with further powers of control over the issue of such licences. The hon. Member in his speech did not deny the propriety of that contention. He admitted that further powers of control were necessary, though he adhered to the old plan that they should rest in the hands of the Magistrates. The Magistrates are very honourable men, occupying honourable positions, which I hope they have worthily adorned. We who sit on this side of the House would venture to say that, in this democratic age, the Magistrates could in no sense be called a Local Authority. From whom do the Magistrates derive their functions? In this House, I shall always assert, as a Democrat, that the only real base and ground work of authority must be the people, by their votes. Who says the Magistrates, as at present constituted, are in this sense a Local Authority? There may be a conflict of opinion on this side of the House as to what the Local Authority, intrusted with these powers of control shall be. I am not in favour of electing any special Licensing Board. I have had some experience during a not short life of local management in the town which I represent and the districts around it. I have seen the growth of municipal institutions in that neighbourhood. I can remember when the Town Councils of this country had functions of a moderate and limited description, and I can remember the processes by which this House has gradually laid upon these Town Councils additional and extensive powers for dealing with the large questions of public health. In that, as in other matters, the Town Councils have risen to the height of the responsibility that was attached to them, and so far from having depreciated, the Town Councils and other Public Authorities have been able to fulfil the functions bestowed upon them by this House, with great success. Therefore, I have come to the deliberate conclusion that it would be no disadvantage, but a distinct advantage, yet further to enlarge the powers of the Town Councils and County Councils. In what direction could they be more worthily extended? Where is there in the whole range of public thought any question that more nearly touches the interest of the people than the licensing question? My right hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle may desire that a special authority should be appointed for the purpose. Others of us may hold that the present elective authority would be a most efficient machine for carrying out the object we have in view. Let us talk about that; let us differ about it. Suppose we are divided on that point, does that affect the question before the House by my hon. Friend. He alleges that the Local Authorities should be entrusted with further powers of control over the issue of licences. I will not quarrel with him; as a matter of fact, I do not know what his precise opinion may be, but I will only assert against the contention of my hon. Friend opposite this view, that whatever the Local Authority to which this great power must be entrusted may be, it shall be an authority deriving its power directly from the people by election, subject to rejection if it goes wrong, and to be supported if it goes right. In that view I shall be prepared to vote for my hon. Friend. When my hon. Friend talks about further powers of control over the issue of licences I should like to take the opportunity to record my opinion of what that control should be. I believe there can be no effectual settlement of the licensing question except in one direction. I have come to the deliberate conclusion that there will be no effectual settlement until Local Authorities have the power conferred upon them by the Statute to exact an enhanced value for licences, and this I say, having examined the condition of things in America under direct veto, under the Maine Law, and under total prohibition. The licences should only be granted upon such terms as would be practically prohibitive.

*(11.17.) THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. RITCHIE, Tower Hamlets, St. George's): I listened with pleasure and satisfaction to the conclusion of the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle, in which he spoke of the growing feeling in favour of temperance and temperance reform among the working classes. I think he was quite justified in what he said with regard to this. There is that strong feeling among the working classes and it is a matter upon which we may congratulate ourselves. The right hon. Gentleman went on to say that, looking to this growing feeling among the working classes, it was unjust that they should continue to be burdened with an undue number of public houses against their will. I cannot, of course, but acknowledge, as I have acknowledged before, that there is a very considerable excess of public houses over the number required by the public demand. I have again and again stated that as being my conviction, and I have in my mind many cases of localities in which the number of public houses is not only excessive, but grossly excessive. I have always contended that when this question is dealt with, proper and adequate means of reducing this superfluity of public houses ought to be provided. But I cannot shut my eyes to the fact that it is very largely—I do not say it in any spirit of reproach—that it is very largely owing to the action of the temperance party that this great superfluity of public houses exists. We could not have a better proof of this fact than was afforded in the opening remarks of the hon. Member who brought forward this Motion in a speech, I think, of great moderation. The hon. Member says that there exist now 128,508 public houses, but that if Mr. Bruce's proposal had been accepted the number would have been reduced to 37,000. That, in itself, is a sufficient illustration of the danger to temperance that has been caused by the extreme views taken by the Temperance Party. But we also have had our experience in the matter, for we have attempted to do something in the interests of temperance. Our proposals did not commend themselves to hon. Members opposite or to many Temperance Reformers, but in 1888 we made proposals which, if accepted, would, in our opinion, have very considerably reduced the number of public houses. It is perfectly true that with our proposals we embodied the principle of compensation, but in my opinion the money which would have been derived from drink could not have been better expended than it would have been if the House had assented to our plan. Unfortunately we were unable to enlist the sympathies of the Temperance Party, and our proposals fell to the ground. Undoubtedly, however, if our proposals had been accepted, a beginning would at once have been made in the work of reducing public houses, and all new licences would have been stopped. That, in itself, would have enormously diminished the number in proportion—

SIR W. LAWSON: The Government voted against that.

*MR. RITCHIE: What the hon. Baronet and his friends desired us to do, was to take an isolated proposal from our plan as a whole. We put our proposals forward in a comprehensive shape and were not disposed to adopt the suggestion. By our proposal in 1888 a Revenue derived exclusively from increased licences would have been raised, and by its application the number of public houses would have been largely diminished. It has been said that our proposals in 1888 were made under a misapprehension, and that the decision in "Sharp v. Wakefield" has greatly altered the position which we assumed existed in 1888. I do not desire to hide from the House that when our proposals were made we were of opinion that there was a very much greater vested interest in licences than there appears to be; and I acknowledge that as far as that portion of our position was concerned we were not fully informed of what has now been established as the law on this subject. But I should like to recall to the House that whatever were the powers of Justices at that time, we expressly reserved them in the Bill of 1888. Whilst giving to a newly constituted body the power of refusing licences, we expressly reserved to the Justices their power of refusal without compensation. Whilst we acknowledge that the decision in "Sharp v. Wakefield" does establish the fact that Justices have a very wide discretion with respect to the renewal of licences, I think that no one who reads that decision can fail to remark that it is limited by the condition that the question must be treated judicially by a Judicial Body. I think, therefore, that we ought to consider that the publicans who would have had to get their licences from the non-judicial Local Bodies which we proposed to constitute might have had claims to compensation which they may not have under a system that gives the control over licences to a Judicial Body like the Justices. Again, in 1890 we made proposals which were in the main accepted by a very large body of the Temperance Party in this country. They were accepted, subject to certain modifications which we were prepared to adopt, by that very large, influential, and important body called the Church of England Temperance Society. [Ironical Opposition cheers and laughter.] I do not know why the name of the Church of England Temperance Society should be received with laughter and derision by hon. Members opposite. I do not think that even the extreme local optionist party will deny that that society has done good, useful, and even noble work with regard to temperance. I say that our proposals were proposals which met in the main with the approval of the great body known as the Church of England Temperance Society. So much, then, for the question of "Sharp v. Wakefield" and the alteration in the position which is brought about by that decision. With regard to the proposal of the hon. Member opposite, of course he knows quite well that our previous action is of such a nature as will entitle him to receive from us our approval of his propositions—first, that there is a superfluity of licensed houses; and, secondly, that when this question comes up to be dealt with it ought to be dealt with by a transfer of the licensing power from the existing authority to a Local Authority. So far, then, we agree with the hon. Member; but when we come to consider the question of what that Local Authority ought to be, we find that there is a divergence of opinion in the minds of the Temperance Party themselves. There is a great disagreement among them. The hon. Gentleman who brought forward the Motion expressed himself as in the main indifferent as to how that Local Body should be constituted.

*MR. J. E. ELLIS: I said that it was less important in comparison with the granting further powers of control.

*MR. RITCHIE: The hon. Member's argument seemed to be in favour of giving over this control to an existing Local Authority. There is no indication in the Motion of the hon. Gentleman that he contemplates for a moment setting up a Local Authority ad hoc. His proposition, read by an ordinary individual, would seem to imply that it is to be the usual authority in a borough and the County Council in the counties. The hon. Member has modified the words of his Motion by his speech. Undoubtedly a section of the Temperance Party has expressed its opinion in very forcible terms, and appealed to all the Temperance Party to alter the Motion.

*MR. J. E. ELLIS: I am sorry to interrupt the right hon. Gentleman again. As a matter of fact, I explained to Mr. Caine, who, I may say, quite approves of this Resolution, some time ago exactly what I should say as to the three courses being open, and that I did not bind myself to any form of Local Authority. My reading of the Resolution has not been in any way varied by any action taken by the Temperance Societies.

*MR. RITCHIE: The hon. Gentleman says now that long ago he conveyed to Mr. Caine, who is one of the representative men in connection with the temperance question, that he did not bind himself to any particular form of Local Authority. But, notwithstanding that, I received two or three days ago a strongly worded circular from one of the Temperance Societies, asking me to come here and oppose this Motion.

*MR. J. E. ELLIS: Will the right hon. Gentleman say what society it was?

MR. RITCHIE: I think it was the Good Templars, but I am not sure; but I do not wish to press that point. I am quite content with what the hon. Gentleman says. The hon. Gentleman says he is not very particular, what authority it is so long as it is a Local Authority. But the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle (Mr. J. Morley), deprecating this matter being referred to an ordinarily constituted Local Authority, goes in strongly for a Local Authority ad hoc, I think together with a plebiscite. I wonder what the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby thinks on the matter. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby took at one time, and, indeed, has always taken, a great interest in this matter; and I should like to learn from the right hon. Gentleman whether he approves what the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle said to-night as to an authority ad hoc or a plebiscite, because I remember in that Debate which took place on the Motion of the hon. Member for Cockermonth some years ago he expressed an opinion entirely adverse to both an authority ad hoc and a plebiscite. And so it was also with reference to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian, who, in the strongest possible terms, declined to accept any authority ad hoc or a plebiscite. What are we to do with regard to a matter of this kind when we find hon. Gentlemen all at sixes and sevens amongst themselves? A great deal has often been said with regard to the inconvenience, to say the least of it, of abstract Resolutions; but I think that if ever there was a question on which it was unwise to ask the House to commit itself by an abstract Resolution it is a matter of this kind on which there is such enormous divergence of opinion among those who support it. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian, in the very Debate to which I have just alluded, expressed an opinion strongly adverse to abstract Resolutions as a whole, and said that there was still stronger objection to an abstract Resolution on this particular question, about which there was such enormous divergence of opinion and such an amount of complication. I have endeavoured to show that, although undoubtedly it is desirable, in our opinion, that a Local Authority should have these powers, the opinion held by the Temperance Reformers is of such a character as not to tempt us to embark lightly upon such a difficult and delicate task as that of putting proposals with regard to this question before the House. One word on the question of compensation. I have alluded to the decision in "Sharp v. Wakefield." I acknowledge the full force of it; but I have asked the House to consider whether, assuming it to be the law of the land, it is right and proper that such a great change as the hon. Gentleman asks us to make—that of changing the licensing power from a judicial to a locally-elected Body—should be made without some consideration for those who have built up a great business and embarked an enormous capital under what they thought to be the protection of the law. Whatever may be the legal position of this matter, I am certain of this: that that public sense of equity, which I believe exists throughout the length and breadth of the land, would revolt at any idea of a general suppression of these houses, upon which an enormous amount of capital has been embarked, without the smallest consideration for those who have been carrying on a legitimate business in an orderly way, and supplying a great public want, believing they were doing so under the protection of the law. I may say to those gentlemen who support the cause of temperance that they could not be doing a greater injustice to their own cause, they could not be inflicting a greater blow upon the cause they are advocating than by attempting the suppression of public houses without considering the equitable claims which those who have embarked upon this trade have upon the public if they are suppressed. For our part we take our stand upon the proposition that this reform cannot be carried out without considering the equitable and proper claims of those who are carrying on the trade; and that being our view, though acknowledging the main proposition in the Resolution of the hon. Gentleman opposite, we cannot assent to it without also adding to it the words which have been moved by my hon. Friend.

(11.41.) SIR W. LAWSON: It is rather a hard task for me to speak on this question, for everybody has been making my speech. But I should not like the Debate to close without saying with how much pleasure I heard the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle. There was very little, if anything, in all he said with which the most earnest temperance reformer could not agree in all its details. I am very glad the hon. Gentleman opposite moved his Amendment, because it has brought forth the speech we have just listened to from the right hon. Gentleman. It has induced him to nail his colours to the mast. We now know that compensation is still the policy of the Party opposite. I am delighted at that. Let them go to the country on compensation, and we will beat them again upon that question as we have beaten them before. But what does compensation mean? The hon. Member opposite speaks of equitable compensation. Well, I will vote for the Amendment of the hon. Gentleman opposite if he will state satisfactorily what equitable means. Equity means doing justice to all parties. Let, then, the hon. Gentleman do justice to the people whom the publicans have injured. If the compensation is to be applied all round, if those who have suffered by the erection of public houses near their property, and if the ratepayers who have had to pay heavier taxes in consequence of the drink traffic, are to be compensated, then I say I will vote for the Amendment. But the hon. Gentleman makes no sign, and therefore I shall vote against his Amendment. As to the Motion of my hon. Friend, I think it has been somewhat misrepresented. It has been attacked by certain Temperance Bodies, with the best intention no doubt. Those bodies seem to think that the Motion excludes the direct veto; but those who heard the speech of my hon. Friend will see that what he wants to do is to quicken the Licensing Authorities, and make them more effective. He is perfectly willing that the direct veto shall be incorporated. On the ground that there are too many drink shops, and that it is desirable to get rid of them, I shall certainly vote for the Motion of my hon. Friend.

(11.45.) MR. A. R. D. ELLIOT (Roxburgh): I think the general principle of conferring upon the Local Authorities some of that jurisdiction which is now exercised under the general law of the land by the Magistrates has been affirmed over and over again, and that being so, I do not see why the Motion on the Paper should not be accepted by the House. Unfortunately, as I think, an Amendment has been put on the Paper which introduces very great difficulty into the discussion. It is difficult to know what will be the use made of the decision to which the House will come. We cannot disregard the state of things that has come into existence since the recent decision of the House of Lords. The House of Lords has declared, as regards full licences, that the publican has no legal right whatever to anything beyond his yearly interest under his licence, and now the House is asked to affirm as a general principle that the reduction of licences should be accomplished by some sort of system of compensation. I have always held it would be a great misfortune if the House of Commons or Parliament were to lay down a principle of general compensation. I fully admit that circumstances may arise, and do arise, in individual cases when it would be inequitable not to consider the claims of owner or publican. But that is very different to laying down a broad and general system of compensation. Yet if we carry this Amendment we shall be laying down that principle. I am one of those who cordially supported last year the proposals of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, because I thought them perfectly sound and fair. Those proposals were not for compensation. It was merely a scheme for buying up public houses with a view to their suppression. As we know, these houses are continually being sold in the market. But the proposal of this Amendment is totally different. It proposes to declare that the licence, which the highest Court of Law has declared to be only a yearly interest, should be taken to include something more. Its adoption would prove that the opinion of the House of Commons is contrary to the law as recently laid down. I know that this is a ticklish question, and that the constituencies are very much interested in the decision at which we may arrive, but I say we should be tying our hands by carrying such an Amendment as this. I think the House of Commons will be entering on a retrograde path if they accept the Amendment, and I shall therefore vote against it.

(11.51.) MR. DE LISLE (Leicestershire, Mid): I am one of the supporters of the Government who was, unfortunately, last year unable to support their compensation proposals. To-day I cannot support either the Motion or the Amendment. I thank the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board for his able defence of the vote I gave last year. The proposals of the Government last year were made under a 'misapprehension of the law. I think the sense of the country is better expressed in these words—"That this House is of opinion that a large reduction in the number of those who drink intoxicating liquors to excess is desirable, and that drunkards should be intrusted with farther powers of self-control over their unruly appetites, both in respect of the days and hours when public houses are open and when they are closed." As I believe that the present proposal to transfer the control over the liquor traffic from the House of Commons to Local Authorities is a dangerous one, I cannot support the Motion. I should be very loth to see the temperance question transferred either to the County Councils or to the District Councils which are to be established. The principle of local option is most dangerous, and therefore I am unable to support either the original Motion or the Amendment. I may be allowed to point out that in the proposals made by the Government last year there was no guarantee to the public that they would get anything for their money. When the Slave Trade was abolished the return obtained for the compensation was the release of the slaves; but here we have no guarantee that the liquor traffic will be diminished; it is only a scheme to reduce the channels through which the liquor is distributed. I hope, therefore, that both proposals before the House will be negatived by a large majority.

Resolved, That this House is of opinion that, provided equitable compensation be given, a large reduction in the number of houses in England licensed for the sale of Intoxicating Liquors is desirable, and that local authorities should be entrusted with further powers of control over the issue of such Licences, and with respect to the days and hours during which the licensed houses should be open.

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

*(12.55.) MR. J. ROWLANDS (Finsbury, E.): This is the third occasion on which the House has been asked to consider this question. In 1884, for the first time, a Bill of this description was introduced by my hon. Friend the Member for West Nottingham (Mr. Broadhurst), and in 1889 a second Bill was introduced by my hon. Friend the Member for West St. Pancras (Mr. Lawson). Between those periods a great deal has taken place in regard to the question of town lands. It has been usual in this House to have a great many discussions on the land question in relation to agriculture, but hitherto scarcely any time whatever has been absorbed on the question of the tenure of town lands. I have not the slightest doubt, however, that in the course of a few years the House will have to devote considerable attention to the subject. Since the question was first mooted, seven years ago, a large amount of official information has been given which did not exist at the time the hon. Member for West Nottingham was induced to bring the question forward. We have had a Royal Commission upon the Housing of the Working Classes, and it is well-known that a majority of that Commission expressed their views very decidedly upon the question of leasehold enfranchisement. I know it is said that the question did not come within the purview of that Commission; but I take it that as the Commission was appointed by Her Majesty to consider the whole question of the housing of the working classes, it was quite within the scope of the inquiry for the Commissioners to investigate anything regarding the tenure of town lands which they thought might have a bearing upon the better housing of the people. It may be said, further, that although a majority of the Commission were in favour of giving leasehold enfranchisement, there were several important members of the Commission who did not sign the Supplementary Report. The Chairman, however, did sign the Report, and although there were several other Supplementary Reports, to neither of them did the Chairman—Sir Charles Dilke—attach his name. His views on the question are well-known, and, as far as I can ascertain, there has been only one distinct opinion expressed against the Report of the majority, namely, by the present head of the Government—the Marquess of Salisbury. Not only have we now before us the official information obtained by the Commission, but in 1884 we had an important series of Returns called for by the late Earl Granville from our Representatives in foreign countries. The importance of these Returns cannot be over-estimated. It was thought desirable to ascertain the custom in every European country, and with that object Lord Granville sent a series of questions to our Representatives. The most astounding thing is that the answers show that in no European country is there to be found the same system which exists here, namely, that people are induced to build houses on an insecure tenure. Mr. Thornton, reporting upon the custom in Switzerland, said that absolute ownership was the only condition known to the Swiss, and that they knew nothing of the conditions which exist in this country, such as copyhold, leasehold, and so forth. It will, therefore, be seen that we are dealing with a system of tenure peculiar to this country which does not apply to any other part of Europe, and a system, further, which does not prevail in the whole of the United Kingdom. When the question was last before the House the Town Holdings Committee had produced three substantial volumes of evidence, but had not presented their Report. Since then they have reported, and an instructive part of their Report is the information they have collected as to existing tenures in England, Ireland, Scotland, and Wales. It is a curious thing that the terminable leasehold system—the short leaseholds of 99 years as distinguished from those of 999 years—does not exist in a very considerable portion of the United Kingdom. In Lancashire there is a perpetual system of tenure; in Scotland, we have feu-farm rents and perpetual tenure; in the North of England, in such places as Leeds, we have the freehold system, and the short tenures which are common in the South of England, in parts of the West, and in Wales, are unknown. The tenures in Cornwall will be dealt with by my hon. Friend the Member for St. Austell (Mr. W. A. M'Arthur), who will, I believe, give some most important information. We have made considerable progress since the question was last before the House in 1889, and the Report of the Town Holdings Committee puts an entirely new face upon the matter. The great amount of interest which the question entails is to be seen in the Petitions which have been presented to the House by Corporate Bodies. During the present Session more than one Corporate Body has petitioned in favour of this Bill. Upon the last occasion that the question was discussed there was a Petition from the Carnarvon County Council; there has since been one from the County of Anglesea and several others to the same effect, all in favour of the Bill, as well as a Petition from the London County Council. The contention is that the present system is detrimental to the welfare of the community, and demands amendment. It is said that we are interfering with the rights of the landlord; but the noble Lord the Member for South Paddington (Lord R. Churchill), writing a few years ago to one of his constituents, declared that "He would never be a party to wrong and injustice, that the good of the State stands far above freedom of contract, and that when the two forces clash the latter will have to give way."

The evidence given before the Town Holdings Committee proves that the leasehold system tends to bad building, and that, worse than all, towards the end of a lease it operates in inducing tenants to allow dwellings, which are largely inhabited by the working classes, to become dilapidated. When a man gets within the last 20 years of his lease he will decline to make any great structural alterations if he can possibly avoid it, because he knows very well that he cannot possibly get back the money he may expend. I know it is said that we have good ground landlords who will look after the interests of the tenants, and that they will see that all the covenants of the lease are fulfilled. No doubt they do, but it is only when the property is about to pass into their hands, and not before. As to the question of freedom of contract, if we can make out a case that an alteration of the law is justifiable, I maintain that Parliament should do what it has done in other cases and break contracts, if the breaking of contracts is necessary, to bring about a better state of things. The time has gone by when we can put a thing upon a pedestal and never interfere with it, even when it is found to be opposed to the general good of the community; and in this case I hope, before I sit down, to show that the system we are anxious to remedy does come into collision with the good of the community, and it is for that reason that I ask the House to give a Second Reading to this Bill.

MR. WEBSTER (St. Pancras, E.): I rise, Sir, to call your attention to the fact that there are not 40 Members present.

MR. SPEAKER: I have very recently satisfied the House that there were 40 Members present.

*MR. J. ROWLANDS: I have referred to the Town Holdings Committee and to the evidence taken before it, and I think I ought not to omit this opportunity of drawing attention to the classes of witnesses who were examined by that Committee, and the nature of the evidence they gave. There were witnesses representing every class of society who advocated the change proposed by this Bill. We had before us practical builders, and working men who, by their own thrift, had become possessed of their own houses, all in favour of our remedy. What had we on the other side? We had a number of professional gentlemen, all of whom were more or less interested in one or the other of the big estates throughout the country — gentlemen acting and speaking as agents for these properties. Having listened to their evidence as tendered to us through a series of years, and having been on that Committee since 1887, I do not think that those agents are the best witnesses for the interests of their employers. They look at things pretty much as they affect their own interests, and seem to be much more concerned with those interests than with the interests of those they are supposed to serve. It was curious to notice the way in which some of the witnesses who were called to condemn the proposed change in the law bore testimony to the fact that, after all, it was essential that some change should be made. Among the witnesses examined by the Committee was Mr. Statter, agent to Lord Derby, who gave evidence in April, 1888. Mr. Statter had had practical experience as to the system which is in existence in Lancashire, and no one who heard him would be inclined to gainsay the statement that he was a man well qualified to put before the Committee a large amount of useful information as to the state of things in that county. He condemned some of the properties built on leases of 99 years; and he pointed out that, in considering the case of very old properties, we had to take into account whether they were built before the modern Acts came into existence, and, consequently, were not in accordance with their provisions. Mr. Statter also gave us some illustrations as to what was being done on Lord Derby's estate at Bury, where fine wide streets were being made, and he described the class of property that was being put up there. We asked him on what terms the building sites were being granted on Lord Derby's property, and here I ought to say that Mr. Statter was supposed to have come before us to prove that the short leasehold system was a good one. Well, he told us that in the new portion of Bury Lord Derby was not granting

99 years' leases, but was in the habit of renewing the 99 years' leases for 999 years. I suppose, Sir, that no one can have any objection to such a tenure as that, although there are some people who think it would be better to enable the lessees to buy out the rent-charge. Nevertheless, if you give a tenure of 999 years, anyone who holds property on such terms might well be called upon to keep that property in a good and sanitary condition, so as to render it at all times fit for the occupancy of those who have to reside on it. But, it may be asked, for what reason was this 999 years' system being established in Bury? Why, Sir, there is a good bit of freehold land to be got in that neighbourhood, so that Bury is one of the few places in existence where competition in land comes thoroughly into play, and consequently the ground landlord of the property I have referred to has had to do the same as the other ground landlords in the districts. But, on the other hand, the Committee have had before them cases in which the element of competition has not come into play. Let me take the case of Pembroke Dock, where by far the largest amount of the landed property is held by one owner. We all know that workmen must live within a reasonable distance of their work; and in the case of Pembroke, we do not find the essential elements of competition and fair play, so that the entire argument as to freedom of contract which is put forward by some hon. Members falls to the ground, because it is manifestly impossible that there can be any such thing as freedom of contract when one person holds all the land which the others are bound to purchase. I might also take the case of the Festiniog Slate Quarries where, as in the case of Pembroke, the work is centred in one spot, and the workmen have to live near it. You may tell them to go somewhere else and get better terms; but it is evident that both in the case of the Festiniog Quarries and the Pembroke Dock the workpeople must have their homes within a reasonable distance of their work, and it is places like these that freedom of contract cannot exist, unless you can establish perpetuity of tenure. I will give you an illustration of the way in which people suffer under the existing system in places like these. I do not propose to inflict on the House a long list of cases of hardship such as I might easily adduce from the evidence taken by the Town Holdings Committee. I will, however, give you the case that was put before us by a working man who came from Pembroke Dock (Mr. James Davies), a retired Inspector of Shipwrights. I may preface what he said by stating that in 1884 I was at the Pembroke Dock, and then saw the house which Mr. Davies had built; and I can only add that I wish there were more working men throughout the country able to provide such homes for themselves, and possessing the same ability as artisans for making their houses comfortable as he did during his spare hours in the evening. He was asked—

"Can you give us some cases to the point?"

He replied—

"A grocer purchased with 40 years of the lease expired, and laid out £360 to improve the place. He then applied for an extension of the lease. Twenty years more were granted, making 40 altogether, but increasing his ground rent from £1 to £5 per annum."

He was then asked—

"Do I infer that a certain number of years was surrendered or given up in that case?"

He replied—

"Forty years was expired out of 60, leaving 20, and 20 more were added to that, making 40."

He then gave another case, which was this—

"Two young men (brothers) purchased a small house in the centre of the town last year with 14 years unexpired, 18ft. frontage, 18s. ground rent, cost about £100 to build, but laid out upon it last autumn £160 to make it suitable for their business. They then applied to the landlord for a 60 years' lease, and were informed that they could have a new lease for the time required by giving up the old one, and by so doing reducing the new one to 46 years. And this they should have for £20 per annum. This offer they refused."

I think these two illustrations are quite sufficient to point out the evils of the present system. In Worcestershire and elsewhere you may get other phases of these evils. In Cornwall you have the life lease system in operation, and under it large sums must be spent by those who hold leasehold property, especially for business purposes. In Great Malvern we have the cases of two gentlemen, both of whom are tradesmen. The case of Mr. James Nott, a grocer at Malvern, thus—

"In 1862 he bought the property for £1,500, there being only two advanced lives on it. After negotiation he got a third life put in, on payment of £450 and about £50 expenses. One of the old lives died shortly after. Witness made considerable improvements, costing £430, as the property was greatly dilapidated, and in 1871 he got another life put in, at a cost of £630. Since then witness had spent £570 more. Not long ago he sold half the property to his next door neighbour, who has rebuilt at a cost of £2,200."

Witness said—

"I complain of this: I have now only two lives of 40 and 30 respectively; and if these two lives died, as they might die within a very little period, the ground landlord would take the whole of my improvements; every shilling will go at once into the ground landlord's hands, and I could not get the slightest compensation whatever."

The witness also said he knew he had the power to insure the two lives, but that was a severe tax, and would continue to be so to the end of the chapter. I might make similar quotations in regard to the cases of working men, where, although the figures would not be quite so high, they would be proportionately heavy, and would show in the same way how injuriously the system works among that class. One of the pet arguments used against this measure is that, although we desire to benefit the working class, that class would reap no benefit from this Bill. I unhesitatingly assert for myself and my colleagues on these Benches that we should not make another step in furtherance of this measure if we were not fully convinced that the working classes will be benefitted by it. At any rate, there is no other interest that I care for besides that of the working class, and it is because I believe this measure will be of real benefit to them that I have spent so much time in advocating the change proposed by this Bill. I will not weary the House by detailing the circumstances under which the different Friendly Societies have arranged for the purchase of houses by their members. I will, however, give the House one example of what has been done in this way. There were before the Town Holdings Committee two Past Grand Masters of the Manchester Unity of Oddfellows, and what did we hear from them? We were informed that not only the Oddfellows, but the Foresters and other societies had latterly taken to the practice of advancing money to their members for the purchase of houses, because they found they could get a better interest for the outlay than by other modes of investment, while carrying out at the same time a co-operative movement of a useful and beneficial character. Of course, it is to the interest of these societies to let their money out on good security of this description, while the members obtaining the advances are able to do so at a lower rate of interest than if they borrowed money elsewhere. It is a remarkable fact that the Oddfellows alone have laid out nearly £2,000,000 in this way by means of advances to members varying from £200 to £400. I myself am a member of a lodge of Oddfellows in London, which has lent out to members, in sums up to £500, a large amount of money—so large that the outstanding balance a quarter or so back amounted to £7,000. That is a lodge which is held in the North of London, at Islington. When, therefore, hon. Members assert, as some of them do, that the thrifty portion of the working classes take no interest in this question, I ask them to consider these facts. For my part, I have yet to find out that thrift on the part of the working classes is a crime. I cannot but admire the exercise of thrift on the part of the working man, and I know of no better mode of investment on the part of such a man than the purchase of a house as a home for himself and family. You may, perhaps, demonstrate that he might get $\frac{1}{4}$ per cent. more interest from some other investment; but I assert that as a means of benefitting himself and children, no working man can do better than invest his savings in a dwelling house—an acquisition which tends to raise him in the social scale, making him to all intents and purposes a better citizen and a better member of society. If hon. Members say that the working men prefer freeholds to leaseholds let me refer them to the evidence given by Mr. Wallis, the Duke of Devonshire's agent at Eastbourne. Mr. Wallis has the carrying out of the system of enfranchisement on the Duke of Devonshire's Eastbourne estate, where—

"Whoever takes a plot of land on this estate covenants to spend a certain amount on the erection of houses, and the Duke, on his part, covenants to sell the freehold at any time within 10 years of the date of the agreement."

Mr. Wallis stated before the Committee that—

"Up to the present time land has been let on the estate for the erection of 2,034 houses. Of these, 64 per cent., that is 1,406, have been already redeemed; 22 per cent., that is 530, are still within the 10 years' option; 14 per cent., that is 362 houses, remain leasehold. Thus, leaving out the houses still within the 10 years' option, about four-fifths have already become freehold."

Mr. Wallis was asked whether he did not often grant single plots of land to artisans for building purposes, and he replied—

"Oh dear, yes! an artisan might come to my office to-morrow and say, 'Mr. Wallis, I want a plot of land 16 feet wide and 90 feet deep,' and I would let him have it at once, and he, being a carpenter perhaps, would give all his spare time probably to making the doors and sashes, and in a few months be the owner of a nice little house; and not only can they do so, but they have done so hundreds and hundreds of times over."

If I seem to dwell on this point about the working man, it is because it has been urged against me that I have thought only of benefitting the middle, and not the working, class. I will not trouble the House with the provisions of the Bill; they are virtually the same as were contained in the measure brought forward by the hon. Member for West St. Pancras (Mr. H. Lawson), and provide compulsory powers of purchase, while the machinery is that of the County Court. We are not, however, wedded to the County Court if a better machinery can be pointed out. Our only object is, supposing the Legislature in its wisdom should pass the Bill, to obtain a simple and easy machinery which shall not be too cumbrous or expensive. There is still, of course, the alternative propositions of a perpetual rent-charge to the system of buying out. It is said in one of the Amendments that there ought to be some Local Authority for carrying out this scheme. I claim for this measure that by the 14th clause we propose for the first time that Public Authorities should be invested with powers such as do not exist at the present moment for controlling the amenities of the neighbourhood. The Bill is met by a somewhat wide series of Amendments. The first two Amendments which stand in the names of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Harrow (Mr. Ambrose) and the hon. and learned Member for East St. Pancras (Mr. Webster) are simply direct negatives. They will have none of this Bill. They believe that "everything is for the best in the best of all possible worlds," and that we who wish to alter the law are interfering with a benign system which now exists in our Constitution, and are a set of meddlers who ought to be swept out of existence. But I should like to hear the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Harrow explain the position he now takes up, because as he is in favour of the tenants of Ireland becoming possessed of their holdings, even on the security of the public taxation, it is difficult to understand why it is that he does not think what is good for Ireland might also be good for the people of England. Then there is the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for Haddington. He finds fault with some points of the Bill, and because he does not agree with the whole of it, he says, "It is inexpedient to pass a Bill which professes to enfranchise leasehold holdings." It certainly strikes me as peculiar that the hon. and learned Member for Haddington should wish to deny to the people of London, and the South of England, and Wales, that fixity of tenure which is enjoyed by the people of Scotland, where the feu farm system, which is a system of perpetual tenure such as we should like to have in this country, has long prevailed. The hon. and learned Gentleman's Amendment goes on to say—

"Without providing powers for the regulation and control of such holdings in the interest of the community, and the acquisition in that interest of such increment in the value of such holdings as may hereafter take place by reason of public necessities and other causes independent of improvements by the owners."

This Bill is decidedly one dealing with tenure. Clause 14 is the first attempt that I know of to give the

Mr. J. Rowlands

Local Authorities some power over the holdings. We have, however, no objection to the community undertaking some responsibility such as is suggested, and for myself I should not take second place under the hon. and learned Member in my anxiety as to the acquisition of the unearned increment of the property. If the hon. and learned Member will favour us with his plan, I shall be glad to give it my careful consideration. Does the hon. and learned Member for Haddington suppose that we who think we have so good a case for immediate reform should stand still and wait for some other reform which may, or may not, be brought about in the distant future? It would be just as absurd to take such a position as it would have been to have declined to enter on the question of the grievances recently brought before us with regard to the deer forests of Scotland, because of the need of some alteration in relation to the laws of property in that country, which may or may not be made in years to come. I repeat, that we ought not to deny to the thrifty workmen of England the remedy for an undoubted evil, because there are other questions on which it is proposed to alter the laws of property. The last Amendment which stands on the Orders of the Day is one I am willing to welcome, although it does not go so far as the supporters of this Bill might wish. That Amendment stands in the name of the hon. Member for North Bristol (Mr. Lewis Fry), and I am sure that every Member of the Town Holdings Committee have all admired the patience, the ability, and the business capacity with which the hon. Gentleman presided over the deliberations of that body for so long a period. I accept his Amendment, as indicating that some change is necessary in regard to this question. In conclusion, I desire to draw the attention of the House to the Report presented by that Committee. The Committee say, in the paragraph which deals with benefit to the working classes—

"As regards those of the working classes who are occupying leaseholds, we are disposed to think that encouragement would be given to habits of thrift and providence and the interests of a very deserving class be promoted if such persons were able, where they desire it, to purchase the freehold of their houses."

I admit that hon. Members might quote other paragraphs in the Report against me, and here I should tell the House that this Report is one which was fought over and contested to a much greater extent than is usually the case with the Reports of our Committees. We had no fewer than 169 Divisions during the consideration of that Report, and some of the paragraphs were either retained or struck out by very small majorities on either side. On page 37 the Report says—

"We are, however, of opinion that the conversion of leaseholds into freeholds would often promote improvements and encourage the development of trades and businesses by giving lessees the opportunity of securing the full benefit of their outlay in improvements and the full value of any goodwill they may have created. It would also get rid of some minor incidents of leasehold tenure which are felt to be of an irritating character, and would tend to remove the feeling of grievance among lessees which, to whatever extent it may be well founded or not, exists among them."

I think that after the experience of the Duke of Devonshire's agent probably a greater number of the working classes will be prepared to avail themselves of the advantages which this Bill proposes to confer than might otherwise have been expected. No doubt the spread of education and enlightenment will have that effect. The Committee has advised that, under certain circumstances, the Local Authority should have the power to facilitate the enfranchisement of areas in their particular locality. The Committee also make other important recommendations in regard to educational places, co-operative stores, tenants for life, and others—all of a most interesting character—but I need not dwell on them now. I admit that the majority of the Committee do not endorse my opinions. But the one object I have in trying to bring about this system is to give all possible facilities to every man who desires to obtain the freehold of his dwelling. I beg to move the Second Reading of the Bill.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. J. Rowlands.)

*(147.) MR. W. A. McARTHUR (Cornwall, Mid, St. Austell): I rise to second the Motion. I do not think it will be necessary for me to trouble the House at any very great length. My only excuse for intervening in the interminable Debates we have had on the question of English land is the very keen interest that is felt all through the West of England, and more particularly in my own constituency, on the question of leaseholds. There is no part in England in which the oppression of the law on this subject is felt more bitterly than in Cornwall and certain parts of Devonshire. The difficulty under which we labour in those districts is not that land cannot be obtained at all; for, of course, it would be idle to attempt to argue that if working men wanted land they could not get it at all—but that the conditions upon which a working man in Cornwall can get land to build a house on for himself are so onerous and the charges so excessive as to make it practically impossible for a man in that condition of life to erect for himself a house with any hope of being able, during the currency of the lease, to get any reasonable return for his money and his labour. Of course, we shall be met with the old argument that Parliament ought not to interfere between a landowner and the man who seeks to become his tenant. My hon. Friend has dealt with the question of freedom of contract; and I need only add that the complaint of interference between landlord and tenant is a very old bogie, which I hope will not frighten the House. Why should not the State interfere? The State has had repeatedly to interfere between the owners of monopolies and those who sought to use such monopolies where interference was necessary for the public safety and health. In Cornwall we have a state of things in which it is necessary to interfere. The present monopoly is conducive to neither public health nor safety, and interference is necessary for the very existence of the people. Men must live somewhere, and unless, as Mr. Broadhurst has said, they can live in a balloon or on a boat, they must reside on the land; and if you have a state of affairs in which land is let only on conditions which make it practically impossible for a working man to get hold of it, and if the State refuses to interfere, it perpetuates a system for crushing out local industry and preventing a large and industrious population from settling on the land. I say that because land is a monopoly we are entitled to ask that it should receive exceptional treatment at the hands of this House. The House has never hesitated to interfere when it could be shown that a private monopoly is opposed to the public interest. And in asking the House so to interfere I desire it to believe that I have not the slightest wish to rob anybody, or to refuse to the landlord the same rights as those to which every human being is entitled. But the House ought to see that rights of absolute ownership are not allowed to interfere with the public good. That is the only limitation of owners' rights which we are proposing under this Bill. My hon. Friend told the House that the Cornwall County Council appointed a Committee to inquire into the question of the terms on which land is held in Cornwall. That County Council is by no means a revolutionary body. The majority of the Members do not agree with my political views; but they appointed a Committee to investigate the conditions upon which land is held in Cornwall, and to the Report of that Committee, and the evidence taken by it, I propose to ask the attention of hon. Members. I hope I may be allowed to say that I am not making any attack upon Cornish landlords. I recognise, as the Committee recognised, that, in the main, we have very good landlords in Cornwall; landlords who wish to do the best they can for their tenants, and for those who are dependent upon them. But what I am protesting against is this: that the House should refuse to give relief to a condition of things under which the landlord is supposed to have an absolute right to do exactly what he pleases with the land without any regard whatever for the interests of the surrounding locality, or for the interest of the people compelled to live upon it. And I should sincerely regret if anything I may say should be construed into a personal attack upon the landlords of the County of Cornwall. Now, I suppose that the owners of land in England constitute a comparatively small class, and it does not require any wild flight of fancy to suppose that the whole of the land in England could be held by one man. If it were, how much should we hear of the landowner being perfectly entitled to do what he likes with his own? That contention, and the contention as to freedom of contract, was upset by this House long ago. It was upset in the case of the Irish tenant, and of the English tenant, for you have forbidden landlords to make with their tenants contracts detrimental to the public, and only a few days ago, in the case of acquiring sites for chapels and places of worship, the House, by a majority, again upset the principle of freedom of contract. Furthermore, I assert that the principle does not enter into the consideration of this Bill. Throughout the larger portion of Cornwall, and especially in the Division which I represent, freedom of contract absolutely does not exist. No one could contend that it does when one man holds land in his possession which it is absolutely necessary for the people of the country to live upon. If it can be proved, as I think it can, that in many industrial portions of the constituency one or two men own all the land surrounding a particular industry, which employs 5,000 or 6,000 persons, then nobody will say that freedom of contract really exists in that neighbourhood, or that landlord and tenant are on anything like a fair and equal footing. The absolute owner of land in such a district can prevent any houses from being built, can destroy a local industry, because he can refuse to give plots of ground upon which working men may build their houses, and can absolutely prevent any form of religion which he dislikes from being practised in the place, because he can, as has been done in several parts of England, refuse to give land for the erection of chapels. That is a tremendous power to put into the hands of any one man, and it is perfectly idle to assert that Parliament has no power to step in and deal with the monopoly. The Bill now before the House deals with one part of land reform. I cannot say I should regard the passing of this Bill as all the land reform that would be necessary. It is one step towards great and drastic changes in the relations between landlord and tenant which I hope will be part of the law before long. I ask the House to accept the Bill, because it is a practical proposal. The House has debated it for years and years. It has had before it evidence from almost every part of the country in which this leasehold system obtained to the effect that the passing of this Bill would remedy existing evils. Why should we wait until we are prepared to deal with the whole of the land question, which may not be for years to come, when we might to-day remedy part of the grievous injustice which arose under our present land law? I say that the case on behalf of leasehold enfranchisement is an extremely strong one. No doubt one of the chief abominations of the Cornish land system—that of life leases—is gradually disappearing as some of the great landlords have at last set their faces against this very vicious principle. But the system of holding land under lease is almost universal throughout Cornwall, and its evils were abundantly proved before the Town Holdings Committee, to whose Report reference has already been made. The evils were shown to exist, more particularly in the case of Cornwall, where there were large local industries in neighbourhoods the land in which was held exclusively by one or two owners. Mr. Trevail, of Truro, gave evidence on the point, and he speaks with authority upon it. He gave it as his experience that when a working man had acquired the freehold of his house he became a better member of society than a man who had only a temporary tenure, and took a much greater interest in the affairs of his county and his neighbourhood, while he had the strongest possible inducement to spend upon his house the money he formerly expended in drink. The evidence given before the Committee of the County Council in Cornwall showed not merely how extremely difficult it was to acquire land at all, but also that where land could be obtained, enormous prices were asked and most onerous conditions imposed. I am not going to trouble the Committee with long extracts from the Report or the evidence, but I should like to give one case to illustrate my point. Mr. Symons, a witness who gave evidence at Camborne, stated that landlords were asking £20 an acre for building land which was let for agricultural purposes at £2 10s. or £3. Mr.

Rows, the Chairman of the County Council Committee, a very able public man in Cornwall, and I am sorry to say an active opponent of mine, affirmed that it had been proved that if men wanted land on tenure for a certain number of years instead of on tenure for lives, they had to pay more for it. I say that that is a shocking state of things; it is a direct encouragement to perpetuate the old vicious system of life leases, which is nothing less than a desperate form of gambling. The excessive difference between the price of agricultural land and the same land when required for building purposes has prevented the extension of many mining towns and villages in Cornwall, and prevented the workpeople from getting decent houses to live in. The system worked with great hardship in districts where it was necessary for working men to live close to their work. Before the Cornish Committee Mr. Ball related his experience, and his hard case was typical of many others. He wished to establish himself as a builder and wheelwright, in a Cornish village in the year 1850. The landowner to whom he applied would only agree to let him land for 21 years, promising, however, to grant him a new lease for 21 years after the lapse of 10 years. The rent demanded was 2s. a yard. The wheelwright was compelled to accept the conditions, and he built a dwelling-house, a workshop, barn, and cattle-sheds upon the land. At the expiration of the 31 years the landlord stepped in and took possession of the property created by the tenant, and the landlord's steward actually sent in a bill for dilapidations, amounting to more than £17. The tenant, who had spent £700 upon the property, declined to pay the bill. He said, "I maintain that the landlord had no more moral right to that man's property than I have to his money. The question of dilapidations was only settled after five surveyors had been called in. This is how I was treated, although in 31 years I had added £700 to the value of the property." There are only two landowners in the village. It is absurd in such a case to talk about freedom of contract. The witness also in his evidence said he represented to the steward the hardship of the case; but was informed that he had no option but to press the claim for dilapidations. The agricultural value of the land was 10s. an acre; but because it was built upon the tenant had to pay £16 an acre, and at the end of 31 years lost every farthing he had spent on it. Such a state of things as is disclosed by this case cause great hardship in districts where it is necessary for working men to live near the places where they are employed. In my own District in Cornwall the only industry besides the agricultural industry is clay-mining. I have obtained from Mr. Davis, a member of the Cornish County Council, and a gentleman universally respected in the district, some information respecting the St. Stephen's district. This is a parish of 7,000 acres. One landlord owns half the entire parish—the half which is near the clay pits. There is a population of about 4,000 and about 650 houses, five-sixths of which are leasehold. Formerly tenants obtained land on improvement leases at 3s. an acre and erected cottages. The labourers' wages were at that time 9s. or 10s. a week, and, of course, the cottages they put up were small, 12 ft. high, 24 ft. long, and 12 ft. broad. Then came the development of the clay-mining industry, and more people came into the district. Wages increased, and cottages came more into demand. The landlord saw his opportunity and took it, and increased his receipts by every means available. How did it work out? There were hundreds of cases in which a man had got a plot of land on lease, had built a cottage on it, and brought up his family. He held the lease on the three-life system. The son married and wanted his own house. The lives of the father's lease were by that time middle-aged, and it would not pay to build a house on such risky tenure. The landlord was applied to for another piece of land, or for a fresh lease, so that the house might be built on the same plot as his father's. The landlord allowed the son to have a portion of his father's plot, he gave the son fresh lives on that particular part, but charged him from £4 to £6 a year, while the father's lease continued, and when it expired, raised it to £8 or £12 per acre; so that he obtained for a time two rents for the same

piece of ground. These are the unfair, exasperating, and exacting conditions which are imposed on the poor. In one place in Cornwall a landlord has ordered the removal of substantial four-roomed cottages, built by the tenants themselves, his contention being that nothing but five-room cottages ought to be built. It is, of course, desirable that such cottages should be built. I wish all labourers had them; but considering the rent which the tenants have to pay for the land, and the short term for which leases are granted, it is absolutely ridiculous to expect a working man to erect a substantial five-room cottage. The cottages which have been ordered to be removed were passed by the Sanitary Authority of St. Austell. Surely that is a very hard case. I will give the House another very hard case. A man obtained the grant of a piece of land for 21 years at a rent equal to £4 per acre. With the consent of the under steward of an estate he built last year a four-room wooden cottage, which was approved and passed by the local Sanitary Authority. This year the superior steward has stepped in and ordered the whole of this man's work to be forfeited, on the ground that it is against the rule observed on the estate to build anything under a five-room cottage. The under steward is dead. But this man's work and the fruit of his industry is to be destroyed, although he acted in the belief that he was allowed to build the four-room cottage. I say that that is a disgraceful state of things, and that such a case as this is one that requires the protection of the House. Let me quote still another case of grievous hardship in St. Austell as disclosed before the Committee by Cornelius Judd. A man got a piece of land on a life lease. It only lasted 26 years. He had built two cottages on it at a cost of £140, but at the expiration of the lease he lost all the property, and the landlord is receiving from him £4 5s. a year rent for the house he himself built. The House has done much for the protection of agricultural tenants, and I cannot see why it should refuse to protect people who live in industrial villages. Take another result of the present system. In St. Austell, land for building could only be acquired under difficult conditions, and Mr. Nicholls stated that in the last 20 years only £2,000 has been spent in the erection of houses, but in the neighbouring town of Mount Charles, where such hard terms are not imposed, £6,000 has been spent. A rich inhabitant of St. Austell (Mr. Francis Barratt) some few years ago, seeing the difficulty the working classes had in getting houses, offered in a public-spirited manner to erect a number of cottages, but he was absolutely unable to obtain land for the purpose. A Committee of the Cornwall County Council has made a very strong Report on the question, drawing attention to the state of things existing in St. Austell and Mount Charles, and pointing out that not unfrequently a whole village belongs to one or two landowners, and that in such a case an applicant for relief has to accept such terms as his landlord is willing to give. This Committee was appointed by a body which is certainly not of an ultra-Radical character, and was presided over by a gentleman who is opposed to us in politics. I have spoken so far about the hardship of this system upon the working men of Cornwall, but it presses just as much on the rich men of the St. Austell Division—the men who are carrying on the great clay mines which exist close to the towns. These men have to take a tenure of 21 years. The industry is one upon which the whole of that part of the county depends. It costs to develop a clay pit from £5,000 to £8,000 at least, and in addition to this the lessees pay yearly heavier dues than, I think, are paid by any other class of mining property in this country. At the end of 21 years their lease is gone, their improvements are absolutely confiscated, and virtually at the end of the term these gentlemen, who employ practically the whole population of the district, have to buy back their own good-will and improvements from the landlord, who originally let them nothing but a sand-heap, and who has put no expense or work into the concern. I consider this a most monstrous hardship, and I think that if these men are to be turned out of their leases they are entitled to the same equitable compensation as you have given to the agricultural tenants of the country. I think I have made out a fair case for relief, at all events in certain districts. There is in the minds of the labouring men, and, in the case of the clay mines, of the rich men who are now working them, a burning sense of injustice, a sense of dependence, and a sense of absolute shame that their means of livelihood should be absolutely at the mercy of one particular landowner, without any hope of appeal to an impartial tribunal. I have not the slightest hesitation in saying that three or four landlords have absolutely dependent on them one half of the entire District I represent. These few men have the power, if they like to exercise it, to prevent the whole of this population from earning their living under decent conditions. The community whose grievances I have brought forward does not consist of men who have ever given the Government any trouble, but of sober, hard-working, honest, and religious people, and all we ask is that the fruits of hard work extending over many years should be secured to them. This is not a revolutionary proposal, and the persons who ought to give it the warmest support are the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Matthews) and his friends, because I think to a very large extent it is true that the more you create proprietorship and give a stake in the country to the working classes the more sober and quiet are the views they are likely to take of political changes. If you ask these people to respect your law you must make that law fair and just and see that it does not every day rob the people of the property they have created. Unless you can make your law tolerable for honest and hard-working people to live under you cannot expect them to have such respect for it as Members on both sides of the House would wish them to have. I need not deal with the opponents of this Bill, but I hope the constituencies of London will take notice that the one London Member who has put down notice of opposition to the measure, has also attempted to prevent its being discussed, is the hon. Member for East St. Pancras (Mr. Webster). It was he who moved a count while my hon. Friend behind me was speaking.

*MR. WEBSTER: The hon. Member says I moved a count. It appears to me that the question is of some importance we are discussing. No doubt hon. Members opposite agree with me in that. It seemed to me hard there should be so few here to listen to their remarks; so I moved a count to enable them to have a semblance of an audience.

•MR. W. A. M'ARTHUR: I am very glad to hear that explanation, and I hope the hon. Member will remind his constituents that he moved a count for the purpose of obtaining an audience for us. If he does not do so, I think others will. As to the Amendment placed on the Paper by my hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Haldane), if it stood as a Resolution by itself on any other day, I should be one of the first people in the House to vote for it. I thoroughly agree with the principles of it, and if my hon. and learned Friend brought it forward in the shape of a Bill I should certainly vote for it. But I cannot see why, for the sake of pressing such an abstract Resolution, my hon. and learned Friend should endeavour to defeat this particular Bill. We are endeavouring to create an ownership in leaseholds. We think we have a fair chance of doing that at all events within a measurable distance of time. He has no chance, I venture to say, of carrying his Resolution within anything like the same period of time, and still less of putting it into any effective shape. When the time does come to give effect to it, all the property we propose to create under this Bill will be just as subject to the provisions of the Resolution as other property would now be subject to it. I put it to my hon. and learned Friend whether he thinks he ought to stand in the way of a great public improvement in order that the House may negative his proposal to-day. At all events I shall not be led away by the Amendment, but shall vote for the practical proposition of the Bill, believing that it can be carried out, that it is equitable and just, that, if passed, it will give increased stability to the institutions of the country, and that it will create a large class of sober and thrifty householders, free from that sense of injustice under which, I think, they now very naturally labour. I beg to second the Motion for the Second Reading of the Bill.

Mr. Webster

•(247.) MR. HALDANE (Haddington): With regret I find myself compelled to take up an attitude of opposition to the proposal brought forward by the hon. Gentlemen who have moved and seconded the Second Reading of this Bill. That regret is none the less sincere, because I recognise with them that there are real grievances to redress, to which the Bill seeks to apply a remedy, and my quarrel with what my hon. Friends have had to say is not on account of many of the facts on which their case is based, but because of the remedy they seek to apply. Now, my hon. Friends have both alluded to a vast number of cases of hardship, and if they had proposed a way of redress for these hardships, if they had brought forward a proposition for the purpose of conferring upon occupiers of land greater security for the improvements which they have made, I should be with them. But the case made out by them is one thing, and the Bill is another. This is not a Bill for giving greater security to the tenant. There is another Bill which will come before the House shortly, a Bill introduced by my hon. Friend the Member for St. Pancras, dealing with the subject, and when that Bill is before us we shall hear what he proposes to do, and, so far as I can now see, I shall have great pleasure in supporting his proposals. But that is not what we have to deal with to-day, and I claim to discuss the question on the footing that security for improvements is not what we have to consider. For security for improvements is one thing, while leasehold enfranchisement is quite another thing. My hon. Friend the Member for Finsbury (Mr. Rowlands) spoke of this as a Bill for the benefit of the working-classes. I am not second in a desire to benefit the working classes, but I object to conferring a benefit upon a small section of the working classes at the expense of the remainder, and that is what the present Bill proposes to do. The hon. Member for Finsbury expresses surprise that I should be found opposing fixity of tenure for the working classes, such as he imagines exists in Scotland, and that I stand still—not accepting one reform, while waiting for another. But I take this attitude of opposition to his Bill, because I believe it will throw back the settlement of the land question for a long time to come, and it is calculated to do infinite damage to the cause both he and I have at heart. The hon. Member referred to myself as having, two years ago, as he suggested, once before stood in the way of a measure for the enfranchisement of occupiers. It was a very unfortunate illustration, as it seemed to me, that the hon. Member for Finsbury cited. Two years ago, and since I voted for the creation of small freeholders in Ireland, because I thought the special circumstances of the case required it, that the peculiar conditions of social order demanded it, and when the hon. Member for Finsbury did not and the hon. Member for St. Pancras did not vote for it, I did. I do not blame them; it is a question of an entirely different character from this; only I do say the illustration was an unlucky one. I will do my best to show that those of us who do take up this attitude of opposition are in favour of the principle of compensation for improvements; but that we are also in favour of another principle, and, further, that where social order or peculiar circumstances require the enfranchisement of leaseholds, or the creation of small freeholds, we are prepared to bring that about, and, if necessary, by the introduction into legislation of compulsory powers. But in dealing with a special state of circumstances, you are dealing with something quite different to the state of things which should govern a proposal for the working classes of the whole country. The hon. Member for the St. Austell Division (Mr. W. A. McArthur) gave a number of illustrations which seem to me to bear out what I have stated. Take the case of the owners of clay mines in Cornwall. Is there a single clause in the Bill which would apply to them? It is a question of occupiers of houses, not of mines; it is a case of tenements and small holdings connected therewith; and the cases of clay mines, to which the hon. Member alluded, are cases that do not in the slightest degree support the principle of the Bill, but they do support the other principle to which I have adverted, that there ought to be a general law for giving greater security for improvements made during occupation than exists now. Other cases were stated by the hon. Member which seemed to me to show that there is need for Municipal Authorities to have compulsory powers to acquire land for the creation of occupation holdings. The question for the consideration of the House and on which I shall endeavour to make out my case is, whether the remedy proposed by my hon. Friends in the Bill would not throw back a settlement and interpose difficulties of a serious nature between the time in which we stand and the time when we may hope for a redress of the grievances upon which we all agree. What is the proposition of my hon. Friend the Member for Finsbury? He seeks to transfer the complete and absolute dominion over a number of small holdings from the present owners to a number of smaller owners—not occupiers, mark you—for this is a circumstance to be borne in mind in considering this Bill. This Bill carries with it, according to the now common practice, an explanatory Memorandum, and this Memorandum puts forward two recommendations from the Report of the Town Holdings Committee, in which it is set out that the working man having made improvements in the house he occupies can get no recompense when turned out. This is a grievance, and a serious one, but does the Bill meet it? This is not a Bill directed to the case of the occupier, it is directed to the lessee for an unexpired term of 20 years, who is by no means necessarily in occupation. My hon. Friend referred to working men who are in the position of such leasees, and no doubt there are some in the North, where Building Society schemes have flourished greatly, and it is said there are some at Woolwich; but all I can say is I should have no difficulty in proving that the number of working men who hold their houses on leases of 20 years and upwards is infinitesimal in comparison with the number of those who occupy upon much shorter terms—from year to year, for three years, or five, seven or 14 years. Now, let me give a practical illustration of how the thing works out. Suppose an owner of a large piece of property near London, who has done what is very commonly done, let out the land on 99 years building leases. He has let to a builder who is strictly bound to erect houses of a certain character and in a certain way, and he has built the houses and, with a view to making profit, has sub-demised them at short terms to a working class population. The people will occupy the cottages so built on terms of—if not from year to year—of short periods of not more than seven years. I will suppose the building scheme extends over a good many acres close outside London. Then this Bill passes. The builder—the leaseholder thereupon serves the necessary notices and acquires the freehold, taking very good care that he in turn does not fall into the trap in which he has caught the original freeholder, for he himself lets in future on shorter terms than 20 years. The result is, you have transferred the dominion over this piece of land from one freeholder to another, without giving the slightest benefit to the occupiers. The evil does not stop there. The transfer of the property from one man to another is a simple matter, and, if in the future it should be necessary to assert the interest of the community over the land, it would not so much matter, but the process will not generally take the form as in the case I have assumed of the transfer of the great part of the property from one freeholder to the other individual freeholder. The property may be sub-demised and split up into a number of small holdings held by people who are not occupiers and who, under the 14th clause of the Bill, will be free from all the restrictions as to division and sub-letting originally imposed. The result will be, if the Bill passes, the creation of a number of small freeholders, far more difficult to deal with than the freeholder you originally had to face. Bear in mind, we seek to assert some control in the interest of the public over the use of land, particularly urban land, and the situation becomes very serious under a Bill such as this. At present we have got to deal with a few great landlords. You have people in London who own land in enormous tracts. Everybody knows and everybody is watching the proceedings of the Duke of Westminster, the Duke of Bedford, or Earl Cadogan, or Sir John Ramsden in the North; their proceedings are public; they are influenced by the old maxim noblesse oblige, and are in a great measure amenable to public opinion; but when you have a large number of small owners who sublet to any extent and follow out the maxim of doing what they like with their own, you have a state of things in which every resistance will be offered to any proposal, in the name of property. I am not surprised that the hon. Member for St. Pancras, one of the great patrons of this enfranchisement movement, should have received a testimonial from a Property Owners Association, thanking him for his services to owners of property in promoting leasehold enfranchisement. But these are not the people for whom we design the benefit. We are not left to speculate about this, we had a matter before the House last year in connection with property in London. There was a proposition on the part of the London County Council to remove the gates and bars which obstruct access to the great railway termini in the North of London. That proposition was generally accepted outside the House, no strenuous opposition was offered, but when the question came before Parliament, who opposed it? Not the Duke of Bedford, he was conspicuously absent from the discussion in the House of Lords; not Her Majesty's Government as representing the big landowners, but Her Majesty's Solicitor General as representing owners of property in Bloomsbury. He rose after a speech made by the President of the Local Government Board in favour of the Bill, and proceeded to oppose it strenuously, and he was successful, not only in defeating the Government as represented by the President of the Local Government Board, but in getting nearly the whole of the occupants of the Front Bench to go out with him in defence of the rights of owners of property in Bloomsbury who objected in their own interests to the removal of the gates. I say, for my part, that from the great Dukes and Marquesses with whom in a great measure we have to deal in London, we may expect more mercy, more consideration, for the claims of the public than we can from the class of small freeholders proposed to be created by this Bill. The Amendment of which I have given notice indicates the grounds of our objection to this Bill. The course of the history of land in the neighbourhood of our great cities, particularly of London, shows that there is added as years succeeds year a value to the land, an increment which is not due to the creation, the work, or the expenditure of the occupier, the lessee, the builder, or the owner, but is entirely due to the growth of population and of its necessities. This special increment is being added to the value of the land year by year, and, as the law now stands, goes into the pockets of the freeholder. And what would be the effect of this Bill? It would not intercept that value which is created by the community, it would not take it for the community which made it, it would not prevent a state of things which has amounted to something like a scandal in the past—the Bill would leave the matter just as before, and without any alteration, except that it would make a present of this value at the expense of one set of landowners to another set of landowners. To my mind, that is a proposition wholly indefensible. Let us rather than do that accept the status quo, and be content to wait until we have educated the public mind up to the point, when we can proceed to arm our municipalities with the power to prevent in the future such grievances as have been suffered in the past. That is my greatest objection to the Bill, as it comes before the House purely as a Leasehold Enfranchisement Bill. In listening to the speeches of my hon. Friends, I was glad to find that both agree to this, that there ought to be legislation to secure to the community the special value created by the community. In the moral title to this we agree, and we desire to assert it, but the proposition of my hon. Friends is that there is nothing in their Bill which involves any disadvantage to the wider proposition of which I speak. To that I cannot assent. If the Bill becomes law we shall have to assert the public rights not as at present against the few, but against a multitude. It remains for me to substantiate the point that a municipality may acquire this unearned increment without any derogation to the rights of property. It has been said that this is not possible, but I do not assent to that. There are precedents, at all events, for interference by the State with rights of property in the Metropolis to an extent that gives some encouragement for the future. I am not talking of taking from anybody that which is his own. I am talking of such legislation as we find in the Metropolis Management Act, which put restrictions of the most stringent order on owners of property in London. The hon. Baronet the Member for Kingston is not in his place. He has had large experience of the working of that Act in the Metropolis, and I should like to have his testimony upon it, and as to what might be called, from a private point of view, the hardship deliberately inflicted by that legislation upon owners of property, restraining their legal rights in the interest of the community. But it is not necessary to go to precedents. I rely on principle. I suggest the line upon which we should legislate for the future, leaving the past as it is; and I am not advocating land nationalisation as it is commonly termed. If that means going back on the title of the owner in the past, I say it cannot be done without compensation. If you want to nationalise the whole of the land on terms of compensation you will undertake a financial operation so big that you will find it impossible. If, on the other hand, you proceed to do it without compensation you meet with most formidable difficulties. In the first place we are not dealing with individuals. Who are the owners of the land of the country? Not the individual in whose name the title stands, but the incumbrancers and mortgagees, the builders, bankers, merchants, and others who have, so to speak, made their money by the sweat of their brow. Perhaps a Building Society is second mortgagee, and a Trades' Union, which may have advanced its funds on the security of the title, may be third mortgagee. All these people are landowners, and if you are to deal with land nationalisation on any large scale you will have to deal with a multitude of individuals to such an extent as may make it absolutely impossible to separate title to land from title to any other property. Nationalisation of the land is therefore impracticable, and it would be in breach of public undertakings. It was only recently, in 1874, that this House passed a Real Property Limitation Act, which gave the assurance of the State that everybody who had been in occupation for 12 years should, as a general principle, have an absolute title. You cannot go back from that assurance, and I therefore agree with my hon. Friend that it is not possible to bring forward any scheme of land nationalisation in the sense in which he uses the term. But when we come to the land that is situated in big towns, I join issue with him. I say you can do it without going back one bit on the principle of private property. We are, of course, familiar in this country with compulsory interference with the rights of private owners of land on terms of compensation. I should like to quote a few words from one of the greatest and fairest writers who ever touched this subject, a man who had an intense zeal for reform, added to an almost too rigid regard for the rights of property—I mean the late Mr. John Stuart Mill. What he says on this point is this—

“The claim of the landowners to the land is altogether subordinate to the general policy of the State. The principle of property gives them no right to the land, but only a right to compensation for whatever portion of their interest in the land it may be in the policy of the State to deprive them of. So that their claim is indefeasible. It is due to landowners and to owners of any property whatever recognised as such by the State that they should not be dispossessed of it without receiving its full pecuniary value or an annual income equal to what they derived from it. This is due to the general principles on which property rests. If the land was bought with the produce of the labour and abstinence of themselves or their ancestors, compensation is due on that ground; even if otherwise it is still due on the ground of prescription. Nor can it ever be necessary for accomplishing an object by which the community altogether will gain that a particular portion of the community should be immolated. When the property is of a kind to which peculiar affections attach themselves the compensation ought to exceed a bare pecuniary equivalent. But subject to this proviso the State is at liberty to deal with landed property as the general interests of the community may require, even to the extent, if it so happen, of doing with the whole what is done with a part whenever a Bill is passed for a railway or a new street.”

I say that remark applies to the very holdings it is proposed to deal with in this Bill. I say the true principle is to assert the right of the community to expropriate upon terms of paying the present market value, the title of the owners of urban property in order to acquire for the future that increment of value which is due solely to the growth of population, and to the public necessities. I do not think there is any difficulty in carrying out such a proposition. All you have to do is to arm your County Councils as they are now constituted with adequate powers, and then to educate them in the duty of exercising those powers. Contrast the proposition of my hon. Friend with such a scheme as this. Let me, in the first place, point out some difficulties in the way of the proposals of the Bill. In the first place, the Bill provides for no adequate control of the uses to which the enfranchised land is to be put. The hon. Member for Finsbury (Mr. J. Rowlands) referred to Clause 14 as containing the first attempt to give the Local Authority some power to deal with the interests of the land. That clause takes the existing covenants, and proposes to give power to the Local Authority, if it pleases, to enforce them. It begins by sweeping away all restrictions on sub-demise, and things of that kind. It does not, however, prevent the owner of a small holding from robbing the occupier to whom he has made a sub-demise.

*MR. LAWSON (St. Pancras, W.): May I point out to my hon. and learned Friend that by the last paragraph in Clause 14 it is provided that the Local Authority—

“May also restrain the lessee from so dealing with the demised premises either by doing or omitting to do any act in connection therewith as will, in the opinion of such Local Authority, prejudicially affect adjoining owners.”

*MR. HALDANE: I have read that clause, but—it is perhaps because my mind has been debauched with law—I am absolutely unable to attach any definite meaning to it. But, whatever its meaning, it is obvious it will not interfere with the express words of the enactment. Therefore, the robbery of the occupier may go on for the future under the Bill as it has done before, and not only so, but the new freeholders may build on their freeholds practically without regard to the public interest. It comes to this: that the Local Authority, while having power to enforce some restrictions, will have no power to intercept the unearned increment for the benefit of the community. Nor is it to be in the power of the Local Authority to interfere, when an owner desires to build an unsightly structure, or to make his property out of harmony with the property in the adjoining district. Not only is there not to be any adequate control of the user, but you will now have to deal, not with a few people, as was the case in the past, but with an indefinite number of owners of houses of every kind and character. Then you have this difficulty about the increment as it accrues in the future. My hon. Friend suggests that it may be met by taxation of ground values. I am not going to discuss that for the present. It is a subject of great difficulty on which I am in sympathy with many of the views I know the Member for St. Pancras holds. I understand him to suggest by taxation of ground rents simply some form of tax of a limited kind, leaving the surplus to go into the pockets of the owner of the ground value. That is a proposition which is wholly inadequate to meet the case. It is not proposed to put a 20s. in the £1 tax on ground value. To do that would be only distinguishable from confiscation, in the same way as putting one to death in a warm bath is distinguishable from hanging or any other ruder way of extinguishing life. The surplus of any tax under that amount would still, as I say, go into the pockets of the owner and be lost to the community. We desire to arm the Local Authorities with powers to enable them, by means of valuations and after fair notice, to possess themselves of, not the past, but the future, increment for the benefit of the community. I do not propose now to go into the details of any scheme of the kind, but I say it is in that direction of compulsory purchase, and enabling the community to acquire what the community has created, what they ought never to have been deprived of, that you must look for the real remedy. Give compensation for improvements, and legislate in the other direction I have intended to indicate, and you will secure something like a redress of the grievance against which this Bill is levelled.

This Bill is absolutely hostile to such a suggestion, and will, if it be carried, make any dream of municipalisation of land an idle dream, by evoking the opposition of a very large and constantly increasing class. For these reasons I am compelled to oppose the Bill. For every one it will assist, I believe the measure will irrevocably damage the prospects of a hundred others. I beg to move the Amendment which stands in my name.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words, "It is inexpedient to pass a Bill which professes to enfranchise leasehold holdings without providing power for the regulation and control of such holdings in the interest of the community, and the acquisition in that interest of such increment in the value of such holdings as may hereafter take place by reason of public necessities and other causes independent of improvements by the owners."—(Mr. Haldane.)

*(3.25.) MR. MUNRO FERGUSON (Leith, &c.): As a supporter of the principle which my hon. Friend has just laid down, I have to second the Amendment. I do not deny that a certain amount of good would be effected by the Bill. No doubt many country districts, like those which my hon. Friend the Member for St. Austell (Mr. W. McArthur) has spoken of, would be benefited by such a measure. No doubt those who have capital in the towns would also be benefited by its provisions; but what we hold is that the measure would deprive the great majority of the people of any hope of obtaining a material improvement in the condition of their surroundings. The case of the Irish Land Purchase Bill was instanced by the hon. Member who moved the Second Reading. The case of agricultural land, however, is entirely different from that of urban building land, apart altogether from the great question of the unearned increment. The unearned increment in the case of building land is a quantity which is continually altering at high ratios. But, apart altogether from that, in the management of agricultural land there has to be constant supervision and constant interference as long as the system of occupier and owner continues. But in the case of urban land the only operation from which the owner materially controls is that of the fixing of the price. We believe that land nationalisation is impossible, but the difficulties attending the municipalisation of land are of a very minor character, and such municipalisation does offer the hope of considerable improvement in the condition of our towns. The weakness of the Bill is that it would benefit only the few and leave the many much in the same condition as they are now. It would add to the number of those who would put the unearned increment into their pocket, and the community would be deprived of that increment. It is far easier, as has been pointed out already, to deal with a few landowners and make them subject to restrictions, than to deal with a large number of them. You might find it easy to deal with them in London. We think that the measure, if passed, would be a stumbling block in the way of any thorough reform. The Member for the St. Austell Division pointed that out, because he said that if the whole of the land in the country belonged to one landlord there would not be much question as to the interfering with his land. It is clear, then, that the more landowners you have the more difficult it is to deal with this question. The supervision required in towns is exercised to a great extent by the Municipal Authorities already. You would not add very much to their work if you charged them with the duty of seeing that the community secured the land, if required for extension or necessary sanitary improvement. It has been said that under this Bill it is intended to bring some of the advantages which we enjoy in Scotland, under the feu system, to the inhabitants of towns in England. But, in my experience, the feu system in Scotland has not been found absolutely satisfactory. The Bill brought in by my hon. Friend at my side and myself has been approved very largely in the urban constituencies in Scotland and also by the Society of Solicitors. It is true that in that Bill we only provided for the purchase of vacant land, but it is equally easy to give the community power to purchase land already occupied as also to tax ground values. That is a power which should be conferred. It is not proposed to take any land without full compensation for it, but the community should certainly have power to purchase any land required for the public good. The object sought to be obtained by the promoters of this Bill would be equally secured under our proposal. But, further than that, we maintain that our proposals offer a satisfactory solution of the question in Scotland, whilst the other proposals do not really face the difficulty. Only a limited number would be benefited, and it would be almost an impossibility afterwards to carry out any effective reform. While it is proposed in this Bill to strengthen the present system by which the unearned increment goes into private pockets, we want the whole of that increment to go into the public purse. We hold that all the existing values should be open to valuation, the community should be able to have them fixed, and be able within a certain period of time to take the lands at the values fixed at the time of valuation. When we are reproached by those who say that we are attempting to bring about land nationalisation, I say I do not believe in land nationalisation. I think it impracticable and impossible. But I do believe that the municipalisation of land in the way suggested by my hon. Friend the Member for Haddingtonshire is both practicable and desirable. It is with great regret that we have to oppose this Bill, which does, no doubt, offer some measure of amelioration to many people, but we cannot but recognise the fact that in this case it is better to throw out a reform which does offer some advantage if it stands in the way of a more comprehensive reform. We had a warning in the Education Act, and believing that we are bound to take every possible precaution when we start a reform to secure that we shall do it on the best lines, and believing that the principles I have described are on the right lines, we shall offer the most strenuous opposition to the proposal before the House. I beg to second the Amendment of my hon. Friend.

*(3.40.) Mr. BARTLEY (Islington, N.): This is not altogether a legal question, but a matter which especially concerns London and the well-being of its great population. I have had the advantage of attending the Town Holdings Committee for four years, and have taken part in the inquiry into this subject. I suppose it is impossible upon such a subject to expect unanimity of opinion, but there is a general feeling that something ought to be done to improve the homes of the people, and to enable those who are in a position to do it, to obtain the freehold possession of their leasehold holdings. I support the Second Reading of this measure, although I confess a preference to my own Bill, to which, I suppose, it would be out of order to make reference. The House will forgive me if I still think my own goose a swan. I support this Bill, because I think it can be made a useful measure by alteration and amendment in Committee. It is a misfortune that it applies to all leaseholders holding for a certain term. I am not at all interested in the leaseholder as a leaseholder, but only when he is occupier of his premises. There is no reason why a leaseholder who is not an occupier should have the advantage of this Bill. What this House has to do is to make the occupying tenant a freeholder; and if we can in any way do that, we shall enormously improve the social condition of the country. It would be very easy indeed to limit the Bill to occupiers, and I do not see why hon. Gentlemen opposite should not assent to that course. There is a certain amount of clap-trap in saying that this measure is for working men. In my opinion, the poorest stratum of working men in London would not be benefited by it. Those benefited would be the cream of the working classes, and the poorer of the middle class, the latter being so important and almost as numerous as any other class of the community. It would enable small tradesmen to get possession of their homes and leave a shelter for their successors while they had time to look about them. There are three or four main objections to the Bill. One is the old stalking horse of interference with contracts. We believe it wrong to interfere with contracts, save for the public welfare. But we feel that if this Bill only applied to new contracts, many years would elapse before it would come into operation—pretty well a century, and the means of evading the Act would be so great that it is absolutely necessary that the measure should be made to apply to existing contracts. What would justify interference with contracts? Surely it is the great danger which arises from the fact that enormous areas of large towns are owned by a few individuals. In London we must acknowledge that it is a great danger that one or two men should be deriving enormous wealth from certain parts of London. There are one or two cases in which an owner is drawing hundreds of thousands a year, and in a few years even £1,000,000 a year will be drawn from parts of London by one man. I ask the House to consider whether the ideas occasioned by such wealth and in such a prominent form are a source of safety to the State? Does it not constitute a subject constantly to be shot at and attacked? If these enormous holdings were subdivided among a large number of small persons, occupying their own freeholds, surely that would create a barrier of safety to the nation. Fifty years ago the National Debt was held by comparatively a few persons, and the possibility of repudiation was even then whispered as not out of the question. Now, by the establishment of the Post Office Savings Bank, Friendly Societies, and other agencies, a quarter of the whole Debt, at least, is held by millions of the people, and at the present time the idea of repudiating that Debt would be absolutely impossible, because it would ruin millions of the community. If a fourth of the land of this country were held by the millions, it would constitute a real security to the nation, and a great security to all landlords. A great many of the movements, such as those for taxing ground rents, would be swept away by such reforms. Another objection raised is the grievance of severance. I agree that this is a serious objection, and I am sorry that the Bill contains no clause to minimise the danger and difficulty of this subject. If the Local Authorities are intrusted with the power of purchasing outlying portions of an estate, a great deal of hardship will be done away with. This idea was sketched forth in the Report of the Town Holdings Committee; and if the plan were worked out, this great difficulty of severance might be got over, or, at all events, minimised to a great extent. Clauses in my Bill deal with this matter. Then there is the danger of an individual in a residential street turning his house into a shop or a noisy factory. It might, to meet that contingency, be arranged that the localities should enforce the covenants of the lease. I think the localities might well undertake that duty. In my judgment, it would be only reasonable that some slight additional allowance should be made for compensation beyond the ordinary value. With regard to the County Court, it is, after all, the best tribunal we have got for the purpose, and the great bulk of the cases would be fairly adjusted. It is a mistake to limit the action of this measure to leases for 20 years, for directly a particular number of years is named some evasion would be introduced. I strongly object to Clause 15, which provides that when a man has gone through the process of purchasing his freehold he should have a right to make it into a perpetual rent-charge. Such a clause is, on the face of it, grotesquely unfair. I shall support the Second Reading of the Bill because it is wise and politic, and because, looking to the future, it is absolutely essential to increase in every possible way the number of individuals in this country who are personally interested in the holdings which they occupy.

*(4.5.) Mr. LAWSON: The Bill has been between a cross-fire of Amendments as they stand on the Paper; but at present not one shot has been fired from the old-fashioned fort by those who maintain the doctrine of free contract in all circumstances, and without regard to the conditions of human life. I do not know whether the defence of the position is not reserved for the Home Secretary. I hope he will be able to make a better case of it than he did last week when, in spite of his speech, a Bill was carried against him by 100 votes. With regard to the Amendment, I contend that the powers of public control which it seeks are provided for by the 14th clause of the Bill, and I think, though I do not pretend to speak with the authority of a lawyer, that the words of the clause cover any such cases as have been quoted by the hon. and learned

Mr. Bartley

Member. The second part of the Amendment deals with a different subject. The first part of it is inaccurate, and the second irrelevant. The second part deals with the subject of local taxation. This Bill does not provide for intercepting the unearned increment in the ground values. It does not touch the question. I do not wish the House to prejudge the question of local taxation on this Bill, which has, in fact, no connection with it. If the hon. Member for Haddington thinks it is possible, by means of purchase on behalf of Municipal Bodies, to secure what was called "the unearned increment" for the community, he is disregarding the teaching of experience. This plan has been tried in London, and the Metropolitan Board of Works and the London County Council have actually lost instead of gained by taking land for the purpose of recoupment on improvements, even under the most favourable circumstances. I do not wish to abuse the great London landlords, but the whole of London is not in their hands. There are a number of small estates of which the names of the freeholders are quite unknown to the public. The hon. Member cannot have looked at the statistics for London. Those hon. Members who, like myself, served upon the Town Holdings Committee, found it very difficult to discredit the desire of the working classes of London and other leasehold towns to secure possession of their homes. The hon. and learned Member has been led to a general conclusion from a perusal of Mr. Henry George's fascinating book, and has been followed in that course by my hon. Friend the Member for the Leith Burghs. They desire that the Municipalities shall have the power to purchase land, and they forget the whole course of legislation during the last few years. The latter part of the Amendment is outside the scope of the Bill. If he had read the evidence given before the Town Holdings Committee, he would have known that there is a general desire among the working classes not only in London, but in other parts of the country, to acquire possession of their holdings. The Committee in their Report declared that the working classes would welcome a measure enabling artisans to purchase the freehold of their homes, and that such a measure would operate as an encouragement to thrift. Mr. Jones, speaking for a million co-operators, in his evidence before the Committee, said—

"For years we have had thousands of pounds lying at the bank at a mere nominal rate of interest, and we have members pressing for houses to be built, but the land being unavailable except for short leases, and our society being a permanent Corporate Body, we would not expend our capital on short leases."

Then we have the evidence of Mr. Green, of Woolwich, who was questioned as follows:—

Q. "Then you think that the workmen have a desire to obtain the freehold of their own houses for the benefit of their families in preference to leaseholds? A. Equally so, as much as an aristocrat, because the idea of the workman is to benefit his family, but he resents this continual drain upon the savings of his class by the ground landlord."

I cite this evidence to show that the Committee were put in possession of the wishes of the working classes, and they unanimously came to the conclusion that some form of leasehold enfranchisement was necessary. [An hon. MEMBER: No.] I know there was objection to the particular form, but there was absolute unanimity upon the principle of enfranchisement. The only objection taken was as to the machinery by which the principle was to be put in operation. For my own part, I should be willing in Committee to accept any Amendment which would make the machinery of the Bill before the House work more easily, and therefore I hope that the Home Secretary will not criticise the Bill in its details. I am asked what the workman can gain by the Bill? The working man has probably a greater interest in this than any other class of the community. It is his interest to have secured to him the results of his labour that he invests in the embellishment of his house. It is his interest to obtain good public and private sanitation. I think we are justified in including not only the occupiers, but the leaseholders. Only the other day at Cambridge a case occurred in which a shopkeeper holding under one of the Colleges, who had expended a large sum of money on the understanding that his lease would be renewed, had his rent enormously increased, and had to pay a heavy fine. There is no reason why the small shopkeeping class should not be considered as well as the artisans; and no stronger case for leasehold enfranchisement has been made out than that presented before the Town Holdings Committee by the shopkeepers of London and other leasehold towns. They are more than any other class exposed to extortion with their goodwill and open trade. The Local Authorities throughout the country gave evidence as to the unsanitary state of things which the leasehold system produced; and though it was urged that the landlords' covenants would provide a remedy, it is the fact that these covenants are allowed to be neglected in order to secure the rents from the property. I find that in his evidence Mr. Clegg said—

Q. "And do you think it would be expedient upon grounds of public policy to transfer large quantities of property in Sheffield to their hands? A. You cannot for a moment suppose that if those people bought the reversion that they would allow the property to remain in that state (bad repair). During the last 10 years that a lease has to run, a lessee will make all the money that he possibly can out of the property and do nothing to it, as the Report which I read from the Medical Officer of Health shows. The properties he refers to have not been painted for years and years."

Again, Mr. Castle, the land agent of Oxford University, as to national character, said—

Q. "That is not merely only a public question, but it is a private question so far as it concerns the owners of property? A. Yes; I think in their interests it is advisable that the interest of property owners should be made as wide as possible—that is to say, that as many people should be interested as possible in property. I might illustrate it by saying I think it would be an extremely desirable thing for the country and the owners of property in the country that as many working men as possible should own their own homes, particularly, I think, in the case of artisans, and the more intelligent class of working men around towns."

I have still further evidence—that of a great writer, now dead. Nobody ever thought he took any interest in this subject, but I find in some Reminiscences, recently published, the following:—

"He discoursed on London and on Londoners, storming against the sordid and hollow life by which he was surrounded; complaining of the very houses amid which he took his devious way. They were built, he said, to tumble down in 90 years. The tenant had only a

99 years' lease from the landlord who owned the ground; he could not afford to build solidly and honestly; his architect had learned how to run up a wall which would stand just long enough not to become the property of the landlord, computing that the wall should fall down before the lease fell in. Yes, it was more the fault of the landlord than the tenant; but it was a devil's system all through, and the devil had a sure grip on tenant and landlord both. And what did it matter? 'They are just a parcel of pigs rooting in the mire.'

I stand on the principle of the Bill as affirmed by the Town Holdings Committee. In conclusion, I can only say I believe that the Bill, if it is passed—as I hope it will be—will carry out the principle approved last Wednesday; it will do something to put a stop to a system whereby a man pockets the savings and earnings of another for no reason save the happy chance that he is the owner of the freehold, and do a great deal to strengthen and solidify and to improve the public health and peace of the community.

(4.25.) THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. MATTHEWS, Birmingham, E.): The discussion this afternoon has been marked by that disregard of the rights of property which seems to be characteristic of Wednesday afternoon discussions. On the one hand, there are two hon. Members of the mind of the Roman tyrant, who wished that all his enemies had but one neck, that he might sever it at a single blow. Those hon. Members wish to concentrate the ownership of land into as few hands as possible, in order that they might have but few victims to hold up to the public resentment in the future. On the other hand, the hon. Member for North Islington with equal frankness has avowed his desire to take away the property from the present owners and to give it to many others, in order to create a public sentiment in favour of property. I can only earnestly hope that the good sense of the House of Commons will save us from any of these schemes. As to the arguments in favour of the Bill, they are, in my opinion, arguments against the principle of property at all. No one, of course, denies that the rights of property, as understood in English law, may lead to a very disagreeable and unjust state of things, and several extreme cases of the exercise of those rights have been cited. Everyone will agree that, if one or two landlords have in their own hands the monopoly of the whole land of a district, and thus can prevent the working men in that district from being able to live within a reasonable distance of their work, such landlords are the enemies of their class in exercising their legal rights in such a way. They furnish arguments to the opponents of all rights of property. For the sake of argument, I will concede that, if such a state of things were general, or if there were but one landlord for the whole of England, possibly Parliament might have to review the rights of property. But is it true that the rights of property are harshly used or abused as in the isolated cases which have been cited? I do not believe it. The landlords of this country, for the most part, do not use their rights in a way adverse to the common good. The fact that leasehold tenures prevail in one part of the country, freehold tenures in another, and fees in a third, shows that the landlords have the good sense to let their land in the manner best suited to the demands arising among their poorer neighbours. It sometimes happens that the landlord has not the power to let his land except on one kind of tenure, and I look benevolently on any legislation which will remove such disabilities. But the cause of long tenure or short tenure is partly to be found in the value of the land, and partly in the nature of the demand for it. There are places where the land is too costly for the great bulk of the occupiers to be able to buy the fee, or to live on it except on short leases. Hon. Members have cited cases where the fact of ownership gives the landlord a chance of imposing a hard bargain, either in exacting a rent that is too high, or in fixing a tenure too short to enable the lessee to recoup himself for his expenditure on the land. Well, if hon. Members are logical, they will prohibit leaseholds altogether; but that is not the remedy proposed. It is proposed to remedy these isolated cases of injustice by inflicting a universal injustice on the lessors. This Bill is not a proper remedy for the grievance alleged, which is that there are parts of England in which a man cannot get land for the building of a house. For that no remedy is given to the man who has not a lease; the only person benefited is the man who has a 20 years' lease, and who has time to recoup himself for any ordinary expenditure, and that benefit is given by allowing him to break the terms of the contract into which he has deliberately entered. If the promoters of the Bill are acting in good faith, if they believe that the system of letting of land for short terms is one which is so mischievous and dangerous to the public weal that the law ought not only not to recognise it, but ought to allow men to break their contracts, then the measure which ought to be introduced is a measure forbidding the letting of land for less than, say, 200 years. But hon. Members think they may pass this Bill because they are only pressing on an unpopular class, not yet too few for the Scotch Members who have announced "Georgian" views to-day. The Mover and Seconder of the Motion and the hon. Member for St. Pancras said that the Bill was proposed in the interest of the working classes. That is one of the greatest shames ever heard of. Hon. Gentlemen are ready enough to appeal to the authority of the Town Holdings Committee, of which some of them were members, but they ignore the real drift and meaning of the recommendations of that Committee, and they have prefixed to their Bill a Memorandum which gives a totally unfair meaning to those recommendations.

*MR. LAWSON: The Town Holdings Committee recommended a form of leasehold enfranchisement which is not in the Bill.

MR. MATTHEWS: They used these words—

"We are unable, for the reasons above stated, to recommend the adoption of any general scheme of compulsory leasehold enfranchisement such as that proposed to us."

This Bill is a scheme of compulsory leasehold enfranchisement, and, therefore, the Town Holdings Committee have emphatically condemned the proposal. To say that they recommended the Bill is a statement more courageous than I should have expected from hon. Gentlemen. The Committee also said—

"Your Committee have come to the conclusion that the suggested leasehold enfranchise-ment would not materially benefit the working classes in London and most of the large towns."

On this point I would appeal to the experience of hon. Members on both sides. It may be that there are places in Cornwall and Wales where there are working men holding leaseholds. It must be an exceptional working man who has a 20 years' lease—he is a rara avis in terra. The small shopkeeper deserves as much consideration as the working man. That there are hard cases with regard to shopkeepers in London I have no doubt. There are cases where a man has created a valuable goodwill, and he may be treated unfairly by the exercise of the rights of the landlord. That is conduct on the part of the landlord which every chivalrous-minded man will condemn. But are we to do away with the rights of private property altogether in consequence of some out-of-the-way case of individual hardship? We in this country are willing to accept disadvantages and drawbacks, and even occasional injustice, in order to secure the enormous advantages which the untrammelled and free exercise of the rights of private property have secured—advantages which could not be maintained if surrounded by the snares and pitfalls which will be created by this Bill. The Bill in its main outline proposes to give to any 20 years' leaseholder the power to break his contract to the injury of his landlord. In London on the same plot of land there are frequently as many as three leaseholders—one original leaseholder of 90 years, another of 60 years, and a third of 25. Which of the three is to benefit?

*MR. LAWSON: All the three.

MR. MATTHEWS: All the lessees cannot benefit; and is the 90 years' lessee to be deprived of his right in favour of the 25 years' lessee? Why should one of these lessees be picked out for benefit to the exclusion of the owners? The man selected may probably have laid out nothing on the land. Even on a Wednesday I will not admit that the owners of land should be treated as hostes humani generis. Why are landholders, contrary to the contracts they have made, to have their property taken from them piecemeal at the time the occupier chooses to select, without any right in the owner to sell to any other person? Under this Bill an unhappy landowner who has done nothing wrong or unjust is to have his land handed over to another man, land which express covenant says he shall recover, and is not to get the price which he may want for it, but only a rent-charge, which he is to recover as best he can. One would have thought that gentlemen with the elevated views of equity of the supporters of this Bill, gentlemen who like knights-errant seem to ride about the country to redress every imaginary wrong—one would have thought that it might have occurred to their minds that a reciprocal right ought to be given to the landowner to compel the leaseholder to enfranchise. The Bill, however, does not propose to confer any such right upon the landowner. The Bill applies to all landlords, good as well as bad, and amongst the owners of ground-rents I may observe there are many who deserve quite as much sympathy as leaseholders do. The owners of ground-rents represent an enormous class, about whom hon. Members opposite, who feel such solicitude for tradesmen, do not seem to think at all. There are widows and orphans whose whole income depends upon ground-rents. Why are they not to be considered? Why should they be subjected to the injustice of having their legal and contractual rights taken from them? We have heard a good deal about the municipalisation of land. I can hardly pronounce the word. Well, that is a system under which these large interests have grown up in England. And yet the hon. Member seems to favour a policy of confiscation.

MR. HALDANE: We suggest that any person whose land is purchased should receive the full market value.

MR. MATTHEWS: I certainly understood the purport of the hon. Member's speech to be that he hoped the time was coming when there would be only one or two landlords who could be kept within more stringent limits. There are two instances of great Corporations in this country which under this very leasehold system have secured the unearned increment. There are, for example, large estates belonging to the Corporation of Birmingham, and institutions such as King Edward's Grammar School, the whole future value and prosperity of which depend upon the leasehold system being allowed to continue, and the ultimate ground-rent being allowed to fall in. The estate belonging to King Edward's School and the Corporation estates have been let out on 75 years' leases, and at the end of that term the lessors expected to enjoy the unearned increment resulting from the expenditure of the lessees upon the land. And who shall say that the lessees will be injured? They have, it is true, built upon the estates costly warehouses and other buildings; but I do not hesitate to affirm that they will get 5 per cent. in respect of their outlay for the period of their term, and will be repaid at the end of it by the rack-rent which they will have been able to exact a few years ago the Municipality of Liverpool owned 5,200 houses which it let out on lease.

LAWSON: Perpetually renewal of another, MATTHEWS: That is not my intention. Well, under this Bill let the houses, upon which much money has been expended, would be enfranchised, and the unearned increment would be lost to the ratepayers. Many leases in many parts of the country belong to Insurance Companies. What public object, I should like to ask, would be served by enabling such companies to enfranchise? Our system of land tenure is a large and complicated system, and by this Bill it is proposed to rush imprudently and inconsiderately into its midst, and, as with an axe, to cut at its roots without discrimination. The hon. Member for St. Austell (Mr. W. McArthur) says there are men in Cornwall who cannot get land on such good terms as they could wish. I should like to know what ground is that for destroying the property of the ratepayers of Liverpool and Birmingham. I am really at a loss to understand how the hon. Member can for such reasons support such a measure. The compulsion which it is proposed to exercise is not for the benefit of the public, but for the benefit of a limited class, which, in the great majority of cases, has no special merits, many leaseholders having put nothing upon the land, but being simply there by the accident of the contract which the House is now asked to enable them to break. For these reasons, I trust the House will reject both the Bill and the Amendment of the hon. Member opposite.

*(4.55.) MR. LEWIS FRY (Bristol, N.): As Chairman of the Town Holdings Committee, to which so many references have been made, I may be allowed a few minutes in this discussion. I should not oppose any Bill of this character upon the general ground that it would interfere with the rights of property: for I hold that a community may take property, giving compensation, if its interests require that it should do so. But before agreeing to a Bill which interferes with the private rights of persons in property of the value of hundreds of millions of pounds, I think we are justified in inquiring whether any considerable and substantial benefit will accrue to the community; and from the experience which I have gained in the Committee upstairs, I am disposed to think that the benefits which the supporters of this Bill suppose it will cause are, to say the least, very much exaggerated. One argument repeatedly brought forward in favour of leasehold enfranchisement is the contention that the leasehold system encourages bad building; but that contention is not borne out in the judgment of the Town Holdings Committee, who have declared that the tenure of houses has very little to do with the character of the buildings. We had a large number of witnesses; and though the hon. Member for Finsbury has somewhat depreciated the character of the evidence given by professional witnesses, I think we ought to value that evidence as coming from men thoroughly acquainted with the matters upon which they were speaking. Mr. Martin, an experienced surveyor, examined before the Committee, stated that he had surveyed 1,250 houses in London, 720 of them being freehold and 530 leasehold, and that he found no difference whatever in the character of the buildings. In my own town—Bristol—where the houses are mainly held on freehold tenure, upon a comparison between the houses built upon leasehold tenure on the one hand, and those built upon the perpetual tenure of fee-farm rents on the other, no difference of structure can be observed. I therefore do not think that the tenure of a house affects the character of a building. Of course, I do not refer to cases where the leases are of very short duration, and leases of less than 50 years would no doubt exercise an unfavourable effect on the character of the houses. I next ask whether this Bill would confer a benefit on the working classes. The hon. Member for North Islington has shown that the vast majority of the working classes in our large towns hold their dwellings upon yearly, monthly, or weekly tenure, and are not owners of leasehold property within the scope of the Bill of my hon. Friend. Therefore this Bill, as regards its effect in London and other large towns, must be looked upon as a middleman's Bill, and as such it will confer no benefit upon the working classes. It is also extremely doubtful whether any considerable number of leaseholders would be prepared to take advantage of the powers proposed to be conferred upon them. The evidence taken before the Committee shows clearly that it is quite an exceptional thing for ground-rents to be purchased by leaseholders. It was proved that on property in which the right hon. Gentleman below me (Mr. Heneage) is interested the freehold of their houses was offered to a large number of lessees upon fair terms, and that only an inconsiderable number of them availed themselves of the opportunity—in fact, only 32 out of 1,000. The same thing was shown to have occurred on Lord St. Levan's property. The benefits which the Bill would confer are therefore, to say the least, problematic, and there are certain positive objections to it of a very substantial character. It would, for instance, injure Corporations and charities by depriving them of the future increment in the value of their estates. That, I hold, would be a detriment to the public interests, and would confer no compensating benefit on the class the Bill is supposed to benefit. I also think it would be an unfair thing to confer upon one party to a bargain the power to acquire at any time, a time most convenient to himself and will require considerable amendment when it gets into Committee should it pass the present stage. I may mention what I think has already been referred to, namely, that the Bill is confined to the lessees, and appears to exclude the assignee of a lease from the benefits. I shall vote for the Second Reading, but I desire my hon. Friend who brought in the Bill to understand the condition subject to which my vote will be given.

*(5.26.) Mr. WEBSTER: I should like to make one or two observations as to the Amendment. I agree with the remarks that fell from the Home Secretary that this is a very curious Memorandum attached to the Bill. It is grossly inaccurate. [Interruption.] In all the great improvements made in London—for instance, when, at the expense of the ratepayers, Bedfordbury, one of the worst slums of London, had to be swept away—the houses were not held under a leasehold tenure but a freehold one. And there is no evidence of any form or shape to show that overcrowding is caused by leaseholds. London is increasing by leaps and bounds, and the argument set forth in this Memorandum, that the present system of leasehold tenure for 99 years causes overcrowding, is inaccurate. The reverse is the case; if anything, it encourages too much building.

(5.27.) Mr. MUNRO FERGUSON rose in his place, and claimed to move "That the Question be now put;" but Mr. SPEAKER withheld his assent, and declined then to put that Question.

Debate resumed.

*Mr. WEBSTER: I intend to vote against the Bill, which seems to me drawn in the interests of the small building contractors, and not in the interests of the tenants. I should not oppose a good and useful Bill for leasehold enfranchisement. But the hon. Members for Finsbury and West St. Pancras do not agree in their reasons for supporting the Bill. The former, who is always posing as a friend of the working classes in this House, as if he had any monopoly in regard to that, says it is a measure for the benefit of the working classes, whilst the hon. Member for West St. Pancras claims it is a Bill to benefit the lower middle class. It seems to me that it is a Bill which will, if passed, benefit neither the one nor the other. It will unsettle the relations of all who are interested in house property, whether landlord or tenant; it will destroy confidence in property; it will injure the Friendly Societies, who are large holders of ground rents—such societies as the Foresters, Oddfellows, &c. It will benefit no one but the middleman, the jerry builder, and, probably, the money lender. The houses will be worse built, no provisions are given by compensation for severance of properties, and this is the first time that equitable provision has been omitted in any Bill. If, in your opinion, for the public good, you forcibly make a man give up his property, you should fairly compensate him, otherwise you are committing an act of legalised robbery.

Mr. LAWSON rose in his place, and claimed to move "That the Question be now put;" but Mr. SPEAKER withheld his assent, and declined then to put that Question.

ARMY SCHOOLS BILL.—(No. 83.)

THIRD READING.

Order of the Day for the Third Reading, read.

LORD NORTON: My Lords, I merely wish to call your attention to the fact that in this little Bill—and I may point out to your Lordships that there are an unusual number of little Bills of one or two clauses this Session—it has been found necessary to have a definition clause showing what the object of the Bill is. I called your Lordships' attention to the absence of definition in a similar Bill last week, when it seemed to be considered that there is no necessity to define the object.

CAUSES BILL.—(No. 103.)

THIRD READING.

Order of the Day for the Third Reading, read.

LORD COLERIDGE: Will your Lordships permit me to say a few words upon this Bill? They are not exactly out of order, if somewhat out of time. Had I known that my noble and learned Friend to my left was going to make some observations on this Bill the other day when it was last before the House, I should certainly have made it my business to be present; but I did not know it, and therefore was not here. I should, therefore, be glad, with your Lordships' permission, to say a few words in order to explain the position of affairs as far as I am concerned. The noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack was good enough to consult me about this matter, and he told me that he had received from different persons applications for a change in the direction proposed by this Bill; that it was thought a desirable thing that causes arising in the City of London should again, as formerly, be tried in the City of London; that the present state of the law providing for the trial of these, like other causes in the Royal Courts of Justice, should be amended; and that it should be possible again to send these causes for trial at Guildhall. Personally, I do not much believe that the change which the Bill effects would have the result which is anticipated of bringing back mercantile causes to the Law Courts. So far as this business has passed from the Law Courts—which undoubtedly it has to some extent—I believe it has done so from causes not touched or affected in any manner by the Bill. I believe it has passed away because the mercantile community desire to have their cases rapidly, well, and inexpensively decided by persons acquainted with the subject-matter—in whom they have trust, and who discharge their duty, an onerous and difficult duty—of dealing with these large interests, as a whole, in a manner satisfactory to the mercantile community. I, myself, do not think, as the mercantile causes did not, in my judgment, leave the Law Courts from any causes which this Bill will affect, the mere change of the place of trial will make much change as to the subject itself, but, at the same time, I am bound to admit that other persons, as competent to judge of the matter as myself, do not share my view, and are of a different opinion. Many eminent Judges, upon being consulted, intimated to me that on their part they had not the least objection, and as, on my own part personally, my objections were not worth pressing, I said, when I was consulted in regard to the Bill, that, as far as I was concerned, I would not stand in the way for a moment, and that if it was thought any good would come will require considerable amendment when it gets into Committee should it pass the present stage. I may mention what I think has already been referred to, namely, that the Bill is confined to the lessee, and appears to exclude the assignee of a lease from the benefits. THIRD READING.

Order of the Day for the Third Reading, read.

LORD COLERIDGE: Will your Lordships permit me to say a few words upon this Bill? They are not exactly out of order, if somewhat out of time. Had I known that my noble and learned Friend to my left was going to make some observations on this Bill the other day when it was last before the House, I should certainly have made it my business to be present; but I did not know it, and therefore was not here. I should, therefore, be glad, with your Lordships' permission, to say a few words in order to explain the position of affairs as far as I am concerned. The noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack was good enough to consult me about this matter, and he told me that he had received from different persons applications for a change in the direction proposed by this Bill; that it was thought a desirable thing that causes arising in the City of London should again, as formerly, be tried in the City of London; that the present state of the law providing for the trial of these, like other causes in the Royal Courts of Justice, should be amended; and that it should be possible again to send these causes for trial at Guildhall. Personally, I do not much believe that the change which the Bill effects would have the result which is anticipated of bringing back mercantile causes to the Law Courts. So far as this business has passed from the Law Courts—which undoubtedly it has to some extent—I believe it has done so from causes not touched or affected in any manner by the Bill. I believe it has passed away because the mercantile community desire to have their cases rapidly, well, and inexpensively decided by persons acquainted with the subject-matter—in whom they have trust, and who discharge their duty, an onerous and difficult duty—of dealing with these large interests, as a whole, in a manner satisfactory to the mercantile community. I, myself, do not think, as the mercantile causes did not, in my judgment, leave the Law Courts from any causes which this Bill will affect, the mere change of the place of trial will make much change as to the subject itself, but, at the same time, I am bound to admit that other persons, as competent to judge of the matter as myself, do not share my view, and are of a different opinion. Many eminent Judges, upon being consulted, intimated to me that on their part they had not the least objection, and as, on my own part personally, my objections were not worth pressing, I said, when I was consulted in regard to the Bill, that, as far as I was concerned, I would not stand in the way for a moment, and that if it was thought any good would come of taking the causes back to Guildhall, I would lend the proposed scheme all the assistance I could as an experiment. My noble and learned Friend will permit me to remind him that if at the end of the year nothing has happened to change the position, and matters still remain very much as they are now, he must allow me the privilege which is generally, I believe, accorded to the other sex, of saying "I told you so." But, subject to that belief on my part, I certainly did not wish to interfere with the plan which my noble and learned Friend on the Woolsack proposed, and which he is entirely entitled to the credit of carrying into effect. There is one other matter which I desire to speak of. According to the reports which I have seen in the newspapers, which my noble and learned Friend says are not quite accurate, he is reported to have spoken the other day of the block of business in the Law Courts in the Strand. I can only speak as the representative of the Queen's Bench Division. As to the Chancery and Probate Divisions and the Court of Appeal, I do not pretend to possess any special information, and, not having any information, it would ill become me to express any opinion on the matter; but with respect to the Queen's Bench Division, I am in possession of facts which enable me to state to your Lordships that no such block exists as is supposed, and as, when questions have been put elsewhere on the matter, has, I think, in the speeches of right hon. Gentlemen, been too much assumed. The position of matters in the Queen's Bench Division is easily stated: there is absolutely no block of business. Speaking for my own Court, I may say that I was obliged the other day to stop a particular class of business because there was no business to do, and I believe we shall easily finish the business now remaining before the sittings are over. There are, it is true, at the present time about 1,000 cases at nisi prius standing for trial, but to simply look at that figure does not lead to any correct conclusion upon the facts. I ought to tell your Lordships that, as anyone acquainted with the subject will know, it is not fair and not correct simply to look at the number of cases standing for trial. The only way of properly testing the state of affairs is to find out the time which elapses between the setting down for hearing and the actual trial of cases. The non-jury cases, which have largely increased of late, are at present more in arrear than any others; but even they are not four months behind, and the Middlesex jury cases are little more than three months behind. This state of things I do not think can be rightly described as arrears. I do not myself think if a man puts his case down, and it is tried within 9 or 10 weeks from the time it was put down, that can be called anything like, substantially, being in arrear. Another matter which may perhaps interest your Lordships is this: People talk about there being 1,000 causes standing for trial, but they do not all come on for hearing. I have information here, which is at the service of any noble Lord who takes an interest in the matter, ranging back over a period of 40 years, which enables me to state to your Lordships that upon a fair computation a list of 1,000 causes standing for trial has represented for the whole of that time down to the present moment only 500 causes that are tried. The same thing happened in the old Courts at Westminster and at Guildhall as is now the case in the Royal Courts of Justice—they do not have to dispose of more than half the causes which stand for trial. Practically speaking, of the London causes those that are set down are tried during the same sittings, and with them, while there is no arrear, the rule obtains almost absolutely which I have mentioned as occurring in other cases—that only half of them come to trial. I mention that to show that it is not from despair of getting them tried that mercantile cases have, to some extent, left the Courts, for those cases which have only recently been set down are just as likely to be withdrawn as those which have been set down previously. So steady is the rule that only half the cases come on for hearing that the Treasury some years ago made an arrangement in respect of fees on the footing that only half the causes set down are tried. That arrangement has been found to work on that basis, and has been going on now for a considerable number of years as between the Treasury and the officers of the Law Courts. My Lords, I beg, therefore, to say that it is an entire mistake to suppose there is this supposed block in the Law Courts. It does not exist; and even in the present state of things, the interval of three months, which now elapses between the setting down and the trial of causes, would not exist but for reasons over which nobody could possibly have had any control, and which may, or may not, recur—I mean the long and serious illness of two Judges within the last two years, and the withdrawal by Parliament itself for a year and a half of two of the most vigorous and active Judges of the Queen's Bench from their ordinary duties to form a tribunal for the trial of a very important political dispute. Such occurrences, of course, do diminish the force for the time at the disposal of the Courts very much; but those causes have now been removed. I may mention that, as my noble and learned Friend knows, so completely are we masters of the business in the Queen's Bench Division—so well forward is our work there during the last 10 days, I have offered him, and he has accepted, the services of two of the Judges of the Queen's Bench Division—one to sit in Chancery and the other in Probate. I think, therefore, I am entitled to say that, so far as the division which I have the honour to be connected with is concerned, it does its work properly and well and to the satisfaction of the suitors.

LORD ESHER: My Lords, I think I ought to say, with regard to the Bill which is at present before the House, that from the moment the effect of the change made in transferring the trial of the great mercantile causes from the City to the New Law Courts began to develop itself, I have been pressed by a large number of people in the City, whose opinion on the matter I have always considered to be of great weight, both professional (speaking in a legal sense) and unprofessional people—professional lawyers and unprofessional merchants—to endeavour to get the trials of the great mercantile causes sent back to the City, on the ground of the inconvenience which they found in the trial of those causes at the Royal Courts of Justice, both from the distance they had to go when their cases were actually coming on and from the time they were unavoidably kept with their witnesses, most of them being mercantile men in almost every instance, waiting at the Royal Courts of Justice away from their offices and business. It was unavoidable. Whereas formerly, under the old system, their offices being close round the Guildhall, when their cases were called on, they could have messengers sent to them, and could go there immediately for the trial of their own cases. More than that; they have always told me, and I have always considered, that the mercantile community had great faith in the tribunals which they obtained at Guildhall, the juries being composed of mercantile men who perfectly understood the business sent for trial. It is true that such juries are to be obtained also at the Royal Courts of Justice, but there you have, in addition to the inconvenience to the suitors themselves, the fact that the mercantile men whom they would like to have for jurymen are obliged to be at the Royal Courts of Justice, and are kept waiting there at a distance from their offices for the case to come on, at the trial of which they will be called upon to act as jurors. I am told that the result has been not only that mercantile causes from the City have been largely withdrawn from the Royal Courts of Justice, but that a new trade or business has arisen—the profession or calling of paid arbitrators, so that where those mercantile suitors would no doubt prefer to be in the position, and should be in a position, to have their causes tried by the Judges who are paid by the country and in the ordinary administration of justice by the Courts, the mercantile community are paying for Judges of their own, and are employing these arbitrators. Some people seem to think that an arbitrator constitutes a better tribunal than an ordinary Judge and jury; but let those who please think so; I am strongly of the other opinion. I have had now, I am sorry to say, 30 or 40 years' experience, and I have formed a very strong opinion that that is not true. I believe a far safer and better tribunal is to be found in a Judge of the land, and a jury, doing their work well and efficiently in a Court where the public can have their causes tried rapidly. But what signifies that if it entails really enormous inconvenience on the suitors and witnesses? This Bill, as I have told your Lordships, and as my noble and learned Friend on the Woolsack has told you, is introduced at the request of the merchants of the City of London. I have myself been requested to try and get these cases sent back to the City for trial, and, therefore, I have constantly pressed, not only the noble Lord who at present occupies the Woolsack, but every Lord Chancellor I have known, to endeavour to get for the merchants of the City of London that return to the old system which they desire.

LORD HERSCHELL: My Lords, I have, of course, no objection to this experiment being tried. But I would remind your Lordships that what I have called attention to was the fact that the present state of things was established by enactment as the result of an inquiry by Royal Commission, which after inquiry reported on the advantages of concentrating all trials under one roof. This measure, of course, is a departure from that system; and it certainly struck me, when you have so important a departure from a policy arrived at after inquiry by a Royal Commission, and upon their Report, that it was desirable to have what I may call some public grounds—that is, grounds which could be shown to be urged and appreciated by the public—for making such a change. That was all I was desirous of calling attention to, and my noble and learned Friends have stated the requests they have received from those who they state have had experience in the trial of City causes. My noble and learned Friend (Lord Esher) has just given your Lordships his own experience in favour of this Bill. On the other hand, I have received information from those who have been in the habit of conducting these causes at Guildhall. I mean solicitors of experience, who take the entirely opposite view, and who do not think the change proposed would be of any advantage, or that the transfer of all trials to the Royal Courts has had anything to do with the diminution of these causes. It is, of course, for your Lordships to decide. You have the opinions on the one side and the other. For my own part, I may be allowed to say that I have no objection to the experiment being tried in order to see what the result may be. My own impression is that it will turn out that it has not really been the cause of the preference of suitors in the City for their particular tribunals of arbitration in lieu of the Courts, but some light will, no doubt, be thrown on that point by the trial of this experiment.

LORD DENMAN: My Lords, having noticed the course of business between the City and the West End, I may be allowed to remark that the great preponderance has always been in the City of London. I find that in 1832 there were in the King's Bench 700 London causes for trial, and 500 for Middlesex. The great convenience of having Courts near the offices and counting-houses of suitors and jurors is not to be over-rated. The effect of this Bill will be to afford great convenience to the general public. I think the 1,000 causes which have been spoken of had much better have been brought in three separate sets of Courts, as under the former system; but there are now only a number of Courts of Queen's Bench, I am sorry to say. You have now Courts No. 1, No. 2, and so on; causes are transferred from one Court to another, and nobody knows when his cause will come on, or where. It was a great mistake to abolish the old Courts of Common Pleas and Exchequer. An advantage, it was supposed, would result from having all trials in one place, so that the counsel engaged in cases could attend; but there are generally two counsel in a case, and if the leader is away, the junior has an opportunity of distinguishing himself and doing full justice to any cause. I earnestly hope this Bill may pass, and that the experiment may prove successful. I think the change will be found to work well, and that no inconvenience can result.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: My Lords, I should have desired to say no more on this matter, but I must correct a misapprehension on the part of my noble Friend the Lord Chief Justice as to what I said. I did not say there was a block in those Courts which he represents, but in some others there has been a block, though there are perhaps circumstances in the modern administration of justice which he has not given sufficient weight to, when he goes back over a very long period of years for the purpose of establishing a sort of canon of how causes are tried. In the first place, the new procedure under the Judicature

Acts has had certain results. Order 14 has had the effect of striking out a great many cases which are not to be tried now, and the procedure that goes on in Chambers practically reduces the list of causes to be tried. I quite agree with my noble and learned Friend they are not all tried, as was also the case in former times, but the proportion in modern days is a little higher than he supposes. There is one more circumstance which must be borne in mind in considering the period over which causes last. Within his memory I am sure, and in mine too, I am sorry to say, there were such things known as "short" causes. Parties were not capable of being called as witnesses as they are now, and by witnesses being called on both sides naturally cases are made twice as long as they used to be. Though there is no desire to prolong causes, the result is that there is a larger proportion of really effective causes in the list than there used to be formerly. Then, on the other hand, there are undefended causes which, though they occupy a place in the list are, of course, practically not defended. Now, I very much doubt taking these causes over the long period of 40 years which my noble and learned Friend has referred to, whether you would find the result to be the same. I have only spoken, of course, in reference to possible future events, and not with reference to anything my noble and learned Friend has said, because what he said was, it appears to me, in regard to this Bill being in the highest degree satisfactory, and he expressed his opinion that we should all rejoice at it. With respect to the only criticism made by my noble and learned Friend Lord Herschell, I would only observe that what the Master of the Rolls has said I think entirely justifies me in endeavouring to meet an acknowledged inconvenience by trying this experiment. The noble and learned Lord Chief Justice has been good enough to tell your Lordships that he reserves his right in case he should be in a position hereafter to say, "I told you so." If that should be the case, the experiment can be discontinued. I will not be tempted to retort upon him that if it be successful, as I trust it will be, I shall be in a position to say, "I told him so." But in any event the experiment will be tried. One may anticipate the possibility of failure on either side to some extent, but I only hope the public will be benefited by bringing the administration of justice nearer to our great commercial centre.

LORD COLERIDGE: I only desire to add a few words to explain that when I spoke of assistance being rendered from the Queen's Bench to the other Divisions, I referred simply to a present emergency.

On Question, agreed to; Bill read 3^d accordingly, and passed.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Thursday, 30th April, 1891.

QUESTIONS.

THE INDIAN STAFF CORPS.

SIR G. CAMPBELL (Kirkcaldy, &c.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India if it is the case that it has been decided to alter the mode of appointment of Officers to the Indian Staff Corps; and, if so, what is to be the new system; (2) whether such Officers are to be taken from the British Army or appointed direct; and (3) whether they are to be educated at any Military College?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Sir J. GORST, Chatham): The answer to the first question of the hon. Member is, Yes; in accordance with the Army Order of the 9th of March, 1891. The answer to the second question is, that they will be appointed direct from Sandhurst to the unattached list of the British Army. The answer to the third question is, Yes.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: Do I understand the right hon. Gentleman to mean by "unattached" that they will not be attached to any regiment?

SIR J. GORST: I am not a military man, but I believe that that is so.

THE INDIAN FACTORY ACT.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India if he will now produce the further Correspondence regarding the new Indian Factory Act?

*SIR J. GORST: The Papers will be presented if the hon. Member will move for them.

CONSTRUCTION OF INDIAN RAILWAYS.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India if the Secretary of State has lately entertained, or is now entertaining, any projects for construction of Railways by Companies with a Government guarantee?

*SIR J. GORST: Yes, Sir.

THE WELSH CENSUS.

MR. STANLEY LEIGHTON (Shropshire, Oswestry): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether he is aware that immediately before the Census was taken at Machynlleth, in the County of Montgomery, a proclamation was made by the town crier urging the inhabitants to declare themselves Welshmen, that is to say, to return themselves as understanding the Celtic language only; whether he can inform the House who were the parties responsible for this proclamation; and if he can state in how many schedules, including how many individuals, the enumerators were obliged to correct the Census papers, on account of persons having, through ignorance or design, wrongly described themselves as monoglot Celts?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. Ritchie, Tower Hamlets, St. George's): I learn from the Registrar General that the Superintendent Registrar of Machynlleth reports that immediately before the Census day the town crier at Machynlleth made a proclamation in Welsh, of which the following is a translation of the material part:—

"Take notice.—The Census. Inasmuch as the Government permits all persons to have the schedules in Welsh, and there being a special opportunity in connection with the matter on the present occasion for every Welshman and every Welshwoman through the town, who can fill up the paper in Welsh to do so. Another similar opportunity will not be offered for ten years. Remember our country, our language, our nation."

I have no information as to the person responsible for the notice. The Registrar General has had the number of schedules counted which the enumerators in the township found it necessary, under the provisions of Section 6 of the Census Act, and in accordance with the Regulations to alter, at the time of collection, on account of persons having described themselves as monoglot Celts, whereas it was within the knowledge of the enumerators that they could speak both Welsh and English. The Registrar General finds that the number of schedules altered by substituting the word "both" for "Welsh" was 57, including 284 persons.

MR. ARTHUR WILLIAMS (Glamorgan, S.): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether he is aware that only 200 Welsh schedules were supplied for distribution in the parishes of Barry, Cadoxton, Merthyr, Dovan, Sully, St. Andrew, Wenvoe, St. Nicholas, Porthkerry, Llancarfan, Peterstone super Ely, Penmark, Bonvilstone, St. Lythans, and other adjoining parishes in the County of Glamorgan, though the population of these parishes is at least 50,000, of which fully 20 per cent. are monoglot Welsh people; whether he is aware that not a single Welsh schedule was given to several enumerators for distribution, and that, when Welsh schedules were asked for by heads of families, the reply which the enumerators in many cases were instructed to give was that the entries could be given in Welsh in the English Census Paper; and whether he can take any steps to remedy the omissions complained of?

*MR. RITCHIE: I have communicated with the Registrar General, and he states as follows:—The parishes mentioned in the question appear to be within the district of Cardiff, which is sub-divided into three sub-districts. Each of the three Registrars was called upon to estimate how many schedules printed in the Welsh language he would require for the use of householders, and to each Registrar was sent some 25 per cent. more than the number asked for. For the whole district some 500 schedules in the Welsh language were sent, and the Registrars assure me that the supply was more than ample to meet the legitimate requirements of those who could only fill up the schedules in Welsh, for whom alone it must be borne in mind the Welsh schedules were printed. A very much larger number of Welsh schedules were issued in 1891 than in 1881. But it having been recommended by certain societies, by ministers and others, that all Welshmen and Welshwomen should demand Welsh schedules, the supply naturally fell short, and schedules in English had to be issued, as they had always been used in previous Censuses. But no omissions were made on that account—the people in the places referred to were closely enumerated, and no action is necessary. Of this, I have satisfied myself by careful inquiry; and wherever in Wales any omission has been proved I have insisted on a re-enumeration. The books and papers are now sent in, and I cannot institute further inquiry. I may mention that the extraordinary desire this time amongst the Welsh people to fill up their schedules in Welsh has given an enormous amount of trouble to this Department, as every schedule filled up in Welsh has to be translated into English. And the filling up the schedule in Welsh has really no bearing on the great question of the number of Welsh-speaking people, as that can be as easily ascertained by a schedule in English with a language column.

Mr. ARTHUR WILLIAMS: May I ask the right hon. Gentleman how it is that the Registrar General considered it of no importance that Welsh schedules should be delivered, and that those who claimed to be monoglot Welsh people should not have been afforded the opportunity of filling up a Welsh schedule?

*Mr. RITCHIE: There can be no doubt of the fact that an enormous number of the schedules issued were filled up in Welsh by people who speak and know both languages. In many instances the Welsh schedule was demanded by persons who understood both languages. For the purposes of the Census, the great object was to give to each person a schedule in which he or she was able to fill up the questions; and the way in which the schedules have been filled up shows that no injustice has been done.

Mr. ARTHUR WILLIAMS: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that a large number of Welsh people who can colloquially make themselves understood in English are utterly unable to read it, and are only so imperfectly acquainted with that language when written or printed that they have been greatly embarrassed by the English Census paper?

*Mr. RITCHIE: I am not able to answer that question; but the information I have received does not bear out the suggestion conveyed by the hon. Member. All the householders filled up their schedules, and stated whether they speak one language or two. It is, therefore, quite immaterial whether they filled up a Welsh or an English schedule.

CHARGE AGAINST A POLICE CONSTABLE.

Mr. W. BOWEN ROWLANDS (Cardiganshire): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he is aware that a coachman named Alexander Nicholl applied to Mr. Partridge, on the 7th of March last, for a summons against police constable No. 5495 for an assault, alleged to have been committed on him without justification or excuse, on the evening of 5th March; whether Mr. Partridge is correctly reported to have declined to grant the summons unless the applicant obtained the consent of the Inspector of Police; whether the rights of individuals in obtaining summonses are different in the case of private persons and of police constables; and whether it is legal for Magistrates to make the consent of a superior police officer a condition precedent to the grant of a summons against a subordinate constable; if so, whether he will consider the matter with a view to an alteration of the law, so as to do away with such a condition, and to make the rights of parties applying for summonses against constables identical with those applying for summonses against private persons?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. MATTHEWS, Birmingham, E.): I am informed by the learned Magistrate that it is not the fact that he refused to grant a summons in this case, unless the applicant obtained the consent of the Inspector of Police. The statement of the applicant failed to satisfy the Magistrate that there had been any assault; nevertheless, in order that all the facts might be more clearly laid before him, the Magistrate suggested that the applicant should lay his case before the Inspector of the district, and then renew his application for a summons, if he desired to do so. The answer to the third paragraph is in the negative. The consent of the Inspector was not made a condition precedent to the granting of a summons.

H.M.S. SULTAN.

SIR U. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH (Lancashire, Clitheroe): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty, in reference to the expenditure, in the year 1889, of £51,175 in raising Her Majesty's Ship Sultan, and of £11,496 in fitting her for the voyage home, set forth on p. 148 of the Navy Appropriation Account, whether any steps have been taken, since the ship reached this country, to prepare her for use as an effective man-of-war; why no provision has been made in this year's Estimates for that purpose; and whether any expenditure is contemplated; and, if not, what are the intentions of the Admiralty with regard to this ship?

*THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Lord G. HAMILTON, Middlesex, Ealing): No steps have been taken to prepare the Sultan for use as an effective man-of-war beyond a careful examination of her condition and a rough estimate of the cost of refitting the ship. This work will not be undertaken until the vessels now under re-construction and re-fit are more advanced or completed.

FOREIGN LOTTERIES.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if his attention has been called to the circulation of foreign lottery and gambling advertisements in this country through the post; whether such a circulation is lawful or unlawful, and, in particular, whether the advertisement of the "New Great Money Lottery, guaranteed by the Government of the State of Hamburg (Germany)," is lawful and is permitted; and whether the advertisement in English newspapers of gambling transactions, such as the "odds" on horse races, is lawful and permitted?

Mr. Matthews

MR. MATTHEWS: I am advised that the printing or publishing in this country of advertisements of foreign lotteries is illegal, but not the transmission of these lottery papers through the Post Office, and legislation would be necessary to enable the authorities of the Post Office to detain such papers. For the law with regard to sporting advertisements I must refer the hon. Member to the case of "Cox v. Andrews," which was decided in the Queen's Bench Division on December 12, 1883.

INCOME TAX.

MR. FELLOWES (Huntingdonshire, Ramsey): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether a farmer, having paid Income Tax under Schedule B, should also be called upon to pay a tax under Schedule D on the profits arising from horses bred on and sold off the farm?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square): The answer to this question is, No. For Income Tax purposes it is immaterial whether a farmer breeds horses, cattle, or sheep, provided the land will carry the stock placed upon it. If the occupation of land is made subsidiary to the business of dealing in live stock, the assessment under Schedule B will not exhaust the occupier's liability to Income Tax. What the further liability may be is a question of fact to be determined by the District Commissioners.

EXPERIMENTS UPON ANIMALS.

MR. S. SMITH (Flintshire): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention has been drawn to the experiments with phthisical sputum reported by Mr. Watson Cheyne in the British Medical Journal of the 11th of April, involving the boring of holes into the knee joints of living rabbits; and whether the Home Office produces a Report of such experiments; if so, does this Report show whether Mr. Watson Cheyne held a certificate dispensing him from the use of anaesthetics in the performance of such experiments; whether the holes were bored into the legs of the animals while they were sensitive to pain; and how long their joints were allowed to inflame and swell through the action of the diseased material stated to have been injected?

MR. MATTHEWS: Yes, Sir; I have seen the report of these experiments in the journal referred to. They were made in the years 1887 and 1888, and a summary of them appears in the Annual Report of the Inspector presented to Parliament for those years under Table 3. From that Table it appears that they were under Certificate A, which authorises experiments without anaesthetics, and which was granted on the supposition that the experiments were simple inoculations. I am informed by the Inspector that the great majority of these experiments were simple inoculations; but that in the cases where the inoculation was performed on bone, as detailed in the journal quoted, the animal was fully under the influence of chloroform. With regard to subsequent pain, the licence always carries a condition that, if severe pain had been induced in an animal after the experiment, and if the main result of the experiment has been attained, the animal shall be immediately killed under anaesthetics.

COMMUNICATIONS BETWEEN RAILWAY GUARDS AND PASSENGERS.

MR. WEBB (Waterford, W.): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade if his attention has been called to the fact that the passengers in a railway train on the Great Western Railway, on 7th April, for upwards of 15 minutes in vain endeavoured to communicate with the guard to stop the train whilst a mother and her child were being assaulted by a drunken sailor with an open knife; and whether the Board of Trade will take any steps to enforce the communication between passengers and the guard being kept in a proper state of efficiency?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (SIR M. HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.): Yes, Sir; I have been in communication with the Railway Company on the subject of the hon. Member's question. The company state that the passenger tried to reach the cord on the near side of the train, whereas the cord was on the off side of the train; that the cord was in good working order, and that the failure to make the communication was because of the passenger going in the first instance to the wrong side of the train. The Act of 1868 imposes the duty on every Railway Company of providing and maintaining in every train carrying passengers, and travelling over 20 miles without stopping, efficient means of communication between the passengers and the guard. The Act leaves it open to any person aggrieved to prosecute, and does not devolve that duty upon the Board of Trade.

MR. ESSLEMONT (Aberdeen, E.): Is it not possible for a passenger to know on which side the communication is?

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: He has only got to look.

ASSAULT BY A SEAMAN OF H.M.S. VOLAGE.

MR. WEBB: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether his attention has been directed to the conviction at Abingdon, on Saturday 25th April, of Robert Dooley, a seaman of H.M.S. Volage, for threatening in a railway carriage to cut the throat of a mother if she would not give him her child; and whether it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to retain this seaman in Her Majesty's Service?

*LORD G. HAMILTON: The offence was dealt with by civil power. The man was sentenced to pay a fine of £5, or to go to prison for a month. The charge was one of ordinary assault only. During his term of service the man's character had been always good. His further retention in the Service is under consideration.

TREATIES OF COMMERCE AND THE COLONIES.

MR. HOWARD VINCENT (Sheffield, Central): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs if the attention of Her Majesty's Government has been called to the resolution unanimously adopted by the Manchester Chamber of Commerce on 28th April, 1890, to the effect that no Treaties of Commerce should in future be renewed or entered into which preclude preferential arrangements between the United Kingdom and British Colonies with regard to their respective products; and if this view will be borne in mind in any negotiations for the renewal of expiring Treaties?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Sir J. FERGUSSON, Manchester, N.E.): Her Majesty's Government are aware of the resolution referred to, as well as of similar expressions of opinion. These will certainly be kept in view in the renewal of expiring Conventions.

NEWFOUNDLAND.

CAPTAIN PRICE (Devonport): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether it is true, as reported in the Times, that the French authorities of St. Pierre are encouraging, by bounties and otherwise, the breaking of the Newfoundland laws with respect to the selling of bait; and whether their doing so amounts to a breach of the Agreement of 1783, with respect to the Islands of St. Pierre and Miquelon, as set forth in the Counter Declaration?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Baron H. de WORMS, Liverpool, East Toxteth): Her Majesty's Government have not been informed that the French authorities have offered any bounty on bait, or have in any other way induced Newfoundland fishermen to break the regulations on the subject. By those regulations the Newfoundland Government at present prohibits the sale of bait to French and Canadian fishermen, while permitting it to be sold to United States fishermen, and it is reported that in defiance of this regulation Newfoundland fishermen have sold bait to the French. Whether the purchase in St. Pierre and Miquelon of bait illegally brought thither by Newfoundland fishermen would constitute a breach of the Declarations of 1783 is a matter of opinion.

SIR G. BADEN-POWELL (Liverpool, Kirkdale): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether the Newfoundland Delegates have now undertaken to introduce into the Newfoundland Legislature the Bill necessary to provide for the due execution of our Treaty obligations on the French shore; and whether agreement has been come to as to the details to be submitted to arbitration?

BARON H. DE WORMS: Her Majesty's Government have not yet received from the Newfoundland Delegates any proposals on this subject beyond the statement made in their Address to the House of Lords. If the second part of my hon. Friend's question refers to the arbitration respecting the lobster fisheries, the answer to it is to be found in Article 1 of the Agreement with France. No agreement has yet been come to with regard to any subsidiary questions, which, as will be seen in the Agreement, are not to be discussed until after the arbitration on the lobster fishery has been concluded.

CHRIST'S HOSPITAL.

CAPTAIN PRICE: I beg to ask the hon. Member for Penrith (Mr. J. W. Lowther) whether the provision, by which 50 sons of naval officers have been maintained on the foundation of Christ's Hospital from the year 1798 to the present time, has been omitted from the new scheme; what is the reason for the omission; and what steps will he take to rectify it?

*MR. J. W. LOWTHER (Cumberland, Penrith): The admission of 50 sons of naval officers to Christ's Hospital rested not upon any specific trust on their behalf, but upon a resolution of the Governors in the exercise of their discretion. The new scheme does not create a trust in favour of sons of naval officers, nor was it ever suggested to the Commissioners during the progress of the case that it should do so. It will still be open to Governors having presentations or nominations for competition to favour sons of naval officers, and it may be presumed that the Council of Almoners in the exercise of their rights of nomination will not be unmindful of the resolution of 1798.

PUBLIC LOTTERIES IN SCOTLAND.

DR. CAMERON (Glasgow, College): I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether his attention has been called to a correspondence between the Secretary of the "Anti-Gambling League (Scotland)" and the Crown Office on the subject of public lotteries for church and other purposes; whether it is true, as therein stated, that four cases had been reported by the Police Authorities and Procurators Fiscal without any proceedings being instituted; whether it is the fact, as stated in the Crown Agent's letter of the 14th instant, that, in the case of the Falkirk Parish Church Bazaar—

"The subscription sale complained of had not been authorised by the Bazaar Committee, and was stopped as soon as it came to their knowledge," or that, as stated in the British Weekly of 26th March,

"the subscription sale and raffle complained of actually took place at the bazaar;"

whether the Act Geo. IV., c. 60, cited by the Society, renders such lotteries illegal in Scotland; and whether the "warning" referred to in the Crown Agent's letter of 14th March as having been given in a Glasgow case, and as "having had the desired effect of closing the shop," was given with the sanction of the Crown Officials and based on the assumption that lotteries are illegal; and, if so, why the Crown Authorities decline to enforce the law in the other cases reported by the Anti-Gambling Society?

*THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. P. B. ROBERTSON, Bute): I have been acquainted with this correspondence throughout its course. In answer to Paragraphs 2 and 5 of the question, four cases of shops in Glasgow used for "Enterprise Sales" were reported to the Crown Office. It is not the case that the Crown Authorities have declined to enforce the law in these instances. The occupiers were informed that their business was illegal under the Statute, and were warned to desist. One of them thereupon closed his premises. The others, having declined to do so, the papers have been sent to the Procurator Fiscal of the Justice of Peace Court. That officer is not under the control of my Department, and it will be for him to make arrangements for the costs of the prosecution. The only alternative under the Statute is the somewhat costly one of raising an action in the Supreme Court. As to Paragraphs 3 and 4, the Act of 4 Geo. IV. renders renders certain lotteries illegal; but the Public Prosecutor has always exercised a discretion as to the classes of lotteries which are fit subjects for prosecution, and I do not intend to depart from this practice. In the case of the Falkirk Church Bazaar, the complaint made was understood to refer to the exposure of an article for subscription sale in a shop window in Glasgow, in connection with that bazaar; and I am assured that it was stopped as soon as it came to the knowledge of the Committee.

LIGHTHOUSE ILLUMINANTS.

DR. CAMERON: I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether his attention has been called to a lecture delivered before the Royal Dublin Society, on the 15th instant, by Mr. John R. Wigham, on the subject of lighthouse illumination, in which he exhibits a new lighthouse burner which he had invented, alleged to have twice the power of the most powerful lighthouse burner tested by the Trinity House at the South Foreland, and also described a new lenticular apparatus alleged to have three times the power of the hyperradiant lens tested at the South Foreland, and to give, when used with the new burner, six times the light of the most powerful existing lighthouse light; and whether he will direct that this new light be tested against the most powerful form of electric light with its most recent improvements with the view of ascertaining their relative efficiency in fog?

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: My attention has not been called to Mr. Wigham's recent lecture respecting his inventions. The hon. Member is aware that it is not the province of the Board of Trade to take the initiative in these matters, and I have had no application for a renewal of experiments from any of the General Lighthouse Authorities who would appear satisfied with the able and exhaustive Report which a Committee of the Royal Society recently made on the subject of lighthouse illuminants, and which has been presented to Parliament.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): I assume that no final action will be taken in a matter of this importance until the House has had an opportunity of expressing an opinion.

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: No action is required.

COUNTY COUNCILS AND TRAFFIC REGULATIONS.

MR. ESSLEMONT (Aberdeen, E.): I beg to ask the Lord Advocate in view of the fact that County Councils have no power to make bye-laws, as Road Authorities, requiring conveyances to exhibit lights during dark while driving, whether he will, on behalf of the Government, take steps to confer the necessary powers where, in the opinion of Local Authorities, such regulations are required for public safety?

*MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: County Councils have the same powers to make bye-laws for the purposes set forth in Section 104 of the Roads Act of 1878 as County Road Trustees had before the passing of the Local Government Act. Until I saw the question of the hon. Member I was not aware of any desire that these powers should be in any way extended; but if representations in this direction are made, they will receive consideration.

DR. CAMERON: The right hon. Gentleman is, no doubt, aware that this is not the only case which has arisen.

*MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: Each case will be considered on its merits, but I may add that the Secretary of an Association does not occupy any privileged position in bringing a case forward.

PRICE'S CHARITY.

MR. STANLEY LEIGHTON: I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education whether he is aware that in the case of Price's Charity, value £60 a year, now devoted to the elementary education of the poor in the Parish of Cwm-dawddwr, in the County of Radnor, the Charity Commissioners, after the publication of the names of four Trustees proposed to be added to the Governing Body, without any public notice and without any opportunity being given to the inhabitants and the general public to express their opinions, added three more names to the list at the nomination of the Joint Education Committee of the County Council, making nine Trustees in all for the administration of £60 a year; and whether the 32 & 33 Vic., c. 110, s. 6, which gives the Charity Commissioners power to dispense with public notices in case of "modifying a proposed order" authorises them to entirely re-construct the Governing Body of a Charity by adding one-third to the number of Trustees, without complying with the provisions securing notice to the public?

THE VICE PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Sir W. HART DYKE, Kent, Dartford): My hon. Friend the Member for Penrith will answer this question.

Mr. Esslemont

*MR. J. W. LOWTHER: Full publicity was given to the names of the three gentlemen referred to in the question at a meeting held on March 11, 1890, of inhabitants of parishes interested in the Charity—now applied as stated, but a grammar school by repute—and was subsequently evidenced by a memorial and a counter-memorial, each signed by about 200 names, presented to the Commissioners on July 7 and August 16 of that year respectively. In these circumstances the Commissioners, when deciding in October last to include these names in the draft order, mainly on the ground that the Parish of Rhayader was entitled to a share of representation, did not consider it to be necessary to publish names already so well-known and so much canvassed in the locality. All the nominees of the existing Trustees having been retained in the order, the Commissioners consider their own action to have been supplemental rather than re-constructive; and this appears to them to bring the case within the discretion, as to publication, allowed by Section 7 (not 6) of the Act 32 & 33 Vic., c. 110.

MR. STANLEY LEIGHTON: I beg to give notice that I will call attention to the matter and move a Resolution.

ELEMENTARY SCHOOL TEACHERS.

MR. RANKIN (Herefordshire, Leominster): I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education whether the Government have had under their consideration the question of the superannuation of teachers in public elementary schools; and, if so, whether they intend to introduce any legislation on the subject this Session?

SIR W. HART DYKE: The subject to which my hon. Friend refers is now being dealt with by a Committee upstairs, and, pending the issue of their deliberations and Report, Her Majesty's Government do not propose to approach its consideration.

ALLOTMENTS ACT.

SIR E. BIRKBECK (Norfolk, E.): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether he can state how soon a Provisional Order will be issued for carrying out the compulsory provisions under the Allotments Act, with the view to the acquisition of land at St. Faith's, Norfolk?

*MR. RITCHIE: A Provisional Order has been made by the County Council of Norfolk in the case referred to; and a Bill for the confirmation of the Order will be introduced without delay.

ELECTION OF GUARDIANS AT CLAPTON, GLOUCESTERSHIRE.

MR. WINTERBOTHAM (Gloucester, Cirencester): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether his attention has been called to circumstances connected with the election of Guardians for the Parish of Clapton, Gloucestershire; whether he is aware that Mr. Thomas Stephens, the successful candidate, received the support of 16 voters, and by the plural vote defeated Mr. N. Jenkins, who received the support of 18 voters; and that Mr. Thomas Stephens signed as witness the voting papers of two of his supporters who were only able to make a mark; and whether such voting papers were legal, and ought to have been counted; if so, whether a procedure so open to abuse can be altered?

*MR. RITCHIE: I have asked the Returning Officer for information as to the election referred to. Mr. Stephens, the successful candidate, received 23 votes, and Mr. Jenkins 19. It is the case that Mr. Stephens signed as a witness the voting papers of two of his supporters who were only able to make a mark; but independently of these votes, Mr. Stephens had a majority of the votes given. I think that it is inexpedient that a candidate should witness the voting papers of persons who are unable to write. At the same time, I may observe that there is no suggestion that the votes in the voting papers as marked were not given for the candidates for whom the voters desired to vote, and the fact that the voting papers were so witnessed does not, in my opinion, render the votes invalid. No facts have come within my knowledge which appear to render it necessary that the law should be altered in this respect, but the point shall be considered when an opportunity offers.

NAVAL DEFENCE ACT.

SIR U. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury when the first Account under the Naval Defence Act will be rendered to the Comptroller and Auditor General, in accordance with the 5th section of the Act?

*THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. JACKSON, Leeds, N.): The Account to which the right hon. Baronet refers is the first of the series, and will largely influence the form of subsequent Accounts. It has, therefore, been the subject of much consideration between the Admiralty and the Treasury, but I believe it has to-day been sent forward by the Treasury.

MAIL SERVICE TO THE HEBRIDES.

COLONEL MALCOLM (Argyllshire): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether the districts of Ardnamurchan and Loch Sninart are included in the improved mail service to come into operation on the 1st May; and, if so, whether these places are to be served by the present Mull mail steamer, by the new service round Mull, or by the steamer to the outer Hebrides?

THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. RAIKES, Cambridge University): In reply to the hon. Member, I beg to state that Ardnamurchan will be included in the improved mail service, and receive a mail three times a week—twice a week by the steamer round Mull, and once by the direct Tobermory steamer. This change, while it will not affect the present frequency of the post, will admit of the delivery of the mails at Ardnamurchan at about 6 p.m., instead of at 2 p.m. the following day. With respect to Loch Sninart, I may state that the present land service to Strontian and Salen will remain undisturbed. With regard to certain places to the westward of Glenborrodale, they will receive their letters, not from Ardgour and Salen, as at present, but by the improved boat service via Ardnamurchan.

IMPERIAL DEFENCE ACT.

SIR W. HARCOURT (Derby): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War having regard to the Report of the Auditor General on "The Imperial Defence Act, 1888," Part II., Ports and Coaling Stations, of the date of 31st January, 1891 (Accounts, No. 90), which sets forth that—

"The proposals in the Imperial Defence Act contemplated that the actual expenditure of £2,600,000 authorised for the purposes of the Act should be completed within the three years ending 31st March, 1891;"

whether he will state how much of the said sum remained unexpended on 31st March, 1891; the reasons for the delay in completing the expenditure, which is declared in the Preamble of the Act to be for—

"Urgent works," and for the "completion without delay of the defence of the Coaling Stations, and the speedy completion of the armaments"; and when the expenditure account will be finally closed?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. E. STANHOPE, Lincolnshire, Horncastle): The amount remaining unexpended under Part II. of the Imperial Defence Act on March 31st last was £935,000, of which £550,000 will be spent during the present year. Unavoidable delay has been caused by the preference given to naval requirements by changes in the armament asked for by the Australian Colonies, and by difficulties in acquiring sites. But the main cause of delay is under the head of "Barracks and Coaling Stations," because the sum to be provided under the Act is to be supplemented by the sales of other property belonging to the War Department and by contributions from certain colonies. These questions lead to complicated negotiations, and the account under this head probably cannot be closed for two or three years.

TREASURY BILLS.

SIR W. HARCOURT: I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will state what was the total amount of the last issue of Treasury bills, the average rate per cent. on the whole, the amount and the average rate on each class of bills allotted?

MR. GOSCHEN: The total amount of the last issue of Treasury bills, being the bills allotted last Monday, was £1,000,000. This amount was made up as follows:—£660,000 in three months' bills at £3 5s. 7d. interest, £260,000 in six months' bills at £3 5s. 6d. interest, and £80,000 in 12 months' bills at £2 16s. 7d. interest. The average rate of interest over the whole, if reduced to three months' bills, was £3 3s. 7d.

Sir W. Harcourt

SIR W. HARCOURT: Why were not more of the bills allotted at the lower rate of interest?

MR. GOSCHEN: For the simple reason that there were no further tenders at that time at the lower rate of interest; otherwise I should certainly have taken them.

ORDNANCE SURVEY REPORT.

SIR E. J. REED (Cardiff): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Agriculture if he will state when the Ordnance Survey Report will be issued?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. CHAPLIN, Lincolnshire, Sleaford): The Report of the Ordnance Survey is now with the Stationery Office, and I am informed that it will be issued in the course of a few days.

SCOTCH DEER FORESTS.

MR. FRASER-MACKINTOSH (Inverness-shire): I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether, if moved for, he will grant a Return from the Government County Assessors of Scotland showing by counties the name, area, and owner of each deer forest in Scotland, and distinguishing those created since 1884?

*MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: It is impossible, without seeing the precise form of the Return, to give a definite answer to the question of the hon. Member. I can only say that I am not aware of any reason why some such Return should not be obtained.

LOWER DIVISION CLERKS.

MR. SEAGER HUNT (Marylebone, W.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty what number of Lower (now Second) Division clerks in the Admiralty have been promoted to the Upper Division, and what number have received staff appointments since 1876; what percentage such promotions bear to the number of Second Division clerks in the Admiralty; and whether he will make such arrangements as will permit of better effect being given in the Admiralty to the Orders in Council of the 12th of February, 1876, and 21st of March, 1890, and to Treasury Minutes of the 19th of June, 1884, and 16th of August, 1889, wherein promotion to the Higher Division and to staff appointments is one of the conditions under which Second Division clerks were induced to enter the Service?

LORD G. HAMILTON: One Second Division clerk has been promoted to the Higher Division, and four have received staff appointments. The number of Second Division clerks in the Admiralty averages 200, and the percentage of such promotions would, therefore, be $2\frac{1}{2}$. The Admiralty can only create staff appointments for the Second Division when the interests of the Service demand such a course; and, in face of the fact that the Admiralty is already overstocked with Higher Division clerks, who will be gradually reduced, I cannot undertake that all vacancies in that grade will be filled up.

ROYAL NAVAL ARTILLERY VOLUNTEERS.

MR. WATT (Glasgow, Camlachie): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether instructions have been issued prohibiting the enrolment of recruits for the Royal Naval Artillery Volunteers pending disbandment; and whether, having regard to the long service of this branch of the Reserve, he can now state his reasons for the proposed step?

LORD G. HAMILTON: The further enrolment of recruits for the Royal Naval Artillery Volunteers has been stopped, pending certain proposed organic changes in their present constitution. The reasons for such a change cannot be stated within the limits of an answer to a question.

THE CHILIAN CIVIL WAR—NAVAL ENGAGEMENTS.

MR. GOURLEY (Sunderland): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether he has received any detailed information from the Commander of the British Squadron in Chilean waters relative to the encounter between the Chilean ironclad Blanco Encalada and the torpedo cruisers Almirante Lynch and the Almirante Condell; is so, will he be good enough to state what it is; and whether he has issued special instructions, requiring the British Commander to advise the Admiralty in detail of any naval engagements which have occurred, or which may occur, during the Chilean Civil War?

LORD G. HAMILTON: The only Report as yet received from the Commander-in-Chief in the Pacific is a telegram from Valparaiso, dated April 24, as follows:—

"Ironclad Blanco Encalada taken by surprise, and sunk with torpedoes by Almirante Lynch and Almirante Condell at Caldera yesterday morning; over 100 drowned; captain saved."

Special instructions are not required, as the Commander-in-Chief will, as a matter of course, furnish the Admiralty with full details of any matters of interest to the Navy.

THE NAVAL RESERVES.

MR. GOURLEY: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether, in consequence of his having appointed a Departmental Committee to inquire into the existing condition of the Naval Reserves, he will place upon the Table of the House Copies of the Report made to the Admiralty by the predecessor of Admiral Tryon, such Report in substance to be similar to that of His Royal Highness the Duke of Edinburgh when in command of the Reserves?

LORD G. HAMILTON: No Report such as that alluded to by the hon. Member was made by Sir George Tryon's predecessor.

THE TUBERCULOSIS COMMISSION.

SIR T. SUTHERLAND (Greenock): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board if he will be good enough to state how long the Royal Commission appointed to inquire into the question of tuberculosis in cattle has been sitting; and whether he can form any idea of the length of time which is likely to elapse before the Commissioners will be able to make their Report?

MR. RITCHIE: The Commission has been sitting since July last. The Commissioners are now engaged in carrying out an exhaustive series of experiments, the results of which cannot be determined for some months.

FOREIGNERS IN ENGLAND.

MR. HOWARD VINCENT: I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board if instructions can be given that the statistics obtained by the Registrar General relating to the numbers of foreigners in the East End of London, in Leeds, and Manchester, competing with the native population, shall be given in the Preliminary Report of the Census, instead of being delayed until the final Report is ready, having regard to the importance of the question from an industrial point of view? I also beg to put to my right hon. Friend this supplementary question on the same subject: Whether he will cause inquiry to be made into the statement in to-day's Times, that there are in the East End of London 25,000 Polish, German, and Russian Jews, who, besides holding on Sunday morning an immense market of the scrapings of the town, sell the labour of destitute arrivals at from 2s. to 3s. a week, depriving thereby other men of work, and especially English workmen?

*MR. RITCHIE: I have no knowledge of such a state of things existing in the East End of London as is described in the hon. Gentleman's question. I have had some experience of the East End of London; and if such a condition of things existed, I think I should know of it. But, further than that, the hon. Member knows a Committee which has sat to consider the subject has heard a considerable amount of evidence, and no statement so startling was made before them. I may say that in the same number of the Times it is stated that some organisation is being set up by Lord Rothschild and others with a view of relieving the congested condition of some parts of London caused by the influx of foreign Jews and other aliens who arrive in large numbers in London. I may also say that a Committee is sitting to consider a Bill with regard to public health, which will confer upon the Local Authorities of London additional powers of dealing with insanitary conditions such as those which are referred to in the hon. Member's question. In reply to the question upon the Paper, I have to say that I have communicated with the Registrar General, who informs me that it will be impossible to comply with the suggestion of my hon. Friend. The preliminary Report on the Census, which must be presented to Parliament within five months next after the Census, and which the Registrar General hopes will be presented at the end of June or in the beginning of July, is prepared from summaries made out by Local Registrars. Those summaries are now made out, and are being sent forward to the Census Office. The information referred to in the question could only be obtained by tabulating the birth-places in all the enumeration books, and to go through all these books for the purpose of extracting from them one particular item of information would involve great trouble and expense, and would most seriously delay the issue of the general Report.

NEW GENERAL POST OFFICE FOR LIVERPOOL.

SIR G. BADEN-POWELL: I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he can now state what decision has been come to in regard to providing a new General Post Office for Liverpool; and whether he can state which site has been selected?

MR. GOSCHEN: I regret that I am unable to answer the question of my hon. Friend. As negotiations are in progress, it would be undesirable to do so.

CYPRUS.

MR. A. O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether Her Majesty's Government intend to adopt the measures recommended, after careful experiments, by the Commissioner of Paphos, for the improvement of sericulture in Cyprus; and whether, having regard to the poverty of the peasants, and to the languishing condition of that industry (which in prosperous times afforded remunerative employment for female labour throughout Cyprus), the Secretary of State will recommend that a grant be voted from the Consolidated Fund to be expended under the orders of the High Commissioner of Cyprus for the improvement of the cultivation of silk in that island?

BARON H. DE WORMS: Her Majesty's Government are favourably disposed towards trying such experiments as the hon. Member alludes to in the first part of his question; but the correspondence on the subject is still in progress. It would be contrary to approved usage for the Secretary of State to recommend a grant from Imperial funds for an industrial experiment of the nature described in the second part of the question; but if, and when he is satisfied that a grant could be usefully expended, he will recommend the Treasury to sanction one out of Cyprus funds. The hon. Member is, however, doubtless aware that the question involves scientific considerations as to the possibility of combating with success the diseases which affect silkworms in the older centres of silk culture.

SOUTH KENSINGTON.

MR. STORY-MASKELYNE (Wilts, Cricklade): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether any steps were taken to consult the Science and Art Department, and in particular the Professors of the Royal College of Science, before the allocation of the land at South Kensington, which has been so strongly objected to in a Memorial to Lord Salisbury, was agreed to, and whether Her Majesty's Government will assent to the appointment of a Committee to report on the statements contained in that Memorial?

MR. BARTLEY (Islington, N.): Is it not the fact that the Science and Art Department strongly object to the proposed arrangement?

MR. GOSCHEN: The responsible Ministers of the Science and Art Department were of course consulted, and after examining the scheme upon the spot, in company with the representatives of the Office of Works, assented, on condition that access should be reserved from Exhibition Road to the Southern Galleries and land adjoining them. The Lord President of the Council and I are prepared to receive a deputation from the memorialists, and all possible care will be taken to protect and promote the interests of science at South Kensington. But I must inform the hon. Member that the munificent offer of the Art Gallery to be built on the proposed site has been finally accepted by the Government, and they cannot now re-open the question.

SEA FISHERY COMMITTEES.

MR. ROWNTREE (Scarborough): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade if it is competent for Sea Fishery Committees to defray the railway fares of fishermen representatives to and from the Committee meetings out of any funds at their disposal under the Sea Fisheries Act; and, if not, if he will consider the desirability of altering the law so as to admit of the payment of such expenses?

SIR M. HICKS BEACH: The Local Fisheries Committees are Committees of the County Councils, and it does not appear that the Councils have any power to pay the expenses of their members when attending meetings. The question whether such a payment should be authorised by law involves that of the payment of the expenses of all County Councillors and other members of their Committees.

FREE EDUCATION.

MR. CHANNING (Northampton, E.): I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education whether, having regard to the number of interests to be consulted, and to the importance of giving sufficient time for the consideration of the details of the scheme for carrying out free education, he will bring in the Bill for that purpose before the Whitsuntide Recess?

SIR W. HART DYKE: If the hon. Gentleman will use his influence with his friends below the Gangway, to assist the progress of the Irish Land Bill, I may be in a position to act upon his suggestion; but, in any case, ample time will be given for the consideration of the details of the measure to which he refers.

MR. H. H. FOWLER (Wolverhampton, E.): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer why, in the "Statement of Revenue and Expenditure," which has been laid upon the Table of the House, the proposed grant of £920,000, for free education in the present financial year, is described as one of the charges on the Consolidated Fund?

MR. GOSCHEN: The Paper in question is simply a record of the Budget Statement of the Chancellor of the Exchequer for the assistance of the memories of hon. Members during the Budget Debates. The right hon. Gentleman has hit a blot in it. I intended the item of education to be stated as a separate item, as not yet before the Committee, and depending on the passage of a Bill, but by inadvertence placed it as a charge on the Consolidated Fund. I will substitute an amended Paper if the right hon. Gentleman thinks it worth while.

THE EVELYN-HURLBERT CASE.

MR. SUMMERS (Huddersfield): I beg to ask the Attorney General whether he is now in a position to state what action, if any, it is the intention of the Public Prosecutor to take with regard to the case of "Evelyn v. Hurlbert"?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir R. WEBSTER, Isle of Wight): The hon. Member must, I think, be aware that it would be both unusual and improper for me to make any statement as to the intention of the Public Prosecutor in such a matter. The evidence is now under the consideration of the Public Prosecutor, and it might be contrary to the interests of public justice were I to state by anticipation any proposed action of the Public Prosecutor. As a matter of fact, I understand that further proceedings are being taken in the civil action.

MR. SYDNEY BUXTON (Tower Hamlets, Poplar): May I ask the hon. and learned Gentleman whether it is on his initiative the Public Prosecutor has moved?

SIR R. WEBSTER: It is not on my initiative. The only action I could take would be on representations made to me. In this case the usual course has been taken and the evidence sent to the Public Prosecutor for his consideration.

MR. PICTON (Leicester): By the Attorney General?

SIR R. WEBSTER: Not by the Attorney General in any sense. The matter has been frequently explained in this House. There are statutory regulations sanctioned by the previous Lord Chancellor and previous Law Officers under which the Public Prosecutor acts.

RATING OF MACHINERY BILL.

MR. W. JAMES (Gateshead): I beg to ask the Attorney General, having regard to the circumstances under which the Rating of Machinery Bill was read a second time, whether he will state what course the Government intend to take with regard to the Committee on the Bill?

SIR R. WEBSTER: Beyond what was stated by myself upon the occasion of the Second Reading of the Rating of Machinery Bill, Her Majesty's Government cannot state what course they propose to take until the discussion upon any proposed Amendments arises in Committee.

SIR W. HOULDSWORTH (Manchester, N.W.): As the Bill is supported upon both sides of the House, will the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury give facilities for its consideration?

*THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster): I am sorry it is not in my power to promise any facilities for the consideration of the Bill.

THE IRISH LAND PURCHASE BILL.

MR. MAHONY (Meath, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he will lay upon the Table of the House a Return showing what electoral divisions in the respective counties will form congested districts counties under Clause 13 of Part II. of the Purchase of Land and Congested (Ireland) Bill, as introduced, and also what electoral divisions in the respective counties will form congested districts counties if in line 2 of Clause 13, the words "poor law union" be substituted for the word "county"?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): Investigations made since the Bill was introduced have convinced me that the proposed basis on which to determine the area of congested districts counties will have to be modified. The £1 average valuation is certainly too low. I have had a map prepared on the basis of a £1 6s. 8d. average valuation, which gives much better results; but I am inclining reluctantly to the view that in all probability it may prove necessary to leave the determination of these counties to some delimiting body. I shall be very glad to show the hon. Gentleman the map based upon a £1 6s. 8d. valuation per head of population.

MR. KNOX (Cavan, W.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he can now give the valuation of the farms in each province in Ireland which, according to his estimate, will be excluded by Clause 6, of the Land Purchase Bill as pasture held by non-resident tenants? There is a misprint in the question. It should be "as pasture, or held by non-resident tenants."

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I can only answer the question as it stood originally.

If the hon. Member will rectify the mistake and repeat the question I will answer it.

LOANS TO IRISH OWNERS.

MR. MAHONY: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether he can state, as regards loans to owners of land in Ireland under a notice from the Office of Public Works, Dublin, dated 12th January, 1880, in which the annual instalments are fixed at £3 8s. 6d. per cent. for 35 years, how much of the instalment is carried annually to the Sinking Fund, and at what rate of interest the Sinking Fund is calculated?

MR. JACKSON: I understand that the rate of interest charged is £1 percent. per annum on the amount outstanding. The balance is carried to the Sinking Fund.

MR. MAHONY: Does the amount carried to the Sinking Fund vary each year.

MR. JACKSON: The interest is always at the same rate. For each £100 advanced, there is an annual payment of £3 8s. 6d. for 35 years.

INDEPENDENT ORDER OF RECHABITES.

MR. JOHNSTON (Belfast, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland whether he is aware that the Independent Order of Rechabites, registered as a Friendly Society, 27th March, 1854,—

"Is an Association of abstainers, united for the mutual interest and benefit of its members in time of sickness and death, and for the promotion of the principles of abstinence from all intoxicating drinks, and thrift";

and whether, as this Temperance and Benefit Society is spreading in Belfast and the North of Ireland, members of the Royal Irish Constabulary will be permitted to join the Order?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Inspector General has already had before him the question as to members of the Constabulary Force being permitted to join the Order referred to. He considers, however, that the pledge to be taken is not merely one of personal abstinence from intoxicating liquors, but involves an expression of views on other matters which might interfere with an impartial discharge of duty.

SEED POTATOES.

MR. T. FRY (Darlington): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if there is any truth in the following statement, which has been received by telegram from Achill, namely—and, if so, what course he intends to pursue in reference to such an important statement?

"Government potatoes rotting after setting, Inspector took quantity to Dublin Castle to show Under Secretary";

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The hon. Member must be aware that the Government have not supplied any seed potatoes to this district. They are supplied by the Guardians of the Westport Union under the Seeds Act, and the failure has been produced in consequence of what is called "heating."

MR. T. FRY: Did not Mr. Inspector Pringle make a representation as to the badness of the potatoes, independent of the heating?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Yes; I believe the Inspector made a representation to the Guardians.

MR. T. FRY: Did he make a representation to the Government as well as to the Guardians?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am not aware; but he ought to have done so.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): How is it that the Government potatoes are more given to heating than others?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: There are no Government potatoes.

MR. FLYNN (Cork, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he (or the Local Government Board) has received any communications respecting the rumoured failure of the seed potatoes imported and supplied through the Skibbereen Union; and who was the Inspector employed by the Government to examine and pass the seed supplied in that district? I also beg to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he is aware that, at the last meeting of the Bandon (County Cork) Board of Guardians, several Guardians complained that the seed potatoes supplied through the medium of the Union already showed symptoms of failure; and, if so, will the Irish Government inquire into the matter without delay?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have received no information beyond the newspaper extract which the hon. Member has been good enough to send me. I will cause inquiries to be made.

MR. FLYNN: May I ask what are the qualifications required of an Inspector?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The hon. Gentleman had better give notice of that question.

LAND COMMISSION—DONEGAL.

MR. MAC NEILL (Donegal, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that in 70 of the cases heard before Land Courts held at Carrick and Killybegs, in Donegal, in January and February, 1890, appeals have been lodged against the judicial rents fixed by the Sub-Commissioners; whether he is aware that the tenants in all these cases are, with six exceptions, the recipients of public charity; and whether, having regard to the fact that these appeals are listed to be heard in the town of Donegal next June, and that the people, by reason of their extreme poverty, are unable to travel so great a distance from their homes and to support themselves while awaiting in Donegal the hearing of their cases, he will give directions for the sitting of the Appeal Court in Carrick or Killybegs, where these cases were originally heard?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Land Commissioners Report that as soon as the arrangements are completed they will be able to say where the sittings will be held, and due regard will be had to the convenience of the persons who will have to attend them.

MERCHANDISE MARKS ACT.

MR. M'CARTAN (Down, S.): I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether his attention has been called to a Report by the United States' Consul Reid, of Dublin, published in the Grocer of the 11th April, in which it is stated that—

"One of the chief pork-packing concerns in Limerick buys great quantities of American hams in the cured state, smokes them, and impresses its own brand upon them," and sells them at a price a trifle below what it asks for its own goods; whether impressing an Irish brand on American hams is an infringement of the Merchandise Marks Act; and if, in the interest of the Irish trade, he will cause inquiry to be made as to whether any such practice, as alleged, is carried on?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. MADDEN, Dublin University): My attention has been called, by the question, to the allegations made by the Paper referred to, and I am informed that they have been flatly contradicted by the Limerick firm referred to. I am having a careful inquiry made.

MR. T. M. HEALY: As this is a matter of great importance, and as many large merchants are interested in it, may I ask the right hon. and learned Gentleman to address a communication to the American Minister, requesting to name the particular house against which the charges are made?

MR. MADDEN: The right hon. and learned Gentleman must be aware that such an inquiry is beyond my province. All I can say is, that as these statements have been made they will be carefully inquired into.

MR. T. M. HEALY: When will the right hon. and learned Gentleman be in a position to answer a further question?

MR. MADDEN: On Monday.

THE BRAGNE SCHOOL, COUNTY DOWN.

MR. M'CARTAN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he has received a memorial from the Manager and Committee of Bragne School, near Banbridge, county Down, complaining that control of the school has been removed from them without any previous notice having been given to them; whether he is aware that this Committee, which represents three Presbyterian congregations, have always been recognised as the only trustees of the property; and whether he will make inquiry into the matter with a view of having their rights over the school restored to the Committee?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Government have no control in regard to the management of the school mentioned. The memorial referred to was received, and duly answered to the effect that the Government were unable to interfere in the matter.

LAND COMMISSION—CAVAN.

MR. KNOX: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland how many appeals re fair rent were heard by the Land Commission recently sitting in Cavan; and in how many of such cases the rent was raised, and in how many lowered?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have not yet received information that will enable me to answer the question.

HARBOUR ACCOMMODATION AT NEWCASTLE, COUNTY DOWN.

MR. M'CARTAN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been called to the want of harbour accommodation at Newcastle, County Down; whether he is aware that the last Return of "Sea Fisheries of the United Kingdom" shows that, in 1885, the quantity of fish conveyed inland by railway from Newcastle was 25 tons, and that every year since then the amount so conveyed has gradually increased, and amounted in 1890 to 197 tons; and whether, considering the great loss to the country, and the serious danger to the lives of the fishermen, he will make inquiry as to the desirability of providing the necessary harbour accommodation there?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Representations have been received from time to time by successive Governments, asking that the harbour of Newcastle (County Down) should be repaired. The Grand Jury have declined to undertake the work, and as the Board of Works estimate that the cost would be at least £13,000, the Government would not at the present moment feel justified in asking Parliament to vote this amount, having regard to the large sums it has already recently voted for works in Ireland.

THE PURCHASE COMMISSIONERS.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland is it true that the Government intend to accept the proposal of the Member for South Tyrone (Mr. T. W. Russell) with regard to the status of the Purchase Commissioners, or any modification thereof?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The hon. and learned Gentleman will probably agree with me that it is not desirable to state the intentions of the Government in regard to those portions of the Land Purchase Bill which have still to be brought forward.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Of course I agree with that as a general rule, but this is a matter which will seriously affect the attitude of the Irish Members. The statement has been made that the Amendment, of which the hon. Member for South Tyrone has given notice, has been put down as a kind of official Amendment.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.): As a reference has been made to me it is right I should state that I have had no conversation with the Government on the matter, either directly or indirectly.

RELIEF WORKS.

DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether any, and, if so, what relief works are proposed to be opened in the Enniskeen district in the County of Cork; and whether any Memorial has been received from the district, pointing out the great distress there existing, and the works of a reproductive character that can with facility be carried out?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: If the hon. Member refers to the Enniskeen district of the Bandon Union, I may inform him that no relief works have been opened there.

WEST CORK POSTAL REQUIREMENTS.

DR. TANNER: I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether any, and, if so, what steps will be taken to provide a quick mid-day mail, to meet the postal requirements of West Cork, that would secure the delivery of letters at Bantry and Skibbereen at about 3 o'clock p.m., with a delivery at 4 o'clock p.m., enabling professional men, merchants, traders, and others, to reply to communications received by the mid-day mail?

MR. RAIKES: The subject to which the hon. Member refers is now under inquiry, and I hope in the course of a short time to be in a position to come to a decision upon it.

YEOMANRY VOTERS AT THE SOUTH LEICESTERSHIRE ELECTION.

MR. DE LISLE (Leicestershire, Mid): I wish to put a question to the Secretary for War of which I have given him private notice, namely, whether it is possible to arrange the training of the Leicestershire yeomanry so that all the members of the corps who desire to vote at the coming election may have an opportunity of doing so?

MR. E. STANHOPE: It is already recognised by Statute that all reasonable opportunity shall be given to members of yeomanry corps to whatever Party they belong, to record their votes; but I will make inquiry into the matter, and see that every reasonable opportunity is secured.

MOTION.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE (PROCEEDINGS ON THE PURCHASE OF LAND AND CONGESTED DISTRICTS (IRELAND) BILL).

(4.25.) MR. W. E. GLADSTONE (Edinburgh, Mid Lothian): I wish to put a question to the Leader of the House, the answer to which may in a certain sense, I think, possibly tend to shorten the conversation upon the Motion which the right hon. Gentleman is about to make. First of all, is it his intention to ask for the particular preference he desires to have on behalf of the Irish Land Bill exclusively; and, secondly, is it his intention to apply the power which he seeks to obtain without making any exception in favour of any particular measure, so that it shall be perfectly equal in its application?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I appreciate the spirit in which the right hon. Gentleman has put the question. The preference which we ask for has reference to the Irish Land Bill at the present time. We conceive that that Bill should be pressed forward with all reasonable speed. It has unfortunately lagged greatly in Committee during the last few days. I suppose the question of the right hon. Gentleman is directed specially to the Wednesdays. So far as other days of the week are concerned, we do not propose to make any exception whatever. The Government do not think it would be possible to make an exception in favour of one Motion or proposal without making an exception in favour of others, so far as Wednesdays are concerned. One difficulty in which we are placed is that an hon. Gentleman opposite had a Motion on the Paper for last Friday, and removed it under the impression that I had given a pledge that the 13th of May should be reserved for its consideration. I did not give that pledge. I did not give that pledge unreservedly; I merely stated that, so far as the Government were concerned, they would not propose that there should be an adjournment for Whitsuntide before that Wednesday, and if no unforeseen event occurred, they would not propose to take that day. However, it has been translated into a pledge; and, therefore, I am afraid I should not be able to take that day for Government Business. After Whitsuntide there are Bills of Private Members which would be in Progress; and under Standing Order No. 12, those Bills would be entitled to precedence before any other Orders. But it would be a strong measure on my part to deprive those Bills of the position they have obtained until absolute necessity compels me to do so. It would be held to be exercising the rights of the majority rather severely upon hon. Gentlemen who had charge of other Bills; and, therefore, it is not the intention of the Government to take the first three or four Wednesdays after Whitsuntide so far as Bills in Progress are concerned. Therefore, it comes to this: The proposition of the Government is that the time of the House shall be given on Mondays, Tuesdays, Thursdays, and Fridays, without reservation, for the Land Purchase Bill. Next Wednesday shall be given for that purpose, but the first three or four Wednesdays after Whitsuntide will not be given until fair progress has been made with the Bills which are in Committee.

MR. J. STUART (Shoreditch, Hoxton): Is it open to the right hon. Gentleman to re-consider the decision to take next Wednesday, when a most important Bill is down?

MR. BRYCE (Aberdeen, S.): May I ask whether, seeing that the right hon. Gentleman took a night in February last, on which I had a Motion down with reference to the Access to Mountains in Scotland, he does not intend to make an exception now in favour of that Motion, which is down for May 8?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: It would, I think, be more convenient that I should enter into these questions, in regard to which I have had more notices than one, when I make the Motion for precedence. I express my regret if by any Motion of mine I have deprived the right hon. Gentleman of any opportunity of bringing forward his Motion.

MR. SPEAKER then, upon formal notice from the First Lord of the Treasury, proceeded to read the Motion on the Paper, but, in response to Opposition cries of "Move,"

*(4.35.) MR. W. H. SMITH again rose and moved—

"That, whenever the Purchase of Land and Congested Districts (Ireland) Bill is appointed for Tuesday or Friday, the House do meet at Three o'clock, and that the proceedings on that Bill have precedence over all Orders of the Day and Notices of Motion: and that the said Bill have precedence on Wednesday if it be appointed for that day."

The right hon. Gentleman said: The House has now had 82 Sittings, and we have arrived at a period of the Session when we are justified in appealing to the House to give further assistance for the progress of Public Business. With reference to the Land Purchase Bill, the House will agree that the case is even stronger than it would ordinarily be in the case of other Bills. On Thursday, the 9th of April, there were 16 pages of Amendments on the Paper, but to-day, the 30th of April, owing to the industry displayed by the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere), there are 24 pages, after we have been sitting for some weeks in Committee. That is a case in itself for asking the House for further time for the consideration of this important measure. It is a Bill which must be considered and disposed of by the House prior to the consideration of any other question, unless it be of extreme urgency. During the 82 Sittings that we have had the Government had precedence on 48 days and private Members on 34. Thirty-four days is a larger amount of time in possession of private Members than has been known during the years from 1882 to 1885. During the Session of 1882 only 21 Sittings were reserved for private Members; in 1884 only 27, and in 1884-5 only 10. I propose now to provide that private Members should have the opportunity of disposing of some of the Bills that have passed a Second Reading and now stand in Committee. We must ask the House, first of all, to dispose of the Land Purchase Bill. That measure has been accepted in principle on both sides, and I believe there is a desire that it should be passed. [Cries of "No!" from the Opposition.] I gather from the right hon. Gentleman and from hon. Gentlemen opposite that they are not opposing the Bill, but only discussing it. But the discussion of the hon. Member for Northampton and his friends has successfully delayed the progress of Public Business for some time.

MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): Hear, hear.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: The hon. Member cheers that, and accepts the statement, and it is because of that delay that I am compelled to make the present appeal to the House. As soon as the Land Purchase Bill is disposed of, it will be our duty to introduce a measure for assisted education [Opposition cries of "Hear, hear," and "Free!"], as to which, if we may fairly interpret the expression of opinions by hon. Gentlemen opposite, we ought not to find much difficulty or experience much delay in passing it. The hon. Member for Northampton says he would like to see the Bill. I am afraid from my experience of the hon. Member for Northampton that we could hardly produce any Bill that would satisfy his mind, and would not require discussion at his hands. When the Assisted Education Bill has been considered by the House, there are Bills now before the Standing Committee that I believe ought to pass without much delay. There is also before the House of Lords a Bill called the Clergy Discipline Bill, and I am sure that the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Gladstone) will concur in the opinion that it is a Bill that should be passed. There is one Bill for which I hope it will not be necessary to ask for any time from the House—the Bill with reference to Newfoundland before the House of Lords, which I trust may not come down to this House. I hope, and believe, that the Legislature of Newfoundland will anticipate the action of the House of Lords and the House of Commons, and render it unnecessary for us to proceed with that Bill. But if it should unfortunately be necessary to proceed with that Bill it will be absolutely urgent that it should be taken, if it comes to us, about the end of May, and passed through all its stages. I only make that reservation with regard to the possibility of this urgent and important matter. I hope that I have given sufficient grounds for the concession which I ask from the House. The right hon. Gentleman has referred in his question chiefly to Wednesdays. By the Motion I make I take practically only next Wednesday so far as May and the first part of June are concerned. If the right hon. Gentleman should be of opinion that it is undesirable that we should take next Wednesday, and if the concession of that day would remove objections on the part of the House, I am perfectly prepared to fall in with his view. There is another point to which I must refer. There is a general desire that the prorogation should take place in July. [Laughter.] Some hon. Gentlemen laugh; but I believe they would not laugh if we deliberately proposed to the House that they should continue to sit during the month of August. The arrangement I have referred to has reference to a Prorogation before the end of July. The House, I think, has fair reason to expect that that should take place. Well, Sir, in addition to the business which I have described, there is Supply, and we have practically—allowing three or four days' holiday at Whitsuntide—[cries of "Oh!"]—12 weeks of the Session before us. I think I have not asked the House to get through more business than can well be done in these weeks that remain; but I think, at the same time, that we ought to begin to set ourselves in order, and invite hon. Gentlemen to repress in the strongest manner the repetition of any speeches, especially when the questions raised have been already considered and practically disposed of by the House.

Motion made, and Question proposed.

"That, whenever the Purchase of Land and Congested Districts (Ireland) Bill is appointed for Tuesday or Friday, the House do meet at Three o'clock, and that the proceedings on that Bill have precedence over all Orders of the Day and Notices of Motion; and that the said Bill have precedence on Wednesday if it be appointed for that day."—(Mr. William Henry Smith.)

(4.45.) MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: The right hon. Gentleman has opened before our anxious eyes a prospect which is rather more gloomy than cheerful. I am afraid that there are considerable difficulties which lie ahead with regard to the fulfilment of the expectations which he still entertains. At the same time, there are some of his anticipations in which I cordially share. One of the last subjects he named was a possible Bill for making certain provisions affecting the internal regulations of the Colony of Newfoundland, and I must say that I most sincerely—I would even say fervently—join in the hope which the right hon. Gentleman has expressed, that it will not be found necessary to submit that Bill to the consideration of the House. With respect to the Education Bill, it is impossible—indeed, it would be out of order—to give an opinion on a measure which we have not seen. But I think the right hon. Gentleman was perfectly correct when he said that, as far as he could gather, there was a desire to give to that Bill every despatch that was compatible with a fair consideration of its provisions, such as they be—in fact that there will be a sincere desire to forward the measure. With respect to the Bill relating to clerical discipline, what I hope is that there may be a very strong wish on the part of those to whom the good moral conduct of the clergy is an object of general interest—and it ought to be an object of general interest—and an anxious desire to find the provisions of that Bill judiciously adapted to their purpose; and, if so, I cannot help thinking that the right hon. Gentleman will find a general disposition in the House to promote the passage of that Bill without any considerable expenditure of time. On the subject of the Land Purchase Bill, it is certainly the case that many who are not supporters of the right hon. Gentleman and the Government desire to try certain questions upon that Bill with regard to which they are unable, from their convictions, to allow them to pass without notice, or even without a Division; but, at the same time, to allow fair and even rapid progress with the different stages of the Bill; and I do not believe that those who object to the Bill altogether have given fair grounds for the right hon. Gentleman's presumption of a wish to delay and impede the measure. I do not think that the right hon. Gentleman was justified in his remarks on that subject, I say that, from recollection of former experience. In the case of the Irish Land Bill, it is quite true that that Bill contained a greater number of clauses than the Bill now before us; but I do not think it contained a greater amount of difficult, complex, and disputable matter. The practice has grown up of late years of throwing into sub-sections a multitude of provisions which in old times would always have been the subject of separate clauses. This is the 11th day on which the Committee on the Land Purchase Bill has sat, and we are only at the third clause. But the Land Bill of 1881 occupied 50 Sittings of the House, and the Committee on that Bill occupied 32 Sittings of the House. It happened in the case of that Bill, as in the case of this Bill, that some of the first clauses were difficult, and I think it will be found, if the matter is carefully examined, that less progress was made in the case of the Land Bill in the first ten days than Her Majesty's Government have made with the Bill now before us. But whereas the Irish Land Bill was an Irish Bill exclusively, and English Members interposed very little in the Debate, this is a measure involving financial provisions concerning England and Scotland and is an English almost as much as an Irish Bill. I say now, as I said when the measure was first introduced, that it is necessarily one of the most complicated and difficult measures ever submitted to the House, and therefore I do not think that there is any ground for the complaint; but I believe that there is a disposition to dissuade any one who is an extreme opponent of the measure from endeavouring to make gain or advantage from it in any shape or form unnecessarily protracting its progress. There is only one other point on which I wish to say a word, and that is with regard to the reference which the right hon. Gentleman made to me in connection with next Wednesday. He said that if I expressed a certain opinion with regard to next Wednesday he would not be disposed to take it. I am disposed to speak in the opposite sense. If the right hon. gentleman thinks it necessary to interfere with the course of business in the House and with the rights of Private Members, particularly in circumstances so remarkable as these, when he has taken the night of the Motion of my hon. Friend the Member for Aberdeen, in which so much interest is taken in Scotland—in my opinion, his only safety is to insist on that on which he has often insisted on previous occasions, and to be perfectly uniform in the application of his rule. I do not look to the contents of the Bills, or to anything that may be called a matter of immediate urgency which I might conceive would be a possible subject for exception, but, taking these measures as measures, they are all well entitled to discussion, and I think the Motion of my hon. Friend the Member for Aberdeen is better entitled than any other Motion, on account of what has formerly happened. I may press on her Majesty's Government that they should not make two bites at a cherry, but should make a fair and uniform practice, and therefore avoid all occasion for giving ground for special complaint on the part of those who may be interested in any particular measure.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: Am I to understand that the right hon. Gentleman is inviting me to take all Wednesdays after Whitsuntide?

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: I thought that we were discussing absolutely the question of all days until Whitsuntide, and then after that of the days on which the Land Purchase Bill may be put down.

(5.0.) MR. LABOUCHERE: The right hon. Gentleman was in a somewhat prophetic mood as to what is going to take place in the present year, but I am sorry that he did not say when there was going to be a Dissolution. With regard to the motion of the right hon. Gentleman, it seems to me that I am always expected to play lamb to the right hon. Gentleman's wolf. The right hon. Gentleman turns on me as if I were the fons et origo of all obstruction in the House. In one sense I am—in the right sense of the word obstruction. The Conservative Party and Ministers have extraordinary notions as to the duties of this House. The right hon. Gentleman has said that I delay Public Business by putting down Amendments. That is one of the valuable truisms in which the right hon. Gentleman occasionally indulges. There can be no ground for any complaint until we have, as in the Land Bill in 1881, occupied more than 32 days. In the discussion on the Land Bill in 1881 the present Chief Secretary made a vast number of speeches, and, for my own part, though I may not be able to equal the Chief Secretary in the eloquence of his speeches, I will endeavour to do so in their number. I would point out to the House that there is no deliberate intention on the part of any one on this side of the House to obstruct, for the sake of obstruction. We know that this Bill must pass. Every clause of the Bill bristles with false principles, and, therefore, I and my friends naturally seek to alter it and make the best of it. Regarding this Motion, however, upon general principles, I am entirely opposed to any invasion of the rights of Private Members, for whenever an attempt at such invasion is made it is owing to Ministers having made a muddle of their own proceedings. The right hon. Gentleman said that it is necessary to pass the Land Purchase Bill at once, and that all other business should give way to it. Then why did he not bring in the Bill earlier than the 9th of April of the present Session? The Government spent many weeks in February and March over the Tithe Bill. Of course, it is known that they were forced to do so by certain hon. Members sitting behind the Treasury Bench; but surely that does not warrant the right hon. Gentleman pleading now that hon. Members have no right to discuss the Land Purchase Bill. The fact is that Ministers are behind with their business, for there is not only the Land Purchase Bill, but also the Estimates for discussion, and we are told that the Bill granting free education is to be introduced. Well, I shall be very sorry to do anything, consistently with my duty to other Bills, which will help to let Ministers escape from the pledge they have given in respect to this matter. I am one of those who want free education, and the right hon. Gentleman may depend upon it that the Radical Members are not going to play into the hands of the "cave" behind him. We are not going to play into the hands of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who must have announced with grief and sorrow that he is in favour of assisted education, considering what he previously said; nor are we going to play into the hands of the Minister of Education, who in his electoral address protested against the system. We had great trouble in forcing the Government to give it, and we are going to keep the Government to their terms and to secure it. It is not improbable that the Radicals may object to much that is in the Bill, but in all probability we shall assent to its passing, and change and modify it when we have a majority. I further object to the proposal of the Government to take the time of Private Members, because it introduces a new element into the demands on the public time. By means of it Ministers are able to say in effect what Bills they approve or disapprove. They will take one Wednesday when Bills which they disapprove are to be brought on, but not the next, because then a Bill favoured by their supporters is to be brought on—a Bill about female franchise or some folly of that sort. In these matters let us at least be fair. What is sauce for the gander is sauce for the goose also. Let the Government take all the Wednesdays or none.

(5.10.) MR. BRYCE: I beg to move an Amendment to except Friday, the 8th of May, from the operation of the Resolution. I could have understood the action of the right hon. Gentleman if it had been uniform, but to select days in a particular way, and practically in favour of particular Bills, is scarcely fair to the House. I should not have moved my Amendment if the right hon. Gentleman had taken all the time of Private Members, and if he had not intimated that the Government would not take Wednesday, the 13th; but, under the circumstances, I feel bound in duty to my constituents and to the people of Scotland, to take the course I do. What we want is uniformity of treatment, and, in fairness and justice, I ask that my Amendment should be accepted. I have no doubt the right hon. Gentleman will express his "deep regret" and speak of his "sense of duty," but I would rather have an ounce of justice than a pound of his regrets.

Amendment proposed, after the word "Friday," to insert the words "except on Friday, 8th May."—(Mr. Bryce.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

(5.12.) MR. COURTNEY (Cornwall, Bodmin): The hon. Member for Aberdeen has candidly confessed that his principal motive of action in excepting Wednesday, the 13th of May, is not that he loves the Access to Mountains Bill so much as that he hates the Women's Franchise Bill.

MR. BRYCE: I said that I desired absolute equality in the matter.

MR. COURTNEY: The hon. Member distinctly stated that he should not have moved his Amendment if the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury had not intimated that he would not take Wednesday, the 13th. Therefore, I have not unfairly interpreted what the hon. Member said. Now, as to the question that is to come on on the 13th of May. Last Friday week the first notice of Amendment on going into Committee of Supply stood in the name of the hon. Member for Haddington relative to the political disabilities of women. That could not have been brought on if the Bill of the 13th of May still stood on the Paper; and it was a question with those Members interested in the subject whether that Motion should be proceeded with or whether the chance of the 13th of May should be retained. A deputation went to the right hon. Gentleman to ascertain the intention of the Government with respect to that day, and the right hon. Gentleman has frankly repeated what he said to the deputation—that it was not intended to adjourn the House before the 13th of May, and that, in the absence of unforeseen circumstances, the Government had no intention to take that day. Well, has anything unforeseen happened?

MR. LABOUCHERE: Yes, surely. The First Lord of the Treasury bases his claim to the days of Private Members on the fact that the unforeseen has happened—that the Land Purchase Bill is obstructed.

MR. COURTNEY: That has not happened since the time referred to, and was not unforeseen. On all grounds it is impossible for the right hon. Gentleman to depart now from the engagement he has made. The engagement of the right hon. Gentleman was known to every Member of the House; it was known to the hon. Member for Northampton. And with regard to the Motion of the hon. Gentleman the Member for Aberdeen, may I point out that even if he loses this opportunity of discussing it the Scotch Members, in consequence of the withdrawal of the Motion as to women's suffrage, had the opportunity given them the other night of debating the question of the deer forests—which is a somewhat kindred subject to that in which the hon. Gentleman is so deeply interested. Before sitting down I should like to say that my right hon. Friend the Member for Mid Lothian, was a little obscure with respect to the Wednesdays subsequent to Whitsuntide. With regard to Bills which have been considered before Whitsuntide, which have passed a Second Reading, and which are set down for progress after Whitsuntide, if the opportunity of further progress is taken away we shall put a stop to all legislation by private Members and make such legislation before Whitsuntide a farce. I entirely agree with the right hon. Gentleman as to the necessity of reserving those Wednesdays for such Bills. I protest against the contention of the hon. Member for Northampton and the hon. Member for Aberdeen that Wednesday, the 13th, should be taken.

MR. SPEAKER: I may remind the House that the Amendment before it is a limited one. It merely excepts Friday the 8th May.

*(5.19.) SIR H. JAMES (Bury, Lancashire): May I appeal to the Member for Aberdeen to withdraw his Amendment. I will then ask leave to amend the Motion so that it shall read, after the word "Bill," in the last line but one, "shall also have precedence on Wednesdays until said Bill has passed through Committee of the House."

MR. BRYCE: On that understanding, I am willing to withdraw my Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

SIR H. JAMES: If there is any ambiguity in the views of the hon. Member for Aberdeen, there is no ambiguity in those of the right hon. Gentleman the Chairman of Committees. Whatever may be the inconvenience to Members of this House, and however desirable it may be that their time should be occupied by useful and practical legislation, yet according to the right hon. Gentleman all ought to give way to what will be after all an abstract discussion on the right of female suffrage. The effect of the Amendment which I beg leave to move is that until the Irish Land Bill has passed through Committee all the Wednesdays shall be taken up by that Bill. In that case we may hope that that Bill will be through Committee before the Whitsuntide Recess, and if it is, fewer Wednesdays will be taken by the Government after Whitsuntide. Anything which may interfere with the progress of the Land Bill through Committee will be detrimental to the public interest. What does the right hon. Gentleman the Chairman of Committees ask? He asks that the progress of the Land Bill shall be suspended, and that precedence shall be given to the Second Reading of the Bill for conferring the suffrage upon women. Does the right hon. Gentleman hope that there is any possibility of that Bill passing through the House? The House has still to deal with the Bill for Marriage of a Deceased Wife's Sister, with the Rating of Machinery Bill, with the Bill which would give a close time for hares. All those Bills, having been read a second time, have vested interests, and ought to be dealt with practically by the House. If we now say that we will not take away the Wednesday in question, but will give it for the pleasure of hearing the eloquence of my right hon. Friend, we must take more days after Whitsuntide, and all for an abstract proposition which we have already at different times discussed eight or ten times in this House. There is only one argument which has been used in favour of that course, namely, that the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury has given a pledge. But this is a question for the House itself. We have to consider how we can best do what is useful for carrying on the public business. We shall not be able to leave this House in the month of July if these days are not taken, and the Session will have to be further prolonged. The right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the House did not anticipate, when he gave what has been called a pledge, that eleven days would have been taken up with three clauses of the Irish Land Bill, or that he would have had to listen to so many arguments from the hon. Member for Elgin. I beg to move the Amendment.

Amendment proposed, in line 5, after the word "Wednesday," to insert the words "until it shall have passed through Committee." — (Sir Henry James.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

(5.26.) VISCOUNT WOLMER (Hants, Petersfield): As reference has been made to me by the right hon. Gentleman, I should like to inform him what was actually said by the Leader of the House on the point in question. The deputation waited on him last Monday week, and as a result, the Motion of the hon. Member for Haddington, which was on the Paper for the following Friday, was removed. The First Lord of the Treasury stated that he did not intend to move the Adjournment of the House before the 13th of May, and that he would not take that day for the Business of the Government unless some "wholly unforeseen emergency" arose. I should like to ask if any wholly unforeseen emergency has since arisen?

(5.28.) SIR W. HARCOURT (Derby): I hope the First Lord of the Treasury will allow the House to express its own opinion on this subject; that he will listen to the appeal of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bury, and not dictate his personal opinion. The right hon. Gentleman is asking the House to make a sacrifice of its time for the purpose of carrying the Irish Land Bill through Committee. With regard to the pledge which has been referred to, the right hon. Gentleman says that he has not given a pledge, although what he said has been construed into one, and it is a curious thing that a man should be bound, not by what he acknowledges to be a pledge, but by what other people understand to be a pledge. It seems to me it would be as well for the right hon. Gentleman not to bring any pressure to bear on the House, but to allow it to determine for itself whether all Wednesdays shall be taken for the Irish Land Bill. I think that the proposal of the right hon. Member for Bury is one which we ought to accept, as it would enable the rest of the Session to be devoted to the Free Education Bill and Supply, and would not damnify the smaller Bills which have so far been read a second time. The Government must take the time somehow or other, and had better do so before Whitsuntide. The arrangement that all Wednesdays should be taken need hardly be broken into for the grand field day of the right hon. Member for Liskeard and the noble Lord the Member for the Petersfield Division, whom, in other circumstances, we should be even more pleased to hear on the subject of Female Suffrage than we should be to hear the right hon. Gentleman.

MR. COURTNEY: Why?

SIR W. HARCOURT: He is younger. I hope the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bury will be accepted, as to my mind it practically meets all the necessities of the case.

*(5.33.) MR. W. H. SMITH: I trust that the House will not consider it necessary to prolong the Debate. The question before us is a very narrow one. It is whether the understanding that has been come to with reference to May 13th shall, or shall not, be observed. For myself I feel bound not to depart from that understanding, but it is for the House to decide what course shall be taken. I fully appreciate the desire of the House to make progress with the Irish Land Bill, and under the circumstances I shall leave this question of taking Wednesday, May 13th, to be decided by the majority.

*(5.34.) MR. KEAY (Elgin and Nairn), who rose amid cries of "Divide!" said: I am glad hon. Gentlemen opposite are so demonstratively objecting to my speaking, because it helps me to push home the argument I was about to address to the House with regard to the attack made upon me by the First Lord of the Treasury. My reply is that if any of my speeches have been prolonged unduly, the reason is to be found in the obstruction which I have met with from the opposite side of the House. Whenever I have risen to speak to Amendments in Committee on the Land Bill I have been received with obstructive cries and howls from hon. Members, chiefly of the landlord persuasion. The attack of the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord has been endorsed by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bury, and by the noble Lord the Member for Petersfield, and I therefore think it right to briefly designate the character of the Amendments which I have placed upon the Paper.

*MR. SPEAKER: The remarks of the hon. Member are entirely out of order.

*MR. KEAY: I trust, Sir, you or the House did not think I was going to speak on the Amendments. I only ask to be allowed to point to the Paper in order to show that my Amendments were such as should be put down by anyone professing Radical principles. I do not know whether this is the proper time for me to say a word in explanation of the prominent position which, in connection with the Land Bill, I have thought it right to take up.

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! The hon. Member has sufficiently made a personal defence, and he must now confine his remarks to the Amendment before the House.

*MR. KEAY: I was only going to reply specifically to what the First Lord had charged me with. I will not, however, press the matter further until after the Division.

(5.39.) MR. A. O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.): The observation of the First Lord appeared to me to be deficient in one or two points. He proposes to take a great deal of the time of the House for Government business, but the Government have not yet stated what they intend to do with the Land Department Bill or the Employers' Liability Bill. Supply, too, has been mentioned, but nothing has been said as to the Vote on Account.

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! The hon. Member's observations are not relevant to the Amendment. They would be more properly made on the Main Question.

*(5.40.) MR. WOODALL (Hanley): I feel that it is only right to thank the First Lord of the Treasury for the loyalty with which he has adhered to the understanding with reference to May 13th. But there are now only two Wednesdays before Whitsuntide, and it is clear that the Wednesdays after will be required to enable further progress to be made with those Bills for which Private Members have been fortunate enough to obtain a Second Reading. I would suggest to the First Lord that the equity of all interests would be met, and Public Business best promoted, by his omitting the concluding passage from his Resolution, and leaving, for the present at any rate, all the Wednesdays free for the Private Members, to which they properly belong.

*(5.41.) MR. W. H. SMITH: In answer to a question addressed to me by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian, I expressed willingness to forego Wednesdays altogether, but since doing so the Wednesdays have been pressed upon the Government, and those who are responsible for the conduct of Public Business can hardly refrain from accepting facilities of that kind when they are offered. The House must now decide the question.

*(5.42.) MR. HALDANE (Haddington): I do think that if May 13th is taken by the Government it would be unfair treatment, for my Resolution on Female Suffrage did not come on last Friday simply because of the understanding that the Bill dealing with the subject would come up for discussion on Wednesday, the 13th. I am aware that the right hon. Gentleman gave no pledge in terms, but he is always courteous and explicit in what he says, and he certainly conveyed to our minds a promise to leave the 13th May free for us. I hope the House appreciates the joining of hands by the right hon. Gentlemen the Members for Bury and Derby and the hon. Member for Northampton in an appeal to devote more time to the discussion of the Irish Land Purchase Bill. I ask the House to pause before depriving us of the opportunity we seek of discussing the principle of Women's Suffrage.

(5.44.) MR. J. ROWLANDS (Finsbury, E.): No one has at present said anything about Wednesday, 6th May, on which day the First Order is the Town Holdings Bill, in which my hon. Friend the Member for West St. Pancras is much interested. Unfortunately, he is not here now, or he would put in a claim for consideration on that ground. I think we have shown by the Divisions which have taken place on two recent Wednesdays how much interest is taken in the town lands question. The right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury is making exceptions with regard to other Bills, but we, because we stand first with the town lands question on the 6th of May, have to lose our place. If this Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman the member for Bury (Sir H. James) is not carried, we do not know that we shall have an opportunity of passing through Committee the Places of Worship Enfranchisement Bill, the Second Reading of which was passed by the largest majority of this Session. If there is to be no protection for the rights of Private Members, the Ballot becomes a farce, and those who are deeply interested in questions of this kind merely waste time when they ballot for a place, and take the necessary precautions to secure the attendance of their friends. We who have precedence on the 6th of May have a perfect right to ask the right hon. Gentleman to exempt that day from the operation of his proposals, and also to ask that the Bills that passed their Second Reading earlier in the Session shall be kept alive. If we do not continue to protest against this continually increasing absorption of Private Members' business, the time will come when Private Members will come down here simply to say "ditto" to what the First Lord of the Treasury says. I think we ought to protest in the strongest language possible against the conduct of the Government.

(5.50.) The House divided:—Ayes 218; Noes 159.—(Div. List, No. 162.)

Another Amendment made, by leaving out the words "If it be appointed for that day."—(Sir Henry James.)

Main Question, as amended, proposed.

(6.4.) DR. CLARK (Caithness): I much regret that in consequence of this proposal a very important Motion affecting the North of Scotland will be prevented coming on. In the month of February my hon. Friend the Member for Sutherland (Mr. A. Sutherland) had a Motion exactly similar before the House. The right hon. Gentleman took his day and since then, unfortunately, there have been some lawlessness and disturbance in the North. The people who are suffering from the grievances to which the Motion relates have not been able to bring those grievances before the House. I do not think the course the right hon. Gentleman is taking will facilitate business. Instead of raising the question we are anxious to raise in a single discussion, we shall be compelled to have three discussions—one on the Supplementary Estimates, a second on the salary of the Secretary for Scotland, and a third on the Vote for the Crofters' Commission. If the right hon. Gentleman were wise he would come to terms with us and give us a couple of hours to-morrow night, in place of the three he is robbing us of.

(6.7.) MR. A. O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.): I should like to hear from the right hon. Gentleman what are the intentions of the Government with regard to the Vote on Account, with regard to the Land Department Bill, and with regard to the Employers' Liability Bill. The question of employers' liability would have been raised on this side of the House over and over again if the present Government had not repeatedly held out to the working classes the prospect of the passing of a measure which would satisfactorily deal with the question of injury to life and limb in employment. The Government have been dallying the subject before our eyes now for three years.

*(6.8.) MR. KEAY: I now desire, Sir, with your permission, to conclude the few brief remarks I had commenced when the Amendment was before the House. I have already pointed to the character of my Amendments as proving that they were such as any honest Radical Member of this House would feel himself bound to put down. I have now to address a remark or two to the House on the methods by which those Amendments have been—

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! That would be out of order.

*MR. KEAY: I am only speaking in general terms, Sir.

*MR. SPEAKER: That would be quite out of order. It has no relevance whatever to the Resolution.

*MR. KEAY: I have been accused by the First Lord of the Treasury of needless repetition—

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! I call on Mr. Howell.

(6.10.) MR. HOWELL (Bethnal Green, N.E.): I wish to protest against the taking away of any opportunity of bringing forward Private Members' business. If I can in any way squeeze in on any of the Votes a Debate on the question in which I am specially interested, I shall certainly do so.

*(6.11.) MR. ANGUS SUTHERLAND (Sutherland): I wish to add my protest to that of my hon. Friend the Member for Caithness. I have for a long time had a Notice down for the amendment of the Crofters' Act; but I have never been able to secure a place for the discussion. When I had a Motion down earlier in the Session the right hon. Gentleman appeared in his favourite character of confiscator of Private Members' time, and took it away from me. I think the right hon. Gentleman might, at least, have excepted to-morrow evening from the operation of his rule.

(6.12.) MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): I trust the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the House will be able to give us a prompt reply to the question put to him by my hon. Friend the Member for East Donegal (Mr. A. O'Connor) respecting the Land Department Bill. That Bill has been in Committee for the last five months, but it has never moved on, and I think we are entitled to know what are the intentions of the Government in regard to it. Perhaps if the Government can see their way to take out of the Purchase Bill the clauses relating to the organisation of the Land Department, and deal with it in the Land Department Bill when that Bill comes on, the prospects of the Land Purchase Bill will be improved, and I think that measure would pass through Committee at least by Whitsuntide. I think the present Motion ought not to have been made, because the Government ought to have sufficient intelligence and businesslike capacity to arrange their business so as to suit the settled order of business in the House. I object on principle to such Motions. If it is found, as a matter of experience, that the time of the House is not properly apportioned between the Government and private Members, the question ought to be dealt with not by these random Motions, but by a deliberate amendment of the Rules of the House. When, however, I consider the question from the point of view of the existing situation, I see no objection to the Motion. I think the subject of the Land Purchase Bill is as worthy of the time of the House as any other subject which has come before it, and I wish to say that we are not only willing to allow progress with the Bill, but desirous to promote it. If any hon. Member says we have unnecessarily interfered with, or offered factious opposition to, the progress of the Bill, let me remind him that the rate of progress of the Bill has improved as its discussion has proceeded, and even the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary cannot say that the rate of progress has been unsatisfactory as a whole. As to what has been effected by the discussions that have taken place, I would refer the House to the three clauses already considered in Committee as they originally stood, and as they now appear, and I therefore think I am entitled to claim credit from the Government, not only that we have in no way obstructed the Bill, but that, on the contrary, we have throughout shown a sincere desire to pass a measure which, although of a very complex character, is one of vast importance to Ireland.

*(6.17.) MR. W. H. SMITH: I desire to say that I have not attributed obstruction to the hon. Gentleman the Member for West Belfast (Mr. Sexton), and I am sure he will find if he remembers what I have said that no observation which has fallen from me is capable of bearing any such interpretation. In regard to the remarks of the hon. Gentleman the Member for East Donegal (Mr. A. Mr. Sexton O'Connor), I have to say that there is no immediate necessity for a Vote on Account, and that no such Vote will be asked for before Whitsuntide. As to the Newfoundland Bill, I hope it will be unnecessary to proceed with it. In that case, after the Land Bill, we shall take the Education Bill. As to the Employers' Liability Bill, my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary made a statement recently, but there is a strong objection to bring in Bills which are not likely to pass. It all rests with the House, and I can only repeat that we do not contemplate asking the House to sit beyond July. Therefore, unless there is a strong probability of our being able to pass that measure through its various stages in the earlier part of July, I do not see how it is to be dealt with this Session. I may also say that I am not at present in a position to give a reply to the question put to me with regard to the provisions relating to the organisation of the Land Department.

MR. PICTON: When the right hon. Gentleman states that it is not proposed to ask for any Vote on Account before Whitsuntide, is that statement to be presumed to imply that a Vote on Account will be taken after Whitsuntide?

(6.20.) MR. FENWICK (Northumberland, Wansbeck): I understand that the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury holds out no hope of the Employers' Liability Bill being passed this Session. That statement will be received with much surprise and regret by a very large number of those who belong to the working classes of this country.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: In answer to what has just fallen from the hon. Member for the Wansbeck Division, I have only to say that it is entirely at the option of hon. Members opposite whether the measure he refers to shall be disposed of this Session. If there is any strong desire to facilitate that and other business there may yet be time for dealing with the measure; but up to the present time quite two-thirds of the time of the House has been occupied by the Opposition.

MR. STOREY (Sunderland): Does the right hon. Gentleman remember any Parliament in which two-thirds of the time of the House has not been occupied by the Opposition?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I am certainly not able to remember any Session during the present Parliament in which two-thirds of the time of the House has not been occupied by the Opposition.

MR. FENWICK: I must express my regret that the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary has not yet seen his way to the introduction of the Employers' Liability Bill, seeing that Her Majesty's Government have announced their intention in each of the Queen's Speeches at the opening of the last two Sessions to deal with the question. It now appears that the subject will not be considered even during the present Session. Of course, it is impossible to say how the Government Bill will be received on these Benches until we have had the opportunity of seeing it in print; but, speaking for myself, and, I think I may also say, for those of my colleagues with whom I have been associated in relation to this question, if the Bill is at all a satisfactory one there will be no disposition on our part to obstruct or delay the measure in its passage through the House. I am only sorry that we have not been able to obtain from the Government an assurance affording anything like a reasonable hope that the Bill will be considered this Session.

Resolved. That, whenever the Purchase of Land and Congested Districts (Ireland) Bill is appointed for Tuesday or Friday, the House do meet at Three o'clock, and that the proceedings on that Bill have precedence over all Orders of the Day and Notices of Motion: and that the said Bill have precedence on Wednesday until it shall have passed through Committee.

PRIVATE BILL PROCEDURE (SCOTLAND) BILL COMMITTEE.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Sir Edward Harland be discharged from the Committee."—(The Lord Advocate.)

(6.42.) DR. CAMERON (Glasgow, College): I rise for the purpose of opposing the Motion, and will briefly state the reasons which induce me to do so. This Committee consists of 20 Members, five of whom are a quorum. The Committee has only sat on three occasions, the first being the usual formal sitting for the election of a Chairman and the arrangement of the order of business, while on the second and last the business of the Committee has been proceeded with. During the discussions that have already taken place much progress has been made, and I venture to say that almost every point on which there has been any difference of opinion has already been discussed and settled. Indeed, I have little doubt that another sitting will conclude the deliberations of the Committee. The object of having a small quorum is to allow those Members who for any reason are unable to attend to absent themselves without at the same time interfering with the progress of the business. This Committee was appointed on the 9th inst., and on the 16th two of its Members were discharged before business had been commenced. There was good reason for the discharge of those hon. Members, one of whom had been appointed on a Joint Committee of the Lords and Commons, which required his attendance; while the other hon. Member was not in this country. On the 21st inst. we had another change in the composition of the Committee; the right hon. Member for the Stirling Burghs (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman) had been taken ill, and was unable to attend, and another hon. Member was substituted, namely, the hon. Member for Banff (Mr. Duff). This proceeding was justifiable, because it was desirable that there should be a representative of the ex-Cabinet on the Committee; but on the 27th inst. we had another and a wholesale change in the constitution of the Committee, four of its then Members being discharged and four others substituted. It would seem, however, that this was not enough, and we are now asked to make a further alteration in the constitution of the Committee, by discharging two more of its Members and putting two fresh ones in their places. If this proposal is adopted we shall be placed in this position: that at the very last stage of the business of the Committee we shall have had changes in the composition of that body to the extent of nine Members. This can hardly be regarded as a proper system of working Select Committees. On the contrary, it appears to me to be a system which, if generally adopted, would be subversive of the confidence usually felt by this House in the proceedings of its Committees. One of the advantages of a Select Committee is that its Members are usually more amenable to argument than is the case in the House itself. They listen more attentively to what is said on both sides, and their decisions generally receive the assent of the House. I must protest against the further innovation in the composition of the Committee which is now proposed, as being, at any rate in my experience, altogether unprecedented. If the hon. Members it is proposed to discharge from this Committee cannot attend there is no reason why they should do so. But as it is, these two gentlemen are two of the most valuable Members of the Committee, namely, the Member for North Belfast (Sir E. Harland), and the Member for one of the Divisions of Leeds (Mr. Gerald Balfour). The hon. Member for Leeds has taken a most active and intelligent interest in the business before the Committee, and the same remark applies to the hon. Member for North Belfast. I am sorry they should think themselves unable to attend to-morrow's sitting, which I suppose will finish the whole business, and I hope the Government will postpone their proposal. I do not think there is any necessity or excuse for a proposal which, in my opinion, tends to subvert the system on which Select Committees are based, and to weaken the confidence which this House has hitherto reposed in their decisions.

(6.50.) THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. P. B. ROBERTSON, Bute): In answer to the hon. Member for the College Division, I would point out that the two hon. Members whom it is proposed to discharge from the Private Bill Procedure Committee have been appointed by Her Majesty as Members of the Labour Commission, which is to meet for the first time to-morrow at the same hour as the Scotch Procedure Bill Committee. So far, the changes made in the constitution of the Committee have been made on the footing of friendly arrangements between both sides. With regard to the two gentlemen it is proposed to discharge, great importance is attached to the proceedings of the Labour Commission, and to the services of those hon. Members upon that Commission. I may point out with regard to the changes already made that the illness of the right hon. Member for the Stirling Burghs necessitated one change, but he has fortunately since recovered his health, and on the Motion of my hon. Friend the Patronage Secretary to the Treasury he has been replaced on the Committee. The other changes have also been justified by the circumstances of each case; it has been felt on both sides of the House that the Committee should be a large one—larger than it was when first constituted. It was originally considered that 15 Members would suffice, but, in deference to opinions expressed on the other side of the House, the number was enlarged to 20. As to the progress made by the Committee, about 20 clauses of the Bill still remain to be disposed of, so that there is still a good deal of detail to be gone into. I trust, therefore, the House will agree to this Motion, and thus retain the Committee at its desired numerical strength.

*MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN (Stirling, &c.): There can be no doubt that the changes made in the constitution of the Committee have been somewhat exceptional both in their number and nature. Some of them have undoubtedly been necessary changes. In my own case the course taken was somewhat unusual, because having been discharged in consequence of the state of my health I was shortly afterwards put on again. I am not surprised that my hon. Friend and other hon. Members should be astonished at the numerous changes made in the composition of a Committee which, after all, has only sat 2½ days. With regard to the sitting of the Labour Commission to-morrow, I would say that the hon. Member for Stirlingshire, who is also a member of the Commission, spoke to me on the subject, and I said to him, not from any special knowledge, but as the result of former experience, that in all probability the business at the first meeting of the Labour Commission would be purely formal, and that therefore his attendance would not be absolutely necessary.

DR. CLARK: I only wish to remind the House that the Government placed three Irish Members on this Committee as representing three divisions of Parties, and that two of those Irish Members having been already taken away, they now propose to remove the last in order to replace him by a Scotchman. I am glad the Government are at last showing some inclination to give way to Scotch feeling by the course they are adopting.

*MR. SPEAKER: I must point out to the House that this discussion is not in order, and that I ought now to put the Question to the House.

(6.55.) The House divided:—Ayes 206; Noes 106.—(Div. List, No. 164.)

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Gerald Balfour be discharged from the Committee."

(7.2.) DR. CAMERON: I shall not oppose this further discharge from the Committee, but I feel that it is necessary to make a protest against the addition of fresh names to the Committee and the nomination of Members who know nothing of the foregoing proceedings.

Question put, and agreed to.

Ordered, "That Mr. Gerald Balfour be discharged from the Committee."

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Anstruther be added to the Committee."—(The Lord Advocate.)

(7.3.) DR. CAMERON: My reason for objecting to the addition of fresh Members at this stage is that we have now in Committee almost reached the conclusion of our deliberations. It is quite true that there are a good number of clauses, but the contentious matter has been got rid of, the appointment of the Commission under the Bill has been decided, and what remains is matter of detail, upon which we are fairly agreed. There arises no difference upon Party lines, and the introduction of new Members is to be deprecated at this stage. It is simply an addition to make up the Party majority of two Members who know nothing of what has been done up to the present.

(7.8.) The House divided:—Ayes 186; Noes 96.—(Div. List, No. 165.)

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Curzon be added to the Committee."

(7.17.) DR. CAMERON: In making my protest against these changes I did so as a matter of principle, and upon no ground of personal objection to the hon. Members nominated by the Government.

They no doubt will make excellent members of the Committee, if new Members under the circumstances can be of any service on the Committee.

Question put, and agreed to.

Ordered, "That Mr. Curzon be added to the Committee."

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

PURCHASE OF LAND AND CONGESTED DISTRICTS (IRELAND) BILL.—(No. 111.)

COMMITTEE.

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 3.

Question again proposed "That the Clause, as amended, stand part of the Bill."

(7.19.) MR. STOREY (Sunderland): There is no disposition in this or any other quarter of the House to discuss at length a clause which has already been subjected to very substantial criticism; but we desire to make our formal protest against the clause in the only Parliamentary way at our disposal. This is the clause which creates the Guarantee Fund springing from local Irish Funds as a sort of buffer between the operation of the Bill and the liability of the British taxpayer. Now, this guarantee is either real or unreal. If it be unreal, if it is not to be drawn upon, but is simply inserted as a sort of sop to the British public against the wishes of the Irish Members, then it is neither fair or statesmanlike to insert such a clause in the Bill. If, on the other hand, the Government mean this to be a real and substantial guarantee, then we Englishmen protest—and in our protest we shall be joined by many Irish Members—against the Government impounding these local grants made for a specific purpose to the Irish Local Authorities, who have a right to deal with them. Whichever way we look at it, we feel that the clause is one we cannot assent to, and therefore we propose to take a Division against it.

*(7.21.) MR. KEAY (Elgin and Nairn): I do not intend to interpose for any long time between the Committee and a Division; but I desire to call attention to the extraordinary character of the speech of the Chief Secretary two days ago in replying to myself. I had been pressing him to do his duty—to lead, to guide the Committee in regard to essential provisions in the Bill, and what did the right hon. Gentleman say? “The hon. Member will be more useful to the Committee”—this was the right hon. Gentleman’s ex cathedra dictum—“if he avoids going back so much on past questions and past replies received.” I should correct that by saying “replies not received.” However, in such replies as they were, the right hon. Gentleman admitted in the plainest manner his great annoyance at my reference to his past speeches. Still, so long as I have the honour of a seat in this House I intend to follow a legitimate Parliamentary practice, and bring forward in Debate whatever inconsistencies, misapprehensions and contradictions I can cull from previous speeches and replies of the right hon. Gentleman. If he wants to stop this he must contrive to destroy all last year’s volumes of Hansard, and if it were possible for him to do that, no doubt he would make things more pleasant for himself. I warn him that when we reach the 6th clause to which period he has relegated many important points of controversy, I shall have need to make further references to his speeches of last year. There is only one other point in the right hon. Gentleman’s speech of the other day to which I desire to call attention now, and that is the extraordinary statement which he made with regard to his joy and delight that the amount of money under this Bill is not fixed at £30,000,000 sterling. Now I prize this statement, for I am convinced that whatever he may think, the country does not share this joy and delight. I wondered when I heard his statement whether he believed that the country was with him in this pleasure which he expressed that the amount in the Bill was purposely left elastic and unknown, so that nobody could say to what extent of capital these loans may be made. Does the right hon. Gentleman want to take the opinion of the country upon this point? I hear that the representation of my constituency is to be contested. Let him send a candidate to fight out the General Election on this ticket, and let that candidate express to the electors that he shares the gratification of the Chief Secretary that £30,000,000 do not represent the limit to which this Bill goes, and if that candidate wins the election in my constituency he will be the most remarkable man who ever went there.

(7.25.) THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. A. J. Balfour, Manchester): I do not rise to reply to the hon. Gentleman who, as usual, has not been able to restrain himself from references to speeches delivered some days ago, but to reply to the hon. Member for Sunderland who has said this guarantee is genuine or not genuine, and that if it is not genuine we are deceiving the British taxpayer, while if it is genuine then we are going to draw upon funds which ought not to be used without the consent of the locality. Now, has the hon. Gentleman never in his experience heard of a guarantee for a loan which it is never anticipated will be used? A more familiar incident in commercial life does not exist. The guarantee may be perfectly genuine, it may be necessary before the lender will make the advance, and yet it can be stated, so far as there is any certainty in human affairs, that the position of the borrower is such that the guarantee will never be drawn upon. That is the case in the majority of mortgages, and as it is in mortgage debts so will it be with these land purchase advances. I do not accept the dilemma the hon. Gentleman offers, not admitting the unfairness of the guarantee or that it is unnecessary.

(7.27.) MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camborne): On that point I take issue with the right hon. Gentleman. He is convinced of the genuine character of the guarantee, but has he estimated the extent to which it may be possible to draw upon these resources? I take leave to observe that assuming the possibility of having to draw upon this fund you never could collect the money, you could never impound these resources without bringing the whole machinery of your Local Government to an abrupt termination. The value of the guarantee is not to be measured by pounds, shillings, and pence, but by the possibility of realising that guarantee. Is it possible that any sane and constitutional Government could venture to impound these sums of local money intended for local matters, the maintenance of lunatics, the salaries of school teachers, and medical officers and others, and the supply of medicines and surgical appliances to the poor? How are you to carry on Local Government with such an appropriation of local resources? Are you going to open the doors and let your pauper lunatics stream forth all over the land? Can it be supposed that any civilised Government will impound these moneys, and is it not therefore ridiculous to insist that this is a genuine guarantee? No; this is a sham, a bogus, humbugging guarantee, of a Tory character, in fact. It has been proved to demonstration that there may be a deficit to meet at any time. In the ordinary course of things you may have to face a decline in land value, and a bad season may bring a tenant to the ground, and especially is this likely to be the case after those unfortunate people have been coerced into purchasing their holdings at prices far above their fair value. A tenant will be coerced into paying 25 years' purchase for land only worth 10 years' purchase; but, notwithstanding misfortunes that may fall upon agriculture, he will still be expected to keep up punctually the instalments to be paid to the State landlord. It is not only possible, it is probable, that you will have this position, and I maintain it is puerile to consider that this is, under such circumstances, a genuine guarantee. This clause, during the numerous discussions we have had upon it, has been considerably amended, and we ought to know before we part with the clause what the effect of these Amendments really is. We ought to have in full perspective view the operation of the clause; but how can any conscientious politician pass judgment upon it unless he has the amended clause before him? I shall certainly vote against the clause being passed, on that ground.

(7.35.) MR. SHAW LEFEVRE (Bradford, Central): I have certainly heard in commercial matters of persons giving a guarantee without being called on to pay it, or without in the least anticipating that they would ever be called on to pay it; but the analogy is not complete in this case. In the present instance the Government are forcing a guarantee on the Irish people without their consent, and it is for that reason that I consider it a sham guarantee. It is a guarantee which can never be enforced because the persons you hold responsible are not to be called upon to give their consent to the transaction. And not only that but only nine Irish Members voted in favour of the guarantee, while three times that number of Irish Members voted against it. This shows that the Irish people will not accept the guarantee. The Government will never be able to put the guarantee in force, and consequently it is not a real guarantee. If it were a real one I should be inclined to support it in view of the principle that has already been adopted by us.

(7.38.) MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The right hon. Gentleman has referred to the majority of the Irish Members against this clause. Well, I admit that the majority of the Irish Members are against this clause, but I think they would accept it rather than not have the Bill, therefore I repudiate the conclusion of the right hon. Gentleman as to the action taken by the hon. Members from Ireland. Nor can I accept the species of public morality which he thinks ought to animate the public bodies in Ireland. He says they will not be able to increase the guarantee because the localities have not been consulted. Suppose the localities had been consulted there would probably always have been a minority, possibly a large one, against the grants being used. Would they be bound by the opinion of the minority or would they not? I apprehend they would not, and that they would only be bound by the opinion of the majority. If they would be bound by the opinion of the majority then I apprehend, as the majority of the House assents to this clause the localities will be bound by it.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): The majority of the Irish Members do not assent.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: No, the majority of the House has accepted the guarantees, and the whole theory of Representative Government is that the minority shall be bound by the majority.

*(7.40) MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: I would point out that if this were a question affecting the whole Empire the majority of the whole House would bind the minority. But this is a question purely affecting Ireland, and I contend that in such a case the opinion of the majority of the Representatives of that country ought to prevail. I would ask the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary if he can produce a case in the whole of our legislation in which a measure of this kind, imposing a guarantee on either Ireland or Scotland, has been carried against the wish of the majority of the Representatives? If he can produce such a case I withdraw my argument. I do not think it possible, however, as I have myself gone carefully through the legislation for England, Ireland, and Scotland.

(7.42.) MR. SEXTON: I think it right to acknowledge that the Amendments made in this clause are neither few nor unimportant, but the fact that we have not these Amendments in print is no reason for fighting against the clause. As to the Amendments which have been made in the clause, I would point out to the hon. Member for Camborne that they cover the order in which the various portions of the Guarantee Fund will be called on to meet default in the payment of annuities. The funds connected with education, lunatics, and medical services will be called on last, so far as one portion of the guarantee is concerned; and as to the Exchequer contribution of £40,000, it will be devoted to the construction of labourers' cottages, and will not be called on for guarantee purposes until after the Probate Duty grant has been exhausted. I am sensible of the importance of these Amendments, and if we were dealing with any part of the Bill except that relating to the local guarantee, I should be disposed to vote in favour of the clause. But we hold that the State, which has created the agrarian system in Ireland and has put the landlords there, should accept the responsibility of taking them away again. If these guarantees are ever resorted to a gross injustice will be done to the people of Ireland. We are now on the question of the local guarantee, and as this clause embodies the principle of local guarantee, I am bound to say that, whilst I recognise the importance of the changes that have been made, I shall be bound to vote against it.

(7.45.) MR. FLYNN (Cork, N.): I object altogether to the principle of these guarantees, and I agree with the hon. Member for West Belfast, when he says that it is the duty of the State at the present time, having brought about the system of landlordism in Ireland, and having given it the complexion and colour it has borne for generations, to meet every possible default. I oppose the principle of guarantee as it stands in the Bill, because it is tyranny. It is a despotism under the form of Constitutional Law, because the Government propose to hypothecate local rates without consulting Local Authorities. Anything more corresponding to the nature of tyranny, it is impossible for a Constitutionalist to imagine. As to the guarantees never being required, I say this Bill offers every scope to the landlords to get an unjustly high price for their land, and if these transactions go on in Ireland, and if there are many of them—as I hold there will be—the guarantees will be called for. In moving the rejection of this clause we are entitled to the assistance of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham (Mr. J. Chamberlain) because, speaking on this subject in April of last year he said—

“Why should not the consent of the Local Authorities be asked? There is no Local Authority that you could put in the Bill, but the Government have promised to bring in a Local Government Bill, and there is no reason why that should not be brought in this year and passed; and when the County Councils are established it will be right to give them a voice in the transactions that would take place in Ireland as to the transfer of land.”

The right hon. Gentleman, however, has given us no assistance in this matter. The Chief Secretary is—or so his friends say—a bold man, and he assumes that if the guarantees are called for the Local Authorities will tamely present any amount of money the Lord Lieutenant calls on them to present. But there are precedents in Ireland from which the right hon. Gentleman can easily see that the localities, when they make up their minds that an impost is unjust, refuse to present, and the money cannot be obtained. There is, for instance, the case of the Constable Leahy, who was awarded £1,000 for injuries received by the Grand Jury. There was the greatest difficulty experienced in collecting the money. Then, in the case of the City of Limerick—

THE CHAIRMAN: These matters are not relevant to the clause under discussion.

MR. FLYNN: I would simply call attention to the fact that the Local Authorities not being consulted, it is most unjust to call for these guarantees; and I warn the Government that if these transactions are unduly advantageous to the landlords, there will be great difficulty in getting the local guarantees to be of any avail.

(7.51.) The Committee divided:—
Ayes 115; Noes 54.—(Div. List, No. 166.)

Clause 4.

(7.59) MR. SEXTON: Looking at the number and variety of the Amendments to this clause, I think it would save time if the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary would make a statement as to the modifications, if any, he proposes to adopt. I move to omit the first subsection, which contains provision for the charge on the Guarantee Fund and the consequent levy on the county, and I make the Motion in order to interrogate the right hon. Gentleman as to the vital points of the scheme of the levy. The right hon. Gentleman proposes, in case he has to resort to the Contingent Fund, to make good the amount by a levy on the county through the agency of the Grand Jury. I should like to ask the right hon. Gentleman, who must be well aware that the Grand Jury, as a Fiscal Body, is moribund, and that its control over local finance will speedily come to an end—whether he will be willing to insert a provision to the effect that the levy by the Grand Jury is only to take place pending the introduction of County Councils. The pledge of the Tory Party to give Local Government to Ireland is ripe, by this time, for fulfilment, and I think the right hon. Gentleman will hardly think it unreasonable in me to ask for the insertion of a provision of this kind in the Bill. We know that the Committee on a previous occasion rejected the principle of local control, but never had an opportunity of giving a decision on my Amendment, which proposed that Boards of Guardians first, and afterwards County Councils, should have a voice in the application of the Act. That question will come up again on Report, and I shall certainly claim a decision on it. Though the question of local control may be out of our purview at present, I would ask the right hon. Gentleman whether on this clause he has considered further the question of local option—that is to say, the right of any county to determine whether or not effect shall be given to this Bill. We had a plébiscite suggested, but I venture to say that the plébiscite proposed would be worse than useless. It would not be applied until the first part of the guarantee was exhausted, when, of course, a great many purchases would have taken place—perhaps a twentieth part of the whole—and it would be too much to expect 19 farmers out of 20, who have been left out in the cold, to deprive themselves of the opportunity of purchasing. They would naturally think that, although the previous purchasers had made default, they themselves would be able to make better terms with the landlords. And after the plébiscite was taken you would tell the farmers that they had accepted the Act, and that they had no right to grumble at anything that might follow as a consequence. What I would suggest would be that there should not be a plébiscite as of course; but that if the elected Members of any Board of Guardians by a petition to the Sheriff demanded a plébiscite, it should be in the power of the Sheriff to have one made, not only as to whether the Act should be discontinued, but whether it should be discontinued or suspended for a year. This would afford something like a real check on the continuity of the operations under the Act. Then I would ask the Chief Secretary why it is proposed to charge the possible burden arising out of default on the county cess? The poor rate has a good deal more to do with the local grants, involving the contingent guarantee, than has the county cess. The county cess is paid by the occupiers; and does the right hon. Gentleman mean to say that this scheme is put forward in the interest of any one class in Ireland? Is this legislation not put forward rather more in the interest of the landlords than the tenants? And if the Bill is needed in the interests of the two great classes of landlords and tenants, why should the burden be thrown on a rate which is paid by one class only? To so allocate it would cause public opinion to go against the Act, and would impede transactions under it. If you consent either to throw the burden on the poor rate borne by all classes, or if you throw it on the county cess and make it divisible between the landlord and tenant—and there are thousands of precedents for such a course in Irish legislation—then I think it would be to the interest of all classes, and would remove what otherwise would be an impediment to the success of the scheme. Then I would remark that there is nothing to prevent the Treasury from taking the money out of the Contingent Fund before the Lord Lieutenant has time to make the levy. I ask the right hon. Gentleman to insert in the clause a provision that it shall not be open to the Treasury to lay hold of the Contingent Fund for the purpose of default until the County Treasurer has had time to obey the requisition of the Lord Lieutenant to levy the money, and to lodge it in the Local Taxation Account. I notice that the procedure with regard to the levy is of the most cast-iron kind, and that no discretion is left to anyone or opportunity given for consideration and representation, the word “shall” appearing in every instance in the clause. I respectfully urge that these matters might fairly be allowed to go before the Presentment Sessions. The right hon. Gentleman will admit that the Treasury have no right to come upon the county until the Land Commission have exhausted their legal power. That leaves over the general question of the Land Commission. They might proceed by civil action against the tenant, or they might say it was no use proceeding by civil action. Now there comes in a matter of opinion. Suppose the Land Commission said they would neither purchase the holding or take civil action, nevertheless they could come upon the county for one-half the default. Would it not be fair to urge that before the Presentment Sessions. Under Clause 6, where there is exceptional distress, the county reserve may be applied. Would it not be more proper that the Grand Jury should have an opportunity of saying that in their judgment there is such exceptional distress as to render it advisable that they should meet these annuities, and default should be met otherwise than by coming on the county already suffering from the burden of an excessive rate? I sincerely hope that the right hon. Gentleman will see his way to afford some relaxation of this point. One other point. The Lord Lieutenant will fix the share of the county in the Guarantee Fund, and that will unalterably govern the amount of Stock issued for the purchase of holdings in the county. The Lord Lieutenant fixes the amount of the burden in case of default, and the amount to be refunded. We know that he is the mere figure-head in matters of administration, and that this work will fall to some official at Dublin Castle, and I submit that the action of the Lord Lieutenant in such important matters should be subject to review. I have made these suggestions in no factious spirit, and, if adopted, I think the progress of the measure would be greatly facilitated.

Amendment proposed, in page 4, to leave out Sub-section (1.)—(Mr. Sexton.)

(8.28.) MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Sir, the hon. Gentleman has raised a great many questions of very great importance as far as the clause is concerned, and as far as the whole Bill is concerned. It is true that any scheme of County Councils would disestablish for very large and important purposes connected with finance the Grand Jury. But if compulsory levies are to be made at all, it should not be by Elective Bodies. I cannot hold out any hopes that for the Grand Jury will be substituted any body such as the hon. Gentleman has suggested. With regard to the second point raised by the hon. Gentleman, it is true that, being unable to accept the suggestions of the hon. Member's colleagues and of the right hon. Member for West Birmingham as to local control, I did say that if I were driven to some form of local control, one of the least injurious would be a plébiscite. The hon. Gentleman told the Committee that a plébiscite would not exercise the power given by Parliament in the direction of stopping the further action of the measure. But the hon. Gentleman's speech on this point does not seem to be quite consistent with itself, for he suggested an Amendment of the plan under which a plébiscite should be called upon to say, not whether the Act should be adopted, but, in the first place, whether its operation should be suspended for a year, and at the end of that time whether it should be postponed for another year, and so on from year to year. I do not see in that case that the Act must come into operation at all. However, we ought not to spend much time in discussing a plan which I am not disposed to accept at any stage of the Bill. I never thought it an improvement to the Bill, and in these circumstances I announced to the Committee at an early period that they would hear no more of it from me. With regard to the third point, which deals with the incidence of the rate to be called upon in aid of the Guarantee Fund, the Bill provides that the rate in aid shall be the county cess. The hon. Gentleman preferred that it should be the poor rate. The incidence of the county cess is on the occupier, whether owner or not, while the poor rate is equally divided between the owner and the occupier, except in the case of occupiers below £4, who pay no poor rate; but the incidence of the county cess is really the fairer of the two. There might be some species of combination of which the landlords would not be the authors, and it would be very unfair entirely to relieve occupiers under £4 of any share of responsibility thrown upon them by the Bill. There are large counties in Ireland where the great mass of the occupiers are under £4, and under the hon. Gentleman's proposal this vast body will be wholly relieved of any responsibility consequent on the refusal to pay the annuities, and consequently the opportunity will be lost of putting them on the side of financial honesty. The hon. Gentleman urged that the provisions respecting the county cess would create a species of soreness, and make the occupiers opposed to the whole measure; that it would, in fact, arouse public opinion against it, and make occupiers disinclined to become the owners of their holdings. But I hope and believe that the desire to purchase will be so strong that under no circumstances will an end be put to the operation of the Act. The fourth point raised by the hon. Gentleman had to do with the rigid and automatic character of the provision with regard to the levy of the special rate. I admit the system is rigid, but that is a necessary and essential part of the scheme. If we are not to have these securities called upon by a process inexorable and automatic, the security for the Treasury will be seriously diminished. There is no Presentment Sessions existing which would not find some ground for thinking that there is distress of a sufficiently grave character to warrant them in making use of the reserve fund rather than levy a special rate. Amendments of that kind would seriously impair the character of the securities which the Treasury has at its back, and would have the effect of preventing it from advancing the loan altogether. Therefore, in the interest of the borrower, stringency is an advantage, not a disadvantage. I cannot hold out any hope to the hon. Member that the Government will be able in any material degree to meet his wishes on this point. Another point which has been raised deals with the proposal that some Court shall be instituted to determine questions connected with the allocation of the Guarantee Fund. I admit that the Lord Lieutenant may possibly come sometimes to a decision under a mistaken view of the facts, and that the result may be that a county will have allocated to it more than its fair share of the total Guarantee Fund. Therefore, whilst not attaching great importance to the point myself, I shall be glad to take into consideration any practical proposals on the subject, and I hope to be able to come to an agreement with the hon. Member. (8.38.)

(9.8.) Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; House counted, and 40 Members being found present,

(9.10.) MR. MAHONY (Meath, N.): The Chief Secretary has objected to substituting the Poor Law for the county cess as the means of levy. The objection so far as it concerns the method of levy is unimportant, but as regards the incidence of taxation the Amendment is very important. County cess, in the vast majority of cases in Ireland, falls solely upon the occupier. This House has already acknowledged the injustice of that by making it law that in all lettings since 1870, the county cess shall be equally divided between occupier and owner except there be some special contract or agreement, and beyond that, I think, in every instance in which this House has imposed any special levy through the county cess, or certainly in the majority of instances, it has specially directed a division between occupier and owner notwithstanding any agreement to the contrary. That is to say, this House has taken care that when it has made a distinct addition to county cess the House has shown on all occasions that the spirit of the arrangement enacted in 1870 shall be adhered to. The great objection the right hon. Gentleman raised to the poor rate was that in the case of holdings under £4, the poor rate—

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member for West Belfast moved to omit the 1st sub-section in order to enter upon a conversation of a practical character in reference to the clause. In so doing he anticipated by reference certain amendments to the clause, but his observations were of a general character, and such as might facilitate the proceedings in Committee, and were therefore permitted; but if these observations are to be carried into a discussion of a particular Amendment, that must be deferred until the Amendment is reached.

(9.14.) MR. STOREY: I beg to call your attention, Sir, to the fact that there are not 40 Members present.

THE CHAIRMAN: I have so recently satisfied myself that there are 40 Members in attendance that it is unnecessary for me now to count again.

MR. STOREY: I wish to draw your attention, Sir, to the fact that only two Members are on the Treasury Benches opposite. What is the use of pursuing the Debate under such circumstances?

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order!

MR. MAHONY: I bow to your ruling, Sir, but I may observe that the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary did enter minutely into the particular point I was referring to. There were other references the right hon. Gentleman made upon which I defer remark to a later stage.

(9.15.) MR. SEXTON: As you have observed, Sir, I moved the omission of the sub-section to secure at once an explanation that might expedite the consideration of useful Amendments, and I now ask leave to withdraw my Motion.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Mr. Mahony

*(9.15.) MR. KNOX (Cavan, N.): On behalf of my hon. Friend (Mr. M. Kenny), I beg to move the Amendment of which he has given notice, the omission of the words "at any time" from the first line of the clause, and its object will be understood by taking this in connection with the subsequent Amendment to line 3. As the liability upon the landlord's guarantee deposit ceases at the end of 18 years, when the fifth of the total sum outstanding has been repaid, so it is proposed by the Amendment that the same Rule shall be applied to the cash and contingent guarantee under the Act. The object of the Amendment might, I think, be stated in the words, so far as I remember them, used by the Chief Secretary when he stated in answer to another argument of my hon. Friend, that in his opinion there was no chance of any default after 18 years. I do not want to enter into the question whether or not the Chief Secretary is justified in forming that opinion, but there is no doubt he formed it deliberately. As he said, after 18 years there is no chance of default, therefore after that time there need be no liability upon the landlord's deposit. Then, for the same reason we contend, taking the premisses of the right hon. Gentleman, there should be no longer any liability upon the county guarantee. I need not enter widely upon the question, the point is plain and simple, and I venture to ask the right hon. Gentleman to consider it with reference to another Amendment of mine to the end of the clause. Without entering into the substance of that Amendment I may say the object is to prevent in some degree what we consider a most disastrous effect likely to arise from this local guarantee. We do not any more than hon. Members opposite expect any large amount of default under the Act, but we do think that if this guarantee is to remain for the whole period of 49 years during which any part of the advances is outstanding, there will be serious risk that the borrowing powers of the Local Authorities will be seriously damaged. These borrowing powers, of course, are measured by the amount of security offered to the lender, and the amount of security will be decreased by the fact that almost all the available sources of Revenue are pledged to a very large extent, under this Act. I press, therefore, upon the Government that this local guarantee should not be continued for a longer period than is absolutely necessary to prevent loss. If it is the opinion of the Government that after 18 years the apprehension of loss ceases, then I say this liability should not remain in name even upon the Local Authority, diminishing thereby the borrowing powers of all the Local Bodies in Ireland.

Amendment proposed, in page 4, line 1, to leave out the words "at any time."—(Mr. Knox.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

*(9.20.) THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. MADDEN, Dublin University): The hon. Member has stated very concisely the object of the Amendment, and I do not differ from the hon. Gentleman in his forecast, for I believe, and I may say it is the opinion of the Government, that the repayment of an amount representing one-fifth of the advances will be ample security for the State; but, at the same time, the hon. Member must see that his Amendment is at right angles with the principle of the Bill, which differs from the Ashbourne Act in this particular, that it provides not only what we believe to be sufficient security, but an absolute certainty that there shall not in any event be loss to the State. This character of the Bill the Amendment of the hon. Member would remove. I fully believe that we are justified by experience in the opinion that the repayment of the fifth will be sufficient guarantee; but the hon. Member will remember that the object of the Bill is not to leave this as a matter of opinion or speculation, but to make it a mathematical certainty. Therefore, though I do not differ from the hon. Member in his anticipation, it is impossible for the Government to accept the Amendment, which would entirely alter the character of the Bill, which is intended to afford absolute security to the taxpayers of the country.

(9.22.) MR. SEXTON: I regret that the right hon. and learned Gentleman does not see his way to accept this and the Consequential Amendment. I think it is a very great pity that in the case of this guarantee, which is offensive to Irish public feeling and repugnant to the Irish Representatives, the Government should persist in retaining it in existence after a time when they confess it will not be needed. The Attorney General lays stress upon the mathematical certainty of the guarantee; but I think the British taxpayer will be satisfied if the security is absolute, as undoubtedly it will be when the landlord has received his final fifth, which the tenant has provided. There will be then an absolute security in human nature itself, for the tenant having paid so much will not wantonly incur the possibility of the loss of his holding if it can possibly be avoided. If there be default you have the fact that a fifth of the money is paid, you have the Insurance Fund, and you will be enabled to sell the farm without loss. There will be ample security for what is owing to the State. We have put our argument, and we can do no more than protest against the fatuity with which the Government persist in their intention to keep this offensive guarantee in existence.

Question put, and agreed to.

(9.23.) MR. KNOX: I now move my Amendment to line 2, the insertion after "payments" of the words "and the county percentage." I hope there will be no objection to this. If I am to understand that the Government do object, then I must submit the matter for serious consideration whether this county percentage is to be of any real use in the interest of the labourers. As the Bill was originally drawn it would not be a matter of great importance; but as the Attorney General is aware, owing to the acceptance of the Amendment of my hon. Friend the Member for West Belfast, the order of payments out of the various parts of the cash portion of the Guarantee Fund has been changed, and this Amendment becomes of real importance. So far as I can understand the scheme of Clause 2, it is this. The sums paid by the tenants year by year will be applied first to the payment of dividends and Sinking Fund; and, secondly, to the county percentage—that is to say, for every £4 owing by the tenant £3 15s. will be applicable to dividend and Sinking Fund payments, and 5s. will be payable to the county.

If a default on the part of the tenant should arise, if he pays less than the £4, the liability will fall, as I conceive, on the Guarantee Fund. When any considerable number of tenants fail to pay the whole of what is annually due from them, what will be the effect if these words I propose are not inserted? Let us suppose that in any county the tenants pay sufficient for the payment in the year of what is due to dividend and Sinking Fund accounts, but nothing more as the clause is now drawn, in that event there would be no call on the Guarantee Fund, there would simply be no county percentage, and the labourers would get nothing from the Amendment to Clause 2, which has been accepted by the Government. Now, if this Amendment of mine is accepted the effect will be that in the event I have contemplated of a sufficient amount not being paid by the tenants to make up the £4 for dividend, Sinking Fund and county percentage, then the balance would be taken from the Guarantee Fund—the balance will therefore come out of the Irish share of the Probate Duty grant and the Irish share of the Probate Duty grant will be taken before there is any loss to the county percentage, before there is any diminution of the amount of the money we desire should go to the benefit of the labourers of Ireland. If this Amendment is not accepted, the effect will be, that the first charge will be made upon the county percentage, although the Government have in terms accepted the proposal of my hon. Friend the Member for West Belfast, that the last charge shall be upon the county percentage. I venture to say, that if the right hon. Gentleman will consider the point, that really it is a mere farce to enact in Clause 3, that the deficiency is to fall, first upon the Probate Duty grant; secondly, on the Exchequer contribution; and thirdly, on the county percentage, if you so frame Clause 4, that in spite of these provisions you first impose the whole of the failure to pay, upon the county percentage. I must, therefore, press this Amendment as necessary to carry out the intention of the Government expressed in the earlier clause.

insert the words "and the county percentage."—(Mr. Knox.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

*(9.29.) MR. MADDEN: I think the illustration which the hon. Gentleman has given will show the Committee that his Amendment is inapplicable. He supposes that the payments from the purchase annuities are sufficient to meet the dividends and Sinking Fund; but not sufficient to produce the county percentage. Very well, if that be so no demand should be made upon the Guarantee Fund. There will be a loss to the county percentage, no doubt, but this county percentage is not to be drawn from the Guarantee Fund, because it was not for the purpose of providing labourers' cottages that the fund was instituted. I fail to see that the hon. Member has made out his case. Assuming his state of facts that the purchase annuities are sufficient to meet the demands for dividends and Sinking Fund, I fail to see there is a case made out for resorting to the cash portion of the Guarantee Fund.

(9.30.) MR. SEXTON: But look at the position. Take the case of £100 advance for purchase. If a man cannot pay the £4 due upon that, the Land Commissioners will not accept part payment, and for default they come upon the Guarantee Fund to make up the requisite £4. That I take to be the enactment arrived at in the earlier clause. The clause provides that the payments are to meet dividends, Sinking Fund, and county percentage, the latter not divisible from the other two. But the right hon. and learned Gentleman, I hope by inadvertence, in his observations, implied that if dividends and Sinking Fund are made right, it does not matter about the county percentage.

MR. MADDEN*: What I said was that if the dividends and Sinking Fund were deficient, they must be met out of the Guarantee Fund, but that the hon. Member (Mr. Knox) had not made out a case for resorting to the Guarantee Fund in the event he contemplated, to make good the Land Purchase Account so far as the county percentage is concerned.

MR. SEXTON: I claim that the objects of Clause 2 must be considered inseparable, and that there is no distinctive treatment of the county percentage. The clause provides that the Commission shall establish a Land Purchase Account, and apply to this all moneys received on account of any purchase annuity for the discharge of an advance. Let me again take the case of an advance of £100 for which the tenant pays £4. You are bound to apply this £2 15s. to the dividends payable on the stock £1 to the Sinking Fund and 5s. for the county percentage. The whole of the clause is of equal validity, and you cannot separate the one purpose from the other? But under this clause as it stands you may apply the annuity so far as it is paid not to the three objects but to two, and I say that would be a violation of the provision in Clause 2 that the county percentage should not "go by the board." We must press this Amendment, which is consequential upon the adoption of Clause 2 as amended.

(9.35.) MR. KNOX: Let me again explain that as the Bill was originally drawn it did not matter, because the full liability in case of default fell upon the percentage, but in this respect a change has been made in deference to the argument of the hon. Member for Belfast. The Government have assented to the change by which the first liability is to fall upon the Irish Probate Duty grant, and only after the whole of that grant has been absorbed is anything to be taken from the Exchequer contribution and the county percentage, which are to be devoted to labourers' dwellings in Ireland. The object of this change obviously was that the labourers might be as sure of getting the 5s. for their dwellings as the Government of getting payment for interest and Sinking Fund. To advert again to the £4 illustration, as soon as the Land Purchase Account is insolvent and cannot meet the payment of £4, then you have at once to go to the Guarantee Fund, that is to say to the Irish Probate Duty grant. Now, if this Amendment is not accepted the effect will be to reduce Clause 3 to a nullity, and the Irish labourer instead of losing his money only in the second resort, will lose it on the first resort in case of default. I venture to suggest that the Amendment is necessary to carry out the intention of the Government as expressed in Clause 3 of this Bill.

(9.37.) MR. STOREY: This seems reasonable, and I am amazed that the Government do not accept the Amendment, for it is entirely in their own favour. I put it to right hon. Gentlemen that for their own sake they should agree to this. Suppose a man has got £100 advance and has to pay £4. If he pays this you apply it in the proportion of £3 15s. to Dividends and Sinking Fund and 5s. to the county contribution. But suppose he pays £3 10s. only, you have a deficiency to provide for, for which the Bill makes no provision so far as the county percentage is concerned. I know it is no use pressing arithmetical arguments upon empty benches, but I hope the right hon. Gentleman will see the Amendment is really in the interest of his own Bill, and I am sure any man with experience of bookkeeping in relation to these monetary transactions will appreciate the difficulties that must arise without such an Amendment as this.

(9.38.) MR. SEXTON: The view taken in the operation of this clause is, that when payments are made for dividends and Sinking Fund the Land Purchase Account is solvent, though the county percentage is left out altogether. But I invite the right hon. Gentleman to look back at Clause 2, and he will find that the language of that clause deals with individual advances. The clause says that the Land Commission shall establish a Land Purchase Account, carry thereto and apply all moneys received on account of any purchase annuity for the discharge of an advance. The clause refers to an individual advance, and goes on to declare that payments shall be made for three specific objects, for dividends on the Stock, for the Sinking Fund, and for the county percentage. Is it not clear that you are as much obliged to fill up the county percentage as to provide the dividends and Sinking Fund? Now, imagine a county in which 21 men have advances, and each owes £4. Twenty of these men pay their instalments, and from these you provide £75 for the dividends and Sinking Fund, and £5 should properly go to the county percentage. But the 21st man fails to pay, and thereupon you appropriate £3 15s. of the instalments that go to make up the £5, to provide for the default of the man who has not paid. What I contend you ought to do is to declare a default of £4 in the Land Purchase Account, and take that from the Guarantee Fund. It is as broad as it is long; having agreed that the Probate Duty grant is the first guarantee, you should provide from that for the Land Purchase Account. If you do not do that you invert the order and place the first charge upon the county percentage instead of on the Probate Duty grant. We really must insist upon the Amendment. We had the greatest trouble in securing this county percentage for the labourers, and if we let this clause pass in this slipshod or malicious form—I will not say which—the result of our efforts which we thought we had secured by the earlier clause will be destroyed.

(9.42.) MR. PARNELL (Cork): I do not think the hon. Member for Belfast is quite justified in using the expression malicious—perhaps he used it by inadvertence—because this clause was drafted before the county percentage provision was included in the Bill.

MR. SEXTON: No; there was a provision in the Bill originally for the labourers, though not such a good one as at present. The clause would be equally injurious to the Bill as originally drawn.

MR. PARNELL: This clause stood before the Amendment for labourers' cottages was drafted into the Bill. May I suggest to the right hon. Gentleman that, master as he is of many points of detail and complexity in this Bill, the Attorney General has not quite grasped the meaning of the Amendment of the hon. Member for Cavan, or the arguments with which it has been supported. Certainly it would be lamentable if we should pass any error in draftsmanship by which the benefit intended for the labourers in Ireland would be lost. What I would suggest would be that the Amendment should be agreed to on the present occasion, and that the right hon. and learned Gentleman should examine the question between now and the Report, with a view of seeing whether it would be necessary to modify it. We ought especially, I think, to ask the right hon. and learned Gentleman now to agree to the insertion of the Amendment, against which he has advanced no case. It seems to me that a great deal of light has been given to us by the two hon. Members; but that no light whatever has been afforded against the Amendment by the right hon. and learned Gentleman. I should think that under these circumstances, the Government would see their way to accept the Amendment on the present occasion, reserving to themselves the right on Report to modify or reject it, if they show cause for such modification or rejection, which they certainly have not done during this discussion.

(9.47.) MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I think I can show cause to the Committee for not accepting the Amendment of the hon. Member for Cavan. The real substantial question we have to discuss is the order in which the county percentage should be come upon, and undoubtedly, both the hon. Gentlemen the Member for West Belfast and the hon. and learned Member for Cavan, are correct in stating that as the Bill is drawn the persons who will first suffer from any default on the part of the tenants are those who pay the county cess. Let us consider whether that is wrong. The county percentage, recollect, is a tax or tribute paid by the farmers who buy their land at the rate of 4 per cent. The State could lend to them at the rate of £3 15s. per cent. including the Sinking Fund. As a matter of fact, it insists on their paying not £3 15s., but £4 per cent., and the difference between the two we have decided, so far, to give to a class only remotely and indirectly connected with the scheme of land purchase. If you decide—and the hon. Member for Cavan would like to decide—that this 5s. should not be taken first to meet default, but that some other fund should be taken, what fund will it be? If it is the Probate Duty grant it practically means that the whole community is to be fined for the default. Really it seems to me more equitable that those who benefit under the Bill, which confers upon them a free gift, ought to be the first to suffer from the default of their co-beneficiaries, and that therefore it is only right that the loss, if any, should be made good out of the county percentage. I hope I have put the case quite clearly to the Committee. I agree with the hon. Members for West Belfast and Cavan that the people who will first lose the money will be the recipients of the 5s., but I would point out that these people are not deprived of a sum which they at present enjoy, or to which they have the slightest title or claim in equity. They are merely deprived of a bonus or charitable donation which they would never have without this Bill, and I, therefore, think that they, rather than the general community—who, as we have been shown over and over again, are being made liable without their own consent to mortgage their own funds—should be held liable to meet the default of the tenants. For these reasons I venture to think—whatever view hon. Members may take as to the necessity of again raising this discussion on Report—the Committee should not accept the present Amendment.

(9.52.) Mr. SEXTON: What the right hon. Gentleman has succeeded in showing us in his observations is that hon. Members have been kept in the dark as to the intentions of the Government upon this point, as it has been universally understood that the Government intend to throw the loss upon the Probate Duty in the first instance. What we understood when Clause 3 was under discussion was that the sum we had secured for the benefit of the labourers would not be touched until the Probate Duty had been exhausted. It would now appear that we have been in the wrong, though not a syllable has been said until now to make that evident. The right hon. Gentleman has not replied to the invitation I gave him to give us an interpretation of Clause 3. That clause is an effective part of the enactment of Clause 4, which says plainly what you are to do and must do with any money you receive from the purchasers. The 5s. being paid into the County Percentage Fund we have a right to expect that it will remain there and not sink into the sand. On what principle will you say to the men who pay it, "We have not done what Section 2 directs, and paid the money into the County Percentage Fund, but have used the payments of solvent men to defray the default of solvent men, and instead of forming the County Percentage with it we have used it to pay dividends and Sinking Fund." What can you use the money for if you do not use it for the County Percentage?

*Mr. SHAW LEFEVRE: On this point I am disposed to agree with the Chief Secretary. I think the Bill is properly drawn on this point, but, after all, it is not one of extreme importance.

(9.56.) Mr. KNOX: When I prepared the Amendment I relied on the drafting of the Bill and the Amendment the Government had already accepted. I was justified, I maintain, in concluding that the order of liability would be the order in which these various funds are mentioned in Clause 3. If this Amendment is not adopted the words the right hon. Gentleman proposes to insert will be simply farcical, as he proposes to enact at the end of one of the sub-sections that the first charge shall fall on the Irish Probate Duty grant.

Sir G. CAMPBELL (Kirkcaldy, &c.): I do not want to intervene more than I can help in the discussion of these Irish funds, but I do want again to take exception to the assumption that it is safe to lend the money at $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. The quarter per cent is simply a small insurance to meet the failures which may occur in repayment. It seems to me that this margin is no more than any prudent lender would require when he lends large sums to a large number of small borrowers.

(10.0.) Mr. FLYNN: The question is, is this 5s. an integral portion of the purchase annuity, or is it not, and is Clause 2 to work in the manner in which it stands in the Bill or not? Nothing can be more clear than the understanding which was arrived at upon Clause 3, but now we find that the Government intend to swindle the labourers, so to speak, out of the 5s. of the purchase annuity. I do hope the Government will see their way to accept the Amendment.

Mr. A. J. BALFOUR: Clause 2 has been alluded to, and hon. Gentlemen opposite appear to think that there is some inconsistency between that clause as amended, and Clause 4 as it appears in the Bill. Surely they are wrong. Hon. Members opposite would make a tenant pay for the default of a brother tenant, but would leave untouched by that default the labourer who is made the recipient of a charitable donation by the Exchequer. Those who pay their instalments honestly will be indignant if they are to be the first persons come upon in case somebody else does not pay. The tenants would think that those who were in receipt of eleemosynary donations ought to be the first to suffer. I quite admit that the Amendment I put down to carry out the agreement come to on Tuesday will require some verbal Amendment, but not any Amendment to alter the intention with which it has been put down.

(10.6) MR. SEXTON: When the 5s. has been paid into the Land Purchase Account there is no right to use it for any other purpose. Any default ought to be first met out of the Probate Duty, and the County Percentage Fund ought not to be touched until after the Probate Duty fails to meet the default. The Government are breaking faith and are denying to Members the substance of the concession it is believed they made.

*(10.8.) MR. KNOX: Section 2, Sub-section 2, contemplates that under certain circumstances a part of the county percentage shall be paid to the Guarantee Fund. Under Section 4, Sub-section 1, as now drawn, no part of the county percentage will ever get into the Guarantee Fund. We do not now want to enter into the question whether it would be better that the Probate Duty Account or the other account should first pay the deficiency. That is a question which was discussed and decided by the Committee. We do not want to go back to ground which has already been covered, although the right hon. Gentleman by his argument invites us to do so. We see no reason why the Committee should have changed its mind, or the right hon. Gentleman should have changed his since the discussion on the 3rd clause. If the labourers of Ireland are to get anything considerable under this Bill this Amendment must be passed, and I still venture to hope that the right hon. Gentleman will insert these words. They are necessary, in our judgment, to carry out the intention of the clauses of the Bill, and if it be found on Report that we are wrong, we will not then put any difficulty in the way of a change.

(10.12.) MR. J. MORLEY (Newcastle-upon-Tyne): Surely my hon. Friend is reversing the ordinary process. If in the interval between now and Report my hon. Friend is able to convince himself that he is right, he can move the Amendment on the Report.

Mr. A. J. Balfour

*MR. KNOX. My right hon. Friend misunderstands me. We are absolutely and certainly convinced that this Amendment is a proper one, and that it is absolutely essential. Therefore I must very regretfully say that we must press it to a Division.

MR. J. MORLEY: I assumed that there was some doubt about the matter in my hon. Friend's mind.

(10.13.) MR. MAHONY: It was in order to ease the doubt existing in the mind of the Chief Secretary that we pointed out that there would be an opportunity for alteration at a later period. I think there is an irresistible case for pressing the Amendment now. As the clause is drawn, it seems to me that the county percentage may never get into the Guarantee Fund. You propose to take a guarantee consisting of the whole local taxation of Ireland, and to do so without the consent of the Irish people. We believe that by so doing you are going to inflict an injury on the taxpayers of Ireland, because you are going to deprive Local Bodies of their credit in the future. The classes in Ireland may be roughly divided into landlords and tenants and the working classes. Both the landlords and the tenants will get a direct benefit under this Bill. You have inserted this provision in order that the labourers may also get a direct benefit under it. Why should the labourers be the first to be deprived of their direct benefit? I have heard the Chief Secretary, I think, argue in this House that one of the advantages of his guarantees would be that if there was repudiation in a district the whole of the district would suffer, and the tenant farmers, the class from which the repudiators come, would suffer. Now you propose to do away with that provision because you say the first people that are to suffer are the labourers. If there is any repudiation let the tenant-farmers be the first to feel it, and do not throw the first injury on the unfortunate labourers, who can have no possible power either to promote repudiation or prevent it. I want to ask the Chief Secretary a question on another point. In case the tenant pays only £3 15s. instead of £4 in any one year, will it be a case of default, and will his interest have to be put up and sold? I would also ask whether this fund will be called upon before the landlord's guarantee deposit or simultaneously with it.

(10.19.) MR. SEXTON: I hope the right hon. Gentleman will not think we are pressing him unduly. I must ask him for a reply to my argument about Section 2. Did not the right hon. Gentleman agree that the first charge for default was to be made upon the Probate Duty? I would beg the right hon. Gentleman to defer to the unanimous opinion of the Irish Members with regard to this Amendment.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Any default by the tenant will have to be met in part by a grant from the landlord's Guarantee Fund. It will be quite impossible for the Government to accept the Amendment.

(10.36.) MR. SEXTON: I regret, Sir, to be under the necessity of moving that you report Progress and ask leave to sit again. I am obliged to traverse the statement of the right hon. Gentleman that there has not been a breach of faith. I say that Clause 3, as it stands on the official record, is conclusive evidence in support of the case I laid before the House. I was under the disadvantage of arguing from a copy of the Bill in which that clause stood as it was originally drawn, and I had, consequently, to depend upon my memory. But on referring just now to the official record I found that the cash portion of the Guarantee Fund was made up of three parts, which stood in the following order: first, the Irish Probate Duty; second, Exchequer contributions; and third, the county percentage. Later on, after we had considered the contingent part of the fund, the Government accepted an Amendment which stated, with regard to both the cash and the contingent portions, that the several parts should be applicable to the Guarantee Fund in the order specified. Not only are the Government not entitled to retire from that arrangement, I say it is incapable of being altered. I appeal to the Committee as strenuously as I can to stand by that agreement, my view of which is confirmed by the official records.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Mr. Sexton.)

(10.41.) MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I understand the hon. Member to allege a breach of faith on the part of the Government. I confess that the speech the hon. Gentleman has just made induces me to regret that, with a view of meeting the wishes of Gentleman opposite, I accepted certain Amendments in Clause 3 for the purpose of facilitating business and making the Bill as far as possible in accordance with the views of all Parties. The fact that the hon. Gentleman has had to refer to the records to see whether any such engagement as he alleges was entered into is conclusive proof that no such engagement was ever made, and that there has been no breach of faith. The order in which payment was to be made was never once in question throughout the Debate. The point (as far as my memory serves me) raised by the hon. Member was whether the Exchequer contribution or the Irish Probate Duty should be first taken, and he urged reasons which induced him to think it desirable to place the Exchequer contribution second instead of first. I did not think it much mattered, so I agreed to the re-arrangement, because the hon. Gentleman wished it. But that the Irish tenant-farmers should be mulct of the grant which this House has given them in order to provide an eleemosynary subscription for the purpose of raising labourers' cottages is a monstrous proposition which I never thought of accepting, and which I never even knew the hon. Gentleman desired me to accept. I repudiate the idea of ever having contemplated so violent or unjustifiable a change in the Bill.

MR. SEXTON: Does the right hon. Gentleman forget his own Amendment "in every financial year, shall be paid in addition to the county percentage." He gave way on our representations, and put the county percentage third.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: It was purely a matter of drafting.

(10.45.) MR. KNOX: There is a conflict of recollection between us and the Chief Secretary. My recollection is that when the Chief Secretary changed the order in which these payments were mentioned in Clause 3, the change was not a mere matter of drafting, but a matter of substance. If the Chief Secretary did not intend to make any substantial change why did he put down an Amendment in Clause 4 inserting the words "in the order hereinbefore mentioned." Hon. Members may sit in the smoking room while these matters are being discussed and simply come into the House to vote. Indeed, we whose duty it is to be present during the Debate have a painful sense of the way in which the united and unanimous views of the Irish Representatives are thus voted down. Either the right hon. Gentleman's Amendment that the money should be taken "in the order hereinbefore mentioned" was put down by inadvertence or it was put down to carry out a distinct agreement which it is now proposed to break.

*(10.48.) MR. MADDEN: I desire to remind the Committee of what happened in connection with Clause 3. As the clause originally stood, the two funds mentioned were the Exchequer contribution and the Irish Probate Duty grant. Under Clause 2 as it originally stood, the county percentage was to be distributed as a part of the Probate Duty grant, which formed part of the cash portion of the Guarantee Fund. But Clause 2 was remodelled owing to suggestions of hon. Members opposite, and the county percentage was carried in the first instance to the aid of labourers' cottages, and only secondarily to the Probate Duty grant, and it therefore becomes necessary the county percentage should be referred to, in some way, in Clause 3, as forming part in any event of the cash portion of the Guarantee Fund. In the Debate on Clause 3 the whole discussion was as between the Exchequer contribution and the Probate Duty grant, and the county percentage was not mentioned. Then the hon. Member for West Belfast suggested that instead of the words "in addition to the county percentage"—the language of the Chief Secretary's Amendment—the section should run "(3) the county percentage."

MR. SEXTON: The right hon. Gentleman must have realised that when I moved that Amendment I had it in my mind that the items should be liable in that order.

Mr. Knox

MR. MADDEN: No doubt the hon. Member had it in his mind if he says so, but why did he not state the effect he thus contemplated to the Committee? If he had done so, the Chief Secretary would at once have objected.

MR. SEXTON: Why did the right hon. Gentleman accept my Amendment, stating that the several sums of the cash portion should be liable in the order stated?

MR. MADDEN: It may have been very stupid, but it will be a warning to the Government not in the future to accept Amendments which are not fully explained. Fortunately there is a stage in every Bill at which errors of this sort which creep in can be corrected.

(10.55.) MR. MAHONY: There seems to be a good deal of difference of recollection in this matter. But there is no getting out of one fact in regard to the order in which the three funds should stand. The Chief Secretary wanted to place the county percentage first, but at the request of my hon. Friend the Member for Belfast he placed it last. After that he agreed to a definite Amendment proposed by my hon. Friend—an Amendment as to which there could be no mistake—which stated distinctly that the funds should be drawn on in the order in which they stood. Surely it is superfluous to ask hon. Members, most of whom were not present at the time the agreement was come to, to carry back their memories. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary would come out of the matter much better if he made a concession on this point.

(10.57.) MR. J. MORLEY: I think that the tone in which the Chief Secretary replied to my hon. Friend the Member for West Belfast was scarcely justified. It is quite true the hon. Member was not sure of the exact change made till he had consulted the Clerk at the Table; but that consultation only confirmed the impression on his mind which he had stated to the Committee. The order of the items was undoubtedly changed, the county percentage being placed last, after the Exchequer contribution and the Probate Duty grant. After that change was made the hon. Member for West Belfast moved as an Amendment—

"And the several sums constituting the cash portion and the contingent portion respectively of the Guarantee Fund shall be applicable for the purposes of that fund in the order specified in this section."

That Amendment was assented to, and is, in fact, now incorporated in the clause. I maintain that the hon. Member for West Belfast is perfectly justified in the account which he has given of the transaction.

(11.1.) MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I do not think that the hon. Member for West Belfast is at all justified in his attitude. By this Amendment the county percentage will be placed, not first, but third. Now Clause 3, as amended yesterday, will carry out that proposal. I do not know whether hon. Members opposite realised that when they moved the Amendment to the clause. I was not aware of it myself; I take blame to myself for it. But in my anxiety—my weak anxiety—to meet the wishes of hon. Members opposite, I did not realise that Clause 3, as amended, would have carried out this very proposal. If hon. Members realised it they would not have proposed this Amendment. The Government do not agree with the view taken of the Debates last night, of the propriety of the Amendment we have just debated, or of the propriety of Clause 3, as amended, and on the Report stage I shall move words to restore its original object.

(11.4.) MR. SEXTON: Clause 3, as it stands, carries out our object. Under it this county percentage is going into the Guarantee Fund, and this Amendment is to secure that it shall do so. Unless the Amendment is carried it may not be paid into the Sinking Fund at all. Of course, if we understand that the reading of the clause is that this county percentage shall be taken out of the Land Purchase Fund immediately, then that to a great extent will get rid of the difficulty, for then Section 3 will remain as it now stands.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: No.

MR. SEXTON: Well, then, what is the position? The right hon. Gentleman accepted the Amendment after full consideration. I distinctly remember that in Debate it was clearly stated that the Probate Duty grant should be the first guarantee, and it was upon this understanding that my Amendment, which had been several days on the Paper, was accepted. I moved it deliberately and with due notice, and the right hon. Gentleman tells us now that he did not know how to regard it then, and that he accepted it not knowing its full scope.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: And I did not.

MR. SEXTON: My Amendment was perfectly plain, and I think a more curious episode never happened in Parliamentary proceedings, that, after an engagement has been solemnly arrived at and ratified, the right hon. Gentleman should express his intention of reversing it at the next stage of the Bill. I think we have shown that we are perfectly consistent in moving this Amendment; and, indeed, it is necessary to bring the county percentage within the scope of Clause 3.

THE CHAIRMAN: I do not know that this discussion is relevant to any point before the Committee. Clause 3 is passed and is unalterable. May I suggest to the Committee that it would be well to proceed with the further discussion of the Bill after the Motion has been withdrawn?

(11.8.) SIR G. CAMPBELL: I only hope that a lesson will be learnt from this discussion. I confess, for my own part, to feeling a sort of malicious satisfaction at the position in which the Government find themselves. I was not in the House when Clause 3 was actually passed, but I do know that on the last occasion it was before us there were very few Members of the Committee who really understood the clause. I tried to understand it myself, and I was unsuccessful; and I do not think I need be ashamed of that now that I find the right hon. Gentleman himself has fallen into an error in regard to it. The right hon. Gentleman tried to conciliate Members in the hope of getting the clause passed the other night. He accepted a vast number of Amendments. He turned the clause upside down, and all that is intelligible to me is that £500,000 additional money was to be thrown in as a kind of sop, and we, who are the guardians of the British Treasury, were put wholly out of the running and unable to understand the clause. The clause was not passed on Tuesday, and it appears to have been shoved through this evening under the circumstances in which it was then left, that no Member in the House understood it. I hope the Government will take a lesson from this experience, and not be so anxious to push through clauses in a hurry.

(11.10.) MR. KNOX: The Chief Secretary says that neither my hon. Friend the Member for West Belfast nor myself, in supporting the Amendment, referred to the agreement which was made in reference to Clause 3; but I wish distinctly to remind the Committee that when introducing my Amendment, and during the subsequent discussion, I distinctly based my proposal solely and entirely on what had gone before Clause 3. I described it as a consequential drafting Amendment, and until I heard the latter speech of the Chief Secretary it never entered my mind that the right hon. Gentleman could have any idea of going back upon the solemn agreement arrived at.

DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid): I hope that hon. Members will understand that this Motion to report Progress was made and this discussion has arisen solely out of regard for the interests of the unfortunate Irish labourers, which interests are threatened in the clause.

(11.12.) MR. MAHONY: I do not wish to discuss the unalterable nature of Clause 3, but I think I may remind the Chief Secretary that we on this side are anxious to pass the Bill just as he is, although we approach it from different and perhaps opposite points of view. I quite acknowledge that on the whole he has met us with a certain amount of concession, and I think he will be wise not to go back upon the concessions he has made. I trust he will be content to let Clause 3 remain as it now stands.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I cannot agree to sacrifice the rights of the tenants of Ireland to the interests of the Irish labourers.

THE CHAIRMAN: Does the hon. Member withdraw his Motion?

MR. SEXTON: No, Sir. I propose to take a Division.

(11.15.) The Committee divided:—
Ayes 92; Noes 164.—(Div. List., No. 168.)

(11.23.) MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): I beg, Sir, to move that you do now leave the Chair;

Sir G. Campbell

and I make the Motion on this ground. We have now reached what I conceive to be a most critical point in the fortunes of this Bill, and the Government cannot expect at this hour of the night, and after the events which have occurred, to make much more progress. It is not, therefore, unnatural or unreasonable that we should request them now to take the time between this and to-morrow morning to consider the very important events of to-night, which have changed the temper of this Committee. I think it will not be denied that we on this side received in a conciliatory spirit and certainly with great satisfaction the important concession made to Irish labourers by the Government; and the result of that concession has been shown in the spirit in which the Debate has been conducted on this side of the House since. Now, there has arisen to-night a considerable amount of warmth and friction; and it appears to have arisen through the right hon. Gentleman not having taken into his purview the whole of the provisions arising upon this and the preceding clause. I confess I am surprised at the attitude he has taken, and the more so when I look to the Amendment which stands in his name at the foot of the page; and if anything could convey to my mind that he wished to seal the contract and agreement entered, it is to be found in this deliberate notice he has put upon the Paper. For myself, I am anxious to see the Bill pass in a workable shape; and we cannot consent to see the provision in respect to Irish labourers passed in a form which must reduce it to a dead letter; and the only advantage that will come out of this Bill will be to one agricultural tenant in every four throughout Ireland. I do not address myself to the argument that the Chief Secretary did not fully understand the force of the Amendment he accepted the other night. I cannot understand that he—one of the astutest men in the House—could have fallen into error in this particular. However, I think that the Government would do well, seeing that we are within half an hour of midnight, and there being other business on the Paper to proceed with, to accept, not this Motion I know, but the alternative Motion, to report Progress and afford us a little time for consideration before resuming our discussion.

THE CHAIRMAN: The point which has occupied the attention of the Committee for some time does not arise again upon the Amendment standing next. A discussion upon that Amendment may possibly occupy half an hour and may restore the Committee to a businesslike condition. I consider that the Motion the hon. and learned Gentleman desires to move will be an abuse of the Forms of the House, and therefore I refrain from putting it.

(11.28.) MR. KNOX: The Amendment which we have considered and voted upon, or voted upon without consideration, was one that in ordinary honesty should have been accepted simply as a drafting and consequential Amendment.

THE CHAIRMAN: I beg the hon. Member to resume a businesslike temper and address himself to the Amendment of which he has given notice.

MR. KNOX: If words have escaped me which I ought not to have used I withdraw them, but I confess it is somewhat difficult for me to resume a business-like temper when we find ourselves dealt with in such an unbusiness-like manner this evening by the right hon. Gentleman in charge of the Bill. The Amendment which I have now to propose is one which, if it had not been for the recent experience, I should say the Government would certainly accept. As the Bill stands there may at least be considerable doubt whether the land lord's guarantee deposit is to be the first thing taken, or whether the charge is to fall upon the Guarantee Fund before anything is taken out of the guarantee deposit. Is it the intention that the landlord is to bear his equal share of the losses that may accrue? If that is the intention, then I hope the right hon. Gentleman will accept the Amendment I now move.

Amendment proposed, in page 4, line 3, after the word "deficiency," to insert the words "so far as it is not payable out of the guarantee deposits."—(Mr. Knox.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

(11.30.) MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The hon. Member seems to think that there is some doubt as to the order in which the guarantee shall be taken, but in the opinion of the Government there is no doubt at all as to what the order is. The guarantee deposit will be taken pari passu with the Guarantee Fund. There is no doubt at all about this, and I do not think the Amendment makes the clause one bit clearer.

MR. KNOX: The Chief Secretary lays down a temporary and a permanent order. I do not find in the Bill anything that provides that the guarantee deposit shall be paid into the Guarantee Fund. It appears to me that there is no provision of the kind for the repayment of the Guarantee Fund.

MR. SEXTON: My hon. Friend said nothing about the order of the calls. All that he aims at is to secure that the whole amount of the default shall not come out of the Guarantee Fund. Has the right hon. and learned Gentleman any objection to our proposition that security shall be given for only one half of the Guarantee Fund?

*MR. MADDEN: Yes, I have. I conceive that the Bill is right as it stands. If these words were introduced the Consolidated Fund would never be recouped from the Guarantee Fund until the process of realising the guarantee deposit had been gone through.

(11.47.) THE CHAIRMAN: The Amendment standing on the Paper in the name of the hon. Member for West Belfast (Mr. Sexton) is inconsistent with Clause 3 as settled.

MR. SEXTON: Would the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary prefer to leave out the words—

"And such charge shall be paid first out of the cash portion of the fund and out of the Exchequer contribution?"

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: As I propose to alter Clause 3 on Report, I propose to move the omission of the words.

MR. SEXTON: I would move to leave out all the words after the word "and" in line 8.

Amendment proposed in page 4, line 8, to leave out all the words after the word "and."—(Mr. Sexton.)

Question, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the clause,"—put, and negatived.

(11.51.) MR. KNOX: I beg to move to add after the word "fund" the words—

"Such charge shall be payable out of the various portions of the cash and contingent portion of the Guarantee Fund in the order hereinbefore mentioned."

THE CHAIRMAN: I must point out to the hon. Member that in Clause 3 it is provided that both the cash portion and the contingent portion shall be applicable in the order there mentioned.

MR. KNOX: Might I ask whether the Amendment in the name of the Chief Secretary was unnecessary, considering what had been done in Clause 3?

THE CHAIRMAN: Yes. Does the hon. Member propose to press his Amendment?

MR. SEXTON: I think that is rather a question for the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary. He said he preferred to leave out the words. As, however, another hon. Member has made use of the words of the right hon. Gentleman it will be interesting to know how he will deal with them.

THE CHAIRMAN: I would ask the hon. Member what he proposes to do with his Amendment.

MR. KNOX: I want to follow the order in Clause 3. That is the object of the Amendment.

(11.55.) THE CHAIRMAN: If the hon. Member will do that it will be in order.

Amendment proposed,

In page 4, line 7, after the word "Fund," to insert the words "and such charge shall be payable out of the cash and contingent portions of the Guarantee Fund in the order hereinbefore mentioned."—(Mr. Knox.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

(11.56.) MR. T. M. HEALY: I think we are entitled to some explanation from the Chief Secretary about his own words. I have heard of a minister eating his words, but never of one refusing to eat them. These being the words of the right hon. Gentleman, I invite him to partake of them.

MR. STOREY: This seems to me an absolute comedy of errors. If the right hon. Gentleman will take time to consider this matter to-morrow I think he will find that the Members behind me have been fighting all night for that which is more to the advantage of the Government than to their own advantage. I think the clause as it stands is really ridiculous. I would suggest to him that when once he introduces a reference to the county contributions into Clause 3 he will find it absolutely necessary, in order to make the Bill symmetrical, to introduce the same thing into Clause 4. I am sure, if he will take the hint and consider this, he will do wisely.

MR. JOICEY (Durham, Chester-le-Street): I have listened to the Debate that has been going on for some time, and I must say that, with regard to these various Amendments, the Committee seems rather in a muddle. I think it desirable that some more time should be taken to consider the effect of the Amendment, and I, therefore, move that the Chairman report Progress and ask leave to sit again.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Mr. Joicey.)

(11.59.) MR. CONYBEARE: I want to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether, considering the muddle we have all got into—[Laughter.] Well, I have taken no part in this discussion, but I can see that the Committee has got into a muddle. I pointed out, at an earlier period, the injustice of not having the amended form of Clause 3 before us, and I venture again to say that if we had had it before us we should have been spared all this comedy of errors. I would ask the Attorney General for Ireland if he will undertake that we shall have the printed copy of the amended form of Clause 3 before the Committee to-morrow.

Question put and agreed to.

Committee report Progress; to sit again to-morrow.

SLANDER OF WOMEN BILL.—(No. 150.)

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Friday, 1st May, 1891.

THE MANIPUR DISASTER.

QUESTION—OBSERVATIONS.

*THE MARQUESS OF RIPON: My Lords, seeing the noble Viscount the Secretary of State for India in his place, I am anxious to ask him a question of which he has received private notice. I am desirous of knowing whether he can inform the House if there is any foundation for the statement which has appeared in some of the newspapers that it was intended to summon the Maharajah of Manipur and other native princes to a Durbar at Manipur, and then at that Durbar or immediately afterwards to arrest some of them; and whether, if the statement is correct, as I hope and believe it is not, that proceeding had the authority of the Government of India? I need not point out the extreme importance of the question, and I will only express my own feeling and opinion in the matter: it seems to me incredible from my experience of Mr. Quinton and my knowledge of his character, that he could possibly have had any part in any proceeding of an unworthy or dishonourable kind.

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Viscount CROSS): In answer to the question of the noble Marquess, I have only to state that my information does not lead me to believe that the Government of India ever contemplated that the Senaputty would be invited to a Durbar with the intention of then arresting him there. I should have been much surprised if this had been done. As to what were the actual facts it is impossible for me at this moment to make any statement, because the Viceroy has not yet had the opportunity of obtaining all the information necessary, which in due time he will, no doubt, obtain. In the meantime, I do not think it would be right to lay Papers on the Table of your Lordships' House in an incomplete state, but I am expecting further Despatches, and as soon as the Papers are complete they will be presented to Parliament.

SLANDER OF WOMEN BILL.

Brought from the Commons: Read 1st; and to be printed. (No. 111.)

CHARITIES (RECOVERY) BILL.

(No. 84.)

Read 3rd (according to order) with the Amendment; a further Amendment made: Bill passed, and returned to the Commons.

EAST INDIA (FACTORY ACT.)

QUESTIONS.

MANIPUR.

MR. CREMER (Shoreditch, Haggerston): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether his attention has been called to letters which appeared in the Times on the 29th inst. from Mrs. Grimwood and Lieutenant Albert Wood, concerning the way in which the massacre at Manipur commenced; if he can inform the House whether the statement in regard to the attempt to capture the Jubraj is true; and whether the agent was authorised; and, if so, by whom, to capture the Jubraj, and the reasons which prompted such attempt?

MR. DONALD CRAWFORD (Lanark, N.E.): May I be allowed to put to the right hon. Gentleman a question on the same subject for which I have given him notice for Monday next, namely, whether he will lay on the Table a copy of the Instructions which were given for the expedition to Manipur?

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Sir J. GORST, Chatham): The information in the possession of the Secretary of State does not lead him to believe that the Government of India contemplated that the Senapatty should be invited to a Durbar with the intention of his being arrested. My noble Friend informs me that he should be much surprised if that were so. The Papers on the subject will be presented to Parliament as soon as the information is more complete than it is at the present time.

MR. CREMER: Will the right hon. Gentleman be kind enough to inform the House whether it is true that an attempt was made to capture the Jubraj, and, if so, on whose authority the attempt was made. Had the Political Agent received any instructions from the Indian Government, or was he acting entirely on his own responsibility?

*SIR J. GORST: I am sorry that I am not able to answer the question, nor has the Secretary of State received information that will enable him to answer it. The officers who were engaged in the expedition have unhappily been killed, and probably all official records have been destroyed. Certainly at the present moment there is no information in the possession of my noble Friend the Secretary of State that would enable him to reply to the question. I may mention that Despatches are on their way, and we expect to receive them on Monday next. Immediately on receipt of the Despatches, Papers will be laid upon the Table of the House, and probably they will give all the information the hon. Member desires to have.

MR. CREMER: I beg to give notice that I will repeat the question on Monday.

OPIUM SMUGGLING FROM HONG KONG.

MR. WEBB (Waterford, W.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether his attention has been called to a correspondence between the Hong Kong, Canton, and Macao Steamboat Company, and the China Navigation Company, on the one side, and the Government of Hong Kong, on the other side, in which the companies complain that opium has been smuggled, or been attempted to be smuggled, from Hong Kong to China in their vessels, without their knowledge, but with the connivance, and for the profit of the opium farmer at Hong Kong; and whether the Secretary of State will urge the Government of Hong Kong to adopt, and enforce, all such measures as may be necessary for the prevention of smuggling?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Baron H. DE WORMS, Liverpool, East Toxteth): My attention has not been called to any such correspondence as is referred to by the hon. Member, but the Secretary of State has every reason to believe that the Government of Hong Kong already enforces such measures as appear to be practicable for the prevention of smuggling. A Report will, however, be called for from the Governor on the subject.

*MR. WEBB: I shall take the liberty of sending the correspondence to the right hon. Gentleman.

NATAL.

MR. HULSE (Salisbury): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies if the Home Government are prepared to approve of the proposed alterations in the internal government of the Crown Colony of Natal, in view of the fact that the majority of votes recorded by the European population in Natal was only 2,596 against 2,503?

BARON H. DE WORMS: My hon. Friend is under some misapprehension as to the exact numbers voting at the last general election in Natal. The numbers were 2,121 in favour of the proposed constitutional changes; and 1,937 against. The number of Members returned in favour of them was 14, and 10 against—the majority being thus one-sixth of the number of Members selected. Under these circumstances, it is not the intention of Her Majesty's Government to withdraw the question from further consideration.

SIR R. FOWLER (London): May I ask my right hon. Friend whether the Secretary of State has advised Her Majesty to assent to these constitutional changes?

BARON H. DE WORMS: No, Sir. As I have explained before to the House, there are certain questions still pending between the Natal Government and Her Majesty's Government, and when they are settled, and settled satisfactorily, the question of approving the proposed changes will be considered.

THE CIVIL SERVICE.

MR. KELLY (Camberwell, N.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether he will state the date in which payment of overtime for Second Division Clerks at the uniform rate of 1s. 6d. per hour was sanctioned by the Treasury; and whether it is intended that all Second Division Clerks should, in the event of their being called upon to work overtime, be paid at the same rate without distinction of any kind as to the Department in which they might be serving?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. JACKSON, Leeds, N.): As I stated on the 20th April, there is no general Treasury Minute laying down the rule for Second Division Clerks overtime. I cannot, therefore, give the date. Moreover the Treasury has not enjoined a uniform rate, as the hon. Member appears to suppose. All that the Treasury has done is to refuse sanction to any rate in excess of 1s. 6d. an hour in any Department, and within that limit the Heads of Departments may assign such overtime payments as they may deem expedient. It is not intended to make any change in this rule.

MR. KELLY: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether he will take into consideration the desirability of promoting some of those Civil Service Writers who were recommended for promotion under the Treasury Minute of December, 1886, and could not be promoted to a permanent junior class in such an office as the Education Department where, owing to the great increase of work, the present staff must necessarily be shortly augmented?

MR. JACKSON: I am not aware that there is any application from the Education Department for an increase of staff, and I am sure that my hon. Friend will agree with me that it would be very undesirable, if such an application were made, that the Treasury should be hampered in dealing with it by pledges given on a partial view of the circumstances.

CYPRUS.

MR. E. ROBERTSON (Dundee): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether the Legislative Council of Cyprus has passed a resolution in favour of a proposition for the construction of a railway in that Island; and, if so, whether Her Majesty's Government will render any assistance in carrying out the project, either by giving a limited guarantee or by itself constructing the main lines as "protective" railways, in accordance with the practice adopted in India; and what, if any, is the present limit of borrowing on public works in Cyprus?

BARON H. DE WORMS: The Secretary of State has no official information of such a resolution having been passed, but a project for the construction of lines of railway has been submitted to the Local Government, and is under consideration. Cyprus has never borrowed money for any purpose whatever.

HOLIDAYS IN THE POST OFFICE.

MR. WALLACE (Edinburgh, E.): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether, from the 1st July last year till the beginning of this year, four public holidays have been paid for to clerks in England and only three in Scotland; and, if so, whether any compensation will be given to the Scottish clerks for the loss of the day's payment?

THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. RAIBLE, Cambridge University): Arrangements have been made that for the future Post Office servants in Scotland shall be given holidays on fast days or other days, generally observed as holidays in Scotland, in lieu of those days which are held to be Bank Holidays in England but not in Scotland, so that the number of holidays granted in the two Divisions of the Kingdom will be the same.

GRANTS IN AID OF TECHNICAL INSTRUCTION.

MR. D. THOMAS (Merthyr Tydvil): I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education whether it is competent for a Local Authority to set aside part of the Parliamentary grants in aid of technical and manual instruction for the purpose of encouraging, by means of prizes at public competitions, efficiency in timbering, rock-boring, wire-rope splicing, and other work requiring technical skill in connection with colliery operations?

THE VICE PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Sir W. HART DYKE, Kent, Dartford): Such subjects of instruction may very properly be included among those to which aid is given, but, as I have already stated in regard to agriculture, I think the special form in which it is proposed to distribute the grant may be open to exception as to its legality, although something might depend upon the method of its connection with some general scheme of instruction in mining.

LICENSED VICTUALLERS' MEASURES.

MR. D. THOMAS: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he is aware of the inconvenience caused to licensed victuallers and their customers by a recent decision that the sale of beer by retail in the measure known as the "blue," commonly in use in South Wales, is illegal; whether he will introduce a short Bill this Session to amend "The Licensing Act, 1872," in order to legalise the "blue," and so remove the inconvenience; and if not, whether the Government will afford facilities for the passage of such a Bill introduced by a Private Member?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. MATTHEWS, Birmingham, E.): No representation on this subject has reached me. I understand that my right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade recently informed a deputation that waited upon him that there were objections to legalising the "blue." A measure of similar capacity was once legal, but was abolished, as it was found to tend to fraud. The Government will not assist in promoting legislation for this object.

THE ROYAL IRISH CONSTABULARY.

MR. O'NEILL (Antrim, Mid): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he will state the reasons for the proposed change of the head quarters of the Royal Irish Constabulary from Ballymena to Lisburn;

Mr. D. Thomas

if he is aware that Ballymena is the centre of the county, with railway communication north, south, and east, and sufficient hotel accommodation, whereas Lisburn is situated at the extreme south of the county, and, therefore, much more difficult of access to the greater part of the county; and what steps he will take to prevent the proposed change?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): I do not know that I can add anything to the answer which I gave to a question on the same subject by the hon. and learned Member for North Longford (Mr. T. M. Healy), namely, that—

"The removal of the head quarters of the Royal Irish Constabulary of the County Antrim from Ballymena to Lisburn has been for some time under consideration, and has been decided upon in the public interest. Next to Belfast, Lisburn is now the largest and most important town in the county; its population has within a few years largely increased. It is close to the Assize town where all the county officers reside, and possesses the requirements necessary for the accommodation of the county head quarters of the Force. The change is being made on the recommendation of the Inspector General."

The Inspector General, however, adds that a difficulty is now experienced in obtaining a suitable house for the County Inspector at Lisburn, and that the removal of the head quarters has, therefore, been, for the present, suspended.

INLAND REVENUE OFFICE, BELFAST.

MR. M'CARTAN (Down, S.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether he is aware of the very large number of agreements, deeds of transfer, &c., which have to be sent from Belfast to Dublin daily to be stamped there; and whether, considering the delay and inconvenience involved thereby, he will inquire if arrangements can be made whereby such stamps might be impressed at the Inland Revenue Office, Belfast?

MR. JACKSON: The Government is quite aware of the importance of the business transacted at Belfast for which stamps are required, and with a view to meet the convenience of the inhabitants, the Treasury has already sanctioned a plan for the extension of stamping facilities to Belfast, and it will be put in operation as soon as the necessary arrangements can be made.

LAND COMMISSION—"WEAVER v. HERON."

MR. M'CARTAN: I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether his attention has been called to a decision, given by the Chief Land Commission at Belfast on 12th November last, in the case of Mr. John Weaver, tenant, whose family have been in possession of the holding for over 200 years, and Mr. Francis Heron, landlord, where the landlord appealed from an order of the Sub-Commissioners fixing a fair rent on the tenant's holding on the ground of the reduction of rent and not on a point of law; whether he is aware that the Chief Commission, guided by the decision in "Battersby v. Carroll," dismissed the tenant's application on the point of law that the lease contained a covenant enabling the landlord to resume a small portion of the holding for planting or other purposes; whether he is also aware that the Land Commission was at the time asked to state a case for the Court of Appeal, and that at the last County Court at Newtownards this landlord obtained a decree of ejectment against Weaver by reason of this decision; and whether, considering that the decision in "Battersby v. Carroll" has since been departed from in the case of Mooney, tenant, Wilcocks, landlord, reported in the Irish Times of 10th February last, he will support a Bill to have the law declared or amended in such cases?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. MADDEN, Dublin University): My attention has been called by the question to the decision referred to. It is the fact that the Chief Commissioners dismissed the tenant's application following the decision of the Court of Appeal in "Battersby v. Carroll." I am informed that the Land Commission, on the application of the tenant, gave his leave, on the 18th of November, to state a case for the decision of the Court of Appeal. Under the Rules of the Land Commission, the person to whom leave is granted to have a case stated is bound to prepare it and lodge it within one month from the order giving leave. Although now five months have elapsed, no steps have been taken by the tenant. The case of "Mooney v. Wilcocks," referred to in the last paragraph of the question, has not yet been reported in the Law Reports. But on comparing the newspaper report of that case with the report of "Battersby v. Carroll," I find the facts to be nothing difficult, and I cannot accept the statement that any uncertainty has been introduced into the law by the recent decision.

LAND COMMISSION—CAVAN.

MR. KNOX (Cavan, W.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland how many appeals re fair rent were heard by the Land Commission, recently sitting in Cavan; and in how many of such cases the rent, as fixed by the Sub-Commissioners, was raised, and in how many lowered?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Irish Land Commissioners report that at their recent sitting at Cavan there were 124 appeals listed, which were disposed of as follows: Judicial rent confirmed, 50; judicial rent raised, 43; judicial rent lowered, 2; appeals settled, 15; appeals adjourned, 3; appeals struck out, 2; originating notices dismissed, 5; dismissal of originating notice reversed, 1; judgment reserved, 3; total, 124.

RATHDOWN UNION CEMETERY.

SIR T. ESMONDE (Dublin Co., S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if, in view of the desire of the ratepayers of the Rathdown Union to have chaplains appointed to the Union Cemetery, he would use his influence with the Rathdown Board of Guardians to induce them to favourably consider the ratepayers' request?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: An application of the nature mentioned in this Question appears to have been made to the Rathdown Board of Guardians in February last. The matter is one wholly for the consideration of the Guardians, and the Local Government Board are unable to interfere.

FLOODS IN BELFAST.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that serious floods have occurred in Shore Street, Weaver Street, and Millwater Street, in the City of Belfast, owing to encroachments in the course of the Millwater River within the city boundary for certain improvements; that, in consequence, the channel of this river is now insufficient to discharge the water after any heavy rainfall; and that great damage has been done to property and the inhabitants; whether he is aware that the Corporation permitted these alterations to be made, although warned of the consequences, and now disclaim all liability, and refuse to take steps to prevent recurrence of disaster; and whether, in view of the fact that the Corporation of Belfast are fully empowered to deal with such a case, both by their local Acts and also as the Sanitary Authority under the Public Health Acts, what steps the Government will take to cause the application of a remedy in the case?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Town Clerk of Belfast reports that in November last, after an exceptionally heavy rainfall, houses in the vicinity of the water-course of the Millwater River were flooded. But that the Corporation neither sanctioned, nor were they in any way a party to the alteration of the old course. Not owning any property in the neighbourhood, the Corporation felt unable to take any action beyond making representations to the parties concerned, who, however, have, it appears, agreed to remove the cause of complaint.

MR. SEXTON: There have been two disastrous floods within a few years. What is the public authority which ought to attend to the matter?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I must ask the hon. Gentleman to give notice of the question.

THE REPRESENTATION OF THE PEOPLE ACT IN IRELAND.

MR. TUIE (Westmeath, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he can state what means are adopted yearly by the Local Government Board for Ireland to insure that the provisions of "The Representation of the People Act, 1884," and "The Parliamentary Registration Act, 1885," are duly carried out by the officers of the Poor Law Unions in Ireland; whether he is aware that in many Unions the requisition forms specified in the 3rd schedule of "The Representation of the People Act, 1884," have not been distributed since 1885; and whether he will instruct the clerks of the different Poor Law Unions throughout Ireland to have the said forms duly served in their respective Unions on every person rated or liable to be rated, as provided for by the 9th section of the said Act?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Boards of Guardians and their clerks are, under the Representation of the People Act, 1884, declared "overseers" to carry out that Act. It does not devolve on the Local Government Board to issue instructions in the matter. I am not aware that overseers have neglected their duty as to the distribution of requisition forms, but, if so, the persons aggrieved have a remedy provided in the Statute which declares that—

"Any overseer who fails to perform his duty under this section shall be deemed guilty of a breach of duty in the execution of the Registration Acts, and shall be liable to be fined accordingly a sum not exceeding forty shillings for each default."

NON-RESIDENT FARMS IN IRELAND.

MR. KNOX: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he can now give the valuation of the farms in each province in Ireland which, according to his estimate, will be excluded by Clause 6 of the Land Purchase Bill as pasture and as held by non-resident tenants?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: For all Ireland the farms excluded as non-resident are roughly estimated at 12,000, with a valuation of £604,000. They are made up thus:—Ulster 2,500, with a valuation of £67,000; Leinster, 3,300, valuation £238,000; Munster, 3,400, valuation £152,000; Connaught, 2,800, valuation £147,000. For all Ireland the farms excluded as pasture are roughly estimated at 52,000, with a valuation, roughly speaking, of £2,000,000. I have not yet got this total divided into provinces. It must be borne in mind that the two classes overlap, and that some farms excluded as grazing are independently excluded as non-residential. Of course too much reliance must not be placed on these figures, which at best are merely an approximation.

MR. KNOX: The figures given by the right hon. Gentleman now differ somewhat from those which he gave in answer to a similar question the other day.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: That is quite possible, but I have not got the terms of my former answer. As I have said, the figures are only an approximation.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): May I ask the right hon. Gentleman if he will lay this valuable and interesting information on the Table of the House in the form of a Return?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The information is not of such an authentic nature that it ought to be included in a Return. I only give it as an approximate.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Without the information being binding upon the right hon. Gentleman, will he give it quantum valeat?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I do not think that that would be a good practice.

DONAGHADEE HARBOUR.

MR. M'CARTAN: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury what is the amount which he proposed to expend in improving the harbour at Donaghadee; and whether, in the public interest, the work will be proceeded with notwithstanding the protest made by a local gentleman as to the insufficiency of the work proposed to be done?

MR. JACKSON: I am not able to answer the question as to the amount proposed to be expended in dredging the harbour of Donaghadee. I stated on a former occasion that the Treasury could not sanction the proposed expenditure, because it was considered to be much more than was necessary for such a work.

A QUESTION OF ORDER.

MR. BUCHANAN (Edinburgh, W.): I desire to ask your ruling, Sir, upon a point of Order in connection with the Orders of the Day, namely, whether, in view of the Motion passed yesterday, giving the Government precedence on Tuesdays and Fridays for the Land Purchase Bill, they are entitled to place to-night in the Orders of the Day before Supply Orders 2, 3, and 4 (Mail Ships Bill, Public Accounts and Charges Bill, and Summary Jurisdiction (Youthful Offenders) Bill), and whether the purport of the Motion was not this—that on Fridays the Purchase of Land Bill should have the first place, and then Supply, and that on Tuesdays the second place should be given to Private Members' Motions.

*MR. SPEAKER: I replied to a similar question in answer to the hon. Member for Donegal (Mr. A. O'Connor) on the 17th of June, 1887. There is nothing in the Standing Orders to show that if Supply is not placed first it ought to be put second on a Friday. The Standing Order XI. has been superseded, so to speak, by the Resolution passed yesterday, giving precedence to the Irish Land Purchase Bill over all Orders of the Day and Notices of Motion. The hon. Member asks why Supply was not put second. If Supply had been put second, there being no effective Supply down, the only result would have been that the Government would put off Supply as soon as that Order was reached. Friday is a Government night, subject only to the limitation of Supply standing first. If Supply can be got out of the way, the Government take the other Orders of the Day. On a Tuesday the case would be different. Precedence would be given to the Land Bill; and if the proceedings thereon came to an end any time before 12 o'clock, of course Private Members would re-enter into their rights. Notices would be next taken, the precedence being given only for that particular Government Order.

SIR W. HARCOURT (Derby): May I ask you, Sir, as a matter of form, whether you are to be understood to say that the Resolution of yesterday, practically speaking, repeals Standing Order XI., which says—

"That while the Committees of Supply and Ways and Means are open to the first Order of the Day on Friday shall be either Supply or Ways and Means, and that on that Order being read the Question shall be proposed 'That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair?'"

Am I to understand that it is not necessary to have any formal Resolution to suspend that Standing Order?

*MR. SPEAKER: It is virtually a repeal, or rather a suspension, so often as the Land Purchase Bill is appointed on Friday. Otherwise Supply would stand first, and I should have to propose the Question "That I now leave the Chair," on which Private Members' Motions would come on in the usual way, but then the Resolution of yesterday would be rendered inoperative and ineffective. When precedence is given to particular business it, implies the suspension of the Standing Orders ordinarily regulating the course of business.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.—

MR. MAHONY AND MR. HALLEY
STEWART.

MR. MAHONY (Meath, N): I am anxious, with the leave of the House, to make a short personal explanation. A paragraph has appeared in a daily newspaper in reference to a speech that was delivered by an hon. Member of this House last Sunday.

An hon. MEMBER: What paper?

MR. MAHONY: In a paper called the National Press. The paragraph is as follows:—

"A few days ago a paragraph appeared relating to a conversation between an hon. Member for one of the Eastern Counties of Ireland and Mr. Halley Stewart. That hon. Member was Mr. Pierce Mahony. Speaking to Mr. Stewart in the House of Commons, Mr. Mahony said, 'My dear Halley Stewart, if you knew the Irish priests as well as I do, you would cut off your right hand before you would be associated with the Party with whom they are connected.'"

I think that the House will agree with me in expressing surprise, and in characterising as a regrettable incident the fact that what purports to be a report of a private conversation that occurred in this House should by any means have found its way into the public Press, whether the version was correct or not. But in my case the matter is aggravated by the account being absolutely inaccurate and misleading. It attributes to me sentiments regarding the whole body of the Irish priests which I do not hold, and have never held, and have never given utterance to, and it is particularly painful to me, because I do not happen to belong to the Roman Catholic Church. There are many clergymen in Ireland who are members of that Church with whom I have been brought into contact towards whom I entertain feelings of the greatest possible respect. [Mr. T. M. HEALY: Order, order!] If I am out of order the right hon. Gentleman in the Chair will call me to order. [Mr. T. M. HEALY: Order, order!] The hon. Member for North Longford may rest assured that no observations or interruptions from him will prevent me from making my statement. The substance of what I did say in that private conversation was this—I was alluding to the action not of the general body of the Irish priests, but to that of a small section of them at the present crisis, and to the claims which certain ecclesiastics in Ireland have advanced, which I as a Protestant can only view with sorrow and dismay, and I said that if the hon. Member and his friends realised the nature and extent of that action they would not be so ready to identify themselves with that section of Irish Members who rely on actions of that kind. I thank the House for having allowed me to make this explanation.

MESSAGE FROM THE LORDS.

That they have agreed to,—Army Schools Bill; Merchandise Marks Bill; London (City) Trial of Civil Causes Bill. without Amendment.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

PURCHASE OF LAND AND CONGESTED DISTRICTS (IRELAND) BILL.—(No. 111.)

COMMITTEE.

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 4.

Amendment proposed,

In page 4, line 7, after the word "Fund," to insert the words "and such charge shall be payable out of the cash and contingent portions of the Guarantee Fund in the order hereinbefore mentioned."—(Mr. Knox.)

Question again proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

(4.10.) MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): I think that the Government, in declining to accept this Amendment, are violating the agreement they deliberately entered into when Clause 3 was under discussion. There was a clear understanding that the Amendment was to be looked upon as of a consequential character. The Amendment of my hon. Friend the Member for Cavan (Mr. Knox) proposes to apply a particular provision to Clause 4, and I hope the Chief Secretary will inform the Committee if he has anything to add to the statement which he made last night. It has come to our knowledge accidentally that the Government regard the most important of the Amendments made in Clause 3 as having been accepted in ignorance, and that they propose to strike them out on Report. I certainly understood the right hon.

Gentleman to say that these Amendments were to be regarded as consequential. I submit that he was not taken by surprise, but that there was a distinct Amendment on the Paper which provided that the Guarantee Fund should consist, in addition to the county percentage, of two other sums. There was a proposal that the county percentage should be first drawn upon, but the right hon. Gentleman did not move it. In so doing he showed that he was sensible of the propriety of allowing a certain order to be observed in regard to the guarantee. The agreement was entered into by the right hon. Gentleman and by the Attorney General for Ireland with deliberation, and they cannot now rely upon the plea of simplicity, and say that they did not understand the force of the arrangement they entered into. I appeal to the right hon. Gentleman, for the sake of the progress of the Bill and the good relation which exists between members in different parts of the House, to give an undertaking that he will not, on Report, endeavour to affect the arrangement which has been come to. If the right hon. Gentleman will leave the clause as it stands we on our part will not press the Amendment moved last night. We will be satisfied with the transfer from the Land Purchase Guarantee Fund of whatever may be got as a balance, but let it be drawn upon in the order already agreed.

(4.20.) THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (MR. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): I will endeavour to explain the misapprehension, but, in the first instance, I will point out the parts of the hon. Gentleman's speech with which I agree. I agree with him that he did put down on the Paper an Amendment designed to allocate £40,000 of the Probate Duty first, and that he placed two out of the three contributory funds in such a position that they would be drawn upon before the county percentage was touched. I agree also that the Government assented to the Amendment proposed by himself, which had for its object the alteration of the order in which the various funds in Clause 3 were to be utilised, and to provide that one fund should be exhausted before the next in order was touched. But I do not agree with the hon. Member that there was any such understanding as he asserts with reference to the 5s. percentage, nor do I admit that the Government had anything of the kind in their minds when they consented to stereotype the order of the contributory funds, nor is there any evidence that either he or his hon. Friends near him had such a proposal prominently before their own eyes.

MR. SEXTON: That was distinctly the object of the Amendment, and the Government assented to the county percentage coming last.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: No, Sir; nothing appeared in the Amendment or in the speech of the hon. Member to show in the most remote manner that that was either directly or indirectly the object in view. I have looked through the reports of the Debates upon the Bill, and neither in the Times, the Free-man's Journal, the National Press, nor in Hansard, of which I have the reports of our proceedings up to Friday last, can I find any reference to such a proposal in regard to the 5s. percentage, nor can I find at what stage of our proceedings the Amendment referred to last night was introduced. If anything was said upon the matter, it must have been incidentally in the course of some conversation across the Table, and not in serious debate. Indeed, it was neither debated, discussed, nor alluded to regularly in any speech.

MR. SEXTON: The matter was mentioned when the right hon. Gentleman agreed to withdraw, and not to move, his proposed Amendment, by which the county percentage was to be made the first fund drawn upon.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: What was then said had reference to the propriety of the county percentage being dealt with by a later sub-head; but no argument was addressed to the Committee in favour of putting it lowest down in the order. If such a proposal had been made, I should have risen at once to urge the impropriety of leaving untouched this contribution, made simply out of charity. ["Oh, oh!"] The question was regarded as settled, and when the Amendment was brought forward immediately after dinner last night, hon. Members certainly did not appear to be conscious that the matter had been mentioned in any previous Debate. The Amendment,

Clause 4.

Amendment proposed,

In page 4, line 7, after the word "Fund," to insert the words "and such charge shall be payable out of the cash and contingent portions of the Guarantee Fund in the order hereinbefore mentioned."—(Mr. KNOX.)

Question again proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

(4.10.) MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): I think that the Government, in declining to accept this Amendment, are violating the agreement they deliberately entered into when Clause 3 was under discussion. There was a clear understanding that the Amendment was to be looked upon as of a consequential character. The Amendment of my hon. I certainly understood the right hon.

first as consequential, but when that view was dissented from he at once went into the substance of the Amendment, without in any way explaining in what way it was merely a drafting or consequential Amendment. The Amendment was discussed, not as a consequential Amendment, but as a substantive proposition. We accepted an Amendment across the floor of the House.

MR. SEXTON: What does the right hon. and learned Gentleman mean by accepting an Amendment across the floor of the House?

*MR. MADDEN: I mean accepting an Amendment not put down on the Paper, but moved by an hon. Gentleman opposite. I would remind the Committee that on Clause 2 I warned hon. Gentlemen opposite that in an intricate and complicated question such as this it is exceedingly dangerous to accept Amendments without the fullest consideration, and that the best way would be to re-consider the matter on Report.

(4.40.) MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Although I am unwilling to give a final judgment on the Amendment suggested by the hon. Member for West Belfast, I am quite willing to withdraw unreservedly from the position I took up last night as to restoring Clause 3 upon Report, and will give full consideration to the suggestion of the hon. Gentleman, and if I possibly can, give effect to it upon Report.

MR. SEXTON: I thank the right hon. Gentleman for the assurance which I have no doubt he will carry out, and I would suggest to my hon. Friend that he should ask leave to withdraw the Amendment.

(4.41.) MR. KNOX: I beg to ask leave to withdraw the Amendment.

MR. PARNELL (Cork): I hope I am entitled to express a hope, viewing the way in which the right hon. Gentleman has met them on this important question, that hon. Members who have Amendments on the Paper will consider it part of their duty to look over the numerous Amendments with a view to making a selection of the most important questions on which they desire to obtain the judgment of the Committee. If they will do so, I am sure that opportunities will be given them which otherwise they may lose of bringing forward important matters, the discussion of which would be of considerable service to the country.

(4.42.) MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): We entirely appreciate the spirit in which the Chief Secretary has met us in this matter, and we have shown on former occasions our willingness to meet him in the same spirit. As for the hon. Gentleman who has just sat down, he is not entitled to express any hope with reference to our conduct. We have repudiated him from first to last, and if the Government desire to get on with the Bill, the less attention they pay to any suggestions from the hon. Member the better.

MR. FITZGERALD (Longford, S.): We also are entitled to repudiate the action of the hon. Member for Longford and his Friends, which we think is not calculated to promote the progress of the Bill.

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order!

(4.43.) MR. SEXTON: Without raising any contentious matter I may say I think the Chief Secretary will admit that on both Clauses 2 and 3 I endeavoured to open the discussion of each by eliciting from him a general statement as to the intentions of the Government, with a view to limiting the Debates and number of Divisions. We have thus tried to economise the time of the Committee.

MR. PARNELL: I expressly guarded myself from expressing any hope with regard to the action of the hon. Member for Longford. I may tell him I shall reserve to myself the right to express my opinion either on this Committee or in this House on any questions affecting Ireland, undeterred by any exasperating remarks from the hon. Member.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

(4.45.) MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): I gather from the Chief Secretary that he really intends not to use the Guarantee Fund, or to make a special levy on the country, until he has used all legal means to recover the annuity from persons primarily responsible, and I have therefore put down this Amendment to make it distinctly clear that that is the right hon. Gentleman's intention. I need not point out it is only right and proper that all means of getting the money from the person who has had the advantage of it should be exhausted before you come either on the taxpayers of Ireland or of the United Kingdom. I want the Chief Secretary to assure me that he will stand by what he has said so frequently in the course of these Debates, namely, that he will cause evictions to take place before coming on the Guarantee Fund; otherwise when the Irish Executive have in hand moneys paid into the Guarantee Fund they may refrain from enforcing the payment of the annuities on the purchasing tenants and come instead on the taxpayers generally. I think the best plan will be for the Government to accept the Amendment, which puts the right hon. Gentleman's assurance into a definite form.

Amendment proposed, in page 4, line 9, at end to insert—

"Provided that no sum shall be paid to the Land Purchase Account by the Guarantee Fund, in respect to a failure to pay a purchase annuity, unless the Land Commission shall have exhausted all legal proceedings competent to them for the recovery of the sum due."—(Mr. Labouchere.)

(4.47.) Mr. A. J. BALFOUR: It is not possible for the Government to accept this Amendment, because they have no control over the proceedings of the Land Commission. It will be the duty of the Commission to obtain the money and to use all the means in their power to do so, but we cannot make any such rule as the hon. Gentleman suggests. The hon. Member will further see that a great hardship would be inflicted on the British Exchequer, which would be kept out of its money until proceedings are taken in Ireland. Of course, it must be left to the Land Commission to say when a sale shall take place in order that the greatest amount of assets may be realised in the interest of the taxpayer, of the tenants themselves, and of the Local Authority.

Mr. J. MORLEY: I am quite disposed to agree with what has fallen from the right hon. Gentleman. I think that there should be no cast-iron rules imposed on the Land Commission, but that the question should be left to their discretion.

(4.50.) Mr. LABOUCHERE: I am quite content to accept the suggestion of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Morley) if I am to understand it to be the intention of the framers of this Bill that as a general rule the evictions must take place before you can come upon the guarantees. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary says he cannot oblige the Land Commissioners to take a particular course, but if I am to understand him to state for the guidance of the Commissioners that this is the intention of the Government I will not press my Amendment.

Mr. A. J. BALFOUR: I cannot, of course, interfere with the Land Commissioners in the exercise of their duty, but I think the hon. Member may take it that I am not averse to the course suggested.

Mr. LABOUCHERE: Then, Sir, I ask leave to withdraw my Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

(4.53.) Mr. MAHONY: I beg now to move the Amendment standing in my name, in page 4, line 10, after the word "if" to insert—

"In any county where the ratepayers have signified their assent in the manner hereinafter provided."

The object of this Amendment is to provide that the taxpayers of a county who are going to be forced by this Bill to give certain guarantees should have at any rate the opportunity of consenting or dissenting before a special rate is directed by the Lord Lieutenant to be made. The Amendment will not interfere with the cash portion of the guarantee. And in so far as it does not do that, it will accord with the view expressed by the Chief Secretary in a dim and shadowy manner in the earlier part of the Committee's proceedings. The right hon. Gentleman has more than once stated that his proposal with regard to a plébiscite has not been received with approval by the Committee, but I do not think that that is a fair way of putting what has really happened. What has happened is this. Many Members of the Committee have expressed a decided approval of another form of obtaining the assent of the taxpayers. We asked the Chief Secretary to assent to a provision requiring the approval of the County Council to the guarantee, but that was decided in the negative. We now want the Chief Secretary to say distinctly whether he will allow the taxpayers to express by plébiscite whether the contingent portion of the Guarantee Fund should be put in operation or not. I understand that the right hon. Gentleman was willing to confer on the taxpayers certain powers with regard to that portion of the fund. For my own part, I would prefer that the proposal of the Government should be modified in the direction of giving the taxpayers power to consent to pledge a certain portion of their security at a time, but sooner than get no concession on the subject we would agree to the proposal that the taxpayers should have power to assent or dissent for a certain period. This Amendment will, of course, require a consequential Amendment, which is not yet on the Paper, but will depend upon the answer given by the Chief Secretary. I now beg to ask the Chief Secretary whether he will be prepared, if there is now any expression of opinion from any considerable section of the Committee, to bring in this plébiscite which I have foreshadowed in the earlier stage of the Committee.

Amendment proposed,

In page 4, line 10, after the word "if," to insert the words "in any county where the ratepayers have signified their assent in the manner hereinafter provided."—(Mr. Mahony.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

(5.0.) MR. PARNELL: I appeal to the Chief Secretary not to dismiss too hurriedly the suggestion which has been made in this Amendment, or to close the door against further consideration of the question of a plébiscite. It is quite true, as stated by the Member for Meath (Mr. Mahony), that we should have preferred to have had this question referred to a Local Government Authority to be set up in the Irish counties, but as that has not been found possible, it appears to me that the next best course to adopt was that which shaped itself in the mind of the right hon. Gentleman, but which was not insisted upon owing to the want of support on the part of the Committee. Still I think, from the point of view taken by the right hon. Gentleman, we should be wrong in eliminating the question of the plébiscite altogether. I have always been desirous that, in connection with land purchase, there should be no repudiation, because I believe that the use of British credit would very materially facilitate a solution of the land question, but at the same time I maintain that the proposal to hypothecate local resources without the consent of ratepayers is one which Irish Members ought not to countenance without obtaining some form of local control. The best form of local control is that which would permit the ratepayers from time to time to say whether or not the Act should be put into operation, but there is a tolerable alternative. Let the Act operate for a year without the consent of the ratepayers being required, and then we should be in a better position to judge whether they would wish its operation to continue. That would be the second best form of local control, and I would place the proposal of the right hon. Gentleman in the third class as the next best form of local control. I would rather have the right hon. Gentleman's system than none at all, because it does recognise the principle of throwing on those who may have to pay the responsibility of saying whether the Act should operate or not. Certainly some system might wisely be adopted by the Government for recognising the principle of local control, and thereby freeing themselves from the reproach which undoubtedly exists of having shown an utter disregard of those principles of local government so successfully applied in England and Scotland.

(5.10.) MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Committee have long known that the hon. Member for Cork holds the views which he has just expressed. The question now under discussion has been dealt with fully on several occasions during the progress of the Bill, and I have not much to add to what I have already said on the subject. There are not more than a certain number of definite arguments which can be adduced one way or the other. The argument in favour of local control has been considerably exaggerated in one respect. The difficulty—if a difficulty exists—would not really be met by the modification suggested by the hon. Member. After all, the counties are bound, under any scheme, to meet any deficiency occurring over more than a generation and a half in the repayments to the Guarantee Funds. I have never thought that the introduction of local control in the form of a control exercised by Representative Bodies would give any substantially increased security for the repayments to the Exchequer. I will point out to the Committee that if this matter is to be brought up again it can only be done effectively in a new clause; but as far as the action of the Government is concerned I have nothing to add to what has been said before.

MR. SEXTON: The only form of local control which I should regard as at all effective would be a control exercised by an elective Local Body upon individual transactions under the Act, whether it were the sale of a holding or of an estate. If liabilities are imposed on the ratepayers in Ireland in respect of transactions with which as a body they have no concern, there can be only two justifications of such a course. The first is to procure the assent of the ratepayers, which has not been done; and the second is to give them such control over the accruing of the liability as would disentitle them afterwards to repudiate their responsibility. I think it is cruel to put the farmers in any county into the position of saying whether they will part with the Act altogether, or whether they will be responsible for the full balance of transactions. Two questions should be put—first, whether the Act should be continued any longer; and, secondly, whether it should be suspended for a year, another plebiscite to be taken as to whether the suspension should be continued or not? This would be a kind of automatic arrangement which would not interfere with the operation of the Act in any district where the farmers were disposed to view its transactions with favour.

MR. MAHONY: I do not think that this is an inopportune moment to raise this discussion. I shall press the matter to a Division because, as an Irish Representative, I feel that I have no mandate or authority from the taxpayers in Ireland to place this burden upon them without their consent.

(5.20.) SIR G. TREVELYAN (Bridgeton, Glasgow): I think that hon. Members will be perfectly justified in pressing this Amendment to a Division. The Chief Secretary has spoken of the moral sanction which the plebiscite would give to the disposition of the contingent Guarantee Fund; but this is not the most important part of the question. I look upon this as the last and only remaining popular check on the system of land purchase. See what we have done already; we have practically withdrawn the Commissioners from any supervision or criticism by Parliament, which would be a very serious thing if the new clause, to be proposed by the hon. Member for South Tyrone (Mr. T. W. Russell), is accepted, and if the Land Commissioners, who are to have charge of the Purchase Department should be other than the special Purchase Commissioners, in whom at present so many of us have the greatest confidence. In every other part of the Kingdom, except in Ireland, power is given for the purchase of allotments and small holdings on the principle of local control, and is Parliament going to reject this principle when dealing with a similar scheme, but on a much larger scale, which affects the tenants of Ireland, and involves the expenditure of £30,000,000 of money? No doubt a plebiscite is a very imperfect form of local control, but it may be an effective one. The people of the locality would watch how the Commissioners act; and if they find that particular landlords have got the ear of the Commissioners, they will give a vote which will have the effect of suspending any more purchases for the time being, and the result will be that the Commissioners will be kept in check.

(5.30.) MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The right hon. Gentleman argued that under the Bill as it stood, and as it might be modified by the Amendment of the hon. Member for South Tyrone, the Land Commissioners would not be under any responsibility to Parliament, Parliament would not know what was going on; and in lieu of Parliamentary control some substitute in the shape of control by the locality would have to be invented and applied. Now, in the first place, Parliament could not be deprived of the means of knowing what was being done by the Commissioners; and if the necessity should arise, Parliament would have the power of altering the whole system of land purchase in Ireland. This Parliament could not prevent its successor from finding out what is being done in Ireland. All that would be effected by the present Bill with respect to the Land Commissioners is that any particular action of theirs should not be discussed on the Estimates. I therefore deny the first proposition of the right hon. Gentleman. I also deny that a plébiscite would form a sort of substitute for Parliamentary control. The right hon. Gentleman thinks that the Commissioners would be frightened if the Act were suspended for a year or two. But why should they be frightened. Their salaries would be paid all the same, and not the slightest injury of any shape or kind would be done to them. If he thinks a plébiscite would have such an effect he never would have suggested it. According to the right hon. Gentleman, a plébiscite would show whether the price was what the farmers would like to give, and if it was not, it would stop the purchases. If that is what the right hon. Gentleman meant by local control, I am glad that no form of local control was given by the Bill. There are two possible things which hon. Gentlemen might try to show would be done by the plébiscite—one is that it might control the action of the Commissioners, but that I have shown to be illusory; and as to the other, a moral control against repudiation, the Committee have it on the authority of the hon. Member for West Belfast that such a control would not be exercised on the Commissioners. I must again impress upon the Committee that this is not a fitting time to discuss the question of a plébiscite. There is no plan for a plébiscite before the Committee. I would suggest to the hon. Gentleman to put down any proposal he may desire to make in the form of a new clause, and then it could be discussed. Any discussion of the subject now would be only a waste of time.

(5.40.) MR. J. MORLEY: This may not be the most convenient time for discussing the subject, but the right hon. Gentleman must know that hon. Members take a very strong view about local control, and will naturally make use of every opportunity of expressing their desire for it. The Chief Secretary has intimated that local control could influence the Commissioners only if their salaries were affected. That shows that the right hon. Gentleman takes a lower view of the Land Commissioners than Members below the Gangway. I do not think that the Commissioners would be insensible to the expression of opinion of the locality concerned. As the Land Commissioners are about to be put on a new footing, it is all the more necessary to establish some form of popular control. It is not that we may get a moral control against repudiation that we insist upon popular control; but because it is essentially unjust that the resources of a locality should be pledged without the assent of the locality. When in 1889 the right hon. Gentleman laid another Bill on the Table of the House, what did he do? Did he go on the principle which he now proposes to act upon in regard to a far more important proposal in connection with land purchase? Certainly not. On the contrary, where a guarantee was necessary on the part of certain baronies or districts he provided that the responsibility should never fall on the barony until the assent of the ratepayers had been taken in manner required by the Bill. Surely if it were worth while to insist on the principle of popular control in so slight a matter, it is far more essential, when dealing with a much larger and more important proposal, that that principle should be enforced. Of course we would have a plébiscite rather than nothing, but we must all agree that the only effective form of popular control is the control of effective Local Bodies who shall ascertain beforehand whether or not the localities assent to the hypothecation.

(5.48.) MR. A. J. BALFOUR: It appears to me that the distinction which has been drawn by hon. Members as between the cash and contingent portions of the fund is a mockery, and so also would be the plébiscite taken at the beginning of the transaction.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN (Birmingham, W.): I understand that my hon. Friend the Member for West Belfast attributed to me the paternity of the proposal for the plébiscite. If so I can assure him that he is entirely mistaken. I have on several occasions, while this Bill has been under discussion, urged strongly my views in favour of real control by the local administration, and I may point out that both the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Bridgeton Division of Glasgow have by their arguments also favoured some such local control, while they are not in favour of the particular proposition now before the Committee. What I have to say is that I do not accept this suggestion of a plébiscite as in any sense a substitute for a real local control. In the first place, a plébiscite such as has been suggested would give no real local control and would involve no responsibility on the part of the Local Authority. Then there remains the question: Will it give us any what he called moral security against repudiation? The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary has pointed out that in no form have hon. Members seriously suggested that any such moral security would be afforded. I am really surprised that the hon. Gentleman the Member for West Belfast, with his practical acquaintance with the subject, should suggest that there should be at intervals a plébiscite taken on the question whether or not the cash guarantees should be suspended. How is that possible? Under the first plébiscite you may have had a decision as a result of which you may have used up a considerable portion of the contingent part of the Guarantee Fund. And, by a subsequent plébiscite, it may be decided that this portion shall not be used. But what is to become of that portion which has been used and for which the guarantee has already been exhausted?

MR. SEXTON: The right hon. Gentleman entirely misapprehends my suggestion. The idea is to give the locality an opportunity, after a time, of suspending the operation of the Bill. But all the liabilities incurred under the authority of the first plébiscite would be accepted and have to be duly met.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: That shows the extreme inconvenience of discussing a proposition, the terms of which we have not before us. The hon. Member said nothing about providing for liabilities already incurred at the time of the suspension, which he suggests may take place some time after the Guarantee Fund had been drawn upon. Although the hon. Member for West Belfast may think he has by his proposal obtained a moral security, other hon. Members from Ireland may say that, as the locality had no sufficient option as to allowing the Bill to be enforced in the first instance, there is consequently no moral security. On both grounds, therefore—i.e., that there is no real local control and no effective moral security—the proposal is worthless, and if it is pressed to a Division I shall vote against it.

*(552.) MR. KNOX: When we vote in favour of the Amendment of the hon. Member for North Meath we do so with a view rather to the suggestion of the hon. Member for West Belfast. I think the hon. Member will admit that the form of his Amendment is not really applicable to a suspensory veto; it is only applicable to a veto taken once for all, either before the Bill commenced to operate or at some later stage before the contingent portion of the Guarantee Fund is involved. The Amendment really scarcely raises the question of a suspensory veto, which alone, as we think, is of no real value. It was designed before the hon. Member had any idea of a suspensory veto. Therefore, in supporting the Amendment, I do so not on account of its wording or apparent object, but for the indirect object which I gather from the speeches of the hon. Members for Cork and North Meath is involved in it. I take it that the hon. Members have adopted the idea of a suspensory veto which was first suggested by the hon. Member for West Belfast. I am glad to find that they have, for it is infinitely preferable to any other laid before the Committee; failing any direct control by a Local Representative Body. I think the Committee is greatly indebted to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bridgeton for having called us back from mere question of political ethics—a shadowy, if not shady subject—to the more practical question of what can be gained by a suspensory veto. I venture to think that the Chief Secretary misunderstood the advantages which we thought might be gained. If the prices were too high, or if the landlords in a given county would only sell at a price which the farmers of the county thought unsafe, surely the farmers of that county ought to be in a position to say there shall be no further sales until the landlords consent to more reasonable terms. We do not ask that the farmers should be able to enforce what terms they choose on the landlord; but we think they should be able to prevent sales on terms unsafe and unfair to the mass of the people in the county. That is one object in putting forward the idea of a suspensory veto, and surely the hon. Member for South Tyrone, who is in favour of sales to the tenants at fair prices, will not oppose this Amendment.

(5.57.) MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.): The hon. Member has put the matter more plainly than did the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bridgeton. I oppose all these schemes of local control, not because they are bad in theory, but because—to use the words of the right hon. Member for Newcastle—"things are as they are in Ireland." I oppose these schemes on the plain ground that it is proposed by them to put into the hands of one of the parties to a bargain the power of forcing terms upon the other party, giving them the right to regulate the price of land or stop the operation of the Bill.

(5.59.) MR. MAHONY: My hon. Friend the Member for West Cavan was slightly in error when he stated that I adopted the idea of a suspensory veto from the hon. Member for West Belfast. At an earlier stage of the proceedings in this Committee when we were discussing an Amendment by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle I said, in alluding to the scheme of a plébiscite put forward by the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary, that it would be greatly improved by allowing it to be revived after the Bill had been in operation for some time. It appears to me that the Committee have strayed from the vital point at issue, which is this: Under this Bill, about one-third, roughly speaking, of the tenant farmers in Ireland may be able to purchase, and the other two-thirds, together with the ratepayers of Ireland generally, will have their rates pledged in order to guarantee the payment by the purchasing farmers of their annuities, and that pledge is taken without their consent being asked. The Irish Members, or rather the vast majority of them, have not signified their consent to the rates being pledged; they deny that they are in a position to give consent, and it is only because the right hon. Gentleman has at his back a majority of English Members that he is able to impose this guarantee on the Irish people. We ask that before this guarantee is enforced in its worst form the Irish ratepayers should be allowed to express their assent or dissent. There is one point which I think the Committee do not appreciate, and it is this, that when we come to the contingent portion of the Guarantee Fund it cannot be drawn upon until the Lord Lieutenant has made a special levy on the taxpayers of the county. We want before that levy falls on them that they shall have an opportunity of expressing their assent or dissent. It has been stated that this will give them no control over the Land Commission. I do not propose by this Amendment to give them any such control; I only say that they should be allowed to exercise the plébiscite after they have had an opportunity of judging how the Act is working; and if they find the Land Commission, by not seeing there is sufficient security in the holdings for the amount advanced, are endangering the rates and property of the county, they may be able to suspend the further operation of the Act. I shall with that object press the Amendment to a Division.

(6.3.) The Committee divided:—Ayes 114; Noes 187.—(Div. List, No. 170.)

(6.16.) MR. SEXTON: It is provided in the clause that when a charge is made upon the contingent guarantee a notice shall be sent to that effect, and interest at 4 per cent. shall be paid from the date of the notice. I think it would be enough to pay a rate of interest equal to that at which the country can borrow. I move to reduce the interest to $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent.

Amendment proposed, in page 4, line 17, to leave out "four," and insert "two and three quarters."—(Mr. Sexton.)

Question proposed, "That 'four' stand part of the Question."

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The annuities, in respect of which the Guarantee Fund is to be called upon, have interest paid upon them; and if the Treasury are to meet all the charges that will be thrown upon them they must charge 4 per cent. I do not know whether it might not be possible to substitute $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent.

MR. SEXTON: There is no reason why the interest should not be the same as is charged upon an annuity.

If the right hon. Gentleman will turn to Clause 1, Sub-section 3, he will find that where the Land Purchase Fund is insufficient there will be a temporary advance out of the Consolidated Fund.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Yes; I believe I was wrong.

(6.20.) THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square): We must have some regard to the Consolidated Fund. It is, of course, impossible to say at what rate we may have to borrow, and it must be remembered that we are paying all the expense of the carrying out of the Act. If I may say so, I think the State is acting with extreme generosity, and I hardly think hon. Members ought to be desirous of cutting down the expenses.

MR. SEXTON: I do not wish to be too severe on the Consolidated Fund, but will the right hon. Gentleman consider who they are who have to pay this money. They are the people who have not been able to buy under the Act, and the shopkeepers and artisans who have no personal interest in land purchase. I am willing to meet the right hon. Gentleman quarter-way, and I would suggest 3 per cent., which will allow a substantial margin.

MR. FLYNN (Cork, N.): Surely the Consolidated Fund is not to be treated as if it were a bill-broker. The Chancellor of the Exchequer is surely not going to charge the unfortunate artisan or shopkeeper such a rate of interest as 4 per cent. The most that should be required is that the Consolidated Fund should be repaid the sum with the ordinary interest.

MR. GOSCHEN: Well, we will accept the compromise suggested.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment proposed, in page 4, line 17, to leave out "four" and insert "three."—(Mr. Sexton.)

Agreed to.

Verbal Amendments agreed to.

(6.27.) MR. SEXTON: The next Amendment I have to move is one which I think the Government cannot hesitate to accept. If the Treasury give the Lord Lieutenant notice in May, there will be no Assizes till the following year, and the County Surveyor will not be able to pay the levy for a year. Under the clause as it stands it will be open to the Treasury, under such circumstances, to pounce on the Guarantee Fund and derange the whole Public Service of the country in regard to the most necessary and fundamental institutions. I do not suppose the Treasury would do this, but there is no reason why the clause should be left in such a condition that it will be possible to do it. The object of my Amendment is to give time for payment.

Amendment proposed.

In page 4, line 26, at end, to insert, "Provided that the Treasury shall not order any such payment to be made out of the contingent portion of the fund, until, at least, one week after the date appointed by the Lord Lieutenant in his requisition to the secretary of the grand jury of any county concerned, for payment by the county treasurer into the Local Taxation (Ireland) Account as hereinafter provided."—(Mr. Sexton.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

(6.28.) MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am not sure that the object of the hon. Gentleman would be carried out by this Amendment. Any money advanced by the Treasury will be paid for at the interest just agreed upon of 3 per cent., and they will have no motive for shortening the time during which the interest shall run. The mention of "one week," might be treated as a suggestion to be acted upon in all cases.

(6.30.) MR. SEXTON: I think there is some danger that with the guarantee so temptingly to hand, the Department may come down upon the money, and it is desirable that there should be some remedy provided for the danger, and against the Public Service being put to such inconvenience.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I do not think there is anything to be gained by it. As the hon. Gentleman is aware, the Treasury and the Chancellor of the Exchequer must act in harmony with the Irish Government in such matters, and the stopping of the various grants would not be governed by red tape, the action of officials would be subject to the responsible Parliamentary heads. I do not think there need be the least apprehension of the Treasury anticipating the time when the Guarantee Fund should be appropriated.

(6.31.) Mr. T. M. HEALY: There should be something in the nature of a tribunal of appeal outside the Government Department to which the county to be mulcted might refer. The Treasury may make mistakes, and it would be safer to accept some such machinery as is suggested by my hon. Friend. At some stage of the proceedings there should be this appeal. The Lord Lieutenant will have nothing to do but order the payment, and the Grand Jury will have no option but must make the levy. From the Treasury in London through the Lord Lieutenant to the county there is a cast iron rigidity. This unfettered official power has done much mischief in Ireland. I hope the right hon. Gentleman will consider something in the nature of a reference to a body before whom arguments may be used, and representations made.

(6.32.) Mr. SEXTON: Really the clause takes all discretion from the Treasury, it provides that the Treasury shall send the notice to the Lord Lieutenant, and tell him that by a certain date he must pay the sum necessary, and failing this payment the Treasury shall order such sum and interest to be paid to the Guarantee Fund out of the contingent portion of the fund. They must take it no matter how inconvenient for the Public Service. If the right hon. Gentleman will not accept this Amendment, which I think important, will he consent to a provision that the Treasury shall not name an earlier day than two months from the date of the next Assizes?

(6.33.) Mr. A. J. BALFOUR: That suggestion is a reasonable one. It is the intention of the clause, and the object of the levy, to prevent the contingent guarantee being drawn upon, and if the Treasury were to go upon the guarantee before the levy was made, that object would be defeated. I do not conceive that any such course would be approved by the Treasury, but I am ready to introduce words to make that impossible. As to the suggestion that there should be some tribunal to act as buffer, I think it might be advisable, in regard to such questions as the partition of charges between counties and matters of that sort, that there should be an appeal to the absolute discretion of the Lord Lieutenant; but in the matter of the security of the Treasury, I do not think an appeal to the High Court or Privy Council would be right or proper. But as to the Treasury having no power to come upon the guarantee until the Lord Lieutenant has asked for the collection of the rate, I am quite prepared to accept such an Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

(6.34.) Mr. SEXTON: I have an Amendment to propose to the beginning of the next sub-section which does not appear on the Paper. The Chief Secretary surprised me when he said a compulsory presentment should never be confided to an Elective Authority. Why not, provided you vest in a Judge of Assize the power to make an order? It does not matter whether the Local Authority is elective or not, so long as you say the Judge of Assize has that power to make an order. There is no discernible principle in saying that an Elective Authority should not have the power to consider a presentment. There can be no harm in their having it before them, providing you guard the compulsory nature of the presentment by referring it in the last resort to the Judge of Assize. I dissent from the proposition that a purely elective body should not have this function, nor do I see any more difficulty in the proceeding than in the present system. In the remarks of the right hon. Gentleman I find the suggestion that even after the establishment of County Councils the Grand Jury may have to deal with presentments of this class. We have assumed that the fiscal functions of the Grand Jury will pass to the County Councils when these are constituted, and that the Grand Jury will be simply a body to deal with affairs of criminal administration. I now move my Amendment, in order to extract an opinion from the right hon. Gentleman whether he really means that after County Councils are established in Ireland the functions of the Grand Jury in relation to presentments of this class shall continue. I propose that the third sub-section shall apply only until County Government is established in Ireland, and this will be an indication that when the time comes for considering Local Government in Ireland, these fiscal functions should be drawn from the Grand Jury, and should devolve upon the County Council. I can see no reason why a presentment of this kind should be withheld from the view of an Elective Body, power to pass it being still with the Judge of Assize.

Amendment proposed,

In page 4, line 27, before the first word "The," to insert the words "Until otherwise provided by an Act for the extension of Local Government in Ireland."—(Mr. Sexton.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

(6.37.) MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I understand the hon. Member moves this in order to elicit from me an explanation of a speech I made last night, and I have no objection to explain the words I used. I stated, and as I think truly, that if you are looking for an instrument to carry out a mandate you do not look in the direction of a Representative Body. In carrying out a compulsory presentment the Grand Jury act as a mere machine interposed between the mandate of the Judge and the levy of the tax; they have no discretion, they can offer no opinion, or at all events no opinion that would be considered by the Judge, they are merely the mechanism by which the tax is collected. Now, surely the hon. Gentleman will agree that if you are looking for such a machine you do not go to a Representative Body—the essence, the value, the virtue of which is that it can and does discuss and express opinions upon the matters before it. It is the very worst body in the world to act as an automatic machine between the fiat of the Judge and an administrative act. I therefore adhere to the general view I laid down last night, saying nothing of Local Government, but that you will not look to an Elective Body called into existence under it as the most proper machine to carry out business on which that Elective Body is not to be consulted at all. Whether it is proper or not to have a consultative body, or to allow consultation on these presentments, is a question I need not decide now, but I may observe that if you do allow such discussion and there is to be no decision issuing from it, it is but a vain exhibition of dialectical and oratorical skill.

MR. SEXTON: It might lead to a reform of the law, for instance.

Mr. Sexton

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: That is to say that when an order is made under the Bill the Council may discuss it and act in such a manner as to compel an alteration of the law in regard to compulsory presentments?

MR. SEXTON: No.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: It is not with such a view County Councils should be invested with these functions. There is a special convenience in leaving this matter to the Grand Jury, because they, in the ordinary course of business, have to meet the Judge in whom the compulsory power is vested. The Grand Jury meet the Judge of Assize, and act in concert with him, and if you take this duty from the Grand Jury then you must compel the County Council to meet the Judge, and make that body the passive instrument for carrying out an action of which they possibly may heartily disapprove. I cannot conceive how anyone anxious to give authority and dignity to County Councils can wish to invest them with this function of a Grand Jury which certainly will not add lustre to such a Representative Body.

(6.42.) MR. J. MORLEY: Surely when the right hon. Gentleman says there is no example of a compulsory levy being committed to a Representative Body he forgets one incident. I remember that in 1883 or 1884, after extra police had been sent into Limerick, an order was made upon the Corporation of that town to levy an extra rate to meet the expenses of this Force. The Lords Lieutenants of both parties found the greatest difficulty in getting that extra rate, and, as a matter of fact, it never was paid. That surely is an exact illustration of a compulsory order being made upon a Representative Body. It is not a very encouraging precedent I know, but it shows the kind of difficulty you will have to meet when you force upon a locality an extraordinary levy through a body which is not representative, and in every sense unpopular. I suppose the hon. Member for West Belfast wishes the Committee to insert this provision because he foresees the enormous difficulty that will beset these new County Councils when created, if this power is going to be entrusted to an outside body, as it were, over their heads. It is so obviously consistent with all we ought to expect in Representative Government that I support the Amendment.

(6.44.) MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The right hon. Gentleman appears to me to have given the most cogent argument against the Amendment when he cited the incident in regard to the City of Limerick. The Corporation of Limerick were ordered by mandamus to collect the extra police rate, and they did not do so. They refused to obey the law, and there was no power to compel them to do so; but if, under the existing law, the Grand Jury were ordered to levy a tax and did not do it the Judge would levy it for them.

MR. T. M. HEALY: No; he provides the presentment, that is all.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am not an expert in these technicalities, and must leave my right hon. Friend (Mr. Madden) to explain details; but as we desire the Bill to be framed it would not be left to the discretion of the Grand Jury or any Local Authority whether the tax should be raised or not. If there were any such discretion the security for the Treasury provided in the Bill by the guarantee would become worthless. In the view of the framers of the Bill it should not be left to the Local Authority to determine whether the tax should be raised. It is to be raised independent of all local control, and the proceeds are to be paid to the contingent portion of the fund; or, rather, are to be used to prevent the contingent portion of the fund being touched. That could not be carried out if we adopted the precedent in the Limerick case, and if the Bill does that it must be amended. We believe the machinery of the Bill is adequate for the security, and the responsibility of the Grand Jury is that the tax shall be raised.

(6.46.) MR. T. M. HEALY: The right hon. Gentleman has been singularly unfortunate in his statements of law and statements of fact. There is nothing in this clause differing in any way from the ordinary case of a police rate levy.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Hear, hear!

MR. T. M. HEALY: Very well. Let me take the right hon. Gentleman's proposition. When you want the rate paid to whom do you issue a precept? In the case of Dublin, Limerick, Waterford, and other places, when you want your tax raised, how do you get it?

How does the Government collect from Dublin nearly £60,000 a year, for the Police Force? By precept on the Local Authority, in the very same way as that my hon. Friend the Member for West Belfast proposes. Similarly, in the City of Limerick, how is the extra police rate levied? By precept. In the County of Clare you make up £5,000 a year for a period of 10 years for extra police, and how is that £50,000 taken from the county? By precept. What is the case in England and for your School Boards here; how does the School Board collect its rates in English towns? It sends a precept to the Municipality, and the Local Municipality collects the rates. The right hon. Gentleman has a broad method of laying down a proposition which is all very well in philosophical writing, but in the House of Commons he should be a little more cautious. The method of raising the rate in Ireland has been in force since the Statute of William IV., and here is proposed no difference in principle though a difference in persons. We are asking nothing whatever from the right hon. Gentleman. His clause provides that the Lord Lieutenant should send to the Grand Jury a precept—for that is practically what it is—and if the Grand Jury do not act on that, action is taken by the Judge. Cannot the Lord Lieutenant and cannot the Judge proceed in the same manner whether the Local Authority is the Grand Jury or the County Council? Where is the difference in principle? Suppose the Grand Jury of the County of Limerick did what the Corporation of Limerick did, saying, "We do not care twopence for the fiat; it is only waste paper."

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Hear, hear!

MR. T. M. HEALY: The right hon. Gentleman cheers that. Well, if it is treated as so much waste paper, what you want is machinery for collection; and the right hon. Gentleman says he will amend the Bill to prevent the action of the County of Limerick imitating the action of the Corporation of Limerick. Into what bog, what quagmire, has he now sprung? Will he set up in every city and county an Imperial means of collection? Will he sit at the receipt of custom, or are we to understand that, as Local Authorities are not to be trusted, some new scheme is to be developed under the Bill for collection by the Royal Irish Constabulary, in the same way as fines under Quarter Sessions and Petty Sessions convictions? Will he provide that the collection shall be made by the Constabulary, as in the case of the estreated recognizances of Messrs Dillon and O'Brien? Will the same easy and forcible method of collection be resorted to to make good cases of default under this Bill as is adopted in the case of persons who do not make their appearance before a Coercion Court? Will that carry out the intention of Her Majesty's Government? Under the present arrangements you make an order on the Grand Jury, and in any case the Judge's fiat will be required, and he hands that to the Treasurer of the Grand Jury, and the collectors have to collect. But are you going to set up two systems of local and Imperial collection? When you set up County Councils are you going to withhold, from the control of those bodies the collection of rates? Are you going to have Grand Jury collectors and County Council collectors? When the new system of County Government is instituted, I cannot see how you can deny to the new authority control over the collection of the rates.

(6.52.) MR. A. J. BALFOUR: There is a question of substance as well as of machinery on this point. The Bill should be so drawn that whatever may be the view of the Grand Jury or the successor to the Grand Jury, the County Council, or any other body, there should be no option for that body but to levy the rate in order to save the Guarantee Fund. That is what the Bill is intended to carry out and I believe will carry out now.

MR. T. M. HEALY: The Amendment of my hon. Friend would leave the matter exactly where it was, with this difference, that it would express the view that after County Government is established in Ireland there should not be an Imperial rate collection and a local rate collection.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: In the Bill I introduced last year I contemplated the contingency which has been discussed this evening, and I then had a suspicion, or an idea crossed my mind that possibly the machinery of compulsory presentment under extraordinary circumstances might not be sufficient, and therefore I adopted a provision from the Crimes

Act of right hon. Gentlemen opposite, the power of the Lord Lieutenant to levy a tax by his own machinery. Of course I do not intend to discuss the merits of that provision now, but if any hon. Member wishes to investigate it I refer him to Section 19 of the Crimes Act of 1882, and in Clause 14 he will see how it was embodied in the Bill of last year—this power to levy a penal rate. Practically the Lord Lieutenant was allowed to appoint his own collectors.

MR. T. M. HEALY: A most wasteful system; it led to a scandalous waste of money.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I trust the time may never come when such a power may have to be put into force, but in the opinion of right hon. Gentlemen opposite it was necessary to provide a special mode of collecting a tax, and this was embodied in their Act of 1882. It has been dropped out of the present Bill because I was advised that probably the existing ordinary means of presentment were sufficient, and also, because if hon. Gentlemen will look at the end of the sub-section we are discussing the Treasury is given a lien upon every rate collected by the Local Authority. This seemed to me a sufficient security, but if the result of this discussion is to excite a suspicion, that by the refusal of the Local Authority, whether County Council or Grand Jury to obey the mandate of the Judge, some difficulty will be thrown in the way of the collection of the tax, then I will carefully consider the subject with my right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General for Ireland, and see whether it is advisable to re-introduce the provision in regard to this point which appeared in the Bill of last year.

(7.0.) MR. SEXTON: The object with which I moved my Amendment was to give an indication, that when Local Government is extended to Ireland and County Councils are established, then this compulsory presentment should no longer remain with the Grand Jury. I am not contesting the power to be given to the Judge, and that power may remain in the hands of anyone with whom it is proper to deposit it, but I say the presentment should be in the first instance presented to the County Council; and though it is compulsory and may not be popular to the Council as the County Authority, it should be submitted.

SIR J. M'KENNA (Monaghan, S.): May I ask is it quite in order that we should now discuss the functions of County Councils not yet established, and is it not premature and useless to contemplate their possible position in respect to the machinery of this Bill?

(7.5.) The Committee divided:—Ayes 87; Noes 146.—(Div. List, No. 171.)

(7.19.) MR. SEXTON: I now move to omit the words providing that a sum shall be raised—

“which upon any adjustment under this Act of a charge between the counties is charged against a county in excess of the share of the county in the cash portion of the Guarantee Fund.”

There is no case to which these words can apply which is not covered by the earlier portions of the clause. The words mean nothing and correspond with no effect which could here arise. The share of the county in the cash portion of the Guarantee Fund has been taken away, and nothing remains that could be liable, but the share of the county in the contingent portion of the Guarantee Fund which has been dealt with elsewhere.

Amendment proposed, in page 4, to leave out lines 28, 29, and 30.—(Mr. Sexton.)

Question proposed, “That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause.”

(7.21.) MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I think the words are necessary to meet the case of a mistake made before and not discovered until after the adjustment. The words were carefully considered, and I think our experience in off-hand drafting has not been particularly happy. I would suggest, therefore, that the words should be left unchanged. They will be much more likely to carry out the view we entertain than any words which could be suggested across the Table of the House.

Question put, and agreed to.

(7.22.) MR. T. M. HEALY: I beg to move in page 4, line 31, after “upon,” to insert “the poor rate of each Poor Law Union situate wholly or partly within.” The object of this, with other Amendments consequent upon it, is to substitute the poor rate for the county cess in levying taxes on the counties under the Bill. The Amendments raise two points—first, the area of charge (with which I will deal later on), and, secondly, the divisibility of charge, which is the more immediate object of the present Amendment. As to the area, the right hon. Gentleman referred a short time ago to the “Blood Tax.” That, of course, was a very infamous charge, but in the matter of delimitation, even the “Blood Tax” was more equitable than that of the right hon. Gentleman, for that was limited to the area immediately surrounding the spot where the murder was committed. The Lord Lieutenant, for instance, in the case of a murder committed at Youghal in the county of Cork, could draw a ring round the Barony in which Youghal is situated, and fix his tax on that division. In the case of the right hon. Gentleman's Bill, however, the tax must go over the entire county. As to the divisibility of the charge, since the Land Act of 1870, in every new tenancy it has been divided equally between owner and occupier, and it has been felt an enormous burden by the Irish people that not only are they prevented from having any representation on the Grand Jury, but that the gentlemen who assess the tax and the landlords of the county pay none of the rates. In the case of the poor rate it is entirely different. The poor rate was instituted long after the Grand Jury rate, the latter having been settled in the reign of William and the former in the reign of Victoria. When in the 30's or 40's the Legislature first began to consider the question of the poor rate it was thought only natural that it should be divided between the landlord and the occupier. Not only is the poor rate divisible between owner and occupier, but in cases of under £4 valuation it is payable by the landlord. It may be said that as the landlords have created all the poverty in Ireland, it is only fair that this should be so; but I do not think that when the provision was made the House of Commons was awayed by the sins of the landlords: it must have acted upon some general principle. The landlords form one-half of the Boards, the remaining half of those being elected. In the case of the county rate, the Body which assesses it is selected by the Sheriff at his own sweet will, the Sheriff being in turn selected by the Lord Lieutenant. The Sheriff's practice is to take two men from each barony, and they fix what rates they please. The result used to be that whenever a landlord wanted an avenue made up to his house, or a road made round his domain, it was paid for out of the county rate. Lately a sharper look-out has been kept, and these things have been prevented. Up to 1870 the rate was payable solely by the occupier. In 1870 Parliament established an innovation whereby it was provided that in the case of every new tenancy half the rate should be borne by the owner and half by the occupier. This was the action taken by Parliament in dealing with the case of a new cess, and I challenge the Government to show me an instance in which a new cess, in the case of a Private Bill, unless it was a Railway Bill, was thrown on the county without being divided between the owner and the occupier. In the case of the Tramways (Ireland) Act, no doubt it is not so, technically, but it is, in fact, being divided between the Treasury and the tenant. The series of Amendments I have put down provide that the machinery of the Poor Law shall be employed for delimiting the area, and in addition they provide machinery whereby the rate is divisible between owner and occupier. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary says it is right that in towns like Lurgan, Kilkenny, and Waterford the ratepayers should provide their local contributions to the Guarantee Fund. That may be so, and I assume the right hon. Gentleman's proposition is correct, viewing the matter in the light of a system of insurance. But why are the landlords left out of this insurance? Why is this burden to fall on every labourer who pays his 1s. a week for his miserable cottage and on every artisan who for his fever-stricken room in a town has to pay 4s. or 5s. a week, whilst the landlord escapes from it, although in the case of the poor rate, from which the labourer or the artisan may in his old age derive some advantage, the landlord has to pay half? If this were a Bill to provide £100,000,000 for the redemption of the landlords I could understand the action of the Government in throwing the entire charge on the county rate. But the Bill only provides £30,000,000, so that a large proportion of these gentlemen will still have to continue at their trade of rent-collecting and rack-renting. That being so, why should not those of the landlords who remain continue to be made to pay some amount of the county rate? I will give the strongest of all reasons for the proposition I make to the Committee. Probably if there is any strike against this new levy or against the repayment to the Treasury it will arise from some local agitation created by the tenants of some rack-renting landlord whom they have been unable to buy out because of his exorbitant demands. The sympathy that may be generated in the district may spread to the next locality, and the people there may be roused—I do not say it is likely—to repudiate for a year or half a year their re-payment of the purchase money. It is in my opinion desirable that the landlords should know that if there be repudiation they, as citizens of the country, will be as much interested in the question as the tenants. If the Government are unable to accept the poor rate as the rate from which the Treasury is to be recouped, at any rate let them adopt some system whereby the rate shall be divided between the owner and the occupier. My Amendment would give the landlords a temptation to adopt the purchase policy. Local Government in Ireland is in such a defective condition that you must resort either to the machinery of the Poor Law or to that of the county.

Amendment proposed,

In page 4, line 31, after the word "upon," to insert the words "the poor rate of each Poor Law Union situate wholly or partly within."—(Mr. T. M. Healy.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

(7.35.) Mr. A. J. BALFOUR: It will be noted that, whatever else can be said against our scheme, it is not open to the objection that the discretion with regard to levying the rate is vested in a local, but non-representative body, because undoubtedly the rate will be levied at the discretion of the Treasury. Therefore, such objection as there may be to the Grand Jury on the ground that they are not elected falls to the ground.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I did not argue that point.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The hon. and learned Member dilated at considerable length on the injustice of giving power to levy rates to those who were not elected. However, if the hon. and learned Member does not urge that point, far be it from me to take up the time of the House with it. The hon. and learned Member said that before 1870 the rates were divided between the owner and the occupier. He must be aware that now nearly the whole of the county cess is levied not on the owner but on the occupier. The hon. and learned Member attempted to show that the framers of the Tramways (Ireland) Bill deliberately threw on the Treasury the rate that should have been borne by the landlord, but those who drafted that Bill are present in the House at this moment, and I should be surprised if they admitted that the reason why they burdened the Treasury was that the landlord should not bear a charge he ought to have borne. I will postpone my remarks on the point which I understand the hon. and learned Member proposes to raise by means of a subsequent Amendment. The hon. and learned Gentleman says that we should select, of the two rates we have to choose from in fixing upon our machinery, the Poor Law instead of the county cess. I have decidedly come to the conclusion that we ought to take the opposite course. In the first place, the area of the Poor Law election is a most inconvenient area, considering that the county at large will be the area charged, and besides that the hon. Gentleman must recollect that it is not a complete or accurate statement of the incidence of the poor rate to say it is divided between the owner and the occupier. In districts where almost all the holdings are below £4 the burden will fall almost entirely on the owner. The landlords do not escape, as the hon. Member appears to suppose; on the contrary, unless the default reaches a proportion which could only be caused by a general strike against payment the landlord would lose. If there should be a general strike against the payment of annuities, it would be part of an agrarian movement of which the landlords would not be the authors, and to make them the victims of such a conspiracy would be grossly unjust on the face of it. For these reasons I cannot consent to the proposal of the hon. Gentleman to transfer this tax from the county cess to the poor rate, of which the greater part is paid by those who would be the victims of such a conspiracy as would alone render it possible that the contingent portion of the fund should be touched.

*(7.45.) SIR G. TREVELYAN: Sir, in 1884 the Government to which I belonged brought in a Purchase Bill, the machinery of which nobody more than the right hon. Gentleman will confess was exceedingly well devised. It was that Bill which first put before the world the system of cheap and easy transfer of land, which has been embodied in subsequent land legislation. A conclusion arrived at in regard to that measure was that the guarantee ought to be on the county cess, and not on the poor rate. But under that Bill it was proposed that, seeing that both the landlord and tenant would benefit alike, the cess required to meet the deficiencies should be divided between the tenant and the owner. It likewise was stated in my speech introducing the Bill that it would be unjust that the district should be burdened with a liability which it had no voice in accepting, and provisions were introduced to make that voice effectual. I am certain that it would be possible to devise a county cess, and an hon. Member has an Amendment down which will carry out that object. The arguments of the right hon. Gentleman are not convincing as to the desirability of placing the entire responsibility on the tenant. Two great classes of the agricultural community are benefited by the measure, and the liabilities and the disagreeables of the measure ought to fall on both classes alike. I agree that the poor rate is in itself a cumbrous and awkward method of securing this joint liability, but I firmly believe that it is perfectly practical, as it is entirely just, to resort to the project of dividing the county cess.

(7.52.) MR. MACARTNEY (Antrim, N.): It is not accurate to state that the Grand Jury are not representative of the cesspayer. The Grand Jury, though not an elected body, consist in every county of the largest cesspayers, who are very often landlords. Therefore, under the clause as it stands, the landlords will bear a large proportion of the liability as cesspayers. I cannot imagine why they should bear the liability at all. The liability arises entirely on the part of the tenant. The hon. Member proposes to substitute the complex machinery of the Poor Law for the comparatively simple proposal of the Bill, which is drafted to meet the circumstances of each county separately, and to introduce the Poor Law element would be to complicate the whole matter. I cannot conceive on the ground of convenience why the House should for one moment assent to the Amendment of the hon. and learned Gentleman.

(7.55.) MR. T. M. HEALY: The object of the Amendment is to secure divisibility of rating between the owner and the occupier. The hon. and learned Gentleman states that the landlords are large cesspayers. Has he ever heard of a landlord named Clanricarde, in Galway? How much land has he in occupation? But that is only one case. The country is absenteeed all over, and that is sufficient reason for saying that the landlords are not large cesspayers. I should be content to drop my proposal with regard to the Poor Law, if the Government will agree to adopt some limited area of charge. Why is the urban tenant to be saddled and the landlord to go free? Although the Amendment is not in the form in which I should prefer, I say its adoption would prove very advantageous, as I assert that under the Bill as it at present stands, it will be an enormous hardship (aggravated seriously in the case of urban tenants) to enforce payment of a rate as to the imposition of which the people have never been consulted.

(8.1.) MR. SEXTON: I submit with some confidence that it can be shown that principles of equity and public policy demand the adoption of the Amendment of my hon. Friend. This is not a mere question of machinery, and such a consideration ought not to be allowed to stand in the way. If it be desired to raise money by means of the poor rate instead of by means of the county cess, nothing could be easier than to make an adjustment between Poor Law Unions which overlap from one county into another. The real question is: Is it equitable or desirable as a matter of public policy that these burdens should be levied on the poor rate. Deal with it first as a matter of equity. Who is it that is asking for the Bill? It is not the tenants; it is the landlords, one-third of whom are in such financial straits that they cannot hold on without this relief.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I absolutely deny the accuracy of the assertion.

MR. SEXTON: Then, this is a most remarkable instance of the entire separation of cause and effect. I again assert that one-third of the Irish landlords are in a bad way financially. It is a most happy coincidence that while they are in that condition the Chief Secretary should take it into his head to introduce this Bill, which will help them out of their troubles, and enable them to sell their estates to their tenants. They have no other means of selling their estates.

MR. MACARTNEY: We do not want to.

MR. SEXTON: Whatever may be the case in Ulster, we know that in other parts of Ireland the landlords are simply panting to sell, while the tenants are not very eager to buy. Why, we know that in the North the London Companies and other great landlords simply rushed forward to avail themselves of the opportunity of selling under the Ashbourne Act. The Chief Secretary is now giving the Irish landlords a market for their land. It will be a great advantage to them without any corresponding advantage to the purchasing tenants. The benefit will be very slight to the latter; and seeing how enormous the advantage will be to the landlord, I say that in common equity the landlord should be asked to bear a share of any resulting liability. How can any reasonable man allege that it is tolerable to throw his liability on farmers who have paid their money to the State. Why, too, should it be thrown on persons living in towns? Why should all this be done for the sake of a fraction of a fraction? The purchasing farmers will constitute but a fraction of the whole body of farmers on whom, however, the liability is to be thrown. The only way to make this plan tolerable, would be to make any ultimate burden fall on the classes mainly concerned—the selling landlord and the purchasing tenant. The Chief Secretary said the land would suffer when the cash portion of the Guarantee Fund was appropriated in case of default. I think he went so far as to say that the loss would fall equally on the poor rate and the county cess.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: What I said was that, as the Bill was now drawn, any loss will fall on a fund which is in part paid by the landlords.

MR. SEXTON: Yes, so far as they contribute to the poor rate; but while 500,000 or 600,000 tenants pay that rate, only 7,000 or 8,000 landlords have to contribute to it. No doubt, when the cash portion of the Guarantee Fund is drawn upon for the default, it means that the amount is withdrawn from the counties, and there has to be an increased levy, which falls upon the poor rates and upon the landlord; consequently, so far, he contributes to that rate. But he only has to pay in respect of holdings under £4 annual value, and such holdings constitute but one portion of the agricultural valuation. As a matter of fact, when the cash portion is come upon, the landlord will only suffer to the extent of one-fourth as against the payment by the tenants of three-fourths. Why should there be this disparity of treatment? Why should a distinction be drawn between the cash portion and the contingent portion? Will the Chief Secretary favour a proposal to establish a parity of treatment as between the two portions of this fund? Seeing that in the cash portion he divides the loss between landlord and tenant, will he do so with regard to the contingent portion? The right hon. Gentleman very often refers to an imaginary strike. He says that if ever there is a call upon the contingent fund it will be caused by a strike against the payment of the annuities. I am not so sure of that. He contends, however, that in such a case no liability should be thrown on the landlords. But is it not the fact that the landlords generally impose hard bargains on the tenants?

MR. MACARTNEY: They cannot do that under this Bill.

MR. SEXTON: Why not?

MR. MACARTNEY: The bargain will be imposed by the Land Commission.

MR. SEXTON: Not at all. The Land Commission will only have to make sure that the value of the landlord's and tenant's interest combined in the holding constitutes a sufficient security for the price charged for the land. I say that by placing any loss through default on the county cess the landlord will be deprived of any inducement to use his moral influence to secure the safe and sound working of the Bill. But if you make the landlords liable to some extent you give them a practical reason for using their influence to prevent hard bargains and to suggest to individual landlords that they should make fair terms with their tenants in order that this liability may not arise. I think the right hon. Gentleman would find that to be a very powerful beneficent influence. If he will establish a parity between the two funds I shall be willing to accept a suggestion that if the liability is thrown on the county cess all occupiers shall pay their share, and as to the "strike" argument I am willing to agree to the insertion of a provision to the effect that if the contingent fund be drawn upon by reason of default through a combination among the tenants against the payment of the annuities, the burden shall in that case fall on the county cess alone.

*(8.15.) MR. T. W. RUSSELL: I believe the majority of the occupiers in Donegal are under £4.

MR. T. M. HEALY: That is not so.

*MR. T. W. RUSSELL: I believe the major portion are, and if part of the burden is thrown on occupiers under £4 the landlords will be responsible for the payment, and those who have caused the default will go absolutely scot free.

MR. T. M. HEALY: We have already said we would assent to a suggestion that all occupiers should pay their share in case of default being made.

(8.16.) MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The hon. Gentleman seems to think that the treatment of this question depends upon the view whether this Bill was brought in to please the landlord or the tenant. Surely that is not a proper spirit in which to approach this Amendment. At any rate, it is necessary to make some observations on the arguments used by

hon. Members opposite, especially as hon. Members are never tired of throwing these particular charges across the floor of the House whenever they wish an Amendment introduced into the Bill. I cannot conceive what foundation there is for the statement of the hon. Gentleman, which has been over and over again denied, that this Bill was introduced by the Government to please the landlords. If it had been, the Government would have failed in their object. The hon. Member for West Belfast asks what the tenants gain by it. If a farm is sold for 20 years' purchase, the tenant will obtain a reduction in his rent of 32 per cent.; but if a landlord sells at 17 years' purchase, he will receive Consols at $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., and for every £100 of income only £60.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Why, then, does he sell?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: If the hon. Gentleman wishes to know why the landlords in the South of Ireland are anxious to sell, while the landlords in the North are not, I will tell him: it is because the tenants in the South do not pay their debts, and the tenants in the North do.

MR. ILLINGWORTH (Bradford, W.): Will the right hon. Gentleman say upon what evidence he bases that assertion? What is the difference between the tenants North and South?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Those in the North are a more sober lot. Those in the South, too, think it more convenient not to pay, but to wait for the time when they will be able to get their land for nothing. The tenant in the North prefers to meet his legal obligations, and is, as a consequence, anxious to buy. Many landlords in the South and West ask, "How can we escape from this country?" because they are being driven out by Members opposite. Those who contend that the landlords are the gainers ignore the whole history of the country for the last 10 years. The agrarian agitators make out that the landlords are debtors to the State; in my opinion, they are really creditors. I allow that the landlord ought not to escape some part of the responsibility of default by the purchasers; nor does he. Under the Bill the landlords bear, I believe, much more than their share of the responsibility. If there is to be default, it is likely to be on a scale of great magnitude, and then the landlords will have to bear their share of the loss of the Probate Duty grant, and, so far as they are occupiers as well as owners, they will have to bear half the county cess, and, above all, the whole of the fifth of the purchase money will be exhausted before the Contingent Fund is touched. I say, therefore, it is unfair to throw upon them the additional burden which would be imposed by the adoption of this Amendment. As to the suggestion of the hon. Gentleman, that he would be quite prepared to bring in a scheme by which the county cess would be divided, I may point out that in addition to the broad objection I have just mentioned, that proposal would throw upon us the burden of inventing a new and complicated assessment. We must, however, take the machinery as we find it.

MR. T. M. HEALY: How about the urban landowners?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Where will the hon. Member draw the line? Will he next try to get in the ground landlords? I must respectfully decline to burden a Bill already sufficiently large and controversial with any superfluous provisions.

(8.23.) MR. MAHONY: The right hon. Gentleman has made a very confusing statement. He said that because the selling landlords had to deposit one-fifth of the purchase money as a guarantee, which fifth would be absorbed before a levy took place, they would have to contribute more than their share in case of default. The right hon. Gentleman forgets that only a very few tenants will be able to purchase under this Bill, and that a comparatively small number of landlords will sell. It is only those who sell who will thus contribute anything in the case of default, whereas you are asking contributions from the whole of the taxpayers of the country. Those taxpayers may be roughly divided into four different classes—landlords, tenants, agricultural labourers, and the urban populations. If you proposed to confine the assessment even to the tenants, it would be unjust, although they are the only people at all likely to join in a combination for the non-payment of the annuities, because there will be a number of tenants who will derive no benefit under the Act. It appears to me a monstrous thing to throw an extra tax like this on the taxpayers, and then refuse to divide it equally between all classes. You choose the county cess in preference to the poor rate, not because it is a more convenient tax to levy, but because it is not divided between occupier and landlord. In the year 1870 this House indicated its opinion that the county cess ought to be divided between landlord and tenant, and on subsequent occasions when this House has put an extra amount on the county cess it has specially directed that the extra levy shall be thus divided.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Not under the Act of 1883.

MR. MAHONY: I was specially referring to the Relief of Distress Act, 1880. I was also thinking of the guarantees given by Grand Juries in the case of railways. I know that in these cases the county cess is divisible between occupier and owner. In Section 14 of the Relief of Distress Act, 1880, there is a special provision for the levy on the county cess to be so divided. The Chief Secretary complained just now that he was asked to introduce into this Bill a cumbersome and complicated method of assessment. I say a sufficient method is already devised in the 14th section of the Act I have just referred to, that it is not cumbersome, and that it works without any difficulty whatsoever. It does not even require an additional ticket to be issued by the cess collector. I do not support that portion of the Amendment which would transfer the levy to the poor rate. I only support the principle that the levy should be divided between landlord and occupier, and I take it that that is the real object of the Amendment. The next Amendment on the Paper is in my name, and if I move it I shall propose to add to it these words—

“Except and so far as that section provides, as regards holdings under £4 valuation the payment of the whole levy shall be by the owner or lessor.”

I want to provide distinctly for a division between the owner and occupier. Is the Chief Secretary prepared to make any concession on this point? If so, he may save discussion on my next Amendment? (8.35.)

(9.1.) Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; House counted, and 40 Members being found present,

*(9.4.) MR. KNOX: The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary, in a remarkable speech made half an hour ago, showed in a way we had never before sufficiently realised how great a benefactor he had been to the tenants of Ireland. We were under the impression derived from speeches we have heard from the Benches opposite that under the strict coercive régime of the right hon. Gentleman rents have been paid in Ireland; but we are told by the Chief Secretary that in the South and West the tenants do not pay their rents. If that be so, if the administration of the right hon. Gentleman has led to this practical result that the tenants do not pay any rents, then I fail to see the necessity for the Bill, for we have arrived at an ideal state of things in the South and West. We can now well understand the speech we read the other day on the text of “more power to the elbow of the right hon. Gentleman?” But I come to the practical parts of the speeches of the right hon. Gentleman and the hon. Member for South Tyrone, and we see that the Bill in this provision aims to do a great injustice to the tenants of Ireland. Throughout the argument of the Chief Secretary, he based his contention, that the landlords should not pay any part other than as occupiers of this rate, on the assertion that if you put half the liability on the landlords you would be removing the loss from the class who had caused the loss. The hon. Member for South Tyrone supposes, and perhaps he is right, that there is no loss which could fall upon the Contingent Guarantee except in case of general combination among purchasers. He argues that the landlords could not prevent that combination, and, therefore, they should not pay the loss. But could the other tenants prevent such a combination? It certainly could not have escaped the minds of the Chief Secretary and the hon. Member for South Tyrone that the tenant purchasers will have to bear the whole of the loss whether we adopt the poor rate or the county cess as the method of raising the money. In either case these men will have to pay the whole of the loss. The hon. Member for South Tyrone said, and I daresay he is right so far as the number of tenants are concerned, that in Donegal the majority of holdings are under £4 valuation. But, in the first place, my hon. Friends the Members for West Belfast and for North Meath have admitted that, so far as tenancies under £4 are concerned, we are ready to waive the point; and though under the Poor Law they have to pay nothing, we say let them pay half. But suppose it were not so, it would not be the case, as the hon. Member for South Tyrone argued, that these tenants in Donegal under £4 valuation would bear none of the loss if this Amendment were accepted, because a large proportion of these tenants would have purchased their holdings under the Bill; and whether you take the county cess or the poor rate levy, the small tenants who have purchased will have to pay their share. I do not object to that. I only want to show that if these combine they will, in case of default, have to bear the whole burden. As between landlords who do not sell, and tenants who do not buy, the burden should be equally distributed. Surely the hon. Member for South Tyrone must know that in many counties there is a very deep feeling of discontent in consequence of extra taxation being levied by the county cess instead of being divided between landlord and tenant. The fact has been referred to that under the Tramways Act of 1883 the burden is not divided between landlord and tenant, and I suppose a very large number of the constituents of the hon. Member—I know many of my constituents do—think that it is a gross injustice that railways should be made under that Act simply for the advantage of landlords, while tenants provide the guarantee. This is a source of grave discontent, and threats have been made to combine against the payment of the county cess.

*MR. T. W. RUSSELL: Not in Tyrone.

*MR. KNOX: I know there is very great discontent there at the tenant farmers having to bear the whole of the burden under the Tramways Act. I have heard that they relied on the belief, vainly of course, that the Parliamentary efforts of the hon. Member for South

Mr. Knox

Tyrone would be directed towards obtaining for them some relief from this burden; but I suppose, if they read an account of to-night's Debate, and find that the hon. Member is in favour of throwing this further burden on the tenants, they will consider whether, if they do not resort to combination, they should not adopt the still more painful step of getting rid of their present Member. Undoubtedly, there have been expressions of great discontent on account of injustice similar to this we are trying to prevent under this Bill. The right hon. Gentleman must see that when a tenant farmer has to pay two rates, one of which is divided and one is not, he must be painfully conscious of the injustice of throwing any fresh burden entirely on the rate of which he has to pay the whole. If it ever does come to pass that this levy has to be made, it will be found almost impossible to collect it. Under the light railways scheme the extra cess in part of my division amounts to 1s. in the £1; but under this Bill there may be an extra cess of 3s. in the £1 in the year, and I say it would be impossible for a Government to levy 3s. in the £1 extra cess if the burden is to fall entirely on the tenant farmer. Combination would inevitably arise against such injustice. I therefore ask the Government, as much in the interest of their own scheme as in the interest of justice, to consent to the Amendment of the hon. Member for Longford or to that of the hon. Member for North Meath, which stands next on the Paper, and make an equitable division of this rate between the landlords and tenants of Ireland.

(9.14.) MR. FLYNN: The Amendment is of such a reasonable character that I cannot understand why the right hon. Gentleman should not accept it except on the principle that he will make no concession at all to hon. Members in this part of the House. Such appears to be the position we are drifting into, and we are forced to the conclusion that there is a determination on the part of the Government not to listen to Irish Members, though they speak with special knowledge of this subject. I invite the attention of the Committee to the words of the Chief Secretary in reference to this Amendment. He said that in framing the Bill he had to consider whether the levy should be thrown upon the poor rate or the county cess, and he decided upon the latter. So that it comes to this: that he, having so decided, the representations of Irish Members are to have no effect. Against this we protest, and shall continue to protest. I congratulate the hon. Member for South Tyrone on the dual rôle he assumes. Sent here as the tenant's representative, he poses as the landlord's advocate. He says a large portion of the county cess is already paid by landlords—

*MR. T. W. RUSSELL: I did not say so. I believe the hon. Member for South Antrim referred to that.

MR. FLYNN: I thought the hon. Member also assented to that proposition; but if I am mistaken, I withdraw the assertion. But whoever made the statement, I am sure that anyone who knows anything of Irish local taxation knows it is not the case that landlords pay any large share of the county cess. Where the landlord farms any portion of his land, he, of course, as occupier, pays the county cess upon that portion, but such portions form but a very small part of the whole property. I invite the attention of Ulster Members to the case of the London corporations. They are large landed proprietors, and they are trying to sell out under the Ashbourne Act, or they will sell out under this Act. They pay no county cess, and some of the London companies have even made their agent a present of his farm, and so they pay no cess whatever. Lord Egmont in my constituency has sold his property near Kanturk, on which he paid his share of the county cess, cut down the pretty plantations round the town, cleared himself from all obligations, and left the country. I fail to see how it can be pretended that landlords to any appreciable extent pay any portion of the county cess. Whatever unfairness there may be in regard to the valuations under £4 that can be met by the Amendment of the hon. Member for North Meath; and in regard to these small holdings in Donegal, Sligo, Galway, Mayo, and part of Kerry, the payment of poor rate has been taken into account by the landlord in fixing the rent. That there is a large amount of discontent because of the heavy burden of county cess there can be no doubt whatever. I am not competent to speak of Tyrone, but I know that such discontent does exist in Ulster and Munster, and in Kerry representations have been made to the Grand Jury that the extra rates make the local burdens intolerable. If, in addition, you impose this additional burden upon the occupiers it is very possible that this grave discontent will culminate into something still more grave. In times of difficulty and distress the tendency towards combined resistance to payment may lead to very serious consequences. Take the case of the tax for raising £1,000 for the widow of Constable Lee. It was levied, and I believe collected, but after fierce, and at times, bloody struggles, in which several persons were injured, and, I believe, it will be found that in many cases it cost £2 to recover £1. Do you propose to perpetuate this state of things, this possibility of scenes of disturbance all over the country? I am not sanguine about the matter, but I hope that under the Bill landlords may be reasonable, and the tenants may purchase at a fair price, and that there will be no necessity to call upon the guarantee at all, but we have to face the fact that in many cases under the more lenient Ashbourne Act tenants, under the pressure of arrears, high rents, and other causes, have been forced into contracts to purchase at a price the instalments of which they will probably be unable to keep up. If this state of things exists to any great extent in Ireland, as I greatly fear it may, then you will have these tenants who, by great exertions, manage to pay their annual instalments, burdened by the default of those who have failed to pay, and perhaps through no fault of their own, and thus causing more default. It is a most reasonable Amendment, and I am sure no Government would resist such a proposal from local Members if applied to a measure dealing with Wales or Scotland; but the habit of coercion for Ireland seems to encourage the Government to be deaf to the representations of Irish Members. We warn the Government that they are doing much to make this Bill inoperative, and they will make it a very dubious gift indeed to the Irish tenantry and the Irish people if they do not accept the Amendment. We are told that the Bill is more or less part of a scheme for the pacification of Ireland. Surely the landlords are as much interested in that as the tenants are, and they ought to pay their fair share of the burden instead of putting it all upon the people from whom they have already taken their full pound of flesh.

(9.26.) Mr. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camborne): I do not think the Amendment is one that need trouble the minds of English Radicals. Reference has been made to the fact that the poor rate falls entirely, or is supposed to fall entirely, on the shoulders of the landlords in the case of holdings with a valuation of under £4. It is perfectly well-known, however, that in many cases the landlord takes very good care to shirk his responsibility, and to saddle his poorest tenants with a portion, at any rate, of the poor rate by consolidating holdings of under £4 so as to bring them up to £4. I know, as a fact, that this was done in the case of the Glenbay Estates, and I have no reason to suppose that other landlords do not adopt the same subterfuges and dodges to relieve themselves at the expense of their tenants. I would suggest to my hon. Friends to be very careful in adopting precautions to prevent landlords acting thus unjustly to the tenants, in case such a concession might be made as they ask for. But on broader grounds I should certainly be disposed to support the Amendment. It appears to me that the principle for which the Chief Secretary is contending is but another illustration of the extent to which the Government are willing to go for the purpose of relieving the landlords in every possible way. They are going directly against a very sound principle which I recollect was advocated in the Western part of England not many years ago by a very eminent financial authority. It was then explained that in any proposal for buying out the landlords it was very desirable that some hold should be maintained on the landlords, and that they should not be allowed to pocket the whole of their purchase-money at one stroke, and march off triumphantly to spend it in London or abroad, but should be compelled to have it spread over a number of years as a sort of rent-charge. The person by whom this principle was enforced and emphasised on the public platform was the right hon. Gentleman who now occupies the chair.

THE CHAIRMAN: I do not see the bearing of this on the question before the Committee.

MR. CONYBEARE: I was going to appeal to the right hon. Gentleman, not on personal grounds at all, but as a matter of financial soundness to consider whether in resisting the Amendment of my hon. Friend he is not going further than he ought to do in the direction of relieving the landlords of every possibility of loss. The right hon. Gentleman proceeded on another line of argument and he said—to do what is proposed by the Amendment would be to make landlords the victims of a conspiracy against the payment of the annuities in the Bill because, he said, he could not conceive the possibility of any risk of loss unless there were a general strike against the payment of what he called rent, but what is now, I suppose, to be called annuities. I would point out to the right hon. Gentleman that according to those who know far more about Ireland than he can possibly pretend to know, in spite of extended tours, he is, by refusing this Amendment, refusing that which would prevent a state of things likely to culminate in a conspiracy, and consequent risk to the British taxpayer. This imposition of a burden on the tenants to the exclusion almost entirely of the landlords will bring about such a feeling of discontent amongst these unfortunate people as will, in all probability, result in a determination not to pay this county cess. A more foolhardy course than that he is following it would be impossible for the right hon. Gentleman to adopt. I should have thought that with the warnings he has staring him in the face even a Minister more brave than the right hon. Gentleman would have paused before repudiating a suggestion such as that just now made. I hope the right hon. Gentleman will even yet see the error of his ways, and will agree to accept the proposal of the hon. Member for Longford.

(9.40.) The Committee divided:—Ayes 63; Noes 71.—(Div. List. No. 172.)

One of the Tellers made a communication to the Chairman.

Mr. SEXTON: The hon. Member for South Down (Mr. M'Cartan) was engaged in writing when the Division was called, and did not hear the Question put. He voted in the "No" Lobby by mistake.

THE CHAIRMAN: In that case his vote ought to be disallowed, but the circumstance that the hon. Member did not hear the Question put should have been announced to me before the result of the Division was declared.

(9.50.) Mr. MAHONY: I beg to move an Amendment to get rid of an objection which can be raised to the clause. I wish, in line 31, after "county," to insert—

"Subject however to the provisions of Section 14 of the Relief of Distress (Ireland) Act, 1880, except in so far as that section provides, as regards holdings under £4 value, for the payment of the whole levy by the owner or lessor."

This subject has already been very largely debated on the last Amendment, therefore I propose to be very brief. I wish the right hon. Gentleman in this Amendment to address himself to the following points, which I think up to this he has avoided. The county cess in 1870 by an Act of this House was as regards all the future lettings divided equally between the owner and the occupier. When in 1880 under an Act for the relief of distress, this House threw an additional burden on the county cess which could not be contemplated in any agreement for tenancy previous to that date, it was especially enacted that any levy under the Act should be divided between the owner and occupier except in the case of holdings of under £4—which I propose to except. Now, I think that that shows the spirit in which this House has approached this matter of county cess up to the present time, that is to say, it has declared its belief that where there is no agreement to the contrary, and no lettings have taken place since 1870, the county cess shall be divided, and that even where there are agreements to the contrary, where the House has proposed fresh taxation which could not be foreseen at the time of the agreements, the county cess shall be divided between the owner and the occupier. Now, this House is going to throw a fresh burden on the taxpayers, and in no agreement previous to this can any tenant or landlord have foreseen the possibility of this fresh burden. Therefore, I say in justice you ought to enact that any levy under this Bill shall be equally divided between the owner and the occupier. I want to call the attention of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary to a matter which will show the injustice of the clause as it stands at present. As the clause stands you will have in Ireland two different cases of tenancy. You will have the majority of cases in which the county cess is generally paid by the owners, but you will have a smaller though a definite number of cases in which at the present moment the county cess is divided between the occupier and owner, and in these cases the levy under the clause will be divided between the occupier and the owner. Does not the Chief Secretary see that the clause will not bring relief to a very large number of tenants, and that its injustice will be clearly apparent? It will relieve some tenants. We imagine that they ought all to be relieved; but as it stands it will actually relieve some tenants from half the burden of this levy, while others, solely because their tenancies were created prior to 1870, or if created after 1870, because the parties entered into an agreement at a time when they could not foresee this Act, will have to bear the whole burden of the levy instead of half. These are the only points I will ask the Chief Secretary to answer. I will press the Amendment to a Division, because it places the matter in a distinct and definite manner before the Committee and does not interfere in any way with the area chosen by the Chief Secretary in substitution for the poor rate, but only asks the Committee to distribute the taxation equitably.

Amendment proposed,

In page 4, line 31, after the word "county," to insert the words "subject however to the provisions of section fourteen of 'The Relief of Distress (Ireland) Act, 1880,' except in so far as that section provides as regards holdings under four pounds valuation for the payment of the whole levy by the owner or lessor."—(Mr. Mahony.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

(9.56.) Mr. A. J. BALFOUR: So far as I understand the hon. Gentleman his objection to the clause as it at present stands is based on the fact that under the Act of 1870 there are a certain number of holdings in Ireland in which the county cess is divided between owner and occupier. Then, says he, in the present instance, this new tax will bear unequally. In some cases it will be paid only by the occupier, and in other cases, half by the occupier and half by the owner. I do not deny that there is an inequality owing to the Act of 1870. All I can say is that it is a difference that affects very few persons, and that the inequality must exist whatever we do with regard to the Bill. The hon. Member seems to think that every cess imposed has been divided in past times. That is certainly not the case. We have already to-night discussed one of the most important examples of new cess—that levied under the Tramways Act of 1883. That cess, with very few exceptions, is entirely thrown on the occupiers. The same inequalities as those the hon. Member complains of exist in connection with the Public Works Loans Act. Though I admit that it is not altogether satisfactory to have these different methods of meting out loans to the Irish tenantry, it appears to me that the anomaly is not of a serious character and that it ought not to oblige us to adopt a principle which is not justified at all on grounds of equity. There does not appear to me to be anything new in the arguments the hon. Member has advanced. In the main I have dealt with his statement in a previous Amendment, and I would, therefore, venture to suggest that we should not waste time in further considering the question.

(10.0.) The Committee divided:—
Ayes 64; Noes 79.—(Div. List, No. 173.)

(10.10.) Amendment proposed, in page 4, line 37, to leave out the words, "Without any previous provision at any presentment Sessions."—(Mr. Sexton.)

*(10.12.) Mr. MADDEN: The Amendment would be entirely inconsistent with the ordinary mode of procedure in all cases of compulsory presentment, and the Government cannot accept the alteration that the hon. Member suggests.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Mr. A. J. Balfour

Amendment proposed, in page 4, line 41, to leave out "shall," and insert "may."—(Mr. Sexton.)

*(10.20.) Mr. MADDEN: In cases of compulsory presentment it is usual to direct the Judge to fiat the presentment. The Government cannot accept the Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

(10.21.) Mr. SEXTON: I do not propose to move the next Amendment in my name, but I will the following one, in support of which two reasons may be urged. The Assizes at which the presentments are made are usually held in March and June, so that between the June presentment and the succeeding March there is an interval of nine months. It may well be imagined that at the end of that interval the Local Authorities have become hard up and stand much in need of the first fruits of the new levy, and if, no matter how late the presentments may be, you seize for Consolidated Fund purposes the first moneys that are collected, you run great danger of doing that which you say you have no desire to do, namely, crippling the Workhouse and Asylum Authorities. My other point is this: according to Grand Jury law in Ireland money raised under a presentment must be applied to the particular purpose named in the presentment, and if you take the first money that comes into the hands of the County Treasurer and alienate it to services other than that for which it is raised, the effect may be that the works named in the presentment may have to be postponed. The works in question may be in connection with Asylums or Industrial Schools, and most serious results might follow if they were postponed for half a year. A final reason in support of the Amendment may be found in the scheme of the Bill itself. Under that scheme the Lord Lieutenant has to direct the county treasurer to pay the money over within two months after the cess is issued. Surely that is a sufficient provision, and it is not necessary to say it shall be paid out of the first moneys. I hope the Chief Secretary will rest content with that, and accept my Amendment.

Amendment proposed, in page 5, line 1, to leave out all after "shall," to "pay," in line 2.—(Mr. Sexton.)

(10.25.) MR. A. J. BALFOUR: An important light was thrown on this Amendment by a discussion earlier in the evening on an Amendment moved by the hon. and learned Member for North Longford. It was pointed out in the course of the discussion on that Amendment that the Government really had no greater power of getting money by these compulsory presentments than under an ordinary process. It is evident, if there is even the remotest truth in the allegation, that there is no security at all in the Bill as it at present stands, except that contained in the words to which the hon. Member objects. If the words are retained, it will be impossible for the county to escape paying the levy, as some taxes must be raised. If we rely on the ordinary form of presentment, we must have some clause of this kind to make it absolutely impossible for the county to escape paying. If this particular provision is not carried, then we must introduce some such clause as was contained in the Bill of last year, by which the Lord Lieutenant, if deprived by the Act of the county of the use of the ordinary machinery for levying taxes, was able to set in motion the machinery for that special object. I am reluctant to introduce into this Bill any such invidious and, to some extent, cumbrous mechanism. I therefore advise the Committee to retain these words, and to this conclusion I have been forced by the tenour of the Debate which occurred before dinner to-night.

(10.28.) MR. SEXTON: I do not see what bearing the Debate before dinner had upon this point. I fail to see how the words which the clause at present includes gives a more effectual grip on the county treasurer than the earlier words. If the treasurer has collected £1,000, and does not pay within two months, you can take action against him just as easily as if you retain these words. I notice the right hon. Gentleman avoids the question with regard to the presentment. I understand that by the Grand Jury Law in Ireland, when a County Authority raises money, it is obliged to apply the money collected under the presentment to the purpose named in the presentment. Now, if the first money collected is intended under the presentment to go to the industrial schools, and you take it to make up the default in the payment of annuities, I understand that, as the law now stands, the authority will be debarred from applying any sums subsequently collected to the school purposes, and the schools will have to suffer for want of funds until the next Assizes.

(10.30.) MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I understand the hon. Member's point to be, that the Lord Lieutenant under this clause will be able to take money for the payment of annuities which had been collected for industrial school purposes, and that it will not be possible to apply to the maintenance of industrial schools money subsequently collected for the payment of the annuities. I will ascertain if that interpretation of the law be accurate, and, if it is, care shall be taken that if money collected for industrial schools is taken for the purposes of this Act, other money collected for this Act shall be made applicable to the schools. With regard to the first portion of the hon. Member's reply, it is one thing to go to the county treasurer and say, "You must give me the money you have in your possession," but it is quite another thing to make a demand upon him when he has no money in his possession. That is the contingency against which we have to guard, and unless we take the precaution contained in these words, the levy to make up the default may never be collected, and the county treasurer will then never be able to hand the money over, for you cannot get blood out of a stone. But if it is made clear that whatever money is collected for the county may be taken for the purposes of this Act, then there will be no difficulty in making up the default. For that reason I would suggest that the Committee adhere to the words of the clause.

(10.33.) MR. KNOX: My hon. Friend's Amendment is supported on two grounds—one technical and the other of substance. The right hon. Gentleman has promised to inquire into the technical ground. I trust we may have the opinion of the Attorney General on the other point as well. I have examined this question somewhat carefully, and I find that there are cases where there is a compulsory levy on a Board of Poor Law Guardians, and a similar provision has been inserted to that which is inserted here, but I cannot find that there is any precedent in the case of a compulsory presentment upon a county for such a provision. I think hon. Members opposite will bear me out when I say that the system of presentments is probably one of the most cumbrous and technical systems of raising money in existence in any country in the world. It is hampered on all sides by most elaborate provisions, and I believe it is the case that if money is raised on a presentment it can be applied only to the particular purpose named in that presentment. What my hon. Friend wants is that industrial schools and other county matters shall not be kept waiting until a sufficient sum has been raised by county cess to pay for the treasurer's demands.

(10.35.) MR. MADDEN: The hon. and learned Member is accurate in saying that the principle has not been applied to county cess, although it has been applied to the analogous case of Boards of Guardians. The system is, no doubt, a very complicated one, and I will see whether it is not possible to add words which shall make it clear that if money primarily raised for one purpose is diverted to the purposes of this Act, the fund from which it has been diverted shall be recouped from subsequent collections.

(10.37.) MR. FLYNN: My hon. Friend the Member for West Belfast has called attention not merely to the illegality of the presentment in its present form, but also to the injustice which may be caused. He enumerated two or three objects for which the presentment money might be required, but he omitted to state that the money in the hands of the county treasurer might be wanted for useful and necessary works and for expenditure already incurred. Men who have been engaged in the repair of roads and bridges will be wanting their wages, and yet they are to be kept out of their money in order to meet this special levy. The Bill is drastic enough in all conscience without importing into it this further injustice. I always understood wages were a first charge on the rates, and surely, in its greed and eagerness to grab every available copper, the Treasury will not commit this further injustice.

(10.39.) MR. MACARTNEY: I think that the point which has been raised by the hon. Gentleman opposite is not a substantial one; but if it is material, it may be met by the addition of the words "out of surplus funds in the treasurer's hands." The presentment which raises money for specific objects only relate to bridges and specific improvements of roads, and the large proportion of the expenditure is entirely met out of the surplus funds in the treasurer's hands. The addition of these words would make the clause impervious to criticism.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I think that the Amendment suggested by the hon. Member is worth considering. According to his experience, the greater part of the taxes for roads and industrial schools, and, indeed, for a very large proportion of the general county expenditure is collected ad hoc, while that collected for specific purposes bears to it a relatively insignificant proportion. Therefore, the suggestion might probably be carried out with advantage. If the Committee will allow me, I will see whether it cannot be carried out on the Report stage.

(10.42.) MR. SEXTON: It is a curious thing to see how the reception of an Amendment by the Chief Secretary depends upon the bench from which it comes. When it comes from these benches the right hon. Gentleman makes a conclusive speech against it; but when it comes from the other side, it immediately becomes very valuable in his eyes, and he promises to do everything he can to carry it out. My only desire is, that money collected for special services in a county shall not be diverted from those services. That is the suggestion of the hon. Member opposite, and it is the same as the one I made, and against which the right hon. Gentleman spoke definitely. However, as long as my purpose is served, I do not care from what quarter the Amendment comes. All I want is, that it shall be carried into effect.

(10.45.) MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The hon. Member is entirely wrong in supposing that his suggestion is the same, either in form or substance, as that which the hon. Member for South Antrim proposes; for under the one emanating from my hon. Friend the Treasury will still be able to secure payment of the special levy out of the first moneys received in respect of the presentment made at the Assizes, with the trifling exception of that allocated to one or two special purposes.

MR. SEXTON: Not trifling.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The hon. Member's Amendment would, on the other hand, put it out of the power of the Government to take any moneys at all.

MR. SEXTON: I am willing you should retain power to have it at the end of two months.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The difference between the two Amendments is great and vital. The hon. Member for West Belfast should be the last man to insinuate that the Government show any preference for Amendments suggested by their own supporters. I have systematically done my best to accept every suggestion of the hon. Member for West Belfast, even in cases where I did not approve of them, and it is, therefore, a most extraordinary statement to make that I have exhibited any partiality in accepting a single suggestion from a supporter of the Government.

(10.47.) COLONEL WARING (Down, N.): I may correct one statement made by the right hon. Gentleman. The money collected for specific purposes is not by any means an infinitesimal sum. It is money for roads, bridges, and other public works. The industrial schools, lunatic asylums, and other Public Institutions, are maintained out of surplus moneys in the treasurer's hand, and, generally speaking, the surplus funds are large, so that the treasurer would probably be able to discharge any demand made upon him. I hope the right hon. Gentleman will adhere to the clause as at present framed.

*(10.48.) MR. KNOX: There is another possible injustice to which no attention has been called. One barony may have paid its cess and another may not, with the result that the money having been seized by the Treasury the barony which has paid will suffer from the neglect of its roads and other public works.

(10.49.) MR. SEXTON: After the extremely conciliatory speech of the Chief Secretary, I ask to withdraw the Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment proposed, in page 5, line 7, to leave out "and charged against," to "in such order," in line 8, inclusive.—(Mr. Sexton.)

Amendment agreed to.

Amendment proposed, in page 5, lines 13 and 14, to leave out "having regard to," and insert "in accordance with."—(Mr. Sexton.)

*MR. MADDEN: I will not oppose the Amendment if the words "as nearly as may be" are added.

Amendment agreed to.

Verbal Amendments agreed to.

*(10.54.) MR. KNOX: In the absence of my hon. Friend the Member for Longford (Mr. T. M. Healy), I beg to move the Amendment standing in his name, to insert "in Council, in the prescribed manner" after "Lord Lieutenant." Another Amendment stands immediately after it in my own name, having the same object in view, but reaching that object in a slightly different manner. The Government may urge that the decision of these questions may be of an administrative character. I think the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary will probably agree that some sort of appeal should be given, and in the Amendment which stands in my own name I have adopted a provision which appeared in the English Local Government Act of 1888. Under the Local Government Act, 1888, for England, in Section 29, a similar method of decision to this I suggest was provided, and I think the framers of that Act probably had in their minds the fact that these questions would be questions in which administrative and judicial action would be so intermingled that it would be difficult to decide them according to the procedure of actions at law. It has been found that this proceeding has been exceedingly satisfactory. Counsel on either side have usually agreed as to facts, and the matter has been brought before the Court in a manner enabling the Court to decide with the least delay and difficulty. There is one other advantage. The right hon. Gentleman may probably say there ought not to be interminable appeals in these cases. The clause will only give one appeal from the Lord Lieutenant to the High Court, not from the High Court to the Court of Appeal. In that way I have also followed the procedure which has been prescribed in the Local Government Act for England. It has been decided by the Court of Appeal in England that similar words in the section of that Act give no appeal to the Court of Appeal from the decision of the High Court. The right hon. Gentleman may point out that it is not in form an appeal from the decision of the Department, but in substance it is. As a matter of fact, I understand that the procedure is this: The Local Authority first consults the Local Government Board in England, the Board gives an opinion, and it is only when that opinion is unsatisfactory that it is found necessary to take the decision of the Court. Practically, and in all essential features, the procedure in the Local Government Act of 1888 will be followed under this Act. The form in which this proposal is made is somewhat vague, I know; but the matters that may arise, the many questions to decide are so various and so difficult to put in a form of words that it is well to leave it vague, leaving the Court to decide under rules what particular class of cases should come before it. I venture, therefore, to press upon the Attorney General that either the one or the other of these proposals should be inserted in the Bill.

Amendment proposed,

In page 5, line 23, to leave out "and his decision shall be final," and insert—"Provided that, if any county or local authority or person shall feel aggrieved by such determination, such county or local authority or person may apply to the High Court of Justice in Ireland in such summary manner as, subject to any rules of court, may be directed by the court; and the court, after hearing such parties, and taking such evidence (if any) as it thinks just, shall finally decide such question."—(Mr. Knox)

*(10.59.) MR. MADDEN: This Amendment raises a question of great importance. A number of matters are left to be determined by some tribunal, and, following a usual course, these have been left to the determination of the Lord Lieutenant. I do not think the section in the Local Government Act to which the hon. Member refers is of any use as a precedent, for this reason—that the questions which by this Act may be carried up to the High Court are of a strictly legal nature, questions as to whether any business power or liability is, or is not, attached to a County Council or permitted under the Act—matters, in fact, of construction of the Act. The questions the Lord Lieutenant will have to decide under this Act will be more or less of an administrative character, and I think, on the whole, I would venture to advise the Government that the Privy Council, which is not an exclusively Legal Body, is the better tribunal. This, however, would not be effected by the adoption of the Amendment before the Committee, which leaves these questions to the decision of the Lord Lieutenant in Council. The action of the Lord Lieutenant in Council does not involve any Judicial decision of the Privy Council, but merely expresses the formal assent of the Privy Council. But these are points of detail. The Government are prepared to adopt the principle that the decision of the Lord Lieutenant shall not be final, and I am disposed to advise my right hon. Friend that the Privy Council might be with advantage adopted as the tribunal for the consideration of other than purely legal questions. If the hon. Member will withdraw his Amendment now, the matter shall be carefully considered with the object of giving effect to the principle I have mentioned.

(11.5.) MR. KNOX: I quite admit that the form of the Amendment may not be altogether satisfactory, but in regard to the procedure in the Local Government Act, though in form the questions arising for decision would seem to be chiefly of law, as a matter of fact they are questions in which law and administration are mingled. Of course, questions arise as to the construction of the Act, and so would such questions arise here, and questions such as I imagine under the English Act have to be decided. With great deference to the opinion of the Attorney General, probably, if he would consult the President of the Local Government Board as to the working of the section in the Act of 1888, it might be found that in some ways the procedure adopted under that section is more suitable to this case than an appeal to the Privy Council. The only objection I have to the suggestion the right hon. Gentleman has made is, that I should like somewhat more of a pledge that an appeal shall be given in all cases in which a person may feel aggrieved. I do not think it would be desirable, by the use of any form of words, to prevent an appeal in certain cases or to give it only in a certain class of cases. It is difficult to know beforehand what class of cases may arise and I therefore think an appeal should be given in all cases leaving the appellate power the means of dealing as all Courts do with frivolous cases. I should like the right hon. Gentleman to give a specific pledge that an appeal shall be given in all cases where a person or an authority feels aggrieved.

(11.8.) MR. MADDEN: The subsection to which the Amendment refers relates to a certain class of cases only—

“Questions which arise as to the share of any County or other Local Authority in any fund or sum dealt with in this Act, or as to the rights or burdens of any County or Local Authority or persons in respect of payments out of the Guarantee Fund or the Local Taxation (Ireland) Account.”

Without giving an absolute undertaking, I am prepared to say that these are cases in which there should be an appeal.

*(11.8.) MR. J. MORLEY: It is satisfactory that the right hon. Gentleman has admitted so much. It is perfectly clear under the clause that though questions, as to the share of a county, are questions of account, yet questions of principle may arise, and are inseparable from these questions of account on which it is proposed to grant an appeal. The decision of the Lord Lieutenant as to rates or burdens clearly might involve questions of large construction. I, therefore, hope that when the right hon. Gentleman puts his Amendment on the Paper it will be in a full and complete fashion.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

(11.10.) MR. KNOX: The Amendment I now move is simply to provide that Returns shall be provided for the information of Parliament, and it is practically similar to the information which it has been agreed shall be furnished under Clause 1, the only difference being that I do not propose that the Returns shall be made more than once a year.

Amendment proposed, in page 5, line 33, at end, to add—

(7.) “Returns shall be presented to Parliament in respect of every financial year, showing—

- (a.) What sums have been paid out of the cash portion of the Guarantee Fund to the Land Purchase Account or to the Consolidated Fund in respect of each county;
- (b.) What sums have been applied towards the cost of providing labourers' cottages in each county;
- (c.) What notices or orders have been given or made by the Treasury under this section;
- (d.) What requisitions have been sent by the Lord Lieutenant to the secretaries of Grand Juries under this section;
- (e.) What presentments have been made under this section;
- (f.) What regulations have been made by the Lord Lieutenant under this section;
- (g.) What questions have been determined by the Lord Lieutenant under this section, and how such questions have been determined.”—(Mr. Knox.)

(11.11.) MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have no objection to the fullest information being given to Parliament from time to time as to the working of the Act in all its important essentials, but from a drafting point of view I do not think it is well to load the Bill with an excessive amount of details to be made the subject of Returns. It is quite true we established a precedent in Clause 1, but I think it is an inconvenient method to adopt. I shall suggest on Report that the provision as to Returns shall be taken out of Clause 1 and inserted in a clause specially ad hoc determining what particulars shall be given in an annual Return. To stick at the end of each clause a long catalogue of items on which Parliament shall be informed will make the drafting of the Bill very cumbersome, and I venture to suggest that at the end of the Bill we should add a clause enumerating those particulars upon which it is desirable Parliament should be informed.

MR. KNOX: If the right hon. Gentleman will agree to the particulars which I ask being given, I have no objection to withdraw the Amendment, and I quite agree it will be better to have them all inserted in one clause.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I do not pledge myself or ask the hon. Member to defer his Amendment now. If he does not like my catalogue or wishes to add to it, of course he can raise any objection when the clause is moved.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Question put, "That Clause 4, as amended, stand part of the Bill."

(11.15.) The Committee divided:—
Ayes 132; Noes 77.—(Div List, No. 174.)

Clause 5.

(11.25.) MR. J. MORLEY: This clause raises points which have exerted as much interest in many parts of Ireland as almost any portion of the Bill. This 5th clause purposes to enact that where an advance for the purchase of a holding is less than twenty times the annual value of the holding, then during the first five years, the annuity shall be 80 per cent. of such annual value. We have heard again and again that one of the main objects of this Bill is to reach those districts where the economical and agrarian conditions are difficult. The effect of this clause is to make every tenant pay for five years at the rate of 20 years' purchase. Though a tenant may have purchased for 10, 12 or 15 years' purchase, yet for five years certain, and possibly for an indefinite time at the will and discretion of the Lord Lieutenant, he will pay an annuity as great as though he had bought at 20 years' purchase. It comes to this, that for five years, and possibly for more he is to pay an annuity which is greater than the substantial annual value of the holding. If, for example, 15 years' purchase is the proper price, to make him pay 20 years' purchase is to make him pay, say, £8, where otherwise he would pay £5 or £6, or even £4, and therefore is to make him pay an amount greater than the substantial value of the holding. How do the tenants put the matter to themselves at this moment? That, after all, is the important thing from the point of view of the advocates of purchase. They say, "We are going to be compelled to pay for five years 8 per cent. instead of 4 per cent., which is the fair interest on the price." If a purchaser has come to terms at 10 years' purchase on a rent of £10 the price is £100, and the ordinary annuity will be £4, but under this provision for five years certain and for an indefinite time longer he will pay not £4, but £8. The new purchaser, therefore, will commence his new career under circumstances of exceptional difficulty. At the very outset it will affect his inclination to purchase, because by this provision the relief to be afforded to him will not be immediate nor substantial, but may be the very opposite of relief. There is another aspect of the question, which I hope the Chief Secretary will not refuse to consider. How will the Land Commissioners regard a security which is burdened for five or more years in the manner proposed in the clause? It is obvious that the likelihood of a tenant being able to meet his engagements, will be impaired for as long a time as this additional burden is cast upon him. The Land Commissioners have constantly refused to sanction bargains on the basis of 12 or 15 years' purchase because they have held the security to be inadequate; a fortiori will the security be inadequate where the annuity is burdened for four or five years with this extra payment. The clause, I admit, will do no harm to the strong, comfortable tenant who can afford to pay for five years or more at the rate of 25 years' purchase, but the struggling tenant cannot afford to pay the extra price, and he will therefore be discouraged from entering into negotiations, and when he has entered into them may not be able to fulfil his bargain. Not to do more than enumerate the points, there is just one more. There can be no doubt, Ireland being what it is, that this provision lends itself very easily to evasion. I should think the Chief Secretary might have taken into account the temptation which this provision will hold out to evasion, that is to say, it will be easy for bargains to be made between landlord and tenant, which will bank the Government of their Insurance Fund. Supposing the rent of a holding is £10, and the price agreed upon £100, then the normal annuity would be £4; but 80 per cent. of the annual value would be £8, and, therefore, for five years the purchaser will pay, not £4, the normal annuity, but £8—that is to say 8 per cent. for his money. But what may happen? The tenant may go to his landlord and say, "This is very hard upon me; to you it makes no difference. I am willing to pay you your price of £100, but why should you not reduce my annual value from £10 to £5?" What will the effect of that be? Why, the result will be that he will pay the 80 per cent. on £5, or £4, which will exactly equal the amount of the normal annuity under the original arrangement, and thus the Insurance Fund will not be benefited. The Chief Secretary and the Attorney General for Ireland will be able to follow this argument, and I submit that there is no answer to the proposition that the landlord without anything fraudulent on his part, putting no loss on himself, and not imperilling the security of the Exchequer, would be able by an arrangement of this kind to bring to nought this provision which I believe to be injurious to all that is best in the policy of the Bill. What is the object of this tenants' Insurance Fund? There is no such provision for insurance in the Ashbourne Act. The object of the Government can hardly be to improve the security, for that object cannot be gained by impoverishing the tenant at the very outset of his new arrangement. If you want to improve this security you ought to be content with what the Land Commission do now in cases where they are dissatisfied with the security of the holding—increase the amount of the landlord's deposit. If security were the object of the Government in making this provision that is what they would do. They would increase the amount of the guarantee deposit, or else they would enable the vendor to agree to do so as a substitute for this Insurance Fund. I do not believe that the object can be security. I think the object must have been to increase artificially the price. I do not wish to impute sinister objects to the right hon. Gentleman; but it is clear that landlords will be likely to get high rates of purchase—20 years or more—if, when tenants are hesitating whether they can pay the stipulated sum or not, the landlords can point to tenants who have purchased on neighbouring estates, and who are paying at the rate of 20 years' purchase. Another point which calls for remark is that the annual value in Ireland is often unreal, for there are estates where the rents as put down in the books have not been paid for six or seven years, and are merely nominal. By taking as one basis of calculation in these purchase arrangements a value which is merely a book rent, and by multiplying it, as this clause proposes to do, you will impose a great hardship upon the would-be purchasers, and so balk the operation of the Bill. I will not detain the Committee longer. I have put my objection to the clause as briefly as I could; but I submit that there is no clause in the Bill which is sure to balk the object which the Chief Secretary has avowed as his main purpose, and no clause which is more likely to cause confusion.

Amendment proposed, to leave out Sub-section 1.—(Mr. J. Morley.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'Where' stand part of the Clause."

(11.40.) MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I will endeavour to deal briefly with the important statement of objection just made by the right hon. Gentleman. I am sorry that in introducing a speech otherwise purely argumentative he should have suggested that the provision in question was introduced with a view to artificially raising the price of land.

MR. J. MORLEY: I was careful to say that I could find no other explanation for it. I did not impute any sinister motive to the right hon. Gentleman.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am ready to accept that explanation. I do not say that the right hon. Gentleman imputed a sinister motive, but that he found a provision in the Bill which he could only account for by an imputation which I should regard as sinister, because it suggests that our desire is to raise the price of the commodity which we profess to wish to see fixed by natural arrangement between those who desire to buy and those who desire to sell. But what plausibility is there for such an extraordinary suggestion on the part of the right hon. Gentleman? The whole tenour of his argument against this sub-section, and the whole tenour of every argument I have ever heard against it, is that the tenants will be made much less desirous of buying owing to the fact that during the first five years at least after the purchase they will be obliged to pay 10, 20, perhaps even 30 per cent., more than if they had bought under the provisions of Lord Ashbourne's Act. Did anyone ever before hear of an accusation being brought against anybody of desiring to raise the price of a commodity, and endeavouring to effect that object by rendering the buyers less desirous of buying? Is it not clear that if the provision had the effect which is attributed to it, and which I, to a certain extent, admit, of making the Irish tenant less anxious to become the owner of his holding than he otherwise would be, the result would be not to artificially raise the price of land, but to diminish it artificially? If there is any ground of complaint in this it rests not with the tenants, but with the landlords, who see the market value of their property reduced. So much for that part of the right hon. Gentleman's speech, which I gladly put aside, because it was not in harmony with the general tenour of his argument, which was characterized by great moderation. A more forcible point urged by the right hon. Gentleman was that the clause would conduce to collusion between landlord and tenant in order to get the rents lowered, but there are judicial rents, and it is clear that those cannot be altered by private arrangement. It is conceivable that such collusion might occur in the case of holdings of which the rents are not judicially fixed, but I will consider whether it would not be easy to introduce words to enable the Land Commission to take cognizance of any colourable fraud of that kind, and by which the objection of the right hon. Gentleman can effectually be met. The main objection of the right hon. Gentleman to the subsection is that it will be operative, and not inoperative, but his argument was entirely founded on fallacy. He supposes that the tenant will be always considering what is the capital value of his holding. I do not believe that anyone acquainted with the Irish tenant really is of opinion that that is the mode in which he will look at this transaction. What the tenant will look to is not the capital transaction, but the transaction as far as the interest on that capital is concerned; the amount of annuity which he will henceforth have to pay as compared with the rent he has had hitherto to pay. If this is true, what becomes of the sense of injustice and loss which the right hon. Gentleman attributes to the Irish tenant? At the very worst under this section the Irish tenant will save at least 20 per cent. on his former payments, less the amount of county cess or poor rate, which is estimated by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Bridgeton Division at about 7 per cent. The saving to the Irish tenant would thus be 13 per cent. [Laughter.] Hon. Members may regard it as an insignificant amount, but after all it is a larger amount than has stood between the landlords and the tenants in those internecine quarrels which have had such a disturbing influence upon Ireland during the last few years. On most of the Plan of Campaign estates on which the most acrimonious controversies have existed between the landlords and the tenants, the difference that has so widely separated the respective combatants has been something less than the amount now sneered at by the hon. Gentleman opposite. So much for the statement that the tenants will feel themselves aggrieved. Now I come to the question of the securities, and I have always brought forward this proposal as one which increases the security. The right hon. Gentleman says it will diminish the security, and he talked as if this was a kind of additional burden thrown upon the holdings, but surely the Committee will see that the reverse is the fact. Let us take the case of a small holding in the West of Ireland, where probably the price of land would be small, and the tenant's insurance would, therefore, be relatively large, and let us ask ourselves what would happen. If you sold under the Ashbourne Act the tenant would, no doubt, get an advantage of say, 40 per cent. off judicial rent. In good years he would have the full advantage of that 40 per cent.; he would, no doubt, spend it all. Bad years would come—and recollect you are working and must work with the tenant's insurance on an automatic and rigid mathematical system. When bad years come, as come they would, the tenants would have nothing in hand to meet the payments, the Land Commissioners would have to proceed against the defaulters, the tenants would be evicted and the holdings would be sold. But take the case of insurance under the clause as it stands. The tenant gets a reduction of, let us say, 13 per cent. in his rent. During the first five years he is not allowed to get more than that unless misfortune happens to him. In ordinary years he is obliged to pay an amount to the Land Commission decidedly less than he ever had to pay to his landlord; a sum of money out of his instalments is annually laid by; a bad year comes, he cannot meet his engagements—he cannot pay his annuity and falls into arrear with the Land Commission. Well, the Land Commission do not find themselves in the invidious position of the Commissioners under the Ashbourne Act. They are not obliged to evict, but may say to the tenant, "We have saved up on your account 20 per cent. of your annuity during the first five years of your tenancy, and with that we now relieve you from the consequences of your misfortune and will set you on your legs again. You may have to pay a little more for the first two or three years to bring up the insurance to the original point, and as soon as that is done you will be able to go on in your holding paying a less amount than you would have done under the Ashbourne Act in consequence of the interest which has been accumulating on your deposit." Which of these two systems would be the easier to work and would throw the higher burden on the Land Commission and this House? I must say I listen with astonishment to hon. Gentlemen who at one time go about talking of the English taxpayer and the English Exchequer involving the Irish tenant in hardship, and then come down and refuse to accept a provision which, more than any other provision in the Bill, will probably diminish the necessity for harsh eviction. Then I must point out the extraordinary inconsistency between the argument just used by the right hon. Gentleman and those with which I am overwhelmed by hon. Gentlemen who sit around him. In earlier Debates those hon. Gentlemen told me there was inequality between the annuities paid by the purchasing tenant, and the rent paid to the landlords would cause the Bill to conduce not to public order, but to public disorder. I have always felt, and I feel still, that there is force in that objection. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby urged this very argument against the Bill of last year. It is to obviate this danger that the provision in the Bill now under discussion has been inserted, and I shall look with greater misgiving to the working of the measure if such provision, which is in the interest of social order, of the security of the State, and of conciliation and fairness to the tenant were omitted.

MR. HALLEY STEWART AND MR.
MAHONY.

On the Motion for Adjournment,

(12.13.) MR. HALLEY STEWART (Lincolnshire, Spalding): I ask the indulgence of the House while I reply to a statement made in my absence at the opening of the proceedings this afternoon. Immediately on arriving at the House I was handed a letter by the doorkeeper, in which the hon. Member for North Meath requested my attendance during Question time, as he intended to make certain references to me. I inquired of the doorkeeper when the letter was handed in, and found that it was given to the doorkeeper during Question time. That is scarcely giving the notice to which I think I was entitled, seeing that I was to be drawn into a personal controversy with another hon. Member. The hon. Member for North Meath, in his statement to the House, challenged directly the correctness of a charge made against him; he declared to be absolutely incorrect and misleading the report of his words, and also asserted that what he said was said privately. I challenge both those assertions. The conversation was not private, and the statement that was repeated was in substance and in essence, if not verbally, correct. There was no seal of secrecy whatever on the conversation, and that this was so is shown by the fact that the hon. Member now admits that he did not say anything to imply that the words he was speaking were private, or carried with them any injunction to or suggestion of secrecy. Secondly, these words, which are alleged to be private, were used in the presence of another Member of this House—namely, the hon. Member for the Wansbeck Division, who will corroborate me in this particular as to the words not having been spoken privately, that they were unsolicited, and were uttered in friendly controversy. Thirdly, I have to say that the words were spoken in a discussion as to the hon. Member's political action, and as to what ought to be my action at the present time. The conversation took place in the Dining Room in what I may call comparative publicity, and no suggestion was made that it was under the seal of privacy or secrecy. Surely no man need be ashamed of reasons which lead him to identify himself with a particular Party. The words were used by the hon. Member as an argument to induce me to break off a connection I have formed with political friends. The hon. Member has given an explanation of what he said. The words he used were—

"You would cut off your right hand rather than be identified with a Party which is supported by men like the Irish priests."

Those are the very words used. I frankly admit that the hon. Member did not say he referred to the whole body of the priests—on the other hand, he did not limit his words to a section. He spoke of the priests as priests. There is no desire to amplify the scope of the hon. Member's remarks. I think, judging from the hon. Member's explanation of what he said, i.e., that if hon. Members realised the nature and extent of the connection between this House and the priests they would not be so ready to identify themselves with hon. Members who rely on that connection—that he still continues to hold the same view although he does not express it with such graphic terms as when conversing with me personally. I have no desire to accentuate any division between Members of this House. I hope the House will not think I have unduly trespassed on its attention in thus attempting to justify myself, but I thought it necessary to reply to the statements of the hon. Member that the conversation was inaccurately repeated, and that it was private. It has been accurately repeated, and was not private.

(12.17.) MR. MAHONY (Meath, N.): I do not intend to trouble the House at any length. I agree with the hon. Member that I did not ask him to regard the conversation as private. All I did to-night was to express surprise that any conversation taking place in the dining-room or in any other portion of the House where hon. Members meet one another socially should be published in the newspapers. As regards the difference of recollection between the hon. Member and myself, I do not desire to enter into a dispute with the hon. Member. I am absolutely certain in my own mind that I gave the substance of what I actually said. The hon. Member says the version I have given this evening is identical in meaning with the report in the Press. For myself I see a very great difference. He does not; I am perfectly content that his version shall go before the House and the public and that the matter shall rest where it is. The House had a statement from the hon. Member for the Spalding Division, and it has had my own statement.

(12.19.) DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid): I felt rather ashamed that an Irish Protestant Member should have been guilty of such conduct of the hon. Gentleman.

MR. HALLEY STEWART: I should like to know whether I am expected to give corroboration—the corroboration of the hon. Member for the Wansbeck Division of Northumberland, who is now in his place.

MR. T. M. HEALY: This is most interesting; I hope that, as the hon. Member for North Meath has laid down a canon that everything said in this House is to be held sacred, that rule will be applied not only in this House, but in other houses, and also in hovels and castles. I suppose Hawarden is a castle, and we may expect that statements made there and elsewhere will in future be considered to have been made under the seal of secrecy, and will be respected accordingly, especially when those statements are made—not casually, but by one man as a Statesman and the depository of public confidence to another man who occupies a representative position. The horror which the hon. Member has expressed at finding his conversations here reported reflects great credit upon him, and I hope the hon. Member will take the earliest opportunity of communicating the shock he has felt to his distinguished leader the Member for Cork.

House adjourned at twenty minutes after Twelve o'clock, till Monday next.

COMMITTEES

It is incompetent for a Member to move that the Com. consist of 30 Members when the House has decided that 20 shall stand part of the Question April 9, 151, 169

An Instruction to Com. that refers to a preliminary procedure which is subject to and under the jurisdiction of the Examiners, and governed by Standing Orders in relation to Private Bills, cannot be moved. The proposal would alter the preliminary procedure previous to the Bill being presented to Parliament, and is therefore outside scope of Bill April 9, 154

An Instruction to Com. that proposes to substitute a new tribunal for that proposed in a Bill, when the House on the 2R. rejected an Amendment embodying a similar proposal, cannot be moved April 9, 155

It is safer for a Com. in going into a question of Provisional Orders to adopt an Instruction. If the Com. were not empowered to deal with the question of Provisional Orders they could not embody recommendations respecting them in the Bill, although they could make a special Report April 9, 158

A Member when he puts a question should not take up a rumour, but should assume responsibility, and ask whether or not a certain fact is true April 20, 924

RULES AND ORDER OF DEBATE

An Amendt. introducing a question of general policy as an objection to a particular Private Bill when the Company promoting the Bill are simply asking for further powers is out of order. The proper course would be to make a Motion for an alteration of the general policy applicable to all such Companies April 7, 2, 3, 4

A Motion with an Amendt. moved as an Amendt. to Motion for going into Com. of Supply, which becomes an adjourned Debate in consequence of the lapse of time, stands thus:—On a Division all the words of the Motion that the Speaker do now leave the Chair were negatived, except the first word "That"; the words of the Amendt. to the Motion for Supply were added, and this Motion then became the Substantive Question. As the House passed no definite decision either on the first Amendt. as a Substantive Question, or upon the Amendt. which was moved as an addition to the Substantive Question, on coming to the Order the Speaker would have again to propose the Question—the Substantive Res. and the Amendt. which has been moved to it—and if the Amendt. be carried, the Speaker would have to put the whole Res. with the addendum attached to it; and then the House must express its opinion upon the Substantive Motion amended by the addendum, or, if the addition of the words be negatived, on the Motion alone. If Supply is taken on Monday or on Thursday the Speaker would not be able to propose the Question on the Res., but would be obliged to leave the Chair without Question put. On Friday the Speaker would have to put, not the Question on the Amendt. to the Motion for going into Com. of Supply, but the Question that the Speaker do now leave the Chair, upon which the Amendt. on the Paper specially put down for Friday would take precedence of any other Amendt. But it would be open to the Government to offer facilities for treating the subject as a Motion, and by giving that Motion a place among the Orders of the Day on a Government night April 13, 1884

A Member may move either that the Com. of certain new Standing Orders be postponed for this Session, or the Adjournment of the Debate; but the Motion for the Adjournment must confine the Debate to the Question of Adjournment; an Amendt. to omit certain lines of the new Standing Order would be sufficient, and an issue might be raised upon it April 22, 1080

A Res. that applies to the whole United Kingdom—there being four Bills before the House dealing with the matter embodied in the Res. and the one Bill for England, withdrawn to enable a Member to proceed with his Motion. The terms of the Res. should be confined to England. That would not only obviate every objection on the ground of anticipation, but the Motion would not prejudice the other Bill's April 28, 1687

SUPPLY

There is nothing in the Standing Orders to show that if Supply is not placed first it ought be placed second on a Friday. The Standing Order XI. has been superseded by the Res. passed giving precedence to the Irish Land Bill over all Orders of the Day and Notices of Motions. If Supply had been put second, there being no effective Supply down, the only result would have been that the Government would put off Supply as soon as that Order was reached. Friday is a Government night, subject only to the limitation of Supply standing first. If Supply could be got out of the way, the Government would take the other Orders of the Day. On a Tuesday the case is different. Precedence would be given to the Land Bill; and if the proceedings thereon came to an end before 12 o'clock, private Members would re-enter into their rights. Notices would be next taken, the precedence being given only for that particular Government Order. The Standing Order XI. is virtually a repeal, or a suspension, so often as the Land Bill is appointed on Friday. Otherwise Supply would stand first, and the Speaker would have to propose the Question, "That the Speaker now leave the Chair," on which private Members' Motions would come on, and then the Res. to give precedence to the said Bill would be rendered inoperative and ineffective. When precedence is given to particular business, it implies the suspension of the Standing Orders ordinarily regulating the course of business May 1, 1854

[cont.
